Tenth to the queen's maj. and imperial crown of this realm, and on the 4th of Feb. it passed that house, with the addition of reserved rents, nomine decimarum, and parsonages impropriate.—On the 9th of Feb. was read for the 3rd time a bill for the recognition of the queen's title to the imperial crown of this realm, which was, nem. con. assented to, and committed to the queen's solicitor and the clerk of the crown to carry to the lower house. On the same day was read a bill wherein certain offences are declared treason; and another bill against scandalous and seditious words.

Act for restoring the Supremacy.] Jan. 30th, a committee of 24 members of the commons were appointed to meet and treat of a convenient subsidy. At the same time it was recommended to them to consider of the validity of the summons, both to the last and also this present parl. in which said writ, the words 'supremum caput ecclesie' were omitted. Feb. 3rd, Mr. Carrel reported from the said committee, that it was agreed by them, "that the want of the said words did not at all hinder, or impeach, the validity of the said writs of summons to the preceeding parliaments, or this now assembled." After clearing this point, which was agreed to by the whole house, the bill itself met with no opposition that we can find in their Journal: that house, according to Cambden, being now composed of more protestants than papists; though the latter did not stick to say that secretary Cecil had played an underhand game in the elections; and that several knights of shires and burgesses for cities and corporations, had been returned for this very purpose." The act which met with the greatest opposition in this parl. is intitled, "an act for restoring the Supremacy to the imperial crown of this realm; and repealing divers acts made to the contrary." On the 13th of Feb. the said bill, with certain provisos added thereto by the lords, and sundry other amendments, was concluded in that house. The abp. of York, the earl of Shrewsbury, the visc. Montague, the bps. of London, Winchester, Worcester, Landaff, Coventry, Exeter, Chester, Carlisle, and abbot of Westminster, dissenting. It was sent down to the commons, who kept it till March the 22nd, and then returned it to the lords, with a new proviso, added by them. This was read thrice on the same day, and concluded; the former abp. and bps. dissenting. Mr. Cambden informs us, that the 9 prelates above-mentioned vigorously opposed the bill; but he has left us none of the arguments used against it. But Mr. Strype, that careful collector of ecclesiastical memoirs relating to the Reformation, has given us two speeches, delivered in the Lords, against this Bill of Supremacy. The orators on this occasion were Nicholas Heath, abp. of York, and Cuthbert Scott, bp. of Chester; whose speeches, though long, must nevertheless have a place in this history.

The Abp. of York rose up in his place, and spoke thus: "My lords all; with humble submission of my whole talk unto your honours, I purpose to speak to the body of this act, touching the Supremacy: and that the doings of this honourable assembly may therein be always further honourable, two things are right needful and necessary of your wisdoms to be considered. 1st, when by the virtue of this act of Supremacy, we must forsake and flee from the see of Rome, it would be considered by your wisdoms what manner of danger and inconvenience, or else whether there be none at all. 2nd, when the intent of this act is to give unto the queen's highness a supremacy, it would be considered of your wisdoms what this supremacy is, and whether it do consist in spiritual govt. or in temporal. If in temporal, what further authority can this house give unto her highness, than she hath already, by right and inheritance, and not by your gift, but by the appointment of God? She being our sovereign lord and lady, our king and queen, our emperor and empress; other kings and princes of duty ought to pay tribute unto her, she being free from them all. If you will say that this supremacy doth consist in spiritual govt. then it would be considered what this spiritual govt. is, and in what points it doth chiefly remain. Which being first agreed upon, it would be further considered of your wisdoms, whether this house may grant them unto her highness or not; and whether her highness be an apt person to receive the same or not. And by the thorough examination of all these parts, your honours shall proceed in this matter groundly upon thorough knowledge, and not be deceived by ignorance.—Now to the 1st point, wherein I promised to examine this forsaking and flying from the see of Rome, what matter either of weight, danger, or inconvenience doth consist therein? And if by this our relinquishing of the see of Rome there were none other matter therein, than a withdrawing of our obedience from the pope's person, Paul IV. of that name, which hath declared himself to be a very austere stern father unto us, ever since his first entrance into Peter's chair, then the cause were not of such great importance as it is in very deed; when, by the relinquishing and forsaking of the see of Rome, we must forsake and fly from these four things. 1st, we must forsake and fly from all general councils. 2nd, we must fly from all canonical and ecclesiastical laws of the church of Christ. 3rd, from the judgment of all other Christian princes. 4th, and lastly, we must forsake and fly from the unity of Christ's church, and by leaping out of Peter's ship, hazard ourselves to be overwhelmed and drowned in the waters of schism, sects, and divisions.—First, touching general councils, I shall only name unto you these 4: Nicene council, Constantinopolitan, Ephesine, and Chalcedon council, which are approved of all men, doubted of or denied of no man. St. Gregory writeth in this wise, 'sicut enim sancti evangelii quatuor libros, sic hæc quatuor concilia, scilicet Nicen. Constantinopolitan.

Ephesin. et Chalcedonese suscipere ac venerari me fateor.' At the Nicene council, the bps. which were assembled did write their epistle to Sylvester, then bp. of Rome, that their decrees made there must be confirmed by his authority. At the council kept at Constantinople, all the bps. there were obedient to Damase, then bp. of Rome. He, as chief judge of that council, did give sentence against the heretics, Macedonians, Sabellians, and Eunomians; which Eunomius was both an Arian, and the first author of this heresy, that only faith doth justify; and here, by the way, it is much to be lamented, that we, the inhabitants of this realm, are much more inclined to raise up the errors and sects of ancient and condemned heretics, than to follow the approved doctrine of the most catholic and learned fathers of Christ's church. At the Ephesin council, Nestorius the heretic was condemned by Celestine, then bp. of Rome, he being the chief judge there. At Chalcedon all the bps. assembled there, did write their humble submission unto Leo, then bp. of Rome, wherein they did acknowledge him to be their chief head. Therefore, to deny the see apostolic, were to condemn and set at nought the judgment of these four councils.—2nd, we must forsake and fly from all canonical and ecclesiastical laws of Christ's church, whereunto we have already confessed our obedience at the font, saying, 'credo sanctam ecclesiam catholicam;' which article containeth, that we must believe not only that there is a holy catholic church, but that we must receive also the doctrine and sacraments of the same church, obey her laws, and live according unto the same; which laws do depend wholly upon the authority of the see apostolic. And like as it was here openly confessed by the judges of this realm, that the laws made and agreed upon in the higher and lower house of this hon. parl. be of small or none effect, before the real assent of the king and prince be given thereto; semblably ecclesiastical laws made cannot bind the universal church of Christ without the real assent and confirmation of the see apostolic.—The 3rd, we must forsake and fly from the judgment of all Christian princes, whether they be Protestants or Catholic, when none of them do agree with these our doings; king Henry VIII. being the very first that ever took upon him the title of Supremacy. And whereas it was of late, here in this house, said by an hon. man, that the title is of right due unto the king, for that he is a king, then it would follow, that Herod, being a king, should be supreme head of the church at Jerusalem; and Nero, the emperor, supreme head of the church of Christ at Rome, they both being infidels, and thereby no members of Christ's church. And if our saviour Jesus Christ, at his departure from this world, should have left the spiritual govt. of his church in the hands of emperors and kings, and not to have committed the same unto his apostles, how negligent then should he have left his church, it shall appear right well; by calling to your remembrance, that the emperor Constantius Magnus was the first Christian emperor, and reigned about 300 years after the absence of Christ: if, therefore, by your proposition, Constantine, the first Christian emperor, was the first chief head and spiritual governor of Christ's church throughout his empire, then it followeth, how that our saviour Christ, for that whole time and space of 300 years, until the coming of this Constantine, left his church, which he had dearly bought by the effusion of his most precious blood, without a head; and therefore how untrue the saying of this nobleman was, it shall further appear by the example of king Ozias, and also of king David; for when king Ozias did take the censer to incense the altar of God, the priest Azarias did resist him, and expel him out of the temple, and said unto him these words, 'non est officii tui, Ozia, ut adoleas incensum Domino, sed est sacerdotis et filiorum Aaron; ad hujusmodi enim officium consecrati sunt.' Now, I shall most humbly demand of you this question, When this priest Azarias said unto this king Ozias, 'non est officii tui, &c.' whether he said truth or no? If you answer that he spoke the truth, then the king Ozias was not the supreme head of the church of the Jews: if you shall say, no; why did God then plague the king with a leprosy, and not the priest? The priest Azarias, in resisting the king, and thrusting him out of the temple, in so doing, did he play the faithful part of a subject, or no? If you answer, no; why did God then spare the priest and plague the king? If you answer, yea; then it is most manifest, Ozias, in that he was a king, could not be supreme head of the church. And, as touching the example of king David, in bringing home the ark of God from the Philistines, 'ad civitatem' David, what supremacy and spiritual govt. of God's ark did king David there take upon him? Did he place himself amongst the priests, or take upon him any spiritual function unto the priests appertaining? Did he approach near unto the ark, or yet presume to touch the same; no, doubtless, when before he saw Ozias stricken by the hand of God for the like arrogancy and presumption; and therefore king David did go from the ark of God with his harp, making melody, and placed himself amongst the minstrels; and so humbly did abase himself, being a king, as to dance, skip, and leap before the ark of God, like as his other subjects. Insomuch, that queen Micholl, king Saul's daughter, beholding and seeing the great humility of king David, did disdain thereat. Whereunto king David said, 'ludam, et vilior fiam, plusquam factus sum coram Domino meo, qui me elegit potius quam patrem tuum aut domum patris tui.' And whereas queen Micholl was therefore plagued at the hand of God 'perpetua sterilitate,' king David received great praise for his humility.—Now it may please your honours, which of both these kings' examples it shall be most convenient for your wisdoms to move our queen's highness to follow; the example of the proud king Ozias, and by your persuasions and counsels to take upon her spiritual govt. thereby adventuring yourselves to be plagued at God's hands, as king Ozias was; or else to follow the example of good king David, which in refusal of all spiritual govt. about the ark of God, did humble himself as I have declared unto you? Whereunto our sovereign lady, the queen's highness, of her own nature very well inclined and bent, we may assure ourselves to have of her highness as humble, as virtuous, and as godly a mistress to reign over us, as ever had English people here in this realm; if that her highness be not, by our flattery and dissimulation, seduced and beguiled.—4th and last, we must forsake and fly from the unity of Christ's church, when st. Cyprian, that holy martyr, saith, "that the unity of the church of Christ doth depend upon the unity of Peter's authority; therefore, by our leaping out of Peter's ship, we must needs be overwhelmed with the waters of schism, sects, and divisions. For the same holy martyr saith, in his 3rd epistle 'ad Cornelium,' that all heresies, sects, and schisms do spring only for that men will not be obedient unto the head bishop of God. And how true this saying of Cyprian is, it is apparent to all men that listeth to see by the example of the Germans, and by the inhabitants of this realm. And by our forsaking and flying from the unity of the church of Rome, this inconveniency, amongst many, must consequently follow thereof, That either we must grant the church of Rome to be the church of God, or else a malignant church. If you answer, that it is of God, where Jesus Christ is truly taught, and all his sacraments rightly ministered; how then may we disburden ourselves of our forsaking and flying that church, whom we do confess and acknowledge to be of God, when with that church, which is of God, we ought to be one, and not to admit any separation? If you answer, that the church of Rome is not of God, but a malignant church; then it will follow, that we, the inhabitants of this realm, have not as yet received any benefit of Christ, when we have received no other gospel, no other doctrine, no other faith, no other sacraments, than were sent us from the church of Rome. First, in king Lucius his days, at whose humble epistle the holy martyr Elutherius, then bp. of Rome, did send unto this realm two holy monks, Faganus and Damianus, by whose doctrine we were first put to knowledge of the faith of Jesus Christ, of his gospel, and of his most blessed sacraments. Second, holy st. Gregory, being bp. of Rome, did send into this realm two other holy monks, st. Augustin and Mellitus, to revive the very self same faith of Jesus Christ, that was before planted in this realm in the days of king Lucius. Third and last, Paulus Tertius, being bp. of Rome, did send the lord cardinal Pole's good grace, by birth a nobleman of this realm, as his legate, to restore us to the same faith that the blessed martyr Elutherius and holy st. Gregory had planted here in this realm many years before. If therefore the church of Rome be not of God, but a malignant church, then we have been deceived all this while; when the gospel, the doctrine, faith and sacraments must be of the same nature that the church is of from whence it came. And therefore in relinquishing and forsaking of that church, as a malignant church, the inhabitants of this realm shall be forced to seek further for another gospel of Christ, other doctrine, faith, and sacraments, than we hitherto have received. Which shall breed such a schism and error in faith, as was never in any christian realm: and therefore of your wisdoms worthy consideration, and maturely to be provided for, before you pass this act of supremacy.—Thus much touching the first chief point. Now to the second; wherein I promised to move your honours to consider what this Supremacy is, which we go about by virtue of this act, to give unto the queen's highness, and wherein it doth consist; as, whether in spiritual government, or in temporal. If in spiritual, like as the words of the act do import, 'supreme head of the church of England, immediate and next under God;' then it would be considered of your wisdoms in what points this spiritual govt. doth consist; and the points being well known, it would be considered, whether this house have authority to grant them, and her highness ability to receive the same.—And, as touching the point wherein the spiritual govt. doth consist, I have, in reading the gospel, observed these four, amongst many; whereof the first is to loose and bind, when our Saviour, in ordaining Peter to be the chief governor of his church, said unto him, 'Tibi dabo claves regni cœlorum; quodcunque ligaveris super terram, erit ligatum & in cœlis; & quodcunque solveris, erit solutum & in cœlis.' Now it would be considered of your wisdoms, whether you have sufficient authority to grant unto her highness this first point of spiritual govt. and to say to her, 'Tibi dabimus claves regni cœlorum.' If you say, yea, then we require the sight of your warrant and commission by the virtue of God's word: and if you say no, then you may be well assured, and persuade yourselves, that you have no sufficient authority to make her highness supreme head of the church here in this realm. The 2nd point of spiritual govt. is gathered of these words of our Saviour, spoken unto Peter in the xxi. ch. of st. John's gospel, 'pasce, pasce, pasce.' Now whether your honours have authority, by this high court of parl. to say unto our sovereign lady, 'pasce, pasce, pasce,' you must shew your warrant and commission. And further, that her highness, being a woman by birth and nature, is not qualified by God's word to feed the flock of Christ, it appeareth most plainly by st. Paul on this wise, saying, 'Taceant mulieres in Ecclesiis: non enim permittetur eis loqui, sed subditas esse, sicut dicit lex:' and it followeth in the same place, 'quod turpe est mulieri loqui in ecclesiis.' And in his 1st epistle to Timothy, ch. 2. saith, 'Docere autem mulieri non permitto, neque dominari in virum, sed in silentio esse.' Therefore it appeareth, that like as your honours have not his authority to give her highness this second point of spiritual govt. to feed the flock of Christ; so, by Paul's doctrine, her highness may not intermeddle herself with the same. Therefore she cannot be supreme head of Christ's church here in this realm. The third and chief point of spiritual govt. is gathered of the words of our Saviour, spoken unto Peter, Luke ch. xxii. 'Ego rogavi pro te, ut non deficiat fides tua: et tu aliquando conversus confirma fratres tuos.' Whereby it appeareth, that one chief point of spiritual govt. is to confirm his brethren, and ratify them both by wholesome doctrine, and administration of the blessed sacraments. But to preach or minister the holy sacraments, a woman may not; neither may she be supreme head of the church of Christ. The 4th and last point of spiritual govt. which I promised to observe and note unto you, doth consist in excommunication, and spiritual punishment, of all such as shall approve themselves not to be the obedient children of Christ's church. Of the which authority our Saviour Christ speaketh, in st. Matthew ch. xviii. there saying, 'Dic ecclesiæ: si autem ecclesiam non audierit, sit tibi tanquam ethnicus & publicanus.' And st. Paul did excommunicate the notorious fornicator that was amongst the Corinthians, by the authority of his apostleship. Unto the which apostles, Christ, ascending into heaven, did leave the whole spiritual govt. of his church, as it appeareth by the plain words of Paul, in his epistle to the Ephesians, ch. iv. 'ipse dedit ecclesiæ suæ quosdam apostolos, alios evangelistas, alios pastores & doctores, in opus ministerii, in ædificationem corporis christi.' But a woman, in the degrees of Christ's church, is not called to be an apostle, nor evangelist, nor to be a shepherd, neither a doctor, or preacher. Therefore she cannot be supreme head of Christ's militant church, nor yet of any part thereof.—Thus much I have here said, right hon. and my very good lords, against this act of Supremacy; for the discharge of my conscience, and for the love, dread and fear, that I chiefly owe unto God and my sovereign lady the queen's highness, and unto your lordship's all; when otherwise, and without mature consideration of these premises, your honours shall never be able to shew your faces before your enemies in this matter; being so rash an example and spectacle in Christ's church, as in this realm only to be found, and in none other. Thus humbly beseeching your good honours to take in good part this rude and plain speech that I have here used, of much good zeal and will, I shall now leave to trouble your honours any longer."

It does not appear at what time the above speech was delivered; but it was on the 2nd reading of the bill, that

The Bishop of Chester (Cuthbert Scott) stood up and spoke as follows:—"My lord, and my lords all; I do perceive that this bill hath now been twice read, and by the order of this house must be read the third time. Which order I think was appointed to be observed for this end, that every man being a member of this house, should fully understand, and so at large speak his mind and conscience in the contents of all the bills preferred and read here, before that they be enacted and established as laws. Wherefore I considering that this bill hath been now twice read, and hath accordingly been spoken unto gravely, wisely, and learnedly, by divers of this hon. company; and that I for my part as yet have said nothing therein; I shall most humbly desire your good lordships to give me leave, and patiently to hear what I have to say, as concerning this present bill. And yet to confess unto your Idps. the truth; there be two things that do much move me, and as it were pull me back from speaking any thing in this matter. The 1st is, that I perceive the queen's highness, whom I pray God long to preserve, is as it were a party therein; unto whom I do acknowledge that I owe obedience, not only for wrath and displeasure's sake, but for conscience sake, and that by the scriptures of God. The 2nd is, the reverence I have to those noblemen, unto whom this bill was committed to be weighed and considered; whose doings I assure your good Idps. is a great comfort not only unto me, but also, as I do think, unto all that be of the profession that I am of, with many other besides: 1st, for that their devotion towards Almighty God doth appear; seeing they will not suffer the service of the church, and the due administration of the holy sacraments thereof, to be disannulled, or already altered, but to be retained as they have been heretofore: and 2nd, for that their charity and pity towards poor clergy of this realm, doth appear in mitigating the extream penalties mentioned in this bill, for the gainsayers of the contents of the same.—But there be two other things of more weight, that do move me to speak in this matter what I think. The 1st is Almighty God, which I know doth look, that, according to the profession whereunto (although I be unworthy) I am called, I should speak my mind in such matters as th's is, when they be called in question. Ths 2nd is my conscience, which doth urge me to do the same.—Wherefore, now to speak of the matter, this I say, That our faith and religion is maintained and continued by no one thing so much as by unity, which unity is continued and maintained in Christ's church, even as concord and good order is maintained in a commonwealth. Wherein as we see for civil quietness, there is appointed in every village one constable. And lest there should any variance fall amongst them, there is, again, in every hundred one head-constable, in whom all the other inferiors be as knit in one. And where there be in one shire divers hundreds, to make away all controversies, as might chance amongst the said head-constables of these hundreds, of that they be joined as in one. The sheriffs likewise be joined in one prince, which prince being deprived of his princely authority, the unity and concord of that realm is dissolved, and every man chooseth himself a new lord. Even so it is in the church of Christ, according to the commandment of St. Paul. There is in every village at the least one priest; in every city one bp. in whom all the priests within the diocese be knit in one; in every province one metropolitan, in whom, for the avoiding of controversies, all the bps. of that province be joined; and for unity to be observed amongst the metropolitans, they be likewise joined in one high bp. called the pope, whose authority being taken away, the sheep, as the scripture saith, be scattered abroad. For avoiding whereof, our Saviour Christ, before his death, prayed that we might be all one, as his father and he be one; which thing cannot be, except we have all one head. And therefore Almighty God said by the prophet Ezekiel, "I will stir up over them one pastor." And our Saviour likewise saith, "There shall be one pastor, and one sheep-fold." Which sentences peradventure some men will say to be applied only to our Saviour, which, in very deed, I must needs grant to be so; yet, this I may say, these places be applied to him only, as other like places of scripture be; for it is said in the scripture, that only God is immortal; and by participation with him, all we that be true christian men be made immortal: only God forgiveth sin, and yet, by commission from him, priests have authority to forgive sin. He is only king, and by commission maketh kings; and likewise he is only priest after the order of Melchisedec, and by commission maketh priests: he of himself, and by none other; all the rest by him, and not of themselves. So he is our only pastor, and by commission hath made other pastors, and especially one to be vicar-general on earth, to govern and rule all his whole flock in unity and concord, and in avoiding of schisms and divisions. And likewise as he sent one holy ghost, to rule and govern his people inwardly, so he appointed one governor, to rule and lead them outwardly.—Which one head-governor cannot be applied to any temporal prince. For then either we must needs grant that the church of Christ was not perfect, but rather a mank body without a head by the space of 300 years and more, (for so long was it after the death of our Saviour before there was one Christian prince in all the world) or else, Christ appointed an infidel, being no member of his church, to be head thereof; which both be absurdities. Again, that Christ appointed no temporal prince to be head of his church it appeareth, by that we see in divers kingdoms there be divers and sundry princes and rulers; so that there should by that means be many heads of one body, the which were a monstrous thing. Thirdly, That he appointed no temporal prince to be head of the church, it appeareth by the word itself spoken by our Saviour 'pasce, feed,' which he spoke not to Herod, Pilate, nor yet to Tyberius the emperor. But he spoke them unto Peter, saying, 'Pasce oves meas.' And where peradventure some men will cavil and argue of the Greek word spoken by our Saviour Christ in that place, which doth signify not only to feed, but also to rule and govern; I answer, that I do not know where that word is applied unto any temporal ruler in the New Testament; and if it so were, yet it doth not prove their intent; for other manifest and plain places of Scripture do exclude them from such authority, notwithstanding that the same scripture doth give them very great authority, commanding us to obey the same; declaring withal, that they bear the sword not in vain, nor without cause. But now mark this word 'sword,' which princes had before the coming of our Saviour Christ; and that he did give them any further authority we read not, but left them as he found them. And as he did give them no spiritual authority, so I do not see that he did take any temporal rule from them. Wherefore he commanded Peter to put up his sword, because he had given him other instruments to use, wherein was included his authority, that is to say, the keys of the kingdom of heaven, saying, 'tibi dabo claves regni cœlorum.' In these keys and in exercising of the same, consisteth all authority ecclesiastical given by God unto any man. Unto whom he hath not by Scripture given these keys, they have no right to it. Wherefore it followeth, that no temporal prince hath any authority in or over the church of Christ, seeing that the keys were never given unto any of them.—And here I know it will be objected against me, that as this place doth make against the supremacy of princes, so doth it not make for the primacy of st. Peter. For st. John doth witness, in the 20th ch. of his gospel, that our Saviour did give the keys not only to Peter, but also unto all his apostles, when he did breathe upon them, saying, 'Accipite spiritum sanctum'. Take ye the Holy Ghost: whose sins ye forgive be forgiven to them, and whose sins ye retain are retained.' And divers of the ancient writers do likewise say, That the keys were given unto all the apostles. But yet in one place or other the same authors do declare, that they were given unto Peter principally, as Hillarius, where he saith, speaking of that matter, 'The keys were given to Peter principally, in that he was chief and captain of the other.' And if that any man yet will contend, that this place doth give no more authority to Peter than to the rest of the apostles, I have read another place of scripture, which doth exclude the rest of the apostles from equality of authority with Peter, in the rule and govt. of the church of Christ, and that is the changing of his name: for, at Peter's first meeting with our Saviour, his name was Simon, as it is there mentioned in these words, 'Simon, the son of Jona, thou shalt be called Cephas, that is to say, a stone or a rock.' And for what consideration and end Christ gave him that name, it doth appear in the xvi. of st. Matthew, in these words, 'Tu es Petrus, &c. Thou art Peter; i. e. a stone or a rock, and upon this stone or rock I will build my church.' Here I shall desire you to note, that Peter hath a promise made unto himself alone, which was made to none other of the apostles, that is, that as he had received a new name, so he should have a new privilege or preferment, to be the foundation, ground and stay of Christ's church being builded upon him; for he was called a 'rock' or 'stone' for the stability and constancy that should always appear in the church, being builded upon him a sure foundation and immoveable. Which thing doth now appear in the succession of Peter: for as concerning the other apostles, in their own persons, I do not doubt but during their lives natural, they were as firm and stable in the faith of Christ as Peter was; but for their succession we have no such proof, seeing that only the succession of Peter doth continue in the church of Christ, the like appearing in none of the other apostles. Which is the only stay of the same in earth, and undoubtedly shall be until the world's end. This place of scripture, in my judgment, if there were no more, is sufficient to prove that Peter and his successors be appointed of Christ to have the rule and govt. of his church in earth above all others, both spiritual and temporal; and yet I do know that there may and also will objections be laid against these my sayings. For some will say, that Christ himself is the stone whereupon his church is builded, and some will say, that the profession that Peter made of Christ, when he said, 'Thou art the son of the living God.' Which be both true, and yet not repugnant to that which I have said before: for all these 3 understandings, well pondered and considered in their divers respects, may stand together. But I do think that if the mind and intent of our Saviour, when he spake these words, 'Thou art Peter,' &c. be well weighed, the place itself doth declare, that it is specially to be understood of the person of Peter and his successors. For undoubtedly he knowing, that infidelity and heresies should so encrease and abound, that his church and faith should be in danger to be overthrown and extinguished, made promise there so to provide by Peter and his successors, that it should be always known where his faith should be had and sought for again, if it were any where lost, unto all men that would, with humility, desire, seek after, and receive the same.—So that we now, if we should understand the place of our Saviour Christ, which is the first and true stone of this building in very deed, what certainty can we have of our faith? Or how shall we stay ourselves, wavering in the same in this our time? For at this present there be abroad in Christendom 34 sundry sects of opinions, whereof never one agreeth with another, and all differ from the catholic church. And every one of these sects do say and affirm constantly, that their profession and doctrine is builded upon Christ, alledging scripture for the same. And they all and every of them, thus challenging Christ to be their foundation by scripture, how shall any man know to which of them he may safely give credit, and so obey and follow?—The like is to be said of Peter's confession, wherein we can have no sure trial. For every one of these sects or heresies doth confess and acknowledge Christ to be the son of the living God. So that I think I may conclude that our Saviour Christ in this place, saying, 'That he would build his church upon a stone,' did mean by the stone Peter and his successors, whereunto men might safely cleave and lean; as unto a sure and an unmoveable rock in matters of faith; knowing certainly that in so doing they shall not fall, I mean in faith; as we do most manifestly see it hath come to pass, and continued for the space of 1500 years and odd.—I have heard objected here of late against the supremacy of Peter and his successors, divers reasons which appear unto me to have in them small substance; as I trust it shall appear unto you by the unfolding of the same. And for the better understanding of the same, I will bring them unto three head places.—Whereof the first doth consist in the wicked and evil lives, as it is alledged, of certain popes of Rome; which as I do think were nothing so wicked as they were reported to have been: but let that be, they were so, What then? A man is a man, and, as the scripture sayeth, 'What man is he that sinneth not?' again, if that our Saviour had made the like warrant unto Peter and his successors, as concerning their conversation and living, as he did for the continuance and stability of their faith, and had said unto Peter, 'I have prayed for thee that thou shalt not sin;' as he said, 'I have prayed that thy faith shall never fail;' then their evil lives had been an argument to have proved, that they had not been the true successors of Peter, neither had had any such authority given unto them of God. But seeing that the warrant was made only for the continuance of their faith, wherein they have hitherto, and do yet most constantly stand, without any mention of their conversation and living, it is in my judgment no proof nor argument against the authority and supremacy of the see of Rome: as we see that the adultery and murder committed by king David, doth not diminish the authority of godly Psalms written by him; neither the dissolute living and idolatry of king Solomon is prejudicial to divers books of scripture written by him; nor yet the covetousness of the prophet Balaam did let, in any condition, the vertue and strength of God, the blessing of God sent unto the children of Israel by him, nor the truth of the prophecy, as concerning the coming of our Saviour, by him likewise pronounced; even so the lives of the popes of Rome, where they never so wicked, cannot be prejudicial to the authority given to Peter and his successors, by the mouth of our Saviour.—The sum of the objections secondarily made against his authority, doth consist (as they do alledge) in certain canons of the council of Nicene, and the 6th council of Carthage, with the departure of the Greek church, and other realms now in our days from the authority of the said see of Rome. As concerning the council of Nicene, I do marvel that they will alledge any thing therein contained in this matter, seeing in the preface of the said council it is declared, that this authority which we speak of is given unto the said see by no councils or synods; but by the evangelical voice of our Saviour Jesus Christ: and also the fathers of the said council being condescended and agreed in all matters of controversy, moved in that their assembly, wrote unto the pope, desiring to have their decrees confirmed by his authority; as it doth more at large appear in their epistle written in that behalf. Further, Athanasius, which was present at the said council, and after patriarch of Alexandria, doth not only acknowledge the cure and charge of the universal church of Christ to be given to Peter and successors, but also being universally deprived, did appeal unto the pope of Rome, and by him was restored again. And likewise the 6th council of Carthage maketh nothing for their purpose. For the supremacy of the pope was not called in question there, but some variance there was indeed, which consisteth in this point only, whether a bp. or a priest, being accused and troubled, and thinking himself to have wrong, might appeal to Rome for the better examination and trial of his cause or no; as one Appiarius a priest had done then in Africk. There was alledged for appellations to be made to Rome a canon of Nicene council, which indeed was sought for and could not be found. Which was no marvel; for whereas the fathers in Nicene council made 70 canons, through the wickedness of heretics, there was then but found remaining only 21. Yet that notwithstanding the bps. of Africk did not long after submit themselves to the church of Rome in that point. Also, they use to inculcate the authority of this council, for because that st. Augustin was present at it; as he was indeed, which maketh directly against them. For st. Augustin doth every where in his works acknowledge the supremacy of st. Peter and his successors; as in his 162nd epistle, saying thus, 'In the church of Rome hath always been strengthened, or flourished, the rule or authority of the apostolic chair.'—And where I heard a question moved here of late, whether that ever the Greek church did acknowledge the superiority of the church of Rome or no? Of the which matter I marvel that any man doth doubt, seeing that the Greek church did not only acknowledge, but also continue in obedience under the said church of Rome, by the space of 800 years at the least, so far as I can read myself, or learn of others. And after that it did first renounce the said authority, it did return again with submission 14 several times, as good authors write, and as we may partly gather by the council of Florence, which was about 141 years ago; whereas the patriarch of Constantinople himself was present among other bps. and learned men of Greece, in the which this matter in controversy was determined and agreed upon, as it doth manifestly appear in the canons of the said council. Moreover, if the Greek church were not under the authority and rule of the church of Rome, what shall we think of the story of Anthemas, patriarch of Constantinople, which was deposed for the heresy of Eutyches, by the pope Agapetus. For whose restitution earnest and long suit was made by the empress Theodora, that then was, first to the pope Silverius, and after to his successor Vigilius, and could in no condition be obtained. But as touching the Greek church, and the departure of the same from the church of Rome; this we may briefly say and conclude, that after it did divide itself from the church of Rome, it did by little and little fall into the most extreme miseries, captivity and bondage; in the which at this present it doth remain. And as concerning other countries that have renounced the aforesaid authority, as Germany, Denmark, and as it was here said, Polonia; this I have to say, that the miseries and calamities that Germany hath suffered, since their departure from the church of Rome, may be a warning and example to all other nations to learn by, and beware of the like attempt. And as for Denmark, I do hear indeed they be very Lutherans, and have also renounced the pope's authority; but yet I cannot learn, nor hear, that either the king of Denmark, or yet any prince of Germany, doth take upon him to be called 'Supreme head of the church.' And as for Polonia, although it be troubled with heresies, as other realms be, yet I cannot learn, that either the king, or the clergy thereof, hath, or doth give any place to the same, but of the contrary doth most earnestly withstand them; as may right well appear by certain books set out this present year, that is 1558, by a bp. of Polonia, called Stanislaus Hosius; in the which it is declared, amongst many other things, that earnest suit had been made by the protestants to have three things granted and suffered to be practised within that realm; that is to say, that priests might have wives; to have the public service in their vulgar tongue; and the sacrament of the altar ministred under both kinds; which all three were denied them. Whereby it appeareth plainly that Polonia is not in that case that men reported it to be in. But and if it were so, that all these realms, yea and more, were gone from the obedience of that church, doth it therefore follow that the authority thereof is not just? I think not so. For as Ferdinandus, now emperor, descending justly by election from Constantine the great, if the empire which was under Constantine's rule were divided into 20 parties, it hath scarcely one of the 20, and yet the authority of an emperor continueth in him still. And as the departure of Gascoigny, Guienne, Normandy, Scotland and France, which were all sometimes under the imperial crown of England, doth not take away the authority thereof, but that it is an imperial crown still; even so doth not the departure of these countries from the see of Rome, diminish the authority given unto the same by God. Besides that st. Paul saith, 'That there shall be a departing before the day of judgment;' which although some understand of the empire, yet the most part refer it to the church of Rome, from whence men shall fall and depart by infidelity and heresies; but whether it shall be in all countries at one time or divers times, it is uncertain.—Thirdly, there is alleged a provincial council or assembly of the bps. and clergy of this realm of England; by whom the authority of the bp. of Rome was abolished and disannulled. Which now some inculcate against us, as a matter of great weight and authority; whereas in very deed it is to be taken for a matter of small authority, or else none. For 1st, we know that a particular or a provincial council can make no determination against the universal church of Christ. 2dly, of the learned men that were the doers there, so many as be dead, before they died were penitent, and cried God's mercy for that act: and those that do live, as all your lds. do know, have openly revoked the same, acknowledging their error. And where some here do say, that they will never trust those men which once denied the pope's authority, and now of the contrary stand in the defence of the same; in my judgment their sayings be not greatly to be allowed. For it may happen, as oftentimes it doth chance indeed, that a man of honesty, worship, yea of honour, may commit treason against his prince, and yet by the goodness of the same prince be pardoned for that offence; shall we determinately say, that man is never after to be trusted in the prince's affairs? Nay, God forbid, but rather think of the contrary; that he which once hath run so hastily and rashly, that he hath overthrown himself and fallen, and broken his brow or his shin, will after that take heed to walk more warily. As we learn at the apostles of our saviour Christ, which did all forsake him and run away, when he was apprehended and brought before the Jews, and specially of st. Peter, which did thrice deny him. And yet after, as well Peter as all the rest of the apostles, did return again to their master Christ; and never would after, for neither persecution nor death, forsake or deny him any more. So that it may appear, although men have once gone astray, if they return to the truth again, their testimonies in the truth be not to be discredited. And so I trust that you see that all these reasons and objections, made against the authority of the church of Rome, be of none effect, if they be indifferently weighed and considered.—And whereas there was a reason made here, that a temporal prince, unto whom no ecclesiastical jurisdiction or rule is given or committed by God, cannot himself be head of the church of Christ; so he cannot substitute nor appoint another to exercise any such jurisdiction or authority in spiritual matters, in or over the church of Christ under him: for as it was then said, no man can give to another that thing which he hath not himself: whereunto this answer was made, That a prince may give to another that authority which he hath not himself, neither may exercise; as for example, they alledge, that a king of himself is not a judge, and yet he hath authority to appoint judges to minister justice. And likewise they said, that a king himself is no captain, and yet hath authority to appoint captains under him, for defence of his realm and overthrow of his enemies; and even so, say they, he may appoint and substitute one under him to exercise spiritual jurisdiction, although he have no such authority himself. Which reasons appear unto me not only to be very weak and feeble, but also to be plain, false and against Scripture; which doth declare, that the office of a king doth consist especially in these two points, which these men deny to be in him; that is, playing of the judge, and ministering of justice to his subjects; and likewise in playing the valiant captain, in defending of the same his subjects from all injury and wrong; as the 8th ch. of the 1st book of Kings declareth, 'Our king shall judge us, and he shall go forth before us and he shall fight our battles for us.' And likewise Nathan said unto David's own person, 'Make me answer according to justice.' And likewise Solomon himself did give sentence and judgment between the two common women, which of them two was the mother of the child which was alive. And as for to prove that those kings, with other in the Old Testament, were captains themselves in the defence of their realms, is more manifest than I shall need to travel in proving of the same.—And thus to draw unto an end, I trust your lds. do see, that for unity and concord in faith and religion, to be preserved and continued in the church, our saviour, the spouse thereof, hath appointed one head or governor, to wit, Peter and his successors, whose faith he promised should never decay, as we see manifestly it hath not indeed. And for those men which write and speak against this authority, if therewith their writings and their doings be well considered, they shall appear to be such, as small credit or none is to be given unto in matters of weight, such as this is. For who so readeth the 3d ch. of the 2d epistle of st. Paul to Timothy, may see them there lively described with their doings. And specially one sentence therein may be applied and verified of them most justly, that is, 'Always learning and never coming to the knowledge of truth.' For as we see them vary amongst themselves, one from another, so no one of them doth agree with himself in matters of religion two years together. And as they be gone from the sure rock and stay of Christ's church, so do they reel and waver in their doctrine, where no certainty nor stay can be found. Whereof st. Paul doth admonish us, and teach us in the person of his scholar Timothy, to be constant in doctrine and religion, and not to follow such men. For after, in the same chapter, he saith thus, 'But as for thee, continue in those things which thou hast learned, and which be credited unto thee, knowing of whom thou hast learned them.' In which words we might understand, that st. Paul doth not move any man to continue in any false or untrue doctrine. Wherefore he moveth every man to consider, not only his religion and doctrine, but also, or rather, the schoolmaster of whom he learned the same. For of the knowledge, constancy, and worthiness of the schoolmaster, or teacher, may the doctrine, taught by him, be known to be good and sound, or otherwise. Now if a man should ask of these men in this realm, which dissent from the catholic church, not only in this point of the supremacy, but also in divers of the chief mysteries of our faith; of whom they learned this doctrine which they hold and teach, they must needs answer, that they learned it of the Germans. Then we may demand of them again, of whom the Germans did learn it? Whereunto they must answer, that they learned it of Luther. Well, then of whom did Luther learn it? Whereunto he shall answer himself, in his book that he wrote, 'De missa angulari, seu privata;' where he saith, 'That such thing as he teacheth against the mass, and the blessed sacrament of the altar, he learned of Satan, the devil.' At whose hands, it is like, he did also receive the rest of his doctrine. Then here be two points diligently to be noted; 1st, That this doctrine is not 50 years old, for no man taught it before Luther. And 2dly, That Luther doth acknowledge and confess the devil to be his schoolmaster in divers points of his doctrine. So that if men would diligently mind st. Paul's words, where he biddeth us 'Know of whom we have learned' such doctrine as we hold, they would refuse this perverse and wicked doctrine, knowing from whom it came. But if they will ask us of whom we learned our doctrine, we answer them, that we learned it of our forefathers in the catholic church, which hath in it continually the holy spirit of God for a ruler and governor. And again, if they ask of whom our fathers learned this same, we say of their forefathers within the same church. And so we manually ascend in possession of our doctrine, from age to age, unto the apostle Peter, unto whom, as st. Cyprian saith, our saviour Christ did betake his sheep to be fed, and upon whom he founded his church.—So that now we may be bold to stand in our doctrine and religion against our adversaries, seeing that theirs is not yet 50 years old, and ours above 1500 years old. They have for authority and commendation of their religion, Luther and his schoolmaster before-mentioned; we have for ours st. Peter and his master Christ. So that now, by the doctrine of Irenæus, every man may know where the truth is, and whom he should follow; which saith thus, 'To those priests, which be in the church, we ought to obey, those which have their succession from the apostles, who with bishop-like succession, have received a sure gracious gift, according to the good-will of the father. But for the other, which depart from the principal succession, and be gathered in whatsoever place, we ought to hold them suspected, either as heretics and of an evil opinion, or as making divisions, and proud men, and pleasing themselves; or again as hypocrites, doing that for advantage and vain glory, which all do fall from the truth.' And thus I make an end, most humbly thanking your good lds. for your gentle patience; desiring the same likewise to weigh and consider these things which I have spoken, as shall be thought good to your wisdoms."

Amongst the temporal lords, in the opposition to the bill of Supremacy, Anthony Brown, visc. Montecute, (who had been sent to Rome, in the last reign, by the last parl.; along with Thurlby, bp. of Ely, to procure that England might be restored to the unity of the church of Rome, and obedience to the apostolic see;) out of a sentiment of zeal and honour, says Cambden, spoke, in the debate, to this effect: "That it would be a very disgraceful reflection upon England, which was so lately and so well reconciled to the apostolic see, to make so sudden a revolt from it. And, moreover, the hazard would be as great as the scandal, should the pope thunder out his excommunication; and expose the nation, by that means, to the resentment of its neighbouring enemies, upon the score of this defection. That he, for his part, and by authority of parl. and in the name of the whole body of England, rendered obedience to the pope; the performance of which he could by no means dispense with. He, therefore, conjured them, with great importunity, not to withdraw themselves from the see of Rome; to which they were beholden for the first christian faith, and the constant defence of it ever since."—What success all these speeches had needs no explanation; the bill passed into a law; and is the first among the other printed statutes of this reign. This act renews all the laws of Henry VIII. which Mary had repealed, as well as those of Edw. VI. in favour of the Reformation.

A Subsidy.] Feb. 11, two bills were sent up by the commons; the one for a Subsidy of two 15ths and two 10ths, granted by them, the other for tonnage and poundage given also for life. The first was passed by the lords on the 16th; and the latter on the 20th. A petition was delivered to the Lords, by the knights and burgesses of the Welsh shires, and the county palatine of Chester, praying to be respited, and have longer time allowed them, for the payment of the subsidies and myses charged upon those counties. The lords thought proper to move the queen, about this matter, by the lord keeper, to know her majesty's pleasure herein; which, after they understood, an order was made that the said counties should be allowed a year's time, after the assessment of these taxes was laid by the commissioners, to discharge them in; and this award was ordered to be entered in their Journal.

Resolution relating to Privilege of Peers.] In the said Journals is also an entry made, relating to the Privileges of the peers. "Whereas one John Broxham hath brought one assize against the lord Willoughby of Parham, to be tried at and in the assizes and sessions, now next to be holden at Lincoln. Upon complaint and petition of the said lord Willoughby, for that he necessarily attendeth the parliament, so as he cannot with his learned council, some of whom likewise be burgesses of this parl. be at the said sessions and assizes. It is therefore ordered and decreed, by the lords in parl. that an injunction presently be awarded out of the chancery, to the said John Broxham, his counsellors and attornies, commanding them, and every of them, upon the pain of 500l. that they nor none of them in any wise proceed in and to that trial of the said assize, at this assizes now next to be holden at Lincoln aforesaid."

The Commons address the Queen to marry.] Feb. 4th, a motion was made in the Commons to address her maj. on the subject of her marriage. This was seconded by several; though the substance of the arguments made use of on this occasion are omitted in the Journal. On the 6th it was agreed by the whole house, that 80 of their members should go with the Speaker, and attend upon the queen that afternoon with their address. However, it was not presented till the 10th, to try to get the lords to second it; but they, says Camden, refused, for fear they should be suspected of a design to serve their own ends by it. Wherefore, on the day aforesaid, sir Tho. Gargrave, the Speaker, and the committee, waited upon the queen, when he delivered himself to her in these words:

"May it please the queen's highness; there is nothing that we more earnestly desire of God in our daily prayers, than that the happiness we have hitherto enjoyed in the equity and justice of your maj.'s govt. may be continued to this nation down to the latest posterity. But how to effect this, amidst all the variety of our aims and endeavours, we must profess ourselves at a loss, unless either your maj. were to reign for ever (a blessing which it were in vain to hope for) or would vouchsafe to accept some match capable of supplying heirs to your royal virtues and dominions, which God grant, since it is the hearty and united wish of all your subjects. It ought to be the main concern of persons of all ranks and degrees whatever (of princes especially) that since they are mortal themselves, they may secure the kingdom from that fate. Now it is in your maj.'s power to confer this kind of immortality upon your kingdom of England, by accepting a husband, who may prove a support and comfort to you, in all changes of fortune; besides that your maj.'s temper and age, person and fortune, seem to plead hard for such a change of state. For it cannot be doubted, but the single zeal and assiduity of such a relation will dispatch more business, and to better purpose, than the joint endeavours of a great many who are less concerned. Nor indeed can any thing have a worse influence upon the public, than that a princess, whose marriage must needs produce the twin blessings of peace and safety to a kingdom, should, like a nun profest, condemn herself to a single state. Since your maj. has received the kingdom by way of inheritance from your royal ancestors, you ought to continue it down to such as may prove the glory and the security thereof. Besides, the kings of England have ever shewn a more than ordinary concern that the royal family might not be extinct for want of issue: hence was it, that your royal grandfather, Henry VII. did (within our freshest memory) provide suitable matches for his sons Arthur and Henry, though they were both very young. And for the same reason, your royal father courted Mary queen of Scots, for his son prince Edward, who was then but 8 years old. And it is not very long since your sister, queen Mary, though pretty well advanced in years, was married to Philip of Spain. Now, if the lot of barrenness, whether it fell to the share of princes or peasants, was always looked on as the most grievous misfortune, what a weighty guilt must that princess contract, who shall make this punishment her option; from whence innumerable evils must arise to the commonwealth, and such misfortunes as are not even to be thought of without dread and horror. That matters may never come to this sad pass, not only the small number of us that are here present, but all England in general, and every one of your subjects in particular, cast themselves at your maj.'s feet, and with the deepest concern tender this humble, but pressing and earnest address."

The following is the queen's answer to this speech, as it is preserved in D'Ewe's Journal.

"Gentlemen; as I have good cause, so do I give you all my hearty thanks, for the good zeal and loving care you seem to have, as well towards me, as to the whole estate of your country. Your petition, I perceive, consisteth of three parts, and my answer to the same shall depend of two. And to the 1st part, I may say unto you, that from my years of understanding, since I first had consideration of myself to be born a servant of Almighty God, I happily chose this kind of life, in the which I yet live; which I assure you, for mine own part, hath hitherto best contented myself, and I trust hath been most acceptable unto God; from the which, if either ambition of high estate offered to me in marriage, by the pleasure and appointment of my prince (whereof I have some record in this presence, as you our treasurer well know), or if eschewing the danger of mine enemies, or the avoiding the peril of death, whose messenger, or rather a continual watchman, the prince's indignation, was no little time daily before mine eyes, by whose means, although I know, or justly may suspect, yet I will not now utter; or if the whole cause were in my sister herself, I will not now burden her therewith, because I will not charge the dead; if any of these, I say, could have drawn or dissuaded me from this kind of life, I had not now remained in this estate wherein you see me; but so constant have I always continued in this determination, although my youth and words may seem to some hardly to agree together; yet is it most true, that at this day I stand free from any other meaning, that either I have had in times past, or have at this present; with which trade of life I am so thoroughly acquainted, that I trust God, who hath hitherto herein preserved and led me by the hand, will not of his goodness suffer me to go alone.—For the other part, the manner of your petition I do well like, and take it in good part, because it is simple, and containeth no limitation of place or person: if it had been otherwise, I must needs have misliked it very much, and thought it in you a very great presumption, being unfitting, and altogether unmeet for you to require them that may command you; or those to appoint, whose parts are to desire; or such to bind and limit, whose duties are to obey; or to take upon you to draw my love to your liking, or frame my will according to your fantasy; for a guerdon constrained, and gift freely given, can never agree together. Nevertheless, if any of you be in suspect, whensoever it may please God to incline my heart to another kind of life, you may well assure yourselves, my meaning is not to determine any thing wherewith the realm may or shall have just cause to be discontent. And therefore put that clean out of your heads. For I assure you, (what credit my assurance may have with you I cannot tell, but what credit it shall deserve to have the sequel shall declare) I will never in that matter conclude any thing that shall be prejudicial to the realm. For the weal, good, and safety whereof I will never shun to spend my life; and whomsoever it shall be my chance to light upon, I trust he shall be such as shall be as careful for the realm as you; I will not say as myself, because I cannot so certainly determine of any other; but by my desire he shall be such as shall be as careful for the preservation of the realm and you as myself. And albeit it might please Almighty God to continue me still in this mind, to live out of the state of marriage, yet is it not to be feared, but he will so work in my heart, and in your wisdom, as good provision, by his help, may be made, whereby the realm shall not remain destitute of any heir that may be a fit governor, and peradventure more beneficial to the realm, than such offspring as may come of me: for though I be never so careful of your well-doing, and mind ever so to be, yet may my issue grow out of kind, and become perhaps ungracious. And in the end, this shall be for me sufficient, that a marble stone shall declare, that a queen having reigned such a time lived and died a virgin. And here I end, and take your coming to me in good part, and give unto all my hearty thanks; more yet for your zeal and good meaning than for your petition."

Act respecting the Liturgy.] In this parl. an act was passed for the uniformity of the Common Prayer and Service in the church, and the administration of Sacraments. By this act, the Liturgy and the Sacraments, established in Edward VI.'s time, were to be used and administered in all churches, with very little variation, under a certain penalty to such as should presume to corrupt them, or resort to any other. Against this bill we have two speeches, in "Strype's Annals," made by two zealous Catholic divines, viz. dr. Feckenham, abbot of Westminster, the last of his order that ever spoke in that house; and the same dr. Scott, bp. of Chester, whose speech we have just given. The following are copies of the said speeches.

Abbot Feckenham rose and said: "Hon. and my very good lords, having at this present two sundry kinds of religion here propounded and set forth before your honours, being already in possession of the one of them, and your fathers before you, for the space of 1400 years past here in this realme, lyke as I shall hereafter prove unto you; the other religion here set in a book to be received and established by the authority of this high court of parl. and to take its effect here in this realm at Midsummer next coming. And you being, as I know, right well desirous to have some proof or sure knowledge, which of both these religions is the better, and most worthy to be established here in this realm, and to be preferred before the other; I will, for my part, and for the discharge of my duty, 1st, unto God; 2nd, unto our sovereign lady the queen's highness; 3rd, unto your honours and to the whole commons of this realm; here set forth and express unto you, 3 brief rules and lessons, whereby your honours shall be able to put difference betwixt the true religion of God and the counterfeit, and therein never be deceived. The 1st of these 3 rules or lessons is, that in your search and trial-making, your honours must observe, which of them both hath been of most antiquity, and most observed in the church of Christ, of all men, at all times and seasons, and in all places. The 2nd, which of them both is of itself more stedfast, and always forth one and agreable with itself. The 3rd and last rule to be considered of your wisdoms is, which of these religions doth breed the more humble and obedient subjects, first unto God, and next unto our sovereign lady the queen's highness, and all superior powers.—Concerning the first rule and lesson, it cannot be truly affirmed, or yet thought of any man, that this new religion, here now to be set forth in this book, hath been observed in Christ's church of all Christian men, at all times, and in all places; when the same hath been observed only here in this realm, and that for a short time, not much passing the space of two years, and that in king Edward VI. his days; whereas the religion, and the very same manner of serving and honouring of God, of the which you are at this present in possession, did begin here in this realm 1400 years past in king Lucius's days, the first Christian king of this realm; by whose humble letters sent to the pope Eleutherius, he sent to this realm two holy monks, the one called Damianus, the other Faganus; and they, as ambassadors sent from the see apostolic of Rome, did bring into this realm, so many years past, the very same religion whereof we are now in possession; and in the Latin tongue, as the ancient historiographer Gildas witnesseth, in the prologue and beginning of his book of the Britain history. And the same religion, so long ago begun, hath had this long continuance ever since in this realm; and only of the inhabitants thereof, but also generally of all Christian men, and in all places of Christendom, until the late days of Edw. VI. as is aforesaid. Whereby it appeareth unto all men that list to know, how that by this rule and lesson, the ancient religion and manner of serving of God (whereof we are already in possession) is the very true and perfect religion, and of God.—Touching the 2nd rule and lesson of trial-making and probation, whether of both these religions is the better and most worthy of observation here in this realm, is this, that your honours must observe which of both these is the most stayed religion, and always forth one, and agreeable with itself. And that the new religion here now to be set forth in this book is no stayed religion, nor always forth one, nor agreeable with itself, who seeth it not; when in the late practice thereof in Edw. VI.'s days, how changeable and how variable was it in and to itself? Every other year having a new book devised thereof; and every book being set forth, as they professed, according to the sincere word of God, never any one of them agreeing in all points with the other: the first book affirming the 7 sacraments, and the real presence of Christ's body in the holy eucharist; the other denying the same: the one book admitting the real presence of Christ's body in the said sacrament to be received in one kind, with kneeling down, and great reverence done unto it, and that in unleavened bread; and the other book would have the communion received in both the kinds, and in loaf bread, without any reverence, but only unto the body of Christ in heaven. But the thing most worthy to be observed of your honours is, how that every book made a shew to be set forth according to the sincere word of God, and not one of them did agree with another. And what marvel, I pray you, when the authors and devisors of the same books could not agree amongst themselves, nor yet any one of them might be found that did long agree with himself? And for the proof thereof, I shall first begin with the German writers, the chief schoolmasters and instructors of our countrymen in all these novelties.—And I do read in an epistle, which Philip Melancthon did write unto one Frederico Miconino, how that one Carolostadius was the first mover and beginner of the late sedition in Germany, touching the sacrament of the altar, and the denying of Christ's real presence in the same. And when he should come to interpret those words of our saviour Christ; 'accepit panem, benedixit, fregit, deditque discipulis suis, dicens, accipite, et comedite, hoc est corpus meum, quod pro vobis tradetur; digito, inquit ille, monstravit visibile corpus suum.' By which interpretation of Carolostadius, Christ should with the one hand give unto his disciples bread to eat, and with the other hand point unto his visible body that was there present, and say, "this is my body, which shall be betrayed for you." Martin Luther, much offended with this foolish exposition made by Carolostadius, of the words of Christ, 'hoc est corpus meum,' he giveth another sense, and saith that German, 'sensus verborum Christi,' was this, 'per hunc panem, vel cum isto pane, En! Do vobis corpus meum.' But Zuinglius finding much fault with the interpretation of Martin Luther, writeth, that Luther therein was much deceived, and how that in these words of Christ, 'hoc est corpus meum,' the verb substantive 'est' must be taken for 'significat,' and this word 'corpus (quod pro vobis tradetur)' must be taken 'pro figura corporis.' So that the true sense of these words of Christ, 'hoc est corpus meum,' by Zuinglius's supposal, is 'hoc significat corpus meum, vel est figura corporis mei.' Peter Martyr being of late here in this realm, in his book by him set forth, of the disputation which he had in Oxford, with the learned students there of this matter, giveth another sense of these words of Christ, contrary unto all the rest, and there saith thus, 'quod Christus accipiens panem benedixit, fregit, deditque discipulis suis, dicens, hoc est corpus meum; quasi diceret corpus meum, per fidem perceptum, erit vobis pro pane, vel instar panis.' Whose sense in the English is this, "that Christ's body, received by faith, should be unto you as bread, or instead of the bread."—But here to cease any further to speak of these German writers, I shall draw nearer home, as unto dr. Cranmer, late abp. of Canterbury, in this realm; how contrary was he unto himself in this matter? When in one year he did set forth a catechism in the English tongue, and did dedicate the same unto Edw. VI. wherein he did most constantly affirm and defend the real presence of Christ's body in the holy eucharist; and very shortly after he did set forth another book, wherein he did most shamefully deny the same, falsifying both the scriptures and doctors, to the no small admiration of all the learned readers. Dr. Ridley, the notablest learned of that religion in this realm, did set forth at Paul's cross, the real presence of Christ's body in the sacrament, with these words, which I heard, being there present: 'How that the devil did believe the son of God was able to make of stones bread; and we English people, which do confess that Jesus Christ was the very son of God, yet will not believe that he did make of bread his very body, flesh and blood. Therefore we are worse than the devil; seeing that our saviour Christ, by express words, most plainly affirmed the same, when at the last supper he took bread, and said unto his disciples, 'Take ye, eat, this is my body, which shall be given for you.' And shortly after the said dr. Ridley, notwithstanding this most plain and open speech at Paul's cross, did deny the same. And in the last book that dr. Cranmer and his accomplices did set forth of the communion, in Edw. VI. days, these plain words of Christ, 'Hoc est corpus meum,' did so encumber them and trouble their wits, that they did leave out in the same last book, this verb substantive 'est,' and made the sense of Christ's words to be there Englished, 'Take, eat this my body,' and left out there, this 'is' my body; which thing being espied by others, and great fault found withall, then they were fain to patch up the matter, with a little piece of paper clapped over the foresaid words, wherein was written this verb substantive 'est.' The dealing herewith being so uncertain, both of the German writers and English; and one of them so much against another, your honours may be well assured, that this religion which by them is set forth, can be no constant, no stayed religion. And therefore of your honours not to be received, but great wisdom it were for your honours to refuse the same; until you shall perceive better agreement amongst the authors and setters forth of the same.—Touching the 3d and last rule of trial-making, and putting of difference between these religions, it is to be considered of your honours which of them both doth breed more obedient, humble and better subjects; 1st and chiefly unto our Saviour and Redeemer; 2nd, unto our sovereign lady the queen's highness, and to all other superiors. And for some trial and probation thereof, I shall desire your honours to consider the sudden mutation of the subjects of this realm, since the death of the good queen Mary; only caused in them by the preachers of this new religion: when in queen Mary's days, your honours do know right well how the people of this realm did live in an order; and would not run before laws, nor openly disobey the queen's proceedings and proclamations. There was no spoiling of churches, pulling down of altars, and most blasphemous treadings of sacraments under their feet, and hanging up the knave of clubs in the place thereof. There was no scotching nor cutting of the faces and legs of the crucifix and image of Christ; there was no open flesh-eating, nor shambles keeping in the Lent and days prohibited. The subjects of this realm, and especially the nobility and such as were of the honourable council, did in queen Mary's days know the way unto churches and chapels, there to begin their days work, with calling for help and grace by humble prayers and serving of God. And now since the coming and reign of our most sovereign and dear lady queen Elizabeth, by the only preachers and scaffold-players of this new religion, all things are turned upside down; and notwithstanding the queen's proclamations most godly made to the contrary, and her virtuous example of living, sufficient to move the hearts of all obedient subjects to the due service and honour of God. But obedience is gone, humility and meekness clear abolished, virtuous chastity and strait living denied, as though they had never been heard of in this realm, all degrees and kinds being desirous of fleshly and carnal liberty; whereby the young spring-als and children are degenerate from their natural fathers, the servants contemptors of their masters commandments, the subjects disobedient unto God and all superior powers.—And therefore, honourable and my very good lords, of my part to minister some occasion unto your honours to expel, avoid and put out of this realm this new religion, whose fruits are already so manifestly known to be, as I have repeated; and to persuade your honours to avoid it, as much as in me lyeth, and to persevere and continue stedfastly in the same religion, whereof you are in possession, and have already made profession of the same unto God; I shall rehearse unto your honours 4 things, whereby the holy doctor st. Augustin was continued in the catholic church and religion of Christ, which he had received, and would by no means change, nor alter from the same. The 1st of these 4 things was, 'Ipsa autoritas ecclesie christi miraculis inchoata, spe nutrita, charitate aucta, vetustate firmata.' The 2d thing was, 'Populi christiani consensus et unitas.' The 3d was, 'Perpetua sacerdotum successio in sede petri.' The 4th was, 'Ipsum catholici nomen.' If these 4 things did cause so notable and learned a clerk as st. Augustin was, to continue in his professed religion of Christ without all change and alteration, how much then ought they to work the like effect in your hearts, and not to forsake your professed religion? 1st, because it hath the authority of Christ. 2d, because it hath the consent and agreement of christian people. 3d, because it hath the confirmation of all Peter's successors in the see apostolic. 4th, it hath, 'Ipsum catholicæ nomen,' and in all times and seasons called, 'The catholic religion of Christ.' Thus bold have I been to trouble your honours with so tedious and long an oration; for the discharging, as I said before, of my duty, 1st, unto God, 2d, unto our sovereign lady the queen's highness, 3d, unto your honours, and all other subjects of this realm; most humbly beseeching your honours to take it in good part, and to be spoken of me for the only causes abovesaid, and for none other."

The Bp. of Chester (dr. Scot) spoke as follows:—"This bill doth appear unto me such one, as that it is much to be lamented, that it should be suffered either to be read, yea or any ear to be given unto it of christian men, or so hon. an assembly as this is: for it doth not only call in question those things which we ought to reverence without any doubt moving; but maketh further earnest request for alteration, yea, for the clear abolishing of the same. And that this may more evidently appear, I shall desire your lds. to consider, that our religion, as it was here of late discreetly, godly, and learnedly declared, doth consist partly in inward things, as in Faith, Hope and Charity; and partly in outward things, as in common prayers, and the holy sacraments uniformly ministered. Now as concerning these outward things, this bill doth clearly extinguish them, setting in their places I cannot tell what. And the inward it doth also so shake, that it leaveth them very bare and feeble. For 1st, by this bill christian charity is taken away, in that the unity of Christ's church is broken; for it is said, 'nunquam relinquunt unitatem, qui non prius amittunt charitatem.' And st. Paul saith, 'That charity is vinculum perfectionis,' the bond or chain of perfection, wherewith we be knit and joined together in one. Which bond being loosed, we must needs fall one from another, in divers parties and sects, as we see we do at this present. And as touching our Faith, it is evident that divers of the articles and mysteries thereof be also not only called into doubt, but partly openly and partly obscurely, and yet in very deed, as the other, flatly denied. Now these two, I mean faith and charity, being in this case, hope is either left alone, or else presumption set in her place; whereupon for the most part desperation doth follow; from the which I pray God preserve all men.—Wherefore these matters mentioned in this bill, wherein our whole religion consisteth, we ought, I say, to reverence, and not to call into question. For as a learned man writeth, 'To seek after the things which be manifestly opened, to call back or retract things made perfect, and to pull up again matters defined, what other thing is it, than not to give thanks for benefits received?' Likewise, saith holy Athanasius, 'It is a superfluous thing, to call into judgment again matters which have been tried, decreed and manifestly declared, by so many and such bishops. For no man will deny, but if they be now examined again, and of new judged, and after that examined again and again, this curiosity will never come to any end.' And as it is said in ecclesiastica historia, 'If it shall be lawful every day to call our faith in question, we shall never be certain of our faith.' Now if Athanasius did think, that no man ought to doubt of matters determined in the council of Nice, where there was present 318 bps.; how much less ought we to doubt of matters determined, and practised in the holy catholic church of Christ, by 300,000 bps. and how many more we cannot tell.—And as for the certainty of our faith, whereof the story of the church doth speak, it is a thing of all others most necessary; and if it shall hang upon an act of parl. we have but a weak staff to lean unto. And yet I shall desire your lds. not to take me here as to speak in derogation of the parl. which I acknowledge to be of great strength in matters whereunto it extendeth. But for matters in religion, I do not think that it ought to be meddled withal, partly for the certainty which ought to be in our faith and religion, and the uncertainty of the statutes and acts of parl. For we see, that oftentimes that which is established by parl. one year, is abrogated the next, and the contrary allowed. And we see also that one king disalloweth the statutes made under the other. But our faith and religion ought to be most certain, and one in all times, and in no condition wavering: for as st. James saith, 'He that doubteth, or staggereth in his faith, is like the waves of the sea, and shall obtain nothing at the hands of God.' And partly for that the parl. consisteth for the most part of noblemen of this realm, and certain of the commons, being lay and temporal men; which, although they be both of good wisdom and learning, yet not so studied nor exercised in the scriptures, and the holy doctors and practices of the church, as to be competent judges in such matters. Neither doth it appertain to their vocation; yea, and that by your ldp.'s own judgment; as may well be gathered of one fact, which I remember was done this parl. time, which was this. There was a nobleman's son arrested and committed unto ward; which matter, being opened here unto your lds. was thought to be an injury to this house; whereupon as well the young gent. as the officer that did arrest him, and the party by whose means he was arrested, were all sent for, and commanded to appear here before your lds.; which was done accordingly. Yet before the parties were suffered to come into the house, it was thought expedient to have the whole matter considered, lest this house should intermeddle with matters not pertaining unto it. In treating whereof there was found 3 points; 1st, there was a debt, and that your lds. did remit to the common law. The 2nd was a fraud, which was referred to the chancery, because neither of both did appertain unto this court. And the 3rd was the arrest, and committing to ward of the said gent. wherein this house took order. Now, if that by your lds. own judgments the parl.

hath not authority to meddle with matters of common law, which is grounded upon common reason; neither with the chancery, which is grounded upon considerance; then much less may it intermeddle with matters of faith and religion, far passing reason and the judgment of man, such as the contents of this bill be: wherein there be 3 things specially to be considered; the weightiness of the matter, the darkness of the cause and the difficulty in trying out the truth, and the danger and peril which doth ensue if we do take the wrong way.—As concerning the weightiness of the matter contained in this bill, it is very great; for it is no money-matter, but a matter of inheritance; yea, a matter touching life and death, and damnation dependeth upon it. Here is set before us, as the scripture saith, life and death, fire and water. If we put our hand into the one we shall live; if it take hold of the other we shall die. Now to judge these matters here propounded, and discern which is life and which is death, which is fire that will burn us, and which is water that will refresh and comfort us, is a great matter, and not easily perceived of every man. Moreover, there is another matter here to be considered, and that we do not unadvisedly condemn our forefathers and their doings, and justify ourselves and our own doings; both which the scripture forbiddeth. This we know, that this doctrine and form of religion, which this bill propoundeth to be abolished and taken away, is that which our forefathers were born, brought up and lived in; and have professed here in this realm, without any alteration or change, by the space of 900 years and more; and hath also been professed and practised in the universal church of Christ since the apostles time. And that which we go about to establish and place for it, is lately brought in, allowed no where, nor put in practice, but in this realm only; and that but a small time, and against the minds of all catholic men. Now, if we do but consider the antiquity of the one, and the newness of the other, we have just occasion to have the one in estimation for the long continuance thereof, unto such time as we see evident cause why we should revoke it: and to suspect the other as never heard of here before, unto such time as we see just cause why we should receive it, seeing that our fathers never heard tell of it.—But now I do call to remembrance, that I did hear yesterday a nobleman in this house say, making an answer unto this as it were by pre-occupation, that our fathers lived in blindness, and that we have just occasion to lament their ignorance; whereunto me thinketh it may be answered, that if our fathers were here and heard us lament their doings, it is very like they would say unto us, as our Saviour Christ said unto the women which followed him when he went to his death, and wept after him, ‘Nolite flere super nos, sed super vos;’ i. e. ‘Weep not over us for our blindness,’ but weep over yourselves for your own presumption, in taking upon you so arrogantly to justify yourselves and your own doings, and so rashly condemning us and our doings. Moreover, David doth teach us a lesson clear contrary to this nobleman’s sayings: for he biddeth us in doubtful matters go to our fathers, and learn the truth of them, in these words; Ask of thy father, and he shall declare the truth unto thee, and of thine ancestors and they will tell thee: And after in the same Psalm, ‘The children which shall be born and rise up, shall tell unto their children, that it may be known from one generation to another.’ David here willeth us to learn of our fathers, and not to condemn their doings. Whereof I conclude, as concerning this part, that this bill, containing in it matters of great weight and importance, it is to be deliberated on with great diligence and circumspection; and examined, tried and determined by men of great learning, virtue and experience.—And as this matter is great, and therefore not to be passed over hastily, but diligently to be examined, so is it dark and of great difficulty to be so plainly discussed, as that the truth may manifestly appear. For here be, as I have said, two books of religion propounded, the one to be abolished as erroneous and wicked, and the other to be established as godly and consonant to scripture; and they be both concerning one matter, that is, the true administration of the sacraments according to the institution of our Saviour Christ. In the which administration, there be 3 things to be considered: the first is the institution of our Saviour, for the matter and substance of the sacraments. The 2nd, the ordinances of the apostles, for the form of the sacraments. And the 3rd is the additions of the holy fathers, for the adorning and perfecting of the administration of the said sacraments. Which 3 be all duly, as we see observed; and that of necessity, in this book of the mass, and old service, as all men do know which understand it. The other book which is so much extolled, doth ex professo take away two of these 3 things, and in very deed maketh the 3rd thing of nought. But to let the ordinances of the apostles, and the additions of the fathers pass, let us come to the institution of our Saviour Christ, whereof they talk so much, and examine whether of those two books comes nearest unto it. And to make things plain, we will take for example the mass, or as they call it, the supper of the Lord; wherein our Saviour did institute 3 things, which he commanded to be done in remembrance of his death and passion unto his coming again, saying, ‘Hoc facite,’ &c. Do ye this: whereof the first is, the consecration of the blessed body and blood of our Saviour. The 2nd, the offering up the same unto God the Father. And the 3rd, the communicating, that is, the eating and drinking of the said blessed body and blood, under the forms of bread and wine. And as concerning the first two, st. Chrysostom saith thus, ‘I will declare unto you in very deed a marvellous thing, but marvel not at it, nor be not troubled.' But what is this? It is the holy oblation; whether Peter or Paul, or a priest of any desert, do offer, it is the very same which Christ gave to his disciples, and which priests do make or consecrate at this time. This hath nothing less than that. Why so? Because men do not sanctify this, but Christ which did sanctify that before. For like as the words which Christ did speak, be the very same which the priests do now pronounce, so is it the very same oblation. These be the words of st. Chrysostom; wherein he testifieth, as well the oblation and sacrifice of the body and blood of our Saviour Christ, offered unto God the Father in the mass, as also the consecrating of the same by the priest: which two be both taken away by this book, as the authors thereof do willingly acknowledge; crying out of the offering of Christ oftener than once, notwithstanding that all the holy fathers do teach it; manifestly affirming Christ to be offered daily after an unbloody manner. But if these men did understand and consider what doth ensue and follow of this their affirmation, I think they would leave their rashness, and return to the truth again. For if it be true what they say, that there is no external sacrifice in the New Testament, then doth it follow, that there is no priesthood under the same, whose office is, saith st. Paul, 'To offer up gifts and sacrifices for sin.' And if there be no priesthood, then is there no religion under the New Testament. And if we have no religion, then be we without God in this world; for one of these doth necessarily depend upon another. So that if we grant one of these, we grant all; and if we take away one, we take away all.—Note, I beseech your lds. the end of these men's doctrine, that is to set us without God. And the like opinion they hold touching the consecration; having nothing in their mouths but the holy communion, which, after the order of this book, is holy only in words, and not in deed. For the thing is not there which should make it holy, I mean the body and blood of Christ, as may thus appear: it may justly in very deed be called the holy communion if it be ministered truly, and accordingly as it ought to be; for then we receive Christ's holy body and blood into our bodies, and be joined in one with him, like two pieces of wax, which being melten and put together, be made one. But by the order of this book this is not done; for Christ's body is not there in very deed to be received. For the only way whereby it is present is by consecration, which this book hath not at all; neither doth it observe the form prescribed by Christ, nor follow the manner of the church. The evangelists declare, that our Saviour took bread into his hands, and did bless it, brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, 'Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you: do this in remembrance of me.' By these words, 'do this,' we be commanded to take bread into our hands, to bless it, break it, and having a respect to the bread, to pronounce the words spoken by our Saviour, that is, 'Hoc est corpus meum.' By which words, saith st. Chrysostom, the bread is consecrated. Now by the order of this book, neither doth the priest take the bread in his hands, bless it, nor break it, neither yet hath any regard or respect to the bread, when he rehearseth the words of Christ, but doth pass them over as they were telling a tale, or rehearsing a story. Moreover, whereas by the minds of good writers, there is required, yea, and that of necessity, a full mind and intent, to do that which Christ did, that is, to consecrate his body and blood, with other things following: wherefore the church hath appointed in the mass certain prayers, to be said by the priest before the consecration, in the which these words be, 'That the creatures may be made unto us the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Here is declared the intent, as well of the church as also of the priest which saith mass: but as for this new book, there is no such thing mentioned in it, that doth either declare any such intent, either make any such request unto God, but rather to the contrary; as doth appear by the request there made in these words, 'That we receiving these thy creatures of bread and wine, &c.' which words declare, that they intend no consecration at all. And then let them glory as much as they will in their communion, it is to no purpose, seeing that the body of Christ is not there; which as I have said, is the thing that should be communicated.—There did yesterday a nobleman in this house say, that he did believe that Christ is there received in the communion set out in this book; and being asked if he did worship him there, he said, no, nor never would, so long as he lived. Which is a strange opinion, that Christ should be any where, and not worshipped. They say, they will worship him in heaven, but not in the sacrament: which is much like as if a man would say, that when the emperor sitteth under his cloth of estate, princely apparelled, he is to be honoured: but if he come abroad in a frieze coat, he is not to be honoured; and yet he is all one emperor in cloth of gold under his cloth of estate, and in a frieze coat abroad in the street. As it is one Christ in heaven in the form of man, and in the sacrament under the forms of bread and wine. The scripture doth command us to worship the body of our Saviour, yea, and that in the sacrament in these words, 'Worship his footstool for it is holy.' Upon the which place st. Augustin writeth thus, 'Christ took flesh of the blessed Virgin his mother, and in the same he did walk, and the same flesh he gave us to eat unto health; but no man will eat that flesh, except he worship it before. So is it found out, how we shall worship his footstool, &c. we shall not only not sin in worshipping, but we shall sin in not worshipping.' But as concerning this, if we would consider all things well, we shall see the provision of God marvellous in it. For he provideth so, that the very hereticks, and enemies of the truth, be compelled to confess the truth in this behalf. For the Lutherans writing against the Zuinglians do prove, that the true natural body of our Saviour Christ is in the sacrament. And the Zuinglians against the Lutherans do prove, that then it must needs be worshipped there. And thus in their contention doth the truth burst out, whether they will or no. Wherefore, in my opinion of these two errors, the fonder is to say, that Christ is in the sacrament, and yet not to be worshipped, than to say, he is not there at all. For either they do think, that either he is there but in an imagination or fancy, and so not in very deed; or else they be Nestorians, and think that there is his body only, and not his divinity; which be both devilish and wicked.—Now, my lords, consider I beseech you the matters here in variance: whether you be able to discuss them according to learning, so as the truth may appear, or no; that is, whether the body of Christ be by this new book consecrated, offered, adored, and truly communicated, or no; and whether these things be required necessarily by the institution of our Saviour Christ, or no; and whether book goeth nearer the truth. These matters, my lords, be (as I have said) weighty and dark, and not easy to be discussed: and thus likewise your lds. may think of the rest of the sacraments, which be either clearly taken away, or else mangled after the same sort by this new book.—The third thing here to be considered is, the great danger and peril that doth hang over your heads, if you do take upon you to be judges in these matters, and judge wrong; bringing both yourselves and others from the truth unto untruth, from the highways unto bye-paths. It is dangerous enough, our lord knoweth, for a man himself to err, but it is more dangerous not only to err himself, but also to lead other men into error. It is said in the scripture, of the king Hieroboam, to aggravate his offences, that 'he did sin himself and caused Israel to sin.' Take heed, my lords, that the like be not said by you; if you pass this bill, you shall not only in my judgment err yourselves, but ye also shall be the authors and causers that the whole realm shall err after you. For the which you shall make an account before God.—Those that have read stories and know the discourse and order of the church, discussing of controversies in matters of religion, can testify, that they have been discussed and determined in all times by the clergy only, and never by the temporality. The heresy of Arius, which troubled the church in the time of Constantine the Great, was condemned in the council of Nice. The heresy of Eutyches in the council of Chalcedone under Martin; the heresy of Macedonius in the first council of Constantinople in the time of Theodosius; the heresy of Nestorius in the Ephesian council, in the time of Theodosius the younger. And yet did never none of these good emperors assemble their nobility and commons, for the discussing and determining of these controversies;

neither asked their minds in them, or went by number of voices or polls, to determine the truth, as is done here in this realm at this time. We may come lower, to the third council of Tolletane in Spain, in the time of Ricaredus being there, and to the council of France about 800 years ago, in the time of Carolus Magnus; which both following the order of the church, by licence had of the Pope, did procure the clergy of their realms to be gathered and assembled, for reforming of certain errors and enormities within their said realms, whereunto they never called their nobility nor commons; neither did any of them take upon themselves either to reason or dispute, in discussing of the controversies; neither to determine them being discussed, but left the whole to the discussing and determining of the clergy. And no marvel, if these with all other Catholic princes used this trade. For the emperors that were heretics, did never reserve any such matter to the judgment of temporal men, as may appear to them that read the stories of Constantius, Valens, &c. who procured divers assemblies, but always of the clergy, for the establishing of Arius's doctrine; and of Zeno the emperor, which did the like for Eutyches's doctrine; with many others of that sort. Yea, it doth appear in the Acts of the Apostles, that an infidel would take no such matter upon him. The story is this, st. Paul having continued at Corynth one year and an half in preaching of the gospel, certain wicked persons did arise against him, and brought him before their vice-consul called Gallio, laying unto his charge, that he taught the people to worship God contrary to their law. Unto whom the vice-consul answered thus: 'If that this man, saith Gallio, had committed any wicked act or cursed crime, O ye Jews, I might justly have heard you; but and if it be concerning questions and doubts of the words and matters of your law, that is to say, if it be touching your religion, I will not be judge in those matters. Mark, my lords, this short discourse, I beseech you, and ye shall perceive that all Catholic princes, heretic princes, yea, and infidels, have from time to time refused to take that upon them that your lds. go about and challenge to do.—But now, because I have been long, I will make an end of this matter, with the saying of two noble emperors in the like affairs. The first is Theodosius, which said thus; 'It is not lawful for him that is not of the order of the holy bps. to intermeddle with the treating of ecclesiastical matters.' Likewise, said Valentinianus the emperor, being desired to assemble certain bps. together for examining of a matter of doctrine, in this wise; 'It is not lawful for me, being one of the lay people, to search out such matters curiously; but let the priests, unto whom the charge of these things doth appertain, meet together in what place soever they will:' he meaneth, for the discoursing thereof. But to conclude; and if these emperors had not to do with such matters, how should your lds. have to do with all? And thus desiring your good lds. to consider, and take in good part these few things that I have spoken, I make an end."

Privilege of Parl.] Feb. 24. "John Smith returned burgess for Camelford, upon a declaration by Mr. Marsh, that he had come to this house, being outlawed, and also had deceived divers merchants in London, taking wares of them to the sum of 300l. minding to defraud them of the same, under the colour of Privilege of this house; the examination whereof, committed to sir Jo. Mason, and other of this house, was found and reported to be true; and that a writ of Cap. Utlag. against him, was directed to the sheriffs of London, returnable 150 paschæ next, at the suit of Wm. Pinchebek and his wife, in a plea of detinue:—upon which matters, and consultation had in the house, the question was asked by Mr. Speaker, If he should have privilege of this house or not? And by the more number of voices, it seemed that he should not have privilege: but, upon the division of the house, the number that would have him not to have privilege was 107, and the number that would he should be privileged was 112; and therefore ordered, That he shall still continue a member of this house."

May 8th, the queen came to the house of lords, when Mr. Speaker, attended by the commons, made a learned oration, on exhibiting the bill for the Subsidy and the bill for Tonnage and Poundage. He also required the queen's assent to such other bills as had passed both the houses. Which oration being commended and answered by the lord keeper, the royal assent was given to 42 bills; and, by the queen's pleasure, this parl. was dissolved.—The titles of the public acts passed in this session will be found at the end of this reign.

A Parl. called.] It was not till the beginning of the year 1562 that a new parl. was summoned. A war with France being now actually begun, and the sinews of it much wanted, writs were issued for a new one, to meet at Westminster, on the 11th of Jan. On the day of their meeting the queen was again indisposed; and therefore another writ of prorogation was produced, by the lord keeper, and other lords of the council, and read, whereby this parl. was prorogued only to the following day, On which day the parl. began; and it may not be amiss to give the form of the queen's procession to the house. She rode that morning from her palace, in great state, to Westminster Abbey; accompanied with all the lords, spiritual and temporal. The queen was clad in a crimson velvet robe, the earl of Northumberland bearing the sword before her; all the heralds at arms, in their rich mantles, trumpets blowing, &c. The bishops, 22 in number, riding in their robes of scarlet lined, and hoods down their backs of minever.—The queen lighted at our Lady of Grace's chapel, and, with her noble and stately retinue, went in at the north door of the abbey, where she heard a sermon preached by dr. Nowell, dean of st. Paul's; and then a psalm being sung, she and her honourable company went out of the south door, to the parl. chamber, and soon after to the house.

The Lord Keeper's Speech.] Sir Symonds D'Ewes tells us, that the queen being present, and the houses met, the lord keeper, Bacon, by her command, opened the cause of the summons in these words. "My lords, and others of this honourable assembly; you shall understand, that my most dread and sovereign lady, the queen's majesty here present, hath commanded me to declare the occasion of this assembly; which I am not able (but unmeet) to do, as it ought to be done, among such a noble, wise, and discreet company. Howbeit, knowing the experience of her maj. bearing with such as do their good wills, and your honours' patience, in bearing with me in the like, afore this time; it encourageth me the better herein, not doubting of the like at this present. Therefore, my lords, the occasion is, that necessary matters be provided for, propounded, and scanned, and after agreed upon and ended, which afterwards shall remain and continue; which matters, in my judgment, may well be divided into 2 parts, one touching Religion, for the setting forth of God's honour and glory; and the other concerning Policy, for the Commonwealth; as well for provision at home, as to provide for the foreign enemy abroad; which said matters of Religion may again be divided into 2 parts; for God's cause being sincerely weighed, considered, and followed, bringeth forth good success in all affairs; and being not followed, but neglected, and made light of, how can any thing prosper or take good effect? And the greater the personages be which so abuse the same, the greater the fault is, to the damage of the whole commonwealth; for all mens' eyes be fixed on those who be in authority; for as the head is, even so is the foot; and after the superior followeth the inferior. For as God's law itself is perfect, so there is no imperfection therein, but that which cometh of ourselves, wherein I cannot excuse either the spirituality or laity. For as the preachers be not so diligent in their vocation of preaching as they ought to be, even so we of the laity be neither so diligent in hearing, nor yet in doing, as we should be. And 3rd, some of the laity, in not giving credit unto it, as it ought for to be. For as all in authority ought to be credited, and their doings taken in the best part, yet I would wish the same should continue no longer than they do well.—And where at this present there is great want of ministers, and some of them that be, be much insufficient; which, considering the time, are to be borne withal, not doubting the circumspection of the bps. in well looking to the placing of such which shall be appointed hereafter; and those which be, and will not be reformed, to have sharp punishment. For as heretofore the discipline of the church hath not been good; and again, that the ministers thereof have been slothful; even so for want of the same hath sprung two enormities: the 1st is, that for lack thereof, every man liveth as he will, without fear; and 2nd, many ceremonies agreed upon, but the right ornaments thereof are either left undone or forgotten. As in one point, for want of discipline it is that so few come to service, and the church so unreplenished, notwithstanding that at the last parl. a law was made for good order to be observed in the same; but yet, as appeareth, not yet executed. Therefore if it be too easy, let it be made sharper; and if already well, then see it executed. For the want of discipline causeth obstinacy, contempt, and growing of heresy; therefore better to be winked at and unspoken, than bruted abroad and unperformed: therefore, in mine opinion, the device is good, that in every diocese there be officers appointed and devised, as hath been thought good, to sit for the redress of these and such like errors, twice or thrice a year, till the faults be amended. In which well doing, the head officers are to be borne withal, and maintained; and laws to be made for the purpose: the chief care of which said former matters pertaineth to you, my lords of the spirituality; wherein you must take pains to travel, whereunto be laws to be joined; not only for the more perfecting of the same, but for the maintenance, as well of the heads as the ministers thereof.—Now to the 2nd part, of Policy for the Commonwealth; for as there be faults for want of discipline, so are there faults in the imperfection, and want of execution, which imperfection must be looked unto; and want of laws which needeth to be provided for and made; and to consider, if there be not too many laws for one thing; and those so large and busy, that neither the commons can understand the same, nor yet well the lawyer, which would be brought into some briefer and better order, and there executed. For which purpose, it is necessary to take care to have good ministers thereof; and 2nd, to banish all fearfulness for prosecuting the same; and over and besides, that to appoint proved men to inquire of these ministers, whereby they may have the better regard to their duty: for, even as the visitation of the church is and was well appointed for the church, so now is the like to be appointed for the temporality. For if the laws be not well executed, my part is not the least thereof, which yearly I would be glad to hear of. The third for the enemy, as well here bred amongst us, as abroad: for whereas the queen's maj. at her entrance found this realm in war with foreign power, at which time lack of treasure, artillery, force, and other things, caused her to agree to a peace, although not the best, howbeit for our surety she spared no cost to bring it to pass; which notwithstanding, of later time, certain old cankered enemies of this realm, attempted to put in execution to bring the Scots to the governance of France, and so being a firm land to ours, to have been our utter enemies; which danger the queen foreseeing, sought by all means, as well by her ambassadors as others, to stay the enterprize, but could not; and therefore helped her neighbours of Scotland, and so disappointed that attempt; or else afore this time I doubt the Scottish territories would have been too little to have holden them, but that they would have troubled us, not only at Berwick, but at the walls of York; which attempt, being by the means of her maj., stayed and letted, the said bent enemies have attempted the same in France, to the whole disturbance of all Christendom, and all done for the mischief of this realm, joined with a devilish conspiracy within ourselves, tending to the aiding of the foreign enemy; and by their own confession, to have raised a rebellion in this realm: and for that by none of her grace's travels or means, she could there stay their enterprize, or make them agree, she was forced the rather to stay the same, for the surety of this realm, to the no little charge of her maj.: for in these proceedings; and in repairing of these and other like faults, I dare be bold to say, (for that I am thereof assured) it hath cost her maj. as much as two of the best subsidies, which at any time hath been within this realm: and all at her own proper charges, without either straining of her subjects, or having aid of them, towards the same. Howbeit she yet thinketh it well spent; for often it chanceth, that money is better spent than spared; as the common saying is, 'that a penny is well spent which afterwards saveth a pound.' And so in this, if that money had not been so spent, in staying in time their attempted enterprises, it would afterwards have turned to no little prejudice, nor yet small charge of this realm. And where afore this time princes commonly have had some vein or delight to spend treasure upon for their pleasure, which the queen hath none, but only for the commonwealth and surety thereof; so that we may most justly and fortunately say to her great praise, that the relieving of the realm's necessities is our prince's whole delight: and notwithstanding all the disbursements of these her great charges, yet she was (as I right well know) very hardly brought to, and persuaded to call this parl. in which she should be driven to require any aid, or by any means to charge her subjects, if by any other means it might have been holpen; and so her maj. herself commanded to be declared. And I for my part, and so do others very well know; for the commons little think or consider what a trouble want is to her, whereby she is forced to ask of them, (which surely is against her nature) but that she is thereunto forced, for the surety of this realm.—And for that the nether house cannot, being so many together, but of necessity must have one to be a mouth, aider or instructor unto them, for the opening of matters, which is called the Speaker; therefore go and assemble yourselves together and elect one, a discreet, wise, and learned man, to be your Speaker, and on Friday next the queen's maj. appointeth to repair hither again, for to receive the presentment of him accordingly."

The Speaker's Speech.] Jan. 15th, the commons came again before the queen, and presented Tho. Williams, esq. one of the fellows of the Inner Temple, their Speaker elect; whose excuse for insufficiency not being allowed, he made the following elaborate speech on his induction: "Most honourable; although afore this time the place hath been furnished with orators, and therefore their matter entreated of worthily called an oration; yet I now, void of any such knowledge, require that name may be left, and that it might bear the name of an epistle with a request. And for the better understanding thereof, I will divide the matter into 3 parts; one for time past; and the 2nd, time present; and the 3rd, time to come. But fearing to fall between two mountains, as to be counted either ungrate, or dissembling, I know not what to say; but yet seeing savage beasts forget not them who do well unto them, as appeareth by the story of a lion, out of whose foot a certain man took a thorn, which said person being afterwards cast to the same lion to be devoured, the lion not forgetting, but remembering the former kindness shewed unto him, would not devour him, but ever after followed the same man; even so, without too much ingratitude, can I not let pass your maj.'s manifold benefits extended upon us; which although worthily to be declared, they pass my capacity now to express; yet think it blasphemy to suffer it clean to be untouched, and therefore in some part will put in remembrance the same; which I will divide into 2 parts, the one spiritual the other temporal. For the 1st, when God planted your highness in this place, you found it not so furnished with treasure as other your predecessors have, although if you had, yet occasions enough to employ it; which notwithstanding, you did not take the extremity of penal statutes, and other forfeitures, due unto you, but pardoned all such as in time convenient required it. Also your maj. did vouchsafe to take upon you the charge of both the states, as well spiritual as temporal, and so purged this church of all ill service, and placed therein service to God's honour. Further, what great plague and dearth happened by ill money this 20 years last past, which within one year is brought to good again, with little loss of your subjects? Your maj. prevented also, as well the attempt in Scotland, made by your common enemy there, as now of late again in France; which otherwise, if it had not been foreseen, would have turned to the no little peril, and loss of this your realm, and subjects thereof. Also your highness hath been author of good laws, as appeareth by those made, both of the last parl. and by your other proclamations since. Further, finding this realm at your entrance in wars, you brought it in peace: all which former proceedings have been a great charge unto your maj. which although the revenues of the crown be small, yet hath it hitherto only been done of your own charge, as the last day by the lord keeper it was declared. And for the last part, and principal point of all other, your highness hath brought and restored again God's doctrine into this realm; for which your humble subjects most heartily give thanks to God, and you, by the mouth of me their appointed Speaker.—For the 2d point, being time present; your maj. is the head, and the body the spirituality and the temporality, which body is to be divided into 3 estates, the lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons, whose mouth I am; which by no means can prosper, the one without the other; for as any estate divided cannot well continue, so in this; and therefore say, 'nosce teipsum,' not minding to speak these words only to you, but to the whole body; for although the head may lack a member of the body, and yet continue; yet so the member cannot want the head, nor yet the head the whole body, but the want of the one of these last two shall be the ruin of the other; and therefore of necessity, for the sure preservation of the whole; it behoveth them firmly to join together; for though your highness be the head, and therefore the chief care pertaineth to you, yet your maj. cannot thoroughly redress the same, without knowledge of the faults, nor yet well understand the whole state, except the other parts of the body join with you, and put to their helping hands. I find in divers histories great commodities grow to princes, by searching out, not only the wants of their subjects, but knowledge of their talk; whereby they better both understand their own faults, and the flatterers they have about them; which order the wise and prudent Marcus Aurelius used, and long time reigned honourably. The noble conqueror Alexander, in the beginning of his reign, used the same; but leaving that order, and having no regard to his living, was destroyed; which like example was seen by that notable and valiant warrior Julius Caesar. And being encouraged by these like examples, and others, to enter into some abuses used in this realm, I will only speak of 3, being all 3 notable monsters, necessity, ignorance, and error. Necessity is grown amongst ourselves, so that no man is contented with his degree, though he hath never so much; but where she is (as the Proverb saith) she hath no law; for how now be all schools, benefices, and other like rooms furnished, and yet those for schools so few, that I dare say a hundred schools want in England, which, before this time have been. And if in every school there had been but an hundred scholars, yet that had been ten thousand; so that now I doubt whether there be so many learned men in England, as the number wants of these scholars.—The 2d monster is her daughter ignorance; for want of ten thousand scholars, which these schools were the bringers up of, and want of good school-masters, bringeth ignorance; but the occasion of these two monsters, is for want of livings and preferments; for covetousness hath gotten the livings, as by impropriations, which is a decay of learning. For by it the tree of knowledge groweth downwards, and not upwards, as it was first meant and made for; and groweth thereby greatly to the dishonour both of God and this commonwealth. The universities are decayed, and great market towns, and others, without either school or preacher; for the poor vicar hath but only 20*l.* and the rest, being no small sum, is impropriate; and so thereby no preacher there, but the people being trained up and led in blindness, for want of instructions, become obstinate. And therefore to see to it, and that impropriations may be redressed, notwithstanding the laws already made.—The 3*d* monster is error, a serpent with many heads, many evil opinions, and much evil life, as pelagians, libertines, papists, and such others, leaving God's commandments, to follow their own traditions, affections and minds. But if the Papist be, as indeed he is, in error, let us seek the redress thereof; for that the poor and ignorant be thereby abused. Until which redress be had, you nor your realm, neither at home nor abroad, shall ever be well served of such people, which be so divided; and therefore speedily look to it, and weed out this wickedness and error within these our days, which is too much known now a-days; for if your godly proclamations were not so soon forgotten, they would be amended. In the country I heard tell, but since I came hither, walking in the streets, I have heard oftentimes more oaths than words; a pitiful hearing! for if the Egyptians, by whose laws the people lost their hands, and amongst the barbarians lost their lives, for swearing, and especially if it were a lie: if it were so punished amongst them, being infidels, what shall there be no punishment amongst us being christians? Is truth further from us professing the name of Christ, and being christians, than from them being infidels? But even as Tantalus was plagued, so are we; for although he had apples even hanging at his mouth, yet could he not eat any of them; and having a river of water even as it were running by his lips, yet could he not drink, but died for hunger and thirst: even so are we plagued: for having God's word, and his name ever in our mouths, yet we live as infidels, or as them that are furthest from the same; and so having enough, there is scarcity. And that we may avoid this blasphemy, and the other monsters, your humble subjects desire your highness to see to the lamentable estate of this commonwealth, and the redress of the same.—Having perused times past and times present, let us go to, and well remember the time to come. For Cato saith, 'a thing well begun shall be well ended;' so then followeth of a good beginning a good ending. For that noble captain Hannibal, environed with his enemies, in a strange country, sounded his trumpet to council, and thereby prospered. So your maj. hath now called the prelates, nobles, and commons, to council, for surety of the realm. We now so therefore assembled, as diligent in our calling, have thought good to move your maj. with the assent of this assembly, to build a strong fort for the surety of the realm, to the repulsing of your enemies abroad; which must be set upon firm ground, and steadfast, having two gates, one commonly open, the other as a postern, with two watchmen at either of them, one governor, one lieutenant, four soldiers, and no good thing there wanting. The same to be named, the fear of God; the governor thereof to be God, your majesty the lieutenant, the stones the hearts of faithful people, the two watchmen at the open gate to be called knowledge and virtue, the other two at the postern to be called mercy and truth; all being spiritual ministers.—This fort is invincible, if every man will fear God; for all governors reign and govern by the two watchmen, knowledge and virtue; and if you, being the lieutenant, see justice with prudence her sister executed, you shall then rightly use the office of a lieutenant; and for such as depart out of this fort, let them be let out at the postern by the two watchmen, mercy and truth; and then you shall be well at home and abroad. The charge of this fort is yours, being lieutenant. By justice your place is settled, whereunto obedience ought to be taught and done; which your majesty ought to look to. And so now the fear of God to be a sure fort, the subjects' hearts the stones, knowledge, virtue, mercy, and truth, the four watchmen, God the governor, and your majesty the lieutenant, is well proved. Therefore to build upon this fort, the fear of God, is nothing lacking to a happy life; for by God are all princes appointed. Who put down Saul? Who made David king, who sought only God's glory and so prospered? As did Josaphat, Josias, and Hezekias, and also Ahas, as long as they sought God's glory, prospered; but forgetting God, were overthrown: therefore first of all, and continually vouchsafe to seek God's glory, and his true honour, and then you shall have this fort well built, and by you well governed.—Further I am to be a suitor to your majesty, that when matters of importance shall arise, whereupon it shall be necessary to have your highness's opinion, that then I may have free access unto you for the same; and the like to the lords of the upper house:—2*ndly*. That in repairing from the nether house to your maj. or the Lords, to declare their meanings, and I mistaking on uttering the same contrary to their meaning, that then my fault or imbecility in declaring thereof be not prejudicial to the house, but that I may again repair to them, the better to understand their meanings, and so they to reform the same.—3*rd*. That the assembly of the lower house may have frank and free liberties to speak their minds, without any controulment, blame, grudge, menaces, or displeasure, according to the old ancient order.—Finally, That the old privilege of the house be observed, which is, that they and theirs might be at liberty, frank, and free, without arrest, molestation, trouble, or other damage to their bodies, lands, goods, or servants, with all other their liberties, during the time of the said parliament; whereby they may the better attend, and do their duty; all which privileges I desire may be enrolled, as at other times it hath been accustomed.—And thus having been tedious unto you with my speech, void of eloquence, I crave your pardon, and desire your maj. to accept of my heart and good will, as well at this time as after; and I will pray as I am bounden, for your honour long to reign over us.”

It was now that the oath of Supremacy was first taken by all the members of both houses; pursuant to an act of parl. made in the 1st year of this reign.

Privilege of Parl.] Feb. 6, the Commons Journals say, “Sir H. Jones complains all his servants to be imprisoned, and prays Privilege; but after long arguments for the privilege, commission was given to Mr. Sackvill, and others, to examine and certify of the matter. On the 8th, Mr. Sydney declared upon examination, the fray to seem to be begun by sir H. Jones’s servants.—On the 12th a bill is brought in against sir H. Jones’s servants for the fray and riot; and the same day the committees do certify to the house, that Mr. Jones’s men may be committed to the serjeant, and that he attend Mr. Recorder and Mr. Gargrave with the prisoners, before the lord chief justice, to enter with sureties in bond of 500l. to appear, personally in the queen’s bench, in Trinity term next to answer to such things as shall then be objected to them on the queen’s behalf, and so set at liberty.”

A Supply granted.] Feb. 20th, a bill for granting a Supply was sent up by the Commons. It consisted of a Subsidy, two 15ths and two 10ths; which passed the Lords on the 23d. This grant was the same as the former, except that the tax upon goods was from 3l. when the former was from 5l. Camden writes, that this large supply was granted as a compliment to the queen, on the happy turn of affairs at that time. “In consideration of her having reformed the faith; restored peace to her kingdoms; rescued England and Scotland from the common enemy; refined the coin; rebuilt the navy; provided ammunition for sea and land; and in a word, for the extraordinary care she used in France, for the security of its young king, for the safety of this kingdom, and her endeavours to regain Calais.” We find, by the Journal, that the two provinces of Canterbury and York granted each a Subsidy, this time, which were confirmed by parl.

Act of Supremacy.] March 3d, a bill passed the lords, with some provisoes added thereto, by them, “For the Assurance of the Queen’s Majesty’s Royal Power, over all states and subjects, within her dominions.” By this act, “it was high treason for any man to assert three times, by writing, word or deed, the authority of any foreign prince, prelate or state, in spiritual matters in England, or any other of the queen’s dominions. Or to refuse the oath of Supremacy to the queen, in matters spiritual, or over persons ecclesiastical, after it had been twice tendered. Yet so, as that they should not fall under an attainder, nor forfeit their goods and chattels; nor that this oath should be exacted from any peer of the realm, or any person of eminent quality, whose allegiance the queen did not in the least question; nor, indeed, of any but such who were, had been, or should be, in holy orders; or did then bear, or should bear, some ecclesiastical office. Or that, after warning given, should refuse to observe the rights and ceremonies of the church of England; or should dishonour the same in public, either by word or deed; or should celebrate or hear mass, &c.”—To the passing of this bill there was only some small opposition; the catholic bps. being now removed, but one lay-lord in the house, had the courage to speak against it. This was lord visc. Montague. In the Commons, one Mr. Atkinson, a student of the Inner-Temple, expressed the same zeal for the catholic cause. Their speeches are published in Mr. Strype’s Annals, &c. from the M.S. of the famous martyrologist, Foxe; and are deserving of a place in this History.

Lord Montague spoke as follows:—“The prince or commonwealth that will make a new law, ought to consider 3 things: 1st. That the same law be necessary: 2nd, that it be just and reasonable; 3rd, that it be possible and commodious, apt and fit to be put in execution. Unto these 3 qualities may be reduced all other that are requisite, to the end the law should be good. Now, it is to be seen, if these 3 qualities be in the law, that certain do pretend, and would have to be made in this parl. against the papists, as they call them. For the which presuppose, that my intent is not to persuade that the religion which now is observed in England is either false or schismatical; but to entreat only, if it be good, that a law be made, whereby it shall be commanded, under pain of death, that the papists, with oath, confess the doctrine of the protestants to be true and evangelical. As for the 1st, I say, That this law that is pretended is not necessary; forasmuch as the catholics of this realm disturb not, nor hinder the public affairs of the realm, neither spiritual nor temporal. They dispute not, they preach not, they disobey not the queen, they cause no trouble nor tumults among the people. So that no man can say, that thereby the realm doth receive any hurt or damage by them. They have brought into the realm no novelties in doctrine and religion. This being true and evident, as it is indeed, there is no necessity why any new law should be made against them. And where there is no sore nor grief, medicines are superfluous, and also hurtful and dangerous. As concerning the 2d, I say, That this law that is pretended, is neither just nor reasonable, nor cannot be, nor deserveth to be called, or have the name of law, when it is made. For it shall be contrary and repugnant unto all laws of men, natural and civil. I meddle not with God's laws; for I have above said, that in this discourse I do not pretend to entreat of the verity and truth of religion. But leaving that till time fit and convenient, I do entreat, whether it be just to make this penal statute to force the subjects of this realm to receive and believe the religion of the protestants, upon pain of death. This, I say, is a thing most unjust. For that it is repugnant to the law of nature and all civil laws. The reason is, for that naturally no man can, or ought to be constrained, to take for certain that that he holdeth to be uncertain. For this repugneth to the natural liberty of man's understanding. For understanding may be persuaded, but not forced.—The doctrine of the Protestants doth repugn unto all the ecclesiastical state of England that were present at the last parl. and holdeth contradiction with all provinces of Christendom. It repugneth to all the doctrine of all the parliaments past, and all general councils. With these contradictions there is no Protestant, if he be a man of any understanding or judgment, but will confess that it is doubtful and uncertain; seeing that of those things that appear not to our senses, there ariseth no doubt nor uncertainty, but of the opinions of men. And if he will say 'tis the Catholic doctrine; therefore the question is, How this word can be understood? which is the work of understanding, and is reduced and brought to opinions. And when there be many opinions of the one side and the other, it is reason, that the thing be doubtful, 'till all opinions come to one: and that there be one faith, one God, and one Trinity.—Now, to turn to my purpose, I say, That since the doctrine of Protestants is so uncertain, (leaving to call it false, there no reason nor justice, that doth permit or suffer, that men should be forced to take it for certain, true and sure, and affirm the same. It is sufficient, and enough for Protestants to keep possession of the churches, and the authority to preach and excommunicate, not to seek to force and strain men to do or believe by compulsion what they believe not; and not to swear, and to make God witness of their lie. It is enough for them, and they might hold themselves content, that there is no impediment or let made by the Catholics, but that they may persuade the people so much as they list, and teach and preach their doctrine.—As touching the 3rd, that is, Whether this statute should be possible, meet and convenient, to be put in execution: I say, that on what is said in the 2nd chapter of Justice, dependeth and is contained the understanding of this 3rd, touching the commodity and possibility. For it is an easy thing to understand, that a thing so unjustly, and so contrary to all reason and liberty of man, cannot be put in execution, but with great incommodity and difficulty. For what man is there so without courage and stomach, or void of all honour, that can consent or agree to receive an opinion and new religion by force and compulsion; or will swear, that he thinketh the contrary to that he thinketh. To be still and dissemble may be born and suffered for a time; to keep his reckoning with God alone; but to be compelled to lie and to swear, or else to die therefore, are things that no man ought to suffer and endure. And it is to be feared, rather than to die, they will seek how to defend themselves: whereby should ensue the contrary of what every good prince and well-advised commonwealth ought to seek and pretend, that is, to keep their kingdom and govt. in peace.—So that this law and statute that is pretended, since it is not necessary for men, without they leave quietness and peace; nor just and reasonable, seeing it forceth men to hold for certain and true, that they should hold for doubtful and false; and being inconvenient and impossible to be put in execution, for the alterations that may ensue of great injustice; I conclude, that by no means any such law ought to be made and enacted.—And because some said, This need not be feared, nor ought any thing to be a stop; because the greater part of the assembly of the lords and the higher house, was of the mind and opinion, that the law ought to be made, including in the same assembly the bps. that are 25; I answer, That they neither can, nor ought to have to do in this matter, because they are as party, and therefore cannot be judges. And that they have party, and have interest in this matter, it cannot be denied; since, 'ipso facto,' they have dispossessed the Catholic bps. of their churches, under this occasion and colour, to bring into the realm better doctrine. Besides all this, neither the law nor the gospel, nor other civil law doth suffer ecclesiastical persons, to have more than the judgment and examination of the doctrine and excommunications. And, according to this, it belongeth not to the bps. but only to declare and pronounce the doctrine, of the Papists, to be false, as they have done; and to excommunicate such as follow the same. To appoint afterward the temporal penalties of confiscation, banishment or death; this appertaineth not to them, but to the secular judge, who, according to the necessity of the commonwealth, for peace and quietness of the same, may execute and proceed against some excommunicate persons with more or less rigour after, as he shall think good.—It shall be also very just, reasonable and convenient for the service of the queen, that the lords of the realm alone, without the bps. do consider, if it be meet and convenient for the wealth of the realm, to make this statute and law so rigorous; or whether that that is made already be sufficient; or whether it be meet and convenient (to take away all inconveniences and damages that may arise to those diversities and novelties in religion) to command the bps. all, as well papistical as protestants, to find the means to try the matter (afore disputed here) within the realm, or in the general council. The which seemeth should be much more easy, more sure, and more convenient.—And, furthermore, since it belongeth to the said lords, not to endanger their lives and goods, if any war should happen within the realm, or with their neighbours; let them therefore take good heed, and not suffer themselves to be led by such men that are full of affection and passions, and that look to wax mighty, and of power, by the confiscation, spoil and ruin of the houses of noble and ancient men.”

To this speech we shall subjoin another, made in the House of Commons, against the said bill, on the 10th of March.

Mr. Atkinson rose and said: “Right honourable; you have heard the effect of this bill, containing in itself, that all those that shall by any open act maintain any foreign jurisdiction, or shall refuse the oath, which is likewise for the abolishing of all foreign power; that such offenders shall, for the first offence, incur the danger of præmunire; and if they oftsones refuse again, then to be judged as in case of high treason. Whether any foreign power be lawful to be received within this realm, or whether in conscience a man ought to take this oath, that matter I purpose not now to dispute; for that is already put out of question by consent of the whole realm, in high court of parl. in the 1st year of the reign of our sovereign lady that now is; against which it shall not become me to reason. But, marrie, whether an offence committed against that statute be so sharply to be punished as this bill here requireth, that is the question that we now have in hand. Wherein I think that the punishment already devised is sufficient; that the punishment limited in this bill is too rigorous; and that though this act went forward, yet no benefit could thereof grow to the commonwealth.—If the offence were treason, as it was said this other day, in the house, that it was; and that the offenders therein were traitors even by the common laws of the realm, as men that sought to take the crown from the king, and give it to the pope, then would I think no punishment too little for it; and pity it were, that even for the first offence it was not made death. Howbeit, if it may be proved unto you, that the maintenance of foreign jurisdiction was not by the laws ever accounted treason; then I trust there will no good man think, but that the offence being not so great, the punishment ought not to be so great neither. I would agree, that the ancient writers of the law, as both Bracton and Briton have, in their writings called the king “God’s vicar in earth;” and so I assent to that which Skipwith saith, “that there is the deanery of Pickering in Ireland, belonging to the abp. of Deviling, and that it is of this condition, that if an Englishman be made abp. that then he shall have the deanery as his free chapel; and if an Irishman, then the king. His reason is, “because the sacred maj. of a king, anointed with holy oil, hath capacity of spiritual jurisdiction.” I likewise agree to the saying of Bryan, where he saith, “that a great doctor of law once told him, that a priest, by prescription, might be impleaded in the king’s temporal court; because the person of a king is mixt of priesthood and laity.”—Of all which we may gather, that by the common laws the king may have the temporal profits of a spiritual promotion, and also implead a spiritual person in his temporal court. All which, notwithstanding, I am sure no authority can be shewed to prove, that the affirming, that the pope ought to have jurisdiction in these or other like matters, or that the jurisdiction of them ought to appertain to the king, was never yet accounted treason.—And therefore suppose that the king had brought a ‘quare impedit’ against a spiritual person (which is a plea merely temporal, determinable in the temporal court) and that the spiritual person had thought to appeal to Rome in stay of the judgment; had this been treason? Nay, surely, though without some open act shewing the same, it was never yet taken to be treason; nor was it ever yet seen, that a man in such a case was bound to discover his conscience upon his oath. But to go further, suppose he had expressly said before witness, that he would appeal to Rome; nay, suppose he had appealed to Rome indeed; had this been treason? Nay, it was never yet but præmunire; and not præmunire neither, till the statute of the 27th of Edw. III. made it so. But was this an offence against the king’s crown and dignity? But so are many offences that are not treason; and are not, as he said, ‘crimina læsæ majestatis,’ but ‘crimina minutæ majestatis.’—If, then, to affirm, that the pope ought to have jurisdiction in a temporal matter were not treason; much less were it treason to affirm the same in spiritual matters: as to say, that the consecration of abps. belonged to him, or that the order of service and sacraments ought to be directed by the see apostolic. What the judges have said in our law in the behalf of the pope, that spare I here for duty’s sake to speak of. I am sure it was more than I have hitherto said: and yet were they, I believe, as skilful in knowing what treason was, and as loth to offend therein, as was the gent. that went about with so many reasons to prove it treason; nor I doubt not, but even at those times when princes suffered this offence to remain unpunished, and when the subjects offended in it, that yet they had as great a care to maintain the royal dignity of the crown; and were otherwise as void of traitorous hearts as those that think themselves best subjects. And therefore we read, that in the time of Edw. I. the pope willed the king to take peace with Scotland, and he made him answer, “that touching his temporalities, he knew no peer in his realm." And the like letters were sent in the time of Hen. VI. and Humfrey, then duke of Gloucester, hurled them in the fire. And whosoever readeth the statute of præmunire, made in the 16th of Rich. II. shall find that all the lords, both spiritual and temporal, said, "that they would stick with the king in the maintenance of his crown and dignity." And they were therefore severally examined, to the intent that their opinion might be known. If then it hath been proved, that that offence hath not been treason, nor that the offenders therein have not otherwise borne traitorous hearts; I trust, that the offence being not so great, you will not without cause go about to increase the punishment.—Let us therefore never go about to aggrieve the matter, or make it worse than it is; but let us consider it in such sort as it is indeed; that is, an offence in religion, and an offence against the statute made in the 1st of the queen's maj. And then, whether such an offence be to be punished by death, either for the preservation of the common peace, or else by the express laws of God, that matter falleth further in consultation.—As for the scripture, I must confess myself ignorant in them, as the thing that is not my profession, nor in which I have been exercised: yet thus much have I heard the preachers say, that are now, that though, in the old law, idolatry was punished with death, yet since the coming of Christ (who came to win the world by peace, and bade "put up the sword") the greatest punishment that hath been taught by the apostles in case of religion, hath been by excommunication. For religion, they say, must sink in by persuasion; it cannot be pressed in by violence. And therefore they called the act of the Six Articles, that was made the 31st of Henry VIII. "the whip with the six lashes." And as for the dealings in queen Mary's days, they much disliked them; calling the bps. blood-suckers, and bade 'Fie on these tormentors, that delighted in nothing else but in the death of innocents; that threatened the whole realm with their fire and faggots; murderers; that they were worse than Caiaphas, worse than Judas, worse than the traitors that put Christ to death.' And that with such vehemency and stomach, as I assure you I marvel, how it can possibly come to pass, that they should now desire to establish that as a law, which they thought then so far unlawful.—And indeed many a solemn clerk and holy father hath there been in the church, that have much disliked that cruel handling; and have wished rather the opinions of the men to be taken away than the men themselves; and would have them convinced 'magis verbo quam vi,' i. e. rather by the word than by the sword. Howbeit, what was the cause, why in all christian realms offenders in religion were punished by death: and further, how far the punishment that is here devised, exceedeth that in rigour and cruelty: and lastly, how offenders in this case of religion ought not to be punished by the one, nor by the other; that matter shall I make so plain and so evident unto you, that I trust no charitable man will consent to the passing of this bill.—1st. As for Excommunication, that was thought so easy a punishment, that it was the thing that they gladly would have wished for. For what could please them better that had already forsaken the true faith, than to be punished from the company of all those that believe otherwise than themselves? Therefore was fining and ransoming devised against the Manichees. But that would not serve; for either had they nothing to lose, or else were willing to lose that they had. Then was it further devised and enacted, that they should be imprisoned. But imprisonment would not help neither. For the number of them was such as the prisons could not hold them; and the keepers many times were corrupted. Then was banishment devised; but that was worst of all other. For then would they, by their letters, openly defame those by whom, for their naughtiness they had received any damage. And further, not keeping their conscience to themselves, ceased not by preaching in woods and cellars, by dealing in hugger-mugger seditious books of their own making, keeping of midnight-lectures, making of interludes and ballads, to allure other silly souls to their naughtiness; so far forth that if better remedy had not been provided, this canker would have crept over the whole body of Christendom. Nor were they so contented neither, but fell to open violence, as robbing and spoiling of churches, and taking other mens goods from them. Insomuch that the stories of the church make mention, That when the Macedonians and the Catholics should come before the deputy of Philippus, for hearing of their controversy; and that the throng was great, the Macedonians fell in hand with them, and said, that by the number of them it should seem rather that they came to fight with them than to dispute; and therewith drew their weapons upon them, and slew them to the number of 3000. For which violence of theirs, it was ordained, by consent through Christendom, that violence should be offered them again. And their offence for common quietness sake, and for the peace of the church, punished in this sort: that is to say, that if it were by open witness proved, that any had offended, that yet he might abjure for the first offence, if he would; and upon penance and repentance made, be received into the church again. But if he estoones fell in relapse, then he should be left to the secular hands.—Which punishment, as it was, was yet much more easy, than that which is here devised. For there you see, unless he had been convinced by witness for some open fact done, he was without danger of the law. But here, though he intended to live under a law, and keep his conscience to himself, yet will we grope him, and see what secretly lieth in his breast: and to the intent he shall not dally with us, we offer him an oath, which many a man shall take that understandeth not what it meaneth. There you see the first offence was not punished; but he had leisure to bethink him and mend. But here the very first offence is punished; and by what punishment? Forsooth, by judgment of premunire, which is loss of lands and goods, his body in prison at the queen's will and pleasure; and yet he is in no great surety of his life neither. For if any man, upon displeasure, should kill him, his friends might well lament his death, but they could not punish it. For a man attainted in premunire, is perdie out of the protection of the king, and of the laws. Yea, and besides all this, not a man dare give him his alms, lest he should be an aider and maintainer within the compass of this statute.—Therefore, methinks, the law was a great deal better, and surely much more profitable for the commonwealth, that was made in the 1st of the queen's maj. For there we see the first offence is not so grievously punished. And if every ecclesiastical person, every judge and other officer, every one that is of the queen's fee, every man that shall sue livery, all scholars that are in the university, be sworn, (as they must be by the same statute) what mischief can there be wrought, but it shall be espied and quenched? Is it not, think you, an easier way to win men (for win them we must, if we shall do well) to leave a gap for him open to promotion, if he embrace these proceedings, than if he refuse them, to take that he hath from him? Is it not a sufficient punishment for him, that no man shall, by his wit and learning, so long as he continueth that opinion, bear any office, or have any countenance in this commonwealth? What better proof can you have of the goodness of the law, that you see, since that time, no great breach of the law; no seditious congregations, no tumult, but the common peace well kept, and every man liveth under a law without disturbance of the queen's proceedings? So that that punishment being sufficient, it is in vain to desire a greater to keep them under.—Let us follow the example of the queen's maj. whose gracious highness hath with such clemency ruled us, and so tempered her justice with mercy, as I ween never prince since the conquest hath for the time reigned over us in a quieter peace, with more love and less exaction. The honour be to her gracious maj. and those good counsellors that have had that statute in hand. But suppose it were passed for a law, what great good could we reckon should grow to the commonwealth by it? You will say, a sort of stubborn papists should be rid out of the way; who, if they lived, would be causers of sedition; and sedition must needs be the cause of desolation. Surely, if the whole number, that think against the oath in their conscience, should refuse the oath, and for the offence be executed; the realm could not chuse but be much weakened, and a great deal the less able to defend itself. We may partly see it by the universities, that what with the one side and the other, hath been so shaken for religion, that learning is almost quite decayed in them. And if provision be not made, all like to come to a barbarous ignorance.—But suppose you that the greatest part will refuse the oath? Think you that all that take it, will upon the taking of it change their consciences? Nay, many a false shrew there is that will lay his hand to the book, when his heart shall be far off. Of this hath this house full experience. For in the bill of conveying over of horses, there was a clause, that whosoever would swear that it was for his necessary travel, it was lawful. And because men stuck not at such trifle to forswear themselves, that clause was repealed. And upon like consideration, by the grave advice of this house, was the oath left out of the subsidy-book. If men for such trifles will forswear themselves, it cannot choose but be perilous, when their goods, lands, liberties, and lives shall depend upon it. And namely upon a matter, whereof for the most part they have no knowledge; but all one to them, whether it be so or otherwise. And so protesting that to be in their consciences whereof they stand in doubt, they shall wilfully forswear themselves.—And if men were seditious before, now will they become ten times more seditious. Neither shall the queen's maj. be ever a whit the “surer,” which is the title, and as it should seem the only meaning of this bill. For if any were rebellious before, now will his heart become more rebellious; for that he is enforced to perjury: and that mischief will secretly keep in his mind, and shew it then, when he thinketh it will do most harm. Or else, if he be not thus wickedly disposed, then will he linger on in despair, and with violence at the last seek to destroy himself, which were too lamentable to hear of: and we the cause of all this mischief. Let us therefore, for the honour of God, leave all malice, and notwithstanding religion, let us love together. For it is no point of religion, one to hate another. Let us make an end of division, for fear lest our enemies, who are mighty and now in the field, might peradventure, finding us at dissention among ourselves, the easilier vanquish us. Whereas, if we can agree and love together, there shall be no doubt but we shall put them now to the worst whom we have often vanquished before. Let us do as the good mother did before Solomon, who when she had contention before the wise king for her own child with the common harlot, and that the matter went so hard, that he could not tell to whom to give it, but thought to divide it; the tender love of the mother, considering that the child's division should be the child's destruction, could not suffer that, but was content to yield up, and give away her interest. So let us, for the love of God, forget and forgive all griefs for the commonwealth's sake, and let us love one another: for so shall no division work the desolation of our kingdom. And when we have done all, to this we must come at last. We see in Germany, where, after so long contention, and so great destruction and waste of their country, at last they are come to this point; that the papist and protestant can now quietly talk together, and never fall out about the matter. I beseech you, therefore, right hon. that you will well remember the trust that your country putteth in you; and since you have the sword in your hand to strike, be well aware whom you strike. For some shall you strike that are your near friends, some your kinsmen, but all your countrymen, and even Christians. And though you may like these doings, yet may it be that your heirs after you may mislike them; and then farewell your name and worship. Remember that men that offend this way, offend not as murderers and thieves do, that is, of malice and wicked intent, but through conscience and zeal, at leastways through opinion of religion. And if it shall happen them to die in the wrong opinion, then shall we not only destroy the bodies, of which there is no small force, but their souls, which is a loss that can never be recovered. And if they should do it against their consciences, to save their lives, and seem peradventure in doubt of the matter; then should they fall unto perjury, and we become causers of it. And sith they keep their consciences to themselves, and live under a law, why are they to be punished by so sharp a law? And though some peradventure have offended you, yet do not for their sakes punish the rest, who never offended you; but rather for the others sakes, who are the greater number, forgive all. Follow the example of the good mother in Solomon, or rather the example of the queen's maj. whom I pray God may long reign over us, and her issue after her."

Another Petition of the Commons for the Queen to marry.] In this session the affair of the queen's Marriage and settling the Succession was again renewed. Jan. 16th, a motion was made in the commons, and on the 19th, the Speaker and 24 more were appointed a committee to draw up the form of a Petition to her maj. for the purpose aforesaid. On the 28th, the Speaker, with the whole house, attended on the queen; and, after a short oration of his own, delivered their petition to her. The form of which is preserved in D'Ewes's Journal, as follows:

"Your Commons, in this your maj.'s present parl. assembled, most high and mighty princess, our most dread sovereign lady, as they do daily, to their commodity and comfort, feel and receive the inestimable benefits of your most gracious govt. of this your realm, in peace and surety, so do also most thankfully acknowledge the same, beseeching Almighty God long to bless and continue your most prosperous reign over them; and among all these benefits which they daily receive of your highness, they have at this time willed me, in their names, to recognize unto your highness, that they account it not the least, but rather among the greatest of them all, that your maj. hath at this time assembled your parl. for supplying and redressing the greatest wants and defaults in your commonweal, and for the establishing the surety of the same; which your maj.'s most gracious meaning hath been at your commandment signified unto us, by the right hon. the lord keeper your great seal of England; namely in this, that he willed us first to have consideration of the greatest matters that nearest touched the state of the realm, and the preservation thereof, seeming therein also to express unto us the conformity of your maj.'s mind, in having principal respect to the matters of greatest weight; and for that respect assembling this your parl. And forasmuch as your said subjects see nothing in this whole estate of so great importance to your maj. and the whole realm, nor so necessary at this time to be reduced to certainty, as the sure continuance of the govt. of the imperial crown thereof, and the most hon. issue of your body (which Almighty God send us to your highness's comfort) and for want thereof, in some certain limitation to guide the obedience of our posterity; and where Almighty God, to our great terror and dreadful warning, lately touched your highness with some danger of your most noble person, by sickness; from which so soon as your grace was, by God's favour and mercy to us, recovered, your highness sent out your writs of parl. by force whereof your subjects are at this time assembled; your said subjects are both by the necessity and importance of the matter, and by the convenience of the time of calling them immediately upon your recovery, enforced to gather, and confess, that your maj. of your most gracious and motherly care for them and their posterity, have summoned this parl. principally for establishing of some certain limitation of the imperial crown of your realm, for preservation of your subjects from certain and utter destruction; (if the same should not be provided in your life, which God long continue.) They cannot, I say, but acknowledge your maj. hath most graciously considered the great dangers, the unspeakable miseries of civil wars, the perilous intermingling of foreign princes with seditious, ambitious and factious subjects at home; the waste of noble houses, the slaughter of people, subversion of towns; intermission of all things pertaining to the maintenance of the realm, unsurety of all men's possessions, lives and estates; daily interchange of attainders and treasons. All these mischiefs, and infinite others, most likely and evident, if your maj. should be taken from us, without known heir, (which God forbid) to fall upon your subjects, to the utter subversion of the whole, whereof you have charge under God: if good provision should not be had in this behalf. Your maj. hath weighed the examples of foreign nations, as what ensued the death of great Alexander, when for want of certain heirs by him begotten, or appointed, the variety of titles, the diversity of dispositions in them that had titles, the ambition of them that under colour of doubtfulness of title forsook all obedience of titles, destroyed his dominions, and wasted posterity with mutual wars and slaughters: in what miserable case also was this realm itself, when the title of the crown was tossed in question, between the two royal houses of Lancaster and York, till your most noble progenitors Henry VII. and the lady Elizabeth his wife, restored it to a settled unity, and left the crown in a certain course of succession? These things as your maj. hath, upon your own danger, most graciously considered for our comfort and safety; so we most humble subjects, knowing the preservation of ourselves, and all our posterity, to depend upon the safety of your maj.'s most royal person, have most carefully and diligently considered, how the want of heirs of your body, and certain limitation of succession after you, is most perilous to your highness, whom God long preserve amongst us. We have been admonished of the great malice of your foreign enemies, which even in your lifetime have sought to transfer the dignity and right of your crown to a stranger; we have noted their daily most dangerous practices against your life and reign; we have heard of some subjects of this land, most unnaturally confederated with your enemies, to attempt the destruction of your maj. and us all that live by you; we fear a faction of heretics in your realm, contentious and malicious Papists, lest they most unnaturally against their country, most madly against their own safety, and most treacherously against your highness, not only hope for the woful day of your death, but also lay in wait to advance some title, under which they may revive their late unspeakable cruelty, to the destruction of goods, possessions and bodies, and thralldom of the souls and consciences of your faithful and Christian subjects; we see nothing to withstand their desire, but your only life; their unkindness and cruelty we have tasted; we fear much to what attempt the hope of such opportunity (nothing withstanding them but your life) will move them; we find how necessary it is for your preservation, that there be more bounds set between your maj.'s life and their desire; we see, on the other side, how there can be no such danger to your maj. by ambition of any apparent heir established by your benefit and advancement, for want of issue of your maj.'s royal body, as you are now subject unto, by reason of their desire and hope; we know not how many pretend titles and trust to succeed you, whose secret desire we so much more fear, because neither their number, force, nor likelihood of disposition, is known unto us; and so we can the less beware of them for your preservation.—We find also, by good proof, that the certain limitation of the crown of France, hath in that realm procured so great quiet, as neither the person of the prince in possession hath been indangered by secret or open practice; nor the commonweal molest by civil dissention, through any quarrel attempted, for the title of that crown. And somewhat near home, we have remembered the miserable estate of Scotland, after the death of king Alexander, without any certain heir, or limitation to whom the crown of Scotland should remain; by reason whereof the whole estate of that realm was left open to the ambition of many competitors, and most grievous desolation and spoil, that grew upon such division; which afterwards gave occasion to king James V. to limit the crown of Scotland to certain noble families of that realm; whereby they, at this present, enjoy that quiet surety which we want. And all your maj.'s most noble progenitors, kings of this realm, have been in this behalf so careful, that from the conquest till this present day, the realm was never left, as it is now, without a certain heir, living and known, to whom the crown, after the death of the prince, should appertain. So, as your maj. of your singular care for us, and our posterity, hath at this time assembled us, for establishing this great and only stay of our safeties: we again, most gracious sovereign lady, acknowledge ourselves, and all that we have, to depend upon your preservation, being according to our bounden duty, most careful of the same, are in most humble manner come to your maj.'s presence: and I, the mouth appointed for them, together with, and in the name of all your most loving, natural and obedient subjects, do present unto you our most lowly suit and petition, That forasmuch as of your maj.'s person would come the most redoubted and best heirs of your crown, such as in time to come we would most comfortably see, and our posterity most joyfully obey: It may please your most exc. maj. for our sakes, for our preservation and comforts, and at our most humble suit, to take to yourself some hon. husband, whom it shall please you to join unto in marriage; whom, whatsoever he be that your maj. shall choose, we protest and promise, with all humility and reverence, to honour, love and serve, as to our most bounded duty shall appertain. And where by the statute which your most noble father assented unto, for the limitation of the succession of the crown of this realm, your maj. is the last expressly named within the body of the said act; and for that your subjects cannot judge, nor do know any thing of the form or validity of any further limitations, left incertain for want of heirs of your body, whereby some great dangerous doubt remaineth in their hearts, to their great grief, peril and unquietness: it may also please your maj. by proclamation of certainty already provided, if any such be, or else by limitations of certainty, if none be, to provide a most gracious remedy in this great necessity; which, by your most hon. and motherly carefulness for them, hath occasioned this assembly; that in this convenient time of parl. upon your late danger most graciously called, by you, for that cause, your grace may now extend to us that great benefit, which otherwise, or at other times, perhaps, shall never be able to be done again; so not only we, but all ours hereafter, and for ever, shall owe no less to your maj.'s propagation of succession, than we do already owe to your most famous grandfather, king Hen. VII. his uniting of division. And your subjects, on their behalfs, for your maj.'s further assurance, whereupon their own preservation wholly dependeth, shall employ their whole endeavours, and wits, and power, to renew, devise and establish the most strong and beneficial acts and laws of preservation and surety of your maj. and of your issue, in the imperial crown of this realm; and the most penal, sharp and terrible statutes, to all that shall but once practise, and attempt, or conceive against your safety; that by any possible means they may invent or establish, with such limitations of conditions, and restraints to all in remainders, such grievous pains, and narrow animadversions to all that shall enterprize or imagine any thing in prejudice of your highness, and your issue, as your maj. shall not have any cause of suspicion, but most assured ground of confidence in all your faithful subjects, continually watching and warding for your preservation, which God long continue, that you may see your childrens children, to his honour and our comfort, and incline your gracious ear to our most humble petitions."

No answer was returned to this Petition, till the 16th of Feb.; and then mr. Comptroller, and mr. Secretary, acquainted the house, "That her maj. doubted not but the grave heads of this house did right well consider that she forgot not the suit of this house, for the Succession; the matter being so weighty, nor could forget it. But she willed the young heads to take example of their ancestors." We may believe this short answer to their long address was not well relished by the Commons; but still, no farther notice was taken of it, 'till the 10th of April; when, the bills being all ready for the royal assent, the queen came to the Lords, in the afternoon; and, on presenting the bills, the Speaker of the Commons made the following speech:—

"This it is, most excellent and virtuous princess, &c. As nature giveth to every reasonable creature to speak, so it is a grace to be well learned; and I representing the mouth of such a body as cannot speak for itself, and in the presence of your maj.'s person and nobles, must most humbly desire and crave of your highness, to bear with my imperfections. This commonwealth hath been, by God's providence, first instituted, and since, by mans policy, continued; wherein justice and good counsel is most to be preferred: for ancient law-makers, and authors of good laws, be worthy to be praised, and had in perpetual remembrance; and such are the laws that we have made in this commonwealth, as, in my opinion, do excell and pass all other human laws.—Amongst divers authors of good laws, we have set forth unto us, to the end they should not be forgotten, 3 queens; the 1st Palestina, the queen, reigning before the deluge, who made laws as well concerning peace as war. The 2nd was Ceres, the queen, which made laws concerning evil-doers. And, the 3rd was Marc, wife of Bathilacus, mother to Stillicus, the king, who enacted laws for the maintenance and preservation of the good and well-doers.—And since that time, Etheldred, a king in this realm, established laws, and set in most beaten, high, and cross ways, a cross, and therein a hand, with a ring of gold, pointing to the most usual; which also stood untaken away or diminished during his life. And so you are the 4th queen, establisher of good laws, our most dread sovereign lady, for your time, as happy as any of the three; which happiness for the present I let slip, and desire, as all our hearts do, that some happy marriage to your contentation might shortly be brought to pass. Your maj. finding this realm out of order, and full of abuses, have continually had a special care to reform the said abuses; and for the more expelling thereof, have congregated together this assembly, whereby partly to your contentation, for reformation of the same to its old pristine estate, and for money and peace, is all that chiefly we have done; for which purposes we have agreed upon and made certain laws, which, until your maj. have granted your royal assent, and so given life thereunto, cannot be called laws.—And herein requiring of your maj. 3 petitions, two for the commons, and one for myself; the 1st, for such laws as they have made, being as yet without life, and so no laws; that it would please your maj. to grant your royal assent unto them. 2nd, that your highness would accept their doings in good part, that the imperfections of their labours by your acceptance may be supplied; for, as appeareth in sundry histories, the persons of those princes and subjects have long continued, which have well used themselves one toward the other; which, without neglecting of my duty, I cannot, in your presence, so let slip: for, as it appeareth in divers histories, the noble Alexander having presented unto him, by one of his poor soldiers, the head of one of his enemies, he, not forgetting the service of his soldier, although herein he had done but his duty, gave unto him a cup of gold, which first the soldier refused; but after that Alexander had commanded it to be filled with wine, and delivered him, he received it; whereby appeareth the noble and liberal heart of the said Alexander. Also Xenophon, writing of the life of Cyrus, who being liberal of gifts, having vanquished Croesus, and he marvelled at his liberality, said, "it were better to keep it by him, than so liberally to depart from it;" unto whom Cyrus answered, "that his treasure was innumerable; and appointed Croesus a day to see the same; and thereupon took order, that his subjects should, before that time, bring in their treasure; which being innumerable, and more than Cyrus by any other means could have given, Cræsus much wondered thereat; Cyrus said, "thou causest me to take of my subjects, and retain the same; but what need I to take, when they so frankly will bring it unto me; and so as occasion serveth, ready continually to supply my want? Therefore how can I be but rich, having such subjects? But if they by any means were poor, then were I poor also." Which two worthy examples of Alexander and Cyrus your maj. hath not forgotten to pursue; but with the like zeal have hitherto always used us, and now especially at this present, by your most gracious and free pardon; for the which, and all other, they by me their mouth, do most humbly thank you; acknowledging such and so much love and zeal of their parts towards your maj. as ever any subjects did bear towards their prince and governor. And in token thereof, with one assent, to offer to your highness one subsidy and two 15ths, most humbly beseeching your maj. to accept it, not in recompence of your benefits, but also as a token of their duty, as the poor widow's farthing was accepted, as appeareth in the scripture. 3rd, that it may also like your maj. to accept my humble thanks in allowing, and admitting me, being unworthy of this place, and bearing with my unworthy service; and last of all, my unfitting words, uplandish and rude speech; beseeching God to incline your maj.'s heart to marriage, and that he will so bless and send you good success thereunto, that we may see the fruits and children that may come thereof: so that you and they may prosperously, and as long time reign over us, as ever did any kings or princes; which God for his mercies' sake grant unto us."

Then the Queen called the Lord Keeper unto her, commanding him, in her name, to answer the Speaker, as she then declared unto him, which he did, as followeth:

"Mr. Speaker, the queen's maj. hath heard how humbly and discreetly you have declared the proceedings, and for answer hath commanded me that I should utter 3 or 4 things. The 1st, for her royal assent to the acts made at this parl. 2nd, how comfortably, and also thankfully, her maj. accepteth your liberality. And, 3rd, for the executing of the laws. Here, my lords and masters, although I cannot declare or open it unto you, as her maj. hath commanded me; and therefore willingly would hold my tongue, if I might; which, for that I cannot be excused, I say unto you, as followeth; not doubting of her highness's clemency in bearing with me herein. 1st, her maj. considereth how wisely you have done for the abolishing of the Romish power, the common enemy of this realm; remembering your care for the defence of the same realm, your respects for the maintenance or victual, the banishment of vagabonds, and relief of the poor, with others; and therefore alloweth your worthy proceedings herein. 2nd, your liberality and benevolence, wherein your wise considerations towards her charges is by her maj. taken in thankful part; and I take it to be my duty to put you in remembrance, that although this subsidy is made, and to be borne by subjects, not daily accustomed thereunto, yet that at her first entrance she had the like; and that the grant thereof is more liberal than afore hath been accustomed, and that it is of your necessity, yet it is to withstand a greater necessity, that for fault thereof would else have ensued; and therefore that penny is well spent that saveth a groat; which also hath been granted, neither with persuasions, threats, nor sharp words, which afore this time hath been accustomed, but by one general consent of you all; wherein appeareth your good wills and benevolent minds you bear to her maj. which zeal she most kindly accepteth; and, as she hath cause, thanketh you. Again, by her maj.'s command, she, remembering by whom, why, and to whom this was granted, doth thank as freely as you have granted, the most part whereof hath been accepted; and lest those that have so freely offered should not be so ready toward the gathering, thinketh it much better to lose the sum granted, than to lose your benevolent minds. 3rd, to the execution of laws I have little to say, although the whole substance consisteth therein; because I did, in the beginning of this parl. declare my opinion in that matter; and therefore, as now you have, to your charges, taken pains in making good laws, so put to your helps, to see these and all others executed; for as it is infallible, that a thing done unconstrained is much better than when they be constrained thereunto; even so her maj. willeth you to look well, without more words, to the execution, lest her grace should be driven to do, as she doth in her ecclesiastical laws, make commissions to enquire whether they be done or no; whereby she shall know those justices and officers, who have done their duty, and are to be used in service of justice, whereof her maj. desireth to have many; and again she shall understand who are to be barred from the like rooms, and the penal statutes to be on them executed, after this gentle warning; which enquiry I know is like to fall on me, as well as another. Howbeit, if justice be not executed I shall be glad to see this order taken. Notwithstanding, her maj. hopeth that this her admonition shall not need; for that you see laws without execution be as a torch unlighted, or body without a soul: therefore, look well to the executing. Here endeth the 3 things which her maj. commanded me to say unto you. Besides this, her maj. hath to answer your petitions. And as to the first, in which you desire her royal assent to such matters as you have agreed upon; to that she saith, how at this present she is come for that purpose. And for your other petitions, to accept in good part, as well your service as the travails and doings of the nether house, this parl.: to that she answereth, how that she doth not only accept them in good part, but also thanketh both you and them for the same. And touching your request before this, made unto her, for her Marriage and Succession: because it is of such importance, whereby I doubted my own opening thereof, I therefore desired her maj. that her meaning might be written, which she hath done, and delivered to me to be read, as followeth:

"Since there can be no duer debt than princes' words, which I would observe, therefore I answer to the same. Thus it is; the 2 petitions which you made unto me do contain 2 things, my Marriage, and Succession after me. For the 1st, if I had let slip too much time, or if my strength had been decayed, you might the better have spoke therein; or if any think I never meant to try that life, they be deceived; but if I may hereafter bend my mind thereunto, the rather for fulfilling your request, I shall be therewith very well content. For the 2nd, the greatness thereof maketh me to say and pray, that I may linger here in this vale of misery for your comfort; wherein I have witness of my study and travail, for your surety: and I cannot, with 'nunc dimittis,' end my life, without I see some foundation of your surety after my grave-stone."

After which, her maj. gave the royal assent to 31 public and 17 private acts. And then the lord keeper prorogued this parl. to the 2d of Oct. next ensuing. The principal acts passed in this session were, 1. An act against fond and fantastical Prophecies: 2. An act against Conjurations, Enchantments and Witchcrafts. 3. An act for the due execution of the writ de Excommunicato capiendo. Several good laws were made for the relief of the Poor; the punishment of those Vagabonds, called Egyptians, and Forgers of Evidences; as, also, such as should commit Sodomy or Perjury. Other acts were made for well-ordering of the Royal Navy; for the support and improvement of Tillage. Several attainders were also reversed; amongst which that of the children of Crammer, late abp. of Canterbury, is the most remarkable. An act was passed for a translation of the bible, and other divine offices, into the Welsh tongue. Lastly, an act was made declaring the authority of the lord keeper of the great seal of England and the lord chancellor's to be all one. So that now sir Nich. Bacon, knt. who is, through both those parliaments, stiled 'Custos magni sigilli,' is declared to be the same as lord high chanc. of England.

Oct. 2d, the parl. being again met, the lord treasurer informed the members of both houses, "That for sundry causes and considerations, but, particularly, by reason the plague was then raging in the cities of London and Westminster, and the suburbs of the same, her maj. had thought good to prorogue this parl. still farther, to the 5th of Oct. in the next year." War had now been also proclaimed on both sides, but it did not continue long; for the next year a peace was concluded between the two contending powers.

But though the parl. met again, at the time appointed, it was again prorogued from the 5th of Oct. to the 30th of April next following; without any reasons given for it in the writ. And, from the last named day, another writ still prorogued this parl. to the 4th of Oct. next ensuing. Nor was it then suffered to sit, but was once more prorogued to the 7th of Feb.; from which time this parl. was still prorogued to the 30th of Sept. 1566.

Proceedings in the Commons, on the death of their Speaker.] On the 30th of Sept. the two houses met accordingly; but an accident had happened to the Commons, which greatly disconcerted their proceedings. Tho. Williams, esq. their Speaker, was dead; and, as they could not act without one, they were at a loss what to do in a case that was hitherto unprecedented. A long entry is made in the Journals of the Lords, relating to this affair; whereby it appears that the Commons, after much deliberation, agreed upon this; That a committee should be appointed to wait upon the lord keeper and the lords of the other house, to know their opinion of the matter. This committee consisted of sir Edw. Rogers, comptroller of the household; sir Fra. Knolles, vice-chamberlain; sir Wm. Cecil, chief-secretary; sir Amb. Cave, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; 4 of the chief members of their house; and 20 more persons joined with them in commission. These were to repair to the Lords, to have their aid and assistance, both for intimation of the affair to her maj. and to know her good pleasure in it. The lords, after some consultation, agreed, That the lord keeper, the lord treasurer of England, the duke of Norfolk and the marq. of Northampton, should be appointed to go along with the 4 principals of the other house, being all of the privy council, to intimate the matter to her maj. in the name of both assemblies, and to know her pleasure therein. The result of this was, that, on the 2d day of their meeting, a commission was shewed by the lord keeper, directed to himself, under the broad seal, and was read in the house; importing, That the queen commanded the said keeper to call before him all the members of the other house, and to acquaint them, that her maj.'s pleasure was that they should resort to their usual place, and there to chuse a new Speaker, after their accustomed manner. Which done, 3 or 4 of that house, in the name of the rest, were to inform the queen of their choice, who then was to appoint a day when she would have their new speaker presented to her for her approbation.—In the Journals of the Commons we are told, that the members of that house, by virtue of the queen's writ, went upon the election of a new Speaker. That sir Edw. Rogers, knt. comptroller of the household, made a motion, that whereas Rd. Onslow, esq. her maj.'s solicitor general, was a member of that house, and yet attended the house of lords, that they would have him restored to them to join in the election of a speaker. On which, notice being sent to the lords, the said Rd. Onslow, esq; was sent down to them; who endeavoured to shew, by his writ of attendance, and other arguments, that he could not serve in both capacities; he was, nevertheless, adjudged to be a member of that house. Mr. Comptroller then named the said Mr. Onslow as their Speaker; who, again, endeavouring to evade it, urged, not only his own inabilities, but the oath he had taken to her maj.; and required them to proceed to a new election. On this, the house divided, and the numbers for his being Speaker were 82, against it 70: accordingly he was placed in the chair. The next day, the queen being come to the Lords, and seated on the throne, the new Speaker of the Commons was introduced between sir Edw. Rogers, comptroller of the household, and sir Francis Knolles, vice-chamberlain. Who, having made the usual reverences at the bar, spoke as follows:

"If it please your royal maj. most virtuous and most excellent princess, at the humble suit of the knights, citizens and burgesses of your nether house of parl. now assembled, was signified from your maj. by the mouth of the lord keeper, by force of your highness's letters of commission, your pleasure and grant of free election to the knights, citizens, and burgesses, to chuse a fit and learned man, to be their Speaker, instead of Thos. Williams, esq. their late Speaker, whom it hath pleased God to call to his mercy. For which they have commanded me, in their names, to render unto your maj. most humble thanks; and have commanded and forced me, to my great grief, to signify to your maj. how accordingly they have proceeded to an election, and chosen and assigned me (as I may say) being most unworthy to speak in this place, for this parl.; and for that I would not be obstinate, I am forced to wound myself with their sword, which wound yet being green and new, your maj. being the perfect physician, may cure in disallowing that which they have allowed; for that, without your consent it is nothing. And although I being very loth to trouble your highness, have made suit and used all ways and means to avoid it, yet could I find no remedy; and therefore am driven to seek remedy at your hands; for, though I have the experience of their uprightness, wisdom, and knowledge, which chose me; who, if they would have found any fault in me, I would lightly have believed them; notwithstanding that we are for the most part given to think too much of ourselves) but in this day, that they seem to enable me to this calling, whereof I know myself unable, I cannot credit them no more than the simple patient, grievously tormented with sickness, will believe the physician, nay the whole college of them, if they say he hath no grief, pain, or sickness. I therefore do not attempt this releasing of me for any ease of myself, but would be glad to serve your maj. to the uttermost of my power, in the office of solicitorship, whereunto I am appointed, and not in this, being unfit for the same; and that for divers causes. For, 1st, I consider, I have to deal with many well learned, the flower and choice of the realm, whose deep understanding my wit cannot attain to reach unto. No, if they for great carefulness would often inculcate it into my dull head, to signify the same unto your highness, yet my memory is so slippery by nature and sickness, that I should likely lose it by the way; yet, if perhaps I kept part thereof, I have no other knowledge to help myself withal, but a little in the law, far inferior to divers in this house; and so should want learning and utterance to declare their meanings, as it requireth; especially when I consider your royal maj. a princess endowed with so many virtues, learning and flowing eloquence, it will abash and astonish me; and therefore finding these infirmities, and other in me, I think myself most unworthy of this place. I trust therefore only in your highness, that you will disallow this election; and the rather, for that by the true intent of your said letters, it may not be gathered that they should elect any of your majesty's officers; for although the words be to have their free election, yet the law may restrain them in some measure. As for example, we find in the law, that if it would please your maj. to grant licence to a dean and chapter, to purchase to them and their successors, 100l. yearly; which words be generally: yet if the purchased lands be holden in 'capite,' this grant is void. And again, if you grant the fines and amerciaments of all your tenants to one, who after chanceth to be sheriff of a shire, yet being a sheriff he cannot have them. So this (me seemeth) if it please your highness serveth my case. Another cause is for want of substance to maintain this my countenance; but yet your maj.'s goodness in this point stoppeth my mouth, for that I have none other living, but in manner by you. So for all these considerations, and divers others, as it shall please your maj. to consider, I humbly desire your highness to disallow this election, commanding them to repair again together, and to chuse another more fit to serve the same."

Then the Queen called the Lord Keeper, declaring her opinion in answering him, who returning to his place, said as followeth:—

"Mr. Onslow—The queen's maj. hath heard and well understood this disabling yourself to this office; and doth well perceive your earnest suit to be discharged of the same; and for answer, hath commanded me to say, That she doubteth not, but you very well understand, that when one is chosen to serve the commonwealth, it is not in him which is called, who hath appointed him thereunto. Also, there is an old similitude, that like as it appertaineth to the head to dispose every inferior member in his place, so it pertaineth to the queen's maj. being the head, to appoint every one in the commonwealth. This being truth, and her maj. withal remembering your fidelity and long experience in parl. matters, and again being chosen by so learned and expert men, thinketh therefore your fitness needeth not to be disputed here, and therefore they giving unto you such faith and credit, according to an antient custom, she cannot but do the like; and also you in disabling yourself have abled yourself, and therefore she doth allow and approve this their election, nothing doubting her opinion in your ability to serve this turn."

To this Mr. Opslow returned the following answer:—

"Seeing that it hath pleased your maj. to ratify this election, I, to the uttermost of my power, shall serve your highness and this commonwealth; but first my humble suit is, That it would please your maj. to accept my goodwill; and, the better to discharge my duty towards them which have chosen me, that in great matters sent from them, I may have access to your maj. at times convenient, as the weight shall require. Secondly, if by weakness I shall mistake the effect and meaning of the matters committed to me, by the knights, citizens, and burgesses, and thereby, against my will, misreport them, that then thereby this commonwealth may take no detriment; but that I may confer again with them, the better to understand their meaning, and so with more words to utter the same unto you: and, I shall pray, as I am bound, to God, for your long and prosperous reign over us."

Then her Majesty called the Lord Keeper, and commanded him to answer him, which he did as followeth:—

"Mr. Speaker; the queen's maj. hath heard your humble petitions, and request made unto her, the effect whereof she gathereth to stand in two points: 1st, for access to her person; and, 2ndly, for good interpretation of your meaning; and also larger declarations thereof, if need be. For the former, her highness (as her noble progenitors have done) is well contented, that in convenient time, and for convenient causes, in convenient place, and without importunity, (for that these parts now touched, have not been afore this time so well handled, as she now trusteth it shall be) which considered, as free access she granteth you, as any other hath had. For the 2nd point, because no man at all times may do so well, but sometimes things may be uttered, which may be mis-spoken; for which cause, in that time also you shall have her intreatable; but she thinketh your circumspection to be such as she shall not therein need.—Now a word or two to remember you here present of both the houses; 1st, this it is that I would advise you in this present proceeding, to prefer the most weighty matters first, and not trouble yourselves with small matters, and of no weight; and therein also, that all be done to understand the truth, and to avoid all superfluous matters, and losing or driving away of time. Secondly, it is profitable that you, my lords; and all others that be here, consider that long time requireth great expences, and therefore wish you to make expedition, the rather to avoid the same. And yet not meaning such expedition, that any thing needful to be done, should be lightly passed over, and not substantially done, and seen unto; but only I mean that you should settle yourselves wholly to mighty matters, and those which be necessary, and to spare superfluous things, and which needed not. And this is the sum I have to say."

Oct. 22, a committee of Lords were appointed to wait upon the queen, in the afternoon, to know her maj.'s pleasure. There is no farther entry made of this matter for that day; but three days after the lord treasurer acquainted the house, that the queen, considering his hoary hairs and old age, accompanied with heavy griefs, and, understanding the lord keeper's slow amendment, had minded to supply both their defects, by appointing sir Rob. Catlyn, knt. lord chief justice of the common pleas, to execute the office of the said lord keeper, in parl. And her maj.'s letters patents, for the said appointment, were read accordingly.

A Committee of both Houses appointed to petition the Queen about her Marriage.] Oct. 26th, the Lords, after deliberate consultation, and advice taken, how to provide in the great matter of Succession and Marriage, which had been intimated to them from the Commons, came to the resolution, to send serj. Carus and Mr. Attorney down to them to notify, That there would be a member of their house chosen and sent to them, to take their opinion in this affair. On the 30th, another committee of Lords was appointed for a conference with a select number of the commons, touching a Petition to be made to the queen, both for the Succession and the Marriage. This committee consisted of these lords following; the abp. of York, the lord treasurer, the duke of Norfolk, the marq. of Northampton; the earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Shrewsbury, Worcester, Sussex, Huntingdon, Warwick, Bedford, Pembroke, and Leicester; the viscounts Montague and Byndon; the bps. of London, Durham, Winchester, Worcester, Lincoln, Rochester, Coventry and Litchfield; the lord admiral and the lord chamberlain; the lords Morley, Cobham, Gray, Wentworth, Windsor, Rich, Sheffield, Paget, North, Hastings of Loughborough, and the lord Hunsdon.

The Journals only tell us, that on the 5th of Nov. the same committee of Lords, and 30 of the Commons, were appointed to wait upon her maj. by her own special command. But no account is given in these records, of what was done at the conference, or what answer her maj. gave to this committee. Mr. Cambden however informs us, "that the queen of Scots was just then delivered of a son, and that queen Elizabeth secretly envied her rival the honour of being a mother before her. Yet did she make no haste to follow her example; and this determined the English parl. to solicit Elizabeth strongly about Marriage, or to settle the Succession. The papists, on one hand, were big with hopes to have it settled in the queen of Scots, and her issue; whilst the protestants, on the other, were much divided about a successor, some for one person, some for another; every one foreboding sad and troublesome times, should the queen die before this important point was established." The persons who pretended to have a title to the crown, and had their several abettors, besides the queen of Scots, were the countess of Lenox, a daughter of Margaret of England, by Archibald Douglass, earl of Angus, her second husband. Catherine countess of Hertford, the daughter and co-heir of Henry Grey, marq. of Dorset, and Frances his wife, the eldest daughter and co-heir of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, by Mary the French queen, youngest daughter to Henry VII. These several claims must have made the nation very uneasy at that time; since, without settling the succession, the single life of the queen, only, stopped the door against many troubles which might ensue by her death. For this reason the lords now thought proper to join with the commons in an address to her maj. What the debates at the conference were, does not appear in either journal; but Cambden assures us, "that the heats and clamours were so great, in the debates of both houses, about this affair, that they roundly taxed the queen with a disregard to her country and posterity." In the house of Lords, the peers that spoke the most in this debate were, the earls of Pembroke and Leicester; the duke of Norfolk also, but more cautiously, joined the others opinion, that the queen ought to be obliged to take a husband; or that a successor should be declared by act of parl. even against her will. But they were forced to make submission for this, and had their pardon. However, the whole house came to a resolution, to draw up an address to her maj. to be delivered by their speaker, the lord keeper Bacon; which Address, or Petition, at large, is preserved by Cambden, together with the Queen's Answer, and are as follow:

"The Petition of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, to her Majesty, upon the two great matters of Marriage and Succession, delivered by the Lord Keeper in Parl. Nov. 10, 1566."

"Most humbly beseecheth your excellent maj. your faithful, loving and obedient subjects, all your lords both spiritual and temporal, assembled in parl. in your upper house; to be so much their good lady and sovereign, as according to your accustomed benignity, to grant a gracious and favourable hearing to their petitions and suits, which with all humbleness and obedience, they are come hither to present to your maj. by my mouth, in matters very nearly and dearly touching your most royal person, the imperial crown of this your realm, and universal weal of the same; which suits, for that they tend to the surety and preservation of these 3 things, your person, crown, and realm, the dearest jewel that my lords have in the earth; therefore they think themselves, for divers respects, greatly bound to make these petitions; as first by their duty to God, then by their allegiance to your highness, and lastly by the faith they ought to bear to their natural country. And like as, most gracious sovereign, by these bonds they should have been bound to make the like petition, upon like occasion, to any prince that it should have pleased God to have appointed to reign over them; so they think themselves doubly bound to make the same to your maj. considering that besides the bond beforementioned, they stand also bound so to do, by the great and manifold benefits they have and do receive daily at your highness's hands; which, shortly to speak, be as great as the fruits of peace, common quiet and justice can give; and this with great care and charge to yourself. And thus my lords diversly bound, as your maj. hath heard, are now to open to your highness their humble petitions and suits, consisting in two points chiefly; which not sundrily, or the one without the other, but both jointly they desire your highness to assent to: the 1st is, that it would please your maj. to dispose yourself to marry, where it shall please you, with whom it shall please you, and as soon as it shall please you. The 2d, that some such limitation might be made, how the imperial crown of this realm should remain, if God call your highness without heir of your body, (which our Lord defend) so as these lords and nobles, and other your subjects then living, might sufficiently understand to whom they should owe their allegiance and duty, due to be done by subjects; and that they might, by your maj.'s licence, and with your favour, treat and confer together this parliament-time, for the well doing of this. The former of these two, which is your Marriage, they do in their hearts most earnestly wish and pray, as a thing that must needs breed and bring great and singular comfort to yourself, and unspeakable joy and gladness to all true English hearts. But the 2d carrieth with it such necessity, that without it they cannot see how the safety of your royal person, the preservation of your imperial crown and realm, shall be, or can be sufficiently and certainly provided for. Most gracious and sovereign lady, the lamentable and pitiful state and condition, wherein all your nobles and counsellors of late were, when it pleased God to lay his heavy hand upon you, and the amazedness that most men of understanding were by the fruit of that sickness brought into, is one cause of this their petition; the 2d, the aptness and opportunity of the time, by reason of this parl. whereby both such advice, consideration and consent, as is requisite in so great and weighty a cause, may be better heard and used, than at any other time, when no parl. is. The 3d, for that the assenting and performing of these petitions, cannot, as they think, but breed great terror to our enemies, and therefore must of necessity bring great surety to your person; and especially by addition of such laws, as may be joined with this limitation, for a certain and sure observing it, and preserving of your maj. against all practices and chances. The 4th cause, for that the like (as it is supposed) hath been done by divers of your noble progenitors, both of old time and of late days; and also by other princes your neighbours, of the greatest estate in Europe; and for that experience hath taught, that good hath come of it. The 5th, for that it appeareth by histories, how that in times past, persons inheritable to crowns being votaries and religious, to avoid such dangers as might have happened for want of succession to kingdoms, have left their vows and monasteries, and taken themselves to marriage; as Constantia a nun, heir to the kingdom of Sicily, married after 50 years of age, to Henry VI. emperor of that name, and had issue Frederick II. And likewise Peter of Arragon, being a monk, married, the better to establish and pacify that kingdom. Again, Antoninus Pius is as much commended, for that not two days before his death, he said to his council, 'læto animo morior, quoniam filium vobis relinquo.' Pyrrhus is of all godly men detested, for saying he would leave his realm to him that had the sharpest sword. What but want of a successor known, made an end of so great an empire as Alexander the Great did leave at his death? The 6th cause is, for that my lords do judge, the performing of this will breed such an universal gladness in the hearts of all your true and loving subjects, that likely and probably you shall find them in all commandments ready and glad to adventure their goods, lands and lives in your service, according to their bounden duties; which of necessity must breed great surety to your majesty. The 7th cause, because the not doing of this, (if God should call your highness without heir of your body, which God grant never be seen, if it be his will) and yet your maj. right well knoweth, that princes and their offspring, be they never so great, never so strong, never so like to live, be yet mortal, and subject every day, yea every hour, to God's call; my lords think, this happening, and no limitation made, cannot, by their judgments, but be the occasion of very evident and great danger and peril to all estates and sorts of men of this realm, by the factions, seditions, and intestine war, that will grow, for want of understanding to whom they should yield allegiance and duty; whereby much innocent blood is most like to be shed, and many of those to lose their lives, that now would gladly bestow them for your sake, in your maj.'s service. The 8th, for that the not performing of this, the other happening, doth leave the realm without govt. which is the greatest danger that can happen to any kingdom; for every prince is 'anima legis,' and so reputed in law, and therefore upon the death of princes the law dies; all the offices of justice, whereby the laws are to be executed, do cease; all writs and commandments to call parties to the execution of justice, do hang in suspense; all commissions for the peace, and for the punishment of offenders, do determine and lose their force; whereby it followeth consequently, that strength and will must rule, and neither law nor reason, during such a vacation and inter-reign; wherein such an incertainty of succession is like to last so long, as it is to be feared (if God's mercy be not the greater) that thereby we may become a prey to strangers (which our Lord defend) or at least lose the great honour and estimation that long time hath pertained to us. And like as, most gracious sovereign, my lords have been moved for the worldly respect aforesaid, to make their humble petitions to your maj.; so by the examples, counsels, yea and commandments, that they have heard out of the sacred Scriptures, and for conscience sake they feel themselves constrained, and enforced to do the like. God, your highness knoweth, by the course of the Scriptures, hath declared succession and having of children to be one of the principal benedictions in this life; and on the contrary, he hath pronounced contrarywise: and therefore Abraham prayed to God for issue, fearing that Eliazar, his steward, should have been his heir; and had promise that kings should proceed of his body. Hannah, the mother of Samuel, prayed to God with tears for issue: and Elizabeth (whose name your maj. beareth) mother to John the Baptist, was joyful when God had blessed her with fruit, accounting herself thereby to be delivered from reproach. And as this is a blessing in private houses, so is it much more in kingdoms, as it plainly appeareth in the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Unto the kingdom of Judah, containing but two tribes, or thereabouts, God gave lineal succession by descent of kings; and therefore they continued a long time. The kingdom of Israel, containing ten tribes, or thereabouts, often destitute of lawful heirs, the one half of the people following the one, and the other half following the other, by wars and seditions weakened, came soon to ruin, as plainly appeareth by the third and fourth book of Kings. And again, in the time of the judges, because there was no ordinary succession, the people were oftentimes overcome, and carried into captivity. Besides, it is plain, by the Scriptures, that godly governors and princes (as fathers of their countries) have always been careful to avoid the great evil that might ensue, through want of limitation of succession; therefore Moses did enjoin Joshua to be his successor, and David his son Solomon; whereby a sedition was appeased, begotten by Adonijah: of this there be many examples. Farther, seeing it may be easily gathered by experience of all ages past, that civil wars, effusion of christian blood, and consequently ruins of kingdoms do follow, where realms be left without a certainty of succession; and your maj. is also informed of the same, and sued unto for redress: if therefore now no sufficient remedy should be by your highness provided, that then it should be a dangerous burden, before God, to your maj. and you were to yield a strict account to God for the same; considering you are placed, as the prophet Ezekiel saith, 'in altissimo speculo' of this commonwealth, and see the sword coming, and provide no remedy for the defence of it. Lastly, the spirit of God pronounceth, by the mouth of St. Paul, to Timothy, that 'whosoever maketh no due provision for his family, is in very great danger to God-ward;' and also by the mouth of St. John, that 'whosoever seeth but one brother in necessity, and doth shut up the bowels of pity and compassion from him, hath not the love of God remaining in him:' whereby it is plain and manifest, how fearful a thing it were, if this whole realm, containing so many families, were not, in a perilous case, upon their suit provided for; or if the bowels of mercy should be shut up from so many thousands, which every way were like to fall into most extreme miseries, if God should call your highness without certainty of succession; which we pray to God may never happen. Most excellent princess, the places of Scripture containing the said threatenings, be set forth with more sharp words than be here expressed. Thus, most gracious sovereign, your lords and nobles, both spiritual and temporal, have, as briefly as they can, first shewed to your maj. how diversly they take themselves bound, to make these their humble petitions unto you; and then what their petitions be; and after that what reasons for worldly respects, and what by the Scriptures, and for conscience sake, have moved them thus to do; which here upon their knees, according to their bounden duty, they most humbly and earnestly pray your maj. to have consideration of in time; and to give them such favourable and comfortable answer to the same, that some good effect and conclusion may grow before the end of the session of this parl. the uttermost day of their greatest hope, whereby this commonwealth, which your highness found to be 'lateritia,' as Augustus did his, and by your great Providence is now come to be 'marmorea,' shall not for want of performing this, if God shall call your highness, without heir of your body, be in more dangerous estate and condition, than ever it was that any man can remember. True it is, that this suit is made by my lords, not without great hope of good success, by reason of the experience that they have had of your bountiful goodness shewed to them, and the rest of your loving subjects, divers and sundry ways, since the beginning of your reign; which they pray God long to continue, to his honour, with all felicity."

The Queen's Answer.] "Since there can be no due debt than a prince's word, to keep that unspotted, for my part, as one that would be loth that the self-same thing that keepeth merchants credit from craze, should be the cause that a prince's speech should merit blame, and so their honour quail; therefore I will an answer give, and this it is: the two petitions that you presented me (which must doubtless relate to the two several parts of one and the same petition, viz. the Marriage and the Succession, and might not improperly be so called though couched in one body, and as the words also following do in manner explain it) expressed many words, which contained in sum these two things, as of your cares the greatest, my Marriage and my Succession. Of which two I think the last best to be touched, and of the other a silent thought may serve. For, I thought it had been so desired, as none other trees blossom should have been minded, or ever any hope of any fruit had been denied you. And yet by the way, if any here doubt, that I am, by vow or determination, bent never to trade in that kind of life, put out that kind of heresie; for your belief is therein awry. For though I can think it best for a private woman, yet I do strive with myself not to think it meet for a prince; and if I can bend my liking to your need, I will not resist such a mind.—But, to the last, think not that you had needed this desire, if I had seen a time so fit, and it so ripe to be denounced. The greatness of the cause therefore, and need of your returns, doth make me say that which I think the wise may easily guess, that as a short time, for so long continuance, ought not to pass by roat, as many tell their tales; even so, as cause by conference with the learned, shall shew me matter worth the utterance for your behoof, so shall I more gladly pursue your good, after my days, than with all my prayers, whilst I live, be means to linger my living thread. And thus, much more than I thought, will I add for your comfort: I have good record in this place, that other means than you mention, have been thought of, perchance for your good, as much as for my surety, no less; which, if presently and conveniently could have been executed, it had not been now deferred or overslipped. But I hope I shall die in quiet with ‘nunc dimittis,’ which cannot be, without I see some glimpse of your following surety, after my graved bones.”

The Lords having received this answer to their address, were, seemingly, satisfied; but not so the Commons. For Cambden writes, that Dutton, Wentworth and other members of that house, such as Bell and Monson, great lawyers, grated hard on the queen’s royal prerogative. They maintained, amongst other points, “That kings are bound to appoint a successor; that the affection of the subject is the most impregnable bulwark and support of the prince; but that princes can gain this affection no otherwise, than by providing for the welfare of their subjects, both whilst after they live and after their death. And which can by no means be done, but where ’tis certainly known who shall succeed to the throne. That the queen, by not appointing a successor, did at once provoke the wrath of God and alienate the hearts of her people. Whereas, would she possess the affections of her subjects, and the favour of God, and live for ever in the remembrance of her people, she must of course nominate a successor. If not, she would be rather a step-mother of her country, or something worse, than the nursing-mother thereof; as being seemingly desirous that England, which lived as it were in her, should rather expire with than survive or outlast her. That none but timorous princes, or such as were hated by their people, or faint-hearted women, did ever stand in fear of their successors; nor can that prince, with any reason, apprehend dangers from a successor, who is fortified and secured by the love and duty of his subjects.”

The Queen being made acquainted with the boldness of these speeches, it gave her no little concern, for the present, though she seemed to overlook it. However, the points above-mentioned being still insisted on, with much heat and great insolence; and the members so audacious as to back their pertness with invectives and abuses, the queen was resolved to put a stop to these proceedings. Accordingly, her maj. commanded 30 members of the Commons, as is mentioned in the Journals, along with the committee of lords, to make their appearance before her. On their coming to her, she endeavoured first to smooth and qualify their minds by many obliging expressions; but afterwards gave them a smart reproof, in which, however, she mixed some sweetness with maj. She promised them to manage things not only with the care of a prince, but the tenderness of a parent; by which means she diverted them from their resolution. And, because the parl. had offered greater subsidies than usual, on condition she would declare a successor, she utterly refused that extraordinary supply, and accepted of a much smaller sum. Abating the receipt of the fourth part of the money so granted; and telling them, after commending their regard for her, “That money in her subjects purse, was as good as in her own exchequer.”

This is the substance of what Cambden writes of this matter; as, indeed, it is also of what we find in the Journals of the Commons about it: except that two inhibitions were sent to that house by the queen, expressly forbidding them to proceed in that affair any farther. This occasioned a motion to be made, by Paul Wentworth, esq. to know whether the queen’s commands and inhibition were not against the liberties and privileges of the house? On which nice question the debates aforementioned were grounded. Many arguments ensued upon this; and the debate lasted from 9 in the morning, Nov. 11th, till 2 in the afternoon. Next day the Speaker was again sent for to court; who reported to the house, “That he had received a special command from the queen, that there should be no farther talk of that matter; and if any person thought himself not satisfied, and had further reasons, let him come and shew them before the privy council.”—But we find that on the 25th, the Speaker, coming again from her maj. declared to the house, “That for the good-will she bore to them, she did revoke her two former commandments; but desired the house to proceed no further in the matter at that time.” Which revocation, says the Journal, “was taken by the house most joyfully; with most hearty prayer and thanks for the same.”

A Subsidy.] Oct. 17, the supply was moved in the Commons, by Mr. Comptroller Rogers, and seconded by Secretary Cecil; who declared, “That it was to defray the queen’s charges at Newhaven, the navy, and the munitions against John O’Neyle, in Ireland.” This bill was sent up to the Lords, on the 17th of Dec. and passed that house on the 18th. The grant was one 15th, one 10th, and a Subsidy; a subsidy from the clergy of 4s. in the pound to be paid in 3 years, had been confirmed by parl. some days before. Part of this tax, says Cambden, the queen remitted; as not caring to lie under too high an obligation to her parl. considering she was resolved not to oblige them, either in taking a husband herself, or declaring a successor to the crown.

In this session was passed an act, declaring "the election, consecration, confirmation and installment of the abps. and bps. of England to be good and lawful; and that the said bps. were elected and consecrated duly, and according to the laws of the land."—A bill was also brought into the Lords, and read twice, "That no man killing any person at, what is called in the Journals, 20-12 prick, or longer mark, shall forfeit his goods or chattels." Which bill, because it touched the queen's prerogative, it was thought convenient to proceed in it no farther, till her maj.'s pleasure was known therein. But we hear no more of it.—A list of the public acts passed in this session will be found at the end of this reign.

The Parl. dissolved.] The bills being all ready, after a short adjournment, from the 30th of Dec. to the 2d of Jan.; on that day, the queen came, by water; from Whitehall, as was her usual custom, and landed on the backside of the parliament-chamber. After which, being apparelled in her parliament-robcs, with a caul on her head, she came forth, and proceeded up and took her seat; the marq. of Northampton, carrying the cap of maintenance, stood on her right hand, and the earl of Westmoreland the sword at her left hand, with the heralds and serjeants of arms before her; the queen's mantle borne up on either side from her arms by the earl of Leicester and the lord Hunsdon, who always stood still by her for the assisting thereof, when she stood up; her train borne by the lady Strange, assisted by the lord chamberlain and vice chamberlain. At the left hand of the queen, and south side, kneeled the ladies; and behind the queen, at the rail, stood the lord keeper on the right hand, the lord treasurer on the left hand, with divers young lords and peers eldest sons. Then all being placed, Mr. Onslow the Speaker was brought in, between sir Francis Knolles, vice chamberlain, and sir Ambrose Cave, chancellor of the duchy; and after reverence done, proceeded down to the wall, and from thence came up to the rail, in the way making 3 reverences; and standing there, made other 3 like reverences, and then began his oration, as followeth:

The Speaker's Speech.] "Most excellent and virtuous princess, &c. Where I have been elected by the knights, citizens, and burgesses of this your nether house, to be their mouth or Speaker, and thereunto appointed and allowed by your maj. to supply the same room, to the bewraying of my wants; especially, that thereby I shall be forced utterly to discover the barrenness of my learning before this noble assembly, which not a little grieveth me, and would gladly be excused, considering the true saying, "how there is no difference between a wise man and a fool, if they may keep silence;" which I require. But again, considering your maj.'s clemency, taking in good part the good will of the party for want of ability, which putteth me in remembrance and good hope, persuading me that you will not take your said clemency from me, contrary to your nature. Again, when I consider my office as Speaker, it is no great matter, being but a mouth, to utter things appointed me to speak unto you, and not otherwise; which consisteth only in speaking, and not in any other knowledge; whereby I gather how it is necessary, I speak simply and plainly, according to the truth and trust reposed in me. And thus, considering whose mouth I am, which chose me to speak for them, being the knights, citizens, and burgesses, who were not also by the commons chosen for their eloquence, but for their wisdom and discretion; by this means, being fit men to whom the Commons have committed the care and charge of themselves, wives and children, lands and goods; and so in their behalf to foresee, and take order for all things necessary. Thus they being chosen by the plain commons, it is necessary they elect a plain Speaker, fit for the plain matter, and therefore well provided at first to have such a one as should use plain words, and not either so fine that they cannot be understood, or else so eloquent, that now and then they miss the cushion. But now, upon occasion of beholding your grace and this noble assembly, I consider the manifold and great benefits which God suddenly hath sent unto this country; for although God hath granted the benefit of creation and conservation, with many other commodities, to other nations of the world; yet this our native country he hath blessed, not only with the like, but also with much more fruitfulness than any other; of which great and inestimable benefit of God's preferment, which appeareth better by the want that others have of the same, I am occasioned now to speak, the rather to move and stir up our hearts to give most hearty thanks to God for the same.—Now to speak of govt. by Succession, Election, Religion, or Policy: 1st, if the body should want a head, it were a great monster; so it is likewise if it have many heads, as if upon every several member were a head. And to speak of one head; although in the body be several members, which be made of flesh, bones, sinews, and joints, yet the one head thereof governeth wisely the same; which if it should want, we should be worse than wild beasts without a shepherd, and so worthily be called a monstrous beast. Again, if the body should be governed by many heads, then the same would soon come to destruction, by reason of the controversy amongst them, who would never agree, but be destroyed without any foreign invasion; therefore God seeth it is needful that the people have a king, and therefore a king is granted them; and so therefore the best govt. is to be ruled by one king, and not many, who may maintain and cherish the good and godly, and punish the ungodly and offenders.—As for govt. by Election, in that is great variance, particularly strifes and part-takings.

As for examples, amongst the rest, take out one, which is called the most holy, as that of the pope; and weigh how holily and quietly it is done, called indeed holy and quiet, but utterly unholy and unquiet, with great partakings and strifes. Now touching Religion. To see the divine providence of God, how that many nations be governed by one prince; which were impossible, but that God ordereth it so, by whom the order of regimen is appointed, and that in his scriptures; wherefore the subjects ought to obey the same, yea, although they were evil, and much more those that be good. So God hath here appointed us not a heathen, or unbelieving prince, as he might, but a faithful, and one of his own children, to govern us his children; in which govt. the prince serveth God two ways, as a man and as a king. In that he is a man, he ought to live and serve God, as one of his good creatures; and that he is a king, and so God's special creature, he ought to make laws whereby God may be truly worshipped, and that his subjects might do no injury one to another, and especially to make quietness among the ministers of the church; to extinguish and put away all hurtful and unprofitable ceremonies, in any case contrary to God's word: in which point we have, in your maj.'s behalf, great thanks to give unto God, in setting forth unto us the liberty of God's word, whereof before we were bereaved; and that you have reformed the state of the corrupt church, now drawing souls out of dangerous errors, which afore by that corruption they were led and brought unto. And concerning Policy, God hath committed to your highness two swords; the one of which may be called the sword of war, to punish outward enemies withal; and the other the sword of justice, to correct offending subjects. In which point of policy your maj. is not behind your progenitors; for although, at your entrance, you found this realm in war, and ungarnished with munition, and that with such store as never was before; yet you have dislodged our ancient enemies, which were planted and placed even upon the walls of this realm. And concerning policy in laws, as bones, sinews, and joints be the force of a natural body, so are good laws the strength of a commonwealth: and your laws be consisting of two points, the common laws and the statutes. And for the common law, it is so grounded on God's laws and nature's, that 3 several nations governing here have all allowed the same; which is not inferior, but rather superior, and more indifferent than any other law. For, by our common law, although there be for the prince provided many princely prerogatives and royalties; yet it is not such as the prince can take money, or other things, or do as he will, at his own pleasure, without order; but quietly to suffer his subjects to enjoy their own, without wrongful oppression, wherein other princes by their liberty do take as pleaseth them. Aristotle saith, "that the life of the prince is the maintenance of the laws, and that it is better to be governed by a good prince than by good laws;" and so your maj. as a good prince, is not given to tyranny, contrary to your laws; but have and do pardon divers of your subjects offending against the laws. As now for example of your special grace, you have granted a general pardon, either without our seeking or looking for, whereby it is the better welcome. Again, your maj. hath not attempted to make laws contrary to order, but orderly have called this parl. who perceived certain wants, and thereunto have put their helping hand. And for help of evil manners, good laws are brought forth; of the which we beseech your excellent maj. so many as you shall allow, to inspire with the breath of your maj.'s power; whereby they may be quickened which now want life, and so be made laws. Furthermore, concerning payments to be made to the prince, it is as to deliver the same to God's ministers, who are appointed always for our defence; wherefore your humble subjects do offer a Subsidy, to be put into your maj.'s treasure; which, although it be but as a mite, or a farthing, yet is the good will of them to be reputed as the poor widow's was in the gospel; wherein I must not omit to do that which never Speaker did before, viz. to desire your maj. not to regard this simple offer of ours, but therein to accept our good will, wherein your highness hath prevented me in taking in the best part our good will; and required us to retain in our hands part of our gift, and accounting it to be in our purses as in your own; and so is our duty, besides the policy thereof, it being for our own defence; and also honesty, for that we have received many benefits by your maj.; for he that doth a good turn deserveth the praise, and not he which afterwards goeth about to reward, or doth reward the same. Also giving most hearty thanks to God, for that your highness hath signified your pleasure of your inclination to marriage; which afore you were not given unto, which is done for our safeguard; that when God shall call you, you shall leave of your own body to succeed you, which was the greatest promise that God made to David, and the greatest request that Abraham desired of God, when God promised him exceeding great reward; who said, "Lord, what wilt thou give me when I go childless; and he that is the steward of mine house is mine heir?" Therefore God grant us, that as your maj. hath defended the faith of Abraham, you may have the like desire of issue with you. And for that purpose, that you would shortly embrace the holy state of matrimony, to have one, when and with whom God shall appoint, and best like your maj.; and so the issue of your own body, by your example, rule over our posterity; and that we may obtain this, let us give our most humble thanks to God for his manifold benefits bestowed upon us, and pray for the reign of your maj.'s issue, after your long-desired government."

Then the Lord Keeper (after the queen had called him, and told him her mind) answered to Mr. Speaker, and said:

The Lord Keeper's Answer.] “Mr. Speaker; the queen hath heard and understood your wise and eloquent oration, whereby principally I gather 4 things; 1st, disabling yourself. 2nd, concerning governance. The 3rd, touching the subsidy. And, lastly, in giving thanks; which also was intermingled very wisely in all parts of your oration. And for the 1st, in disabling yourself, you have therein contrarily bewrayed your own ableness. For the 2nd, concerning governance, as well by succession as election, of religion and policy, in which discourse you have dealt well, I therefore leave it, and mean to speak only a few words, as to your last word, policy.—Politick orders be rules of all good acts, and touching those that you have made to the overthrowing of good laws, they deserve reproof as well as the others deserve praise; in which like case you err, in bringing her maj.’s prerogative in question, and for that thing, wherein she meant not to hurt any of your liberties. And again, the grant of her letters patents in question is not a little marvel, for that therein you find fault; which is now no new-devised thing, but such as afore this time hath been used and put in practice; howbeit, her maj.’s nature is mild and full of clemency; so that she is loth herein to be austere; and therefore, though at this time she suffer you all to depart quietly unto your countries for your amendment, yet as it is needful, so she hopeth that the offenders will hereafter use themselves well.—Again, touching the good laws, which you have taken great pains in making: if they be not executed, they be not only as rods without hands to execute them, or as torches without light, but also breed great contempt: therefore look well to the execution; for, if it be not done, the fault is in some of us, which she putteth orderly in trust to see it done.—For the 3rd point, concerning the presentment of the subsidy, her maj. biddeth me say, that when the lords spiritual and temporal granted it unto her, so she trusteth you will be as careful in gathering of it; which I, and others be witness, how very unwilling and loth she was to take, but to avoid further inconvenience.—And lastly, concerning knowledge of benefits, and giving of thanks, which you have well declared be many, yet one in comparison above all, yea, a fruit above all other, and whereby you may enjoy all the other, which is her marriage; whereof she hath put you in good hope.—Further, I have to put you in remembrance of 3 things; the 1st is, that where now you acknowledge benefits, and as you have cause to give thanks; so 2ndly, that you be not unmindful hereafter to do the like; and 3rdly, that in all your doings hereafter, you show yourselves, that all these benefits be had in remembrance, and not forgotten; for that it should be a thing against reason in human creatures; especially therefore now it behoveth you all, as you have acknowledged benefits, and for them given thanks in the first point, so that you see the other two observed. And then her maj. will not fail likewise thankfully to accept the same.”

The Queen's Speech.] Then the Queen standing up, said (after she had given her royal assent unto 19 public acts, and 13 private):—

“My Lords, and others the Commons of this Assembly; although the Lord Keeper hath, according to order, very well answered in my name, yet as a periphrasis I have a few words further, to speak unto you: notwithstanding I have not been used, nor love to do it, in such open assemblies; yet now, not to the end to amend his talk, but remembering that commonly princes own words be better printed in the hearers memory, than those spoken by their command; I mean to say thus much unto you. I have in this assembly found so much dissimulation, where I always professed plainness, that I marvel thereat; yea two faces under one hood, and the body rotten, being covered with two vizors, Succession and Liberty, which they determined must be either presently granted, denied or deferred. In granting whereof, they had their desires, and denying or deferring thereof (those things being so plaudable, as indeed to all men they are) they thought to work me that mischief, which never foreign enemy could bring to pass, which is the hatred of my commons. But, alas! they began to pierce the vessel before the wine was fined, and began a thing not foreseeing the end, how by this means I have seen my wellwillers from mine enemies, and can, as me seemeth, very well divide the house into four. 1st, the broachers and workers thereof, who are in the greatest fault; 2ndly, the speakers, who, by eloquent tales, persuaded others, are in the next degree; 3rdly, the agreeers, who being so light of credit, that the eloquence of the tales so overcame them, that they gave more credit thereunto, than unto their own wits; and lastly, those that sat still mute, and meddled not therewith, but rather wondered, disallowing the matter; who, in my opinion, are most to be excused.—But, do you think, that either I am unmindful of your surety by Succession, wherein is all my care, considering I know myself to be mortal? No, I warrant you. Or that I went about to break your Liberties? No, it was never in my meaning, but to stay you before you fell into the ditch. For all things have their time. And although, perhaps, you may have, after me, one better learned, or wiser; yet I assure you, none more careful over you: and therefore, henceforth, whether I live to see the like assembly or no, or however it be, yet beware, however, you prove your princes patience, as you have now done mine. And, now to conclude, all this notwithstanding (not meaning to make a Lent of Christmas) the most part of you may assure yourselves, that you depart in your princes grace.”—This speech being ended, the Lord Keeper, by her maj.’s command, dissolved the parliament.

We have now a space of 5 years before we meet with another parl.; during which time, the unfortunate Queen of Scots had been driven out of her kingdom, by her rebellious subjects, and forced to seek protection from her near kinswoman and sister queen, Elizabeth. In this interval, also, a dangerous insurrection had broken out in the north of England; headed by the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland. It grew to some height in a short time; but was soon suppressed by the earl of Sussex, who was sent by the queen against them.

A Parl. called.] In 1571, a parl. was called to meet at Westminster, on the 2d of April. The initial ceremonies and speeches are wholly omitted in both the Journals; but sir Simonds D'Ewes has supplied them from a manuscript Journal, then in his possession, and taken by some member of the commons in that parl. It begins thus:—

On Monday the 2nd of April, the parl. beginning (according to the writs of summons sent forth) her maj. about 11 of the clock, came towards Westminster, in the ancient accustomed most honourable passage, having first riding before her the gentlemen sworn to attend her person, the batchelors knights, after them the knights of the bath, then the barons of the exchequer, and judges of either bench, with the master of the rolls, her maj.'s attorney-general, and solicitor-general; after whom followed in order, the bps. and after them the earls, then the abp. of Canterbury. The Hat of Maintenance was carried by the marquis of Northampton, and the sword by the earl of Sussex. The place of the Lord Steward, for that day, was supplied by the lord Clinton, lord admiral of England; the lord great chamberlain was the earl of Oxford; and the earl marshal, by deputation from the duke of Norfolk, was the earl of Worcester. Her maj. sat in her coach, in her imperial robes, and a wreath or coronet of gold, set with rich pearls and stones, over her head; her coach drawn by two palfries, covered with crimson velvet, drawn out, imbossed and imbroidered very richly. Next after her chariot followed the earl of Leicester, in respect of his office of the master of the horse, leading her maj.'s spare horse. And then 47 ladies and women of honour; the guard in their rich coats going on every side of them; the trumpeters before the first, sounding; and heralds riding, and keeping their rooms and places orderly. In Westminster church the bp. of Lincoln preached before her maj. whose sermon being done, her maj. came from the church, the lords all on foot, in order as afore; and over her head a rich canopy was carried all the way. She being entered into the Upper House of parl. and there sat in princely and seemly sort, under a high and rich cloth of estate; her robe was supported by the earl of Oxford, the earl of Sussex kneeling, holding the sword on the left hand, and the earl of Huntingdon holding the hat of estate, and the lords all in their places on each side of the chamber; that is to say, the lords spiritual on the right hand, and the lords temporal on the left. The judges and her learned council, being at the woollsacks in the midst of the chamber, and at her highness's feet, at each side of her kneeling one of the grooms, or gentlemen of the chamber, their faces towards her; the knights, citizens and burgesses all standing below the bar, her maj. then stood up in her regal seat, and with a princely grace and singular good countenance, after a long stay, spake a few words to this effect:—

The Queen's Speech.] “My right loving lords, and you our right faithful and obedient subjects: We in the name of God, for his service, and for the safety of this state, are now here assembled, to his glory, I hope, and pray that it may be to your comfort, and the common quiet of our, yours, and all ours for ever.”

And then looking on the right side of her, towards sir Nicholas Bacon, knt. Lord Keeper of the great seal of England, standing a little beside the cloth of estate, and somewhat back and lower from the same, she willed him to shew the cause of the parl. who thereupon spake as followeth:—

The Lord Keeper's Speech.] “The queen's most excellent maj. our most dread and gracious sovereign, hath commanded me to declare unto you, the causes of your calling and assembling at this time, which I mean to do as briefly as I can, led thereunto as one very loth to be tedious to her maj. and also because to wise men, and well-disposed (as I judge you be) a few words do suffice. The causes be chiefly two, the one to establish or dissolve laws, as best shall serve for the governance of the realm. The other, so to consider of the crown and state, as it may be best preserved in time of peace, and best defended in the time of war, according to the honour due unto it. And because in all councils and conferences, first and chiefly there should be sought the advancement of God's honour and glory, as the sure and infallible foundation, whereupon the policy of every good public weal is to be erected and built; and as the streight line, whereby it is principally to be directed and governed, and as the chief pillar and buttress, wherewith it is continually to be sustained and maintained; therefore, for the well-performing of the former touching laws, you are to consider, 1st, whether the Ecclesiastical Laws concerning the discipline of the church, be sufficient or no? and if any want shall be found, to supply the same; and thereof the greatest care ought to depend upon my lords the bps. to whom the execution thereof especially pertains, and to whom the imperfections of the same be best known.—And as to the Temporal Laws, you are to examine, whether any of them, already made, be too sharp or too sore, or over burthenous to the subject; or whether any of them be too loose or too soft, and so over perilous to the state. For like as the former may put in danger many an innocent, without cause, particularly; so the 2nd may put in peril both the nocent and innocent, and the whole state universally. You are also to examine the want and superfluity of laws: you are to look whether there be too many laws for any thing, which breedeth so many doubts, that the subject sometimes is to seek how to observe them, and the counsellor how to give advice concerning them.—Now the 2nd, which concerneth a sufficient Provision for the Crown and State; herein you are to call to remembrance how the crown of this realm hath been many ways charged extraordinarily of late; not possibly to be born by the ordinarily revenues of the same, and therefore of necessity to be relieved otherwise as heretofore it hath commonly and necessarily been. For, like as the ordinary charge hath been always born by ordinary revenues, so the extraordinary charge hath always been sustained by an extraordinary relief. This to those that be of understanding is known, not only to be proper to kingdoms and empires, but also is, hath been, and ever will be, a necessary peculiar partaining to all commonwealths, and private states of men, from the highest to the lowest; the rules of reason hath ordained it so to be.—But, here I rest greatly perplexed, whether I ought to open and remember unto you, such reasons as may be easily produced, to move you thankfully and readily to grant this extraordinary relief or no: I know the queen's maj. conceiveth so great hope of your prudent foreseeing what is to be done, and of your good wills and readiness to perform that, which by prudence you foresee, that few or no persuasions at all are needful for the bringing this to pass. Nevertheless, because by the antient order heretofore used, it is my office and duty somewhat to say in this case, and likewise all men also that be present, neither understand alike, nor remember alike: therefore I mean, with your favour and patience, to trouble you with a few words, touching this point. True, it is, that there be 2 things that ought vehemently to move us, frankly, bountifully, and readily to deal in this matter. The former is the great benefits that we have received: the 2nd is the necessity of the cause. If we should forget the former, we are to be charged as most ungrate and unthankful; and the forgetfulness of the 2nd doth charge us, as uncareful of our own livings and liberties, and of our lives; the former moveth by reason, and the 2nd urgeth by necessity. And here, to begin with the former, albeit that the benefits that the realm hath received by God's grace, and the queen's maj.'s goodness, both for the number and greatness, are such as may be more easily marvelled at, than worthily weighed and considered: yet mean I to remember briefly 3 of them, whereof the 1st and chief is restoring and setting at liberty God's holy Word amongst us; the greatest and most precious treasure that can be in this world: for that either doth, or should benefit us in the best degree; to wit, our minds and souls; and look how much our souls excel our bodies, so much must needs the benefits of our souls excel the benefits of our bodies; whereby also, as by a necessary consequent, we are delivered, and made free from the bondage of the Roman tyranny; therefore this is to be thought of us the most principal benefit.—The 2nd is the inestimable benefit of Peace during the time of ten whole years together, and more; and what is peace? Is it not the richest and most wished for ornament that pertains to any public weal? Is not peace the mark and end that all good governments direct their actions unto? Nay, is there any benefit, be it never so great, that a man may take the whole commodity of, without the benefit of peace? Is there any so little commodity, but through peace a man may have the full fruition of it? By this we generally and joyfully possess all; and without this generally and joyfully we possess nothing. A man that would sufficiently consider all the commodities of peace, ought to call to remembrance all the miseries of war; for in reason it seems as great a benefit in being delivered of the one, as in the possessing of the other. Yet if there were nothing, the common and lamentable calamities and miseries of our neighbours round about us, for want of peace, may give us to understand what blessedness we be in that possess it. There be that never acknowledge benefits to their value, whilst they possess them, but when they are taken from them, and so find their want; marry, such be not worthy of them. Now is it possible, trow you, that this blessed benefit of peace could have been from time to time thus long conserved and conferred upon us, had not the mind, affection and love, that our sovereign bears towards us her subjects, bred such care over us in her breast, as for the well-bringing of this to pass, she hath forborn no care of mind, no travel of body, nor expence of her treasure, nor sale of her lands; no adventuring of her credit, either at home or abroad? a plain and manifest argument, how dear and precious the safety and quiet of us her subjects be to her maj. And can there be a greater persuasion to move us to our power to tender the like?—The 3rd is the great benefit of clemency and mercy. I pray you, hath it been seen or read, that any prince of this realm, during whole 10 years reign, and more, hath had his hands so clean from blood? If no offence were, her maj.'s wisdom in governing was the more to be wondered at; and if offences were, then her maj.'s clemency and mercy the more to be commended. 'Misericordia ejus super omnia opera ejus.' Besides, like as it hath pleased God 10 years and more, by the ministry of our said sovereign, to bless this realm with those two inestimable benefits of peace and clemency, so there is no cause but the same might by God's grace have continued 20 years longer, without intermission, had not the raging romanist rebels entertained the matter. And here it is to be noted, that this merciful and peaceful reign 10 years and more, hath happened in the time of Christ's religion now established. I cannot think that any man can follow me in this, in the time of the Romish religion since the conquest. Nay, a man might affirm, that this is an example for times to come, without any like in times past; comparing singula singulis, what should I say? these be the true fruits of true religion. I could further remember you of the fruits of justice, the benefit of restoring your money to fineness; yea, I could put you in mind, but I think it needs not, it happened so late, of a subsidy granted, whereof the queen's maj. of her own bountifulness, remitted the one half; was the like here in England ever seen or heard of? But being out of doubt, that these benefits already remembered be sufficient of themselves to move you to be thankful to your power, I leave any longer to detain you in this point.—And albeit a subject cannot yield any benefit to his sovereign in the same nature that he receiveth it; because every benefit is more than duty, and more than duty a subject cannot yield to his sovereign: yet can it not be denied, but a subject's acknowledging of benefits received, joined with good-will to yield as far as liberty will reach, doth sufficiently satisfy for the subject, for, 'ultra posse non est esse.' To your best actions therefore address ye. And thus much concerning benefits.—Now to the 2nd part, concerning urging by necessity, true it is, that the extraordinary matters of Charge, happened since the last assembly here, urging to have by necessity a relief granted, amongst many others be these. First, the great charge in suppressing the late northern rebellion, with charges also in reducing those the queen's enemies in Scotland, that assisted the rebels, and made roads into England. The continual growing expences, by reason of Ireland, as in subduing the rebels within that realm, and withstanding the Scots northward, and other foreign forces, intending invasion southward. To these 3 charges by land, you may add a 4th by sea; as the preparation and setting forth of ships, partly for the defence against all foreign forces, suspected and intended, partly for the safe conducting of the wares and merchandizes in greater strength and longer cut than heretofore hath been used. These and such like extraordinary charges, whereof there be sundry, with the remains of old charges not possible to be born by the ordinary revenue, and yet of necessity to be expended, do greatly exceed any extraordinary aid therefore commonly granted. Again, the great decay of the queen's Customs, by reason of stay and alteration of traffick (albeit upon just occasion) hath bred no small want; for although in time it is not to be doubted, but that will grow again to his old course, and continue with great surety: yet, in the mean time, this want must some way be supplied; for you know the horse must be provided for, whilst the grass is in growing. At the least, let us do so much for ourselves, as we do for our horses. For ourselves it is that are to be relieved in this case. This I must needs say, that if the queen's maj. did use in matters of expence, to do as commonly princes heretofore have used to do, then with the more difficulty might such extraordinary aid be assented unto, and yet of necessity to be had, to withstand a greater necessity. It hath been used in times past, that princes pleasures and delights have been commonly followed in matters of charge, as things of necessity. And now, because, God be praised, the relieving of the realm's necessity is become the princes pleasure and delight, a noble conversion (God continue it, and make us, as we ought to be earnestly thankful for it!) a princely example shewed by a sovereign for subjects to follow. To descend in some particulars. What need I to remember unto you, how the gorgeous, sumptuous, superfluous buildings of time past be for the realm's good, by her maj. in this time turned into necessary buildings, and upholdings? The chargeable, glittering, glorious triumphs into delectable pastimes and shows? Ambassadors of charge into such as be void of excess, and yet honourable and comely? These and such like are dangerous dams, able to dry up the flowing fountains of any treasure; and yet these imperfections have been commonly princes peculiars, especially young. One free from these was accounted 'rara avis,' &c. and yet (God be thanked) a phoenix, a blessed bird of this kind God hath blessed us with. I think it may be affirmed, and that truly, that there hath not been any matter of great charge taken in hand by her maj. in this happy reign of 12 years and more, that hath not been thought before convenient to be done for the weal and profit of the realm; so far her highness is from spending of treasure in vain matters, and therefore the rather how can a man make any difficulty to contribute according to his power? especially, in maintaining of his sovereign, his country, his self, his wife and children, and what not? having so long a proof by experience of such an employment? Here I would put you in mind of extraordinary charges to come, which in reason seems evident; but so I should be over tedious unto you, and 'frustra fit per plura quod fieri potest per pauciora.' And therefore here I make an end, doubting that I have tarried you longer than I promised or meant, or perchance needed, your wisdoms and good inclinations considered. But you know things are to be done both in form and matter; and my trust is, that if I had stayed, I may be warranted by either, or by both, that you will take it in good part."

The Speaker's Speech.] The Journalist proceeds then to tell us, that on the 4th of April the Commons presented Christopher Wray, esq. serjeant at law, as their Speaker; whose excuse not being allowed, he made an oration in substance as follows; first, he said, "he desired to be heard to say somewhat concerning the orderly govt. of a commonweal, which to be duly done, there were 3 things requisite, Religion,

Authority, and Laws. By Religion, he said, we do not only know God aright, but also how to obey the king or queen, whom God shall assign to reign over us; and that not in temporal causes, but in spiritual or ecclesiastical; in which wholly her maj.'s power is absolute. And leaving all proofs of divinity to the bps. and fathers, as he said he would, he proved the same by the practice of princes within this realm, and first made remembrance of Lucius the 1st Christian king, who having written to Elutherius the pope, 1300 years past, for the Roman laws, he was answered, that he had the holy scriptures, out of the which he might draw good discretion; for that he was the vicar of Christ over the people of Britain. The conqueror, he said, in the erection of Battle Abbey, granted that the church should be free from all episcopal jurisdiction. Henry III. gave to Ranulph, bp. of London, the archbishoprick of Canterbury, by these words, 'rex, &c. sciatis quod dedimus dilect. nostro Ranulpho archiepiscop. Cantuarien. quem instituimus anulo et baculo.' The ring, he said, was the sign of perfection; the staff the sign of pastoral rule; which he could not do if these kings had not had and used the ecclesiastical powers. In the reports of the law, we find that an excommunication of a certain person came from the pope, under his leaden bull, and was shewed in abatement of an action brought at the common law; which, besides that it was of no force, the king and judges were of mind, that he who brought it had deserved death, so to presume on any foreign authority; which authority being now, by God's grace and her highness's means, abolished, and the freedom of consciences and the truth of God's word established; we therefore ought greatly to thank God and her.—For Authority, or the sword, whereby the commonwealth is stayed, 3 things, he said, are requisite; men, armour, and money. For men, their good wills were most, being of itself a strong fortress; for armour, the necessity he shewed in part; and how requisite treasure was, he a little declared. And concluded, that all 3 must be conjoined, men, armour, and money.—Lastly, for Laws, the third stay of the commonwealth; he said there must be consideration in making them, and care in executing of them; in making such, as by the providing for one part of the commonwealth, the rest should not be hindered, which were indeed a matter most pernicious; and this he vouched out of 'Plato de Legibus.' For execution, he said, that since the law of itself is but mute, set in paper, not able to do ought, the magistrate, (except he will be also mute) must be the doer, and then is a good law said to be well made when it is well executed; for 'anima legis est executio.'—Hereupon he said something in commendation of her maj. who had given free course to her laws, not sending or requiring the stay of justice, by her letters or privy seals, as heretofore sometimes hath been by her progenitors used. Neither hath she pardoned any, without the advice of such, before whom the offenders have been arraigned, and the cause heard. His oration being ended, he then made 4 petitions; 1st, that the persons, servants, and goods of all coming to that assembly might be free from all arrests. 2nd, that for cause of conference they might have access to her maj. 3rd, if any sent should not truly report, or in part mistake the meaning of the house, that the same should be by her highness favourably heard. And, lastly, that in the house all men might have free speech."

The Queen's Answer.] This oration being ended, by direction from her maj. the Lord Keeper answered thus, dividing his speech into 3 parts; the 1st, where he had sometimes inserted commendations of her maj. he said, "her highness would not acknowledge so great perfections to be in her; but said, that they should be instructions for her better proceedings in time to come. The 2nd part of his oration, he said, concerning the rule for ordering of the commonwealth, she well liked of; and wished, that as he had well conceived of it, and well uttered the same, so he and others would endeavour the execution thereof. For his petitions, he said, her maj.'s pleasure was, that the 1st should be granted, with this caution, that no man should under their shadows untruly protect others. For the 2nd, he said, at time convenient, her pleasure was, they should come freely. Touching the 3rd part, he said, she could not imagine that among so many wise men it could happen; but if it should, her grace would be content to remit it. The 4th was such, that her maj. having experience of late of some disorder, and certain offences, which though they were not punished, yet were they offences still, and so must be accounted; therefore said, they should do well to meddle with no matters of state, but such as should be propounded unto them, and to occupy themselves in other matters concerning the commonwealth."

Earls of Northumberland, &c. attainted.] The first thing of note we find the Lords went upon was, to bring in a bill for the Attainder of Tho. Piercy, earl of Northumberland, Cha. Nevile, earl of Westmoreland, and others. The names of those other persons attainted are not in the Journals, but Camden has given us several of them: besides the two earls, there were Ann, countess of Northumberland; Edw. Dacres, of Morton, commonly called lord Dacres; John Nevile, of Leversege; John Swinborn, Tho. Markenfeld, Egremont Ratcliff, brother to the earl of Sussex; Christ. Nevile, Rd. Norton, of Norton-Corniers; Christ. Marmaduke, and Thomas of the same family; Rob. and Mich. Tempest, Geo. Stafford, and about 40 more, all of the best families in the north of England. The bill of Attainder against these persons was read in the Lords a first time on the 6th of April; passed that house on the 28th; and, being sent down to the Commons, they returned it, concluded, on the 15th of May following. By this act, all their lands and goods were forfeited to the queen, and those possessions within the bishopric of Durham were adjudged to her and her successors, against Pilkinton, the bp. who laid claim to all royalties between the rivers Tine and Tese. This was done, says Cambden, in regard of the vast expence the queen had been at in freeing the bp. and his diocese from the rebels; but with proviso that it should not prejudice the right of the church of Durham for the future.

Bill relating to Treason.] April 23th, a bill was sent up by the Commons to the Lords, whereby certain offences there named were made Treason. It passed that house on the 8th of May, with a new proviso, and certain amendments added to it. This act, says Cambden, was occasioned by the iniquity of the times, and the love which the parl. of England then bore to their prince and country. By it was provided, according to the tenor of former laws, "that if any man should attempt the death or personal hurt of the queen; or raise war, or excite others to war against her; if any one should give out, that she is not the lawful queen of this realm, but that any other can claim a juster title thereto; or should pronounce her to be an heretic, schismatic, or infidel; or should usurp the right and title of the kingdom during her life; or should affirm that any other has a right to the crown; or that the laws and statutes cannot limit and determine the right of the crown and the successor thereof, every such person shall be guilty of high treason. That if any one, during the queen's life, should by any book, written or printed, expressly maintain, that any person is, or ought to be, the queen's heir and successor, except the natural issue of her body, or should publish, print, or disperse any books or writings to that effect, he and his abettors, for the first offence, should be imprisoned for a whole year, and forfeit the half of his goods; and if any should offend a 2nd time, he should incur the penalty of a premunire, that is, the loss of all his goods, and lie in perpetual imprisonment."

Pope Pius V. excommunicates the Queen.] About this time pope Pius V. thundered out all the anathemas of the Vatican against Elizabeth, and published a bull of excommunication against her, which was fixed on the bp. of London's palace-gates. This arrogance was taken notice of by parl. Accordingly, we find that a bill passed the Lords, April 21st, with this title, "a bill against bringing in and putting in Execution of Bulls, Writings, or Instruments, or other superstitious things, from the see of Rome." By it was enacted, "that whosoever, by bulls, or other rescripts of the pope, should reconcile any man to the church of Rome, and those who should be so reconciled, should be guilty of high treason. That whosoever did relieve such as did so reconcile men, or should bring into England any Agnus Dei's, beads, crucifixes, or other things consecrated by the pope, should incur the penalty of a Premunire. And that whosoever should not discover such reconcilers should be guilty of concealing, that is, misprision of treason."

Several persons concerned in the last rebellion having escaped beyond sea, and others in greater numbers having withdrawn themselves on the score of religion, a bill was framed against them in the Commons, and sent up to the Lords on the 1st of May. The next day this bill against Fugitives over the Seas was committed, and on the 19th was concluded in that house, with a new proviso, and certain amendments added to it. The act recalled all such Fugitives who had gone abroad without the queen's leave, within a limited time, under forfeiture of their estates. And by another act, passed this session, all conveyances, gifts, alienations, &c. of their estates were termed fraudulent, and set aside. These, and some more laws of less significancy, were framed against Popery, by this parl. nor were they wanting to reform some scandalous abuses which had crept into the established protestant church. An act was made for correcting certain disorders of the ministers of the church; another against frauds in defeating remedies for dilapidations; and a third touching Leases of Benefices and other ecclesiastical livings with cure.

A Subsidy.] May 10th, a bill with a grant of two 15ths and 10ths, and a Subsidy, was sent up by the Commons, and passed by the Lords on the 15th. Hollingshead informs us, that this Supply was granted to the queen, towards the great charge she had been at, in repressing the late Rebellion, in the north; and pursuing the rebels, which were fled into Scotland. Great care was taken that the queen should not be cheated of any part of this grant; for two bills were passed this parl. the one against frauds of tellers, receivers, collectors and treasurers of the public money; the other, that all such lands, goods, chattels, &c. as any receiver, teller, collector, &c. should have at their entering into their charge, shall be liable to the payment of their debts due to the crown. The like act was made for the collectors of the subsidies granted by the clergy; which at this time was 6s. in the pound.

We must now go back to trace what was doing this parl. in the Commons. The house having been called over, and the oath of allegiance and supremacy given to each member, by the lord steward of the queen's household, they proceeded to the election of a Speaker; the ceremony of whose investiture is given before.

April 5th, the house was again called over; and some members were commanded to attend the next day the order of the house, because they had entered there without being returned by the clerk of the crown. The same day a committee was named to confer with the attorney and solicitor general, about several boroughs, who had returned members in this parl. but sent none to the last. The Journalist observes, on such a case, in a prior parl. "That it was very common in former times, that if any borough grew into poverty, or decay, to avoid the charges of their burgesses allowance, they either got a licence from the crown to be discharged from such election and attendance, or did, by degrees, discontinue it themselves. But, in later times, the knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of commons, for the most part, bearing their own charges, many of those borough towns, which had discontinued their former privilege, by not sending, did again begin it; which was the case of several towns, both in this and the succeeding reign." This is the reason why so many pitiful boroughs, remarkable now for nothing but their meanness and poverty, retain the same privilege; and have a power of being represented equal to the counties and cities, and superior to many great towns in England.

Debate on the Abuses in Religion, &c.] April 6th, as it appears by the Journalist, a motion was made in the house to this effect:—

Mr. Strickland, a grave and ancient man, of great zeal, stood up, and made a long discourse, tending to the remembrance of God's goodness, giving unto us the light of his word, together with the gracious disposition of her maj. by whom, as by his instrument, God hath wrought so great things, and blaming our slackness and carelessness, in not esteeming and following the time and blessing offered; but still as men not sufficiently instructed what is truth, or so that we think it not convenient to publish and profess it openly, and that all reproachful speeches of the slanderous might be stopped, the drawbacks brought forward, and the over-runners, such as over-run and exceed the rule of the law, reduced to a certainty, he thought it operis pretium, to be occupied therein; for which purpose he said, the professors of the gospel in other nations had writ, and published to the world, the confession of their faith, as did those of Strasburgh and Frankfort, &c. for which purpose also great learned men in this realm had travelled, as Peter Martyr, Paulus Fagius, and others, whose works hereupon were extant.—And before this time an offer thereof was made, in parl. that it might be approved; but either the slackness, or somewhat else of some men in that time, was the lett thereof, or what else, he said, he would not say. This book, he said, rested in the custody of Mr. Norton, as he guessed, a man neither ill-disposed to religion, nor a negligent keeper of such matters of charge, and thereupon requested that Mr. Norton might be required to produce the same; he added also, that after so many years, as now by God's providence we had been learning the purity of God's truth, we should not permit, for any cause of policy, or other pretence, any errors in matters of doctrine to continue amongst us. And therefore, said he, although the book of common prayer is (God be praised) drawn very near to the sincerity of the truth, yet are there some things inserted more superstitious, than in so high matters be tolerable; as, namely, in the Administration of the Sacrament of Baptism, the Sign of the Cross to be made with some ceremonies, and such other errors; all which, he said, might well be changed, without note of chopping or changing of religion, whereby the enemies might slander us; it being a reformation not contrariant, but directly pursuant to our profession; that is, to have all things brought to the purity of the primitive church, and institution of Christ. He spake at large of the abuses of the church of England, and of the churchmen; as first, that known papists are admitted to have ecclesiastical govt. and great livings; that godly, honest, and learned protestants having little or nothing; that boys are dispensed with to have spiritual promotions; that by friendship with the master of the faculties, either unable men are qualified, or some one man allowed to have too many several livings; finally, he concluded with petition, that by authority of the house, some convenient number of them might be assigned, to have conference with the lords of the spirituality, for consideration and reformation of the matters by him remembered.

Mr. Norton, a man wise, bold and eloquent, stood up next, and said, he was not ignorant, but had long since learned what it was to speak on a sudden, or first, before other men in parl. Yet, being occasioned by Mr. Strickland, he said, that truth it was, he had a book tending to the same effect; but (quoth he) the book was not drawn by those he named, but by virtue of the act of 1532, at the assignation, or by the advice of 8 bps. 8 divines, 8 civilians, and 8 temporal lawyers, who having in charge, to make ecclesiastical constitutions, took in hand the same; which was drawn by that learned man, dr. Haddon, and penned by another learned man Mr. Cheeke; whereupon he said, that consideration had been, and some travel bestowed by Mr. Foxe of late, and that there was a book newly printed, to be offered to that house; which he did, then and there, presently shew forth. And for the rest of Mr. Strickland's motions, he was of his mind, chiefly for the avoiding and suppressing of simoniacal ingrossments.

Whereupon were appointed for that purpose, for redress of sundry defections in those matters, these following; viz. all the privy council being members of this house, sir Hen. Nevill, sir Tho. Thinne, sir Tho. Lucy, sir Hen. Gate, the master of the requests; mr. Heneage, mr. Recorder; mr. Bell, mr. Henry Knolles, sen. mr. Mounson, mr. Norton, mr. Strickland, mr. Godier, mr. Wm. More, and dr. Berkley.

On the same day, the Bill concerning Coming to the Church, and receiving the Communion, was read the 2nd time, and thereupon sir Tho. Smith, speaking for the maintenance thereof, argued; and in part wished the bps. to have consideration thereof.—After whom mr. Fleetwood moved, that the penalty of that statute should not go to promoters, and said, it was a device but of late brought in, in the time of Henry VIII. the first year of his reign, and shewed the evils and inconveniences that did grow by these men's doings; wherein no reformation was sought, but private gain to the most of men. He said also, that matter of going to the Church, or for the Service of God, did directly appertain to that court; and that we all have as well learned this lesson, That there is a God, who is to be served, as to have the bps. And thereupon he undertook to prove by the old laws, vouched from king Edgar, that the princes, in their parliaments, have made ecclesiastical constitutions: as these, That if any servant shall work upon the sabbath-day, by the commandment of his master, he should be free; if of himself, he should be whipped; if a freeman should work, he should be bound, or grievously amerced. Then he concluded upon request, that it might be committed to some of the house, without the bishops, who perhaps would be slow.—Sir Owen Hopton moved, very orderly, that the presentation of such defaults should not only depend upon the relation of the churchwardens, who being for the most part simple, and mean men, and fearing to offend, would rather incur danger of perjury, than displease some of their neighbours; he shewed for proof, experience.—On which motions, sir Thos. Smith, sir Owen Hopton, sir Thos. Scot, the master of the requests; mr. serj. Manwood, mr. serj. Geoffrey, mr. Fleetwood, and mr. Sands, were appointed a committee, to meet in the Star-Chamber, at two in the afternoon.

Debate on the Subsidy.] April 7th, the bill concerning Religion was read, and the Journalist proceeds to tell us, That mr. Strickland first moved, that mr. Norton might be required to deliver such books, as he had. Mr. Newdigate moved, that where one of the causes for the calling of the parl. and perhaps the chiefest, was for a Subsidy; he thought it not amiss to make offer of a Subsidy before it should be required, which speech was not liked of by the house.—Sir F. Knolles made a long needless discourse concerning the Subsidy.

Mr. Bell said, that a Subsidy was, by every good subject, to be yielded unto; but for that the people were galled by two means, it would hardly be levied; namely, by licences, and the abuse of promoters; for which, if remedy were provided, then would the Subsidy be paid willingly; which he proved, for that by licences a few only were enriched, and the multitude impoverished; and added, that if a burden should be laid on the back of the Commons, and no redress of the common evils, then there might happily ensue, that they would lay down the burden in the midst of the way, and turn to the contrary of their duty.

Mr. Popham affirmed mr. Bell's speech, and added to the former abuses, that of the treasurers of the crown; who having in their hands great masses of money, with the which either they themselves or some of theirs, do purchase lands to their own use, and after become bankrupts, and so cause or practice an installment of their debts, as of late some one hath installed a debt of 30,000l.: which occasioned the lack in the princes coffers.

Mr. Serj. Lovelace argued, that every loyal subject ought to yield to the relief of the prince, and that without any condition or limitation; notwithstanding, he did not dislike of the former motions; and thought it very requisite, that these evils might be provided for, to the ends aforesaid; unto the which he added 3 abuses more; 1st, the abuse of purveyors, wherein he had to desire the council, and the masters of the household to consider it, and to be willing to yield to reformation; and, in his opinion, it should not be amiss to take away the purveyors, and to limit every country to a proportionable rate; so should her maj. be better served, and the kingdom eased:—2ndly, the reformation of the exchequer, for the charge which groweth by respite of homage; which he wished might be paid on some other sort, in a sum certain:—3rdly, another reformation, which is upon a great abuse in the exchequer, by sending out, upon every fine levied, the writ 'quo titulo ingressus est.'

Mr. Comptroller said, that he being one of the masters of the household, would do his endeavour for reformation of all things arising by the purveyors.

Mr. Sampoole, sometimes of Lincoln's Inn, liked well of the motion of the Subsidy, and commended the motions of the gentlemen before; affirming, that they were very necessary to be thought of; unto which he was to add one more, viz. the abuse of collectors. He shewed, that they do retain their charge sometimes a year, sometimes more, in their own hands. And for that they are but mean men, appointed to that office, they oft times convert it to their own uses, and are perhaps never able to satisfy the same; whereby the people are unwilling to pay: for if they should understand her maj. should have it presently, they would more willingly pay it; and therefore wished the better sort of every country should be assigned to that charge.

Mr. Goodier said, that every man ought to yield to the subsidy, and rather offer it than to stay till it should be demanded; desiring, that the subsidy might be presently, and only go forward without the hearing of any more complaints; for that they might be infinite, and already more were remembered, than in one parl. could be reformed. Wherein he shewed a great desire he had to win favour. A Committee was then appointed to consider of the proportion and time of yielding some relief unto her majesty.

April 9th, a Report was made concerning the right of the Burgesses; and it was ordered, by consent of the attorney general, that the burgesses shall sit according to their returns; because the validity of the charters of their towns ought to be examined in another place.

April 10th, the committee was enlarged on the Religious bills, in order to go to a conference with a select number of bps. and peers. The next day the bill on fraudulent Gifts and Conveyances, alias Monopolies, was taken into consideration; and being ordered to be engrossed, a debate arose, in which

Mr. Fleetwood argued, "that there might appear rashness or indiscretion in them, who should now reverse what of late they had done; but leaving to speak thereof, he entered into a good discourse of the Prerogative, which might thereby be touched, if they should endeavour to overthrow her maj.'s letters patents, to whom by law there is power given to incorporate any town, and she is sworn to preserve her prerogative: he vouched the clerk of the parliament's book to be, that no man might talk of the statute of Wills, &c. but that the king first gave licence; for that his prerogative in the wards was hereby touched. He shewed likewise the statute of Ed. I. Edw. III. and Hen. IV. with a saving of the prerogative. In Ed. VI.'s time, licence was sued for to the Lord Protector, to talk of matters of Prerogative, he remembered the book of 2 Ed. VI. for the parl. of Ireland, called by the chief judge, as is for him lawful; where it was questioned, what by parl. might be done? whether they might depart with any of the king's towns, forts or piers? It was agreed they might not; and so he concluded, that to talk thereof (for as much as her maj.'s letters patents, and prerogative were touched) 'rege non consulto,' was perilous. He also made mention of the statute, which authorizeth all merchants to traffic by sea, 'nisi publice prohibentur;' he saith, others were prohibited.

Mr. Young, of Bristol, shewed the loss to the queen of her custom, then the private monopoly wrought and occasioned by the merchants, the controversies which have ensued by this means amongst them, and the subtile means whereby the statute was procured, without the consent of the major or commons, by such as were put in trust.

Mr. Alford said, that he might not speak of the prerogative aptly, for that he was not learned in the law; but made some remembrance of what he had there seen, concerning the act of parl. for Southampton; where it appeareth, that without an act of parl. her maj.'s letters patents were not sufficient; and therefore he prayed convenient consideration might be, and that the same, if it should so seem good to the house, might be conjoined to the former and other bills, &c.—Then spake Mr. Cleere, Sir F. Knolles, Sir Nich. Arnold, Sir Hen. Norris, and Mr. Christ. Yelverton, of Gray's Inn, severally to the said bill: whose speeches being somewhat imperfectly and uncertainly set down, are therefore omitted; although from them, and the residue foregoing, the effect of this bill may be collected to have been for the dissolution of certain companies of merchants in Bristol, whom her maj. had incorporated by her letters patents, and authorized them to trade to certain places, by which it was pretended that the public and free trading of others was restrained; and at last upon the motion of Mr. Fleetwood, that the bill being of great weight, might be further considered of by the house, and the committees be appointed at some other time; it was thereupon ordered, That they should be appointed on the day following, which was done accordingly.

Debate on the Bill for coming to Church. The same day was read, but not mentioned in the original Journals, a bill for coming to the Service of the Church, which seems to be a matter of great moment, by the following debate about it:

Mr. Snagg shewed, at large, the inconveniences of the old law, for coming to service: for, said he, by the former law it was enacted, that the service shall not be said, or sacraments ministred, in other sort than in the Book of Common Prayer is prescribed; he shewed, how differently the same was used in many places, from the prescribed rule; as where no part of those prayers were observed, but a sermon, and some such other prayers only as the minister shall think good, in place thereof: whereupon have great divisions, discords and dislikes grown amongst and between great numbers. And since it is law, that in this sort Service shall be used, and that whosoever shall be at any other form of service, shall incur the penalty prescribed, and that the ministers neither do, nor will do herein, as they should, and as is by the law prescribed and commanded. He thought the proceedings, in this kind, should occasion a dilemma in mischief: for, by this law, if he come not, he shall lose 12d.; and if he come and be present, and the Service be not said according to the prescribed rule of the book, he shall lose 100 marks.

Mr. Aglionby, burgess of Warwick, moved, the law might be without exception or privilege for any gent. in their private oratories. This did he prove to be fit out of Plato his laws, and Cicero, both prescribing for the observation of the law and equality between the prince and the poor man; not giving scope to the one above the other. Also he remembered the authority of Lactantius Firmianus, making this only difference betwixt man and beast, that all men do know and acknowledge that there is a God; and in this respect there should be no difference between man and man. Withal, he said, the more noble the man, the more good his example may do. He therefore concluded, that for so much of the law, so the same might be general, he was of good liking that it should pass. But, for the other matter, concerning the receiving of the Communion, he argued, that it was not convenient to inforce consciences. And, to that purpose, he shewed the authority of doctors; which he vouched, without quoting the place or sentence. He said also; that it was the opinion of fathers, and learned men of this land; and therefore wished they might be consulted with. Finally, he concluded, that 'bonæ leges à malis moribus proveniunt;' but no good laws can make a bad man fit to receive that great mystery of God above. This whole speech he tempered with such discretion, as in such case was seemly. And whatsoever he spake, he spake the same under correction.

Mr. Strickland said, that, for the 1st, he approved what Mr. Aglionby had said: for the 2nd, he could not be of that mind; and he vouched, out of Esdras, that the church, yea, and the consciences of men, were, by the prophet, restrained: withal, he said, conscience might be free, but not to disturb the common quiet. He shewed the practice and doings of the people, the banishment of the Arians, &c. That the word of the prince, for lack of law, must not be tied. The Israelites, he said, were constrained to eat the passover. And, finally, he concluded, that it was no straitning of their consciences, but a charge or loss of their goods, if they could not vouchsafe to be, as they should be, good men, and true christians.

Mr. Dalton reasoned to this effect, that there could ensue no inconvenience by those two laws, which were intended to be contrary. His reason was, except the Service be according to the law, no man is bound to stay there, no more than if he be bound to come and hear Service; and there be no Service, he is to forfeit his bond. For answer to Mr. Aglionby, he said, the matters of conscience did not concern the law-makers; neither were they to regard the error, curiosity, or stiffneckedness of the evil, ignorant, or forward persons. For be it they did proceed orderly to the discharge of their own consciences, in making the law, let them care for the rest whom it behoveth. He was of mind that gentlemen should not be excepted, for the causes aforesaid; but, he wished provision might be made for such as be imprisoned, or cannot come for fear of arrests. He wished also, that the law might have continuance but till the end of the next parliament.

Debate on the Treason Bill.] April 12th, when the bill, and the additions to it, that certain offences should be made Treason, was read, a debate arose, in which

Mr. Goodier spake to this effect: 1st, he made a solemn protestation of his sincerity, truth and loyalty to her majesty, to the state, and to the house. Then he shewed many singular and true blessings, which we have by her highness's means, and religiously prayed for her preservation; but, his whole discourse stood upon these 3 points;—what he thought of the persons there assembled; what he disliked in the matter of the bill propounded; and why he did so.—Of the persons, he said, he heartily believed the whole company in truth and true meaning to have a care and hearty wellwishing for her maj.'s safety, acknowledging and reposing in her the very anchor of our safety; but, whether all were with a sincere meaning to the state of the crown, he knew not; but rather thought the clean contrary: but yet of the most and most honorable he thought not amiss, but some surely, he said, were doubly disposed, and with a favourable affection bent for some special body.—For the substance of the first bill, he said, he was of clear mind, well-liking, and approving the whole course thereof; except, quoth he, that the same be not already, by former laws provided for; and hereunto he further added, that if any man should say, That the Papists do not err in saying or speaking so slanderously of her maj. the same to be taken also as Treason. For the additions which concerned the first which did clearly respect the time past, as to make Treason of a fault already committed, which at the time of the perpetrating of the same offence, was not in the same degree; it was a precedent most perilous, which might occasion such and so great evils, as easily might not be conceived. Of present time, man's wisdom might judge; future times man's policy may reach to: but to call again the time past, or to raise what is dead in any kind, man may not; nor, in reason, is it to be presumed. The like, he said, had not been seen; and where he hath read thousands of laws, yet did he never find such a precedent. An extremity rare, and never practised, no not in these the greatest matters of faith and religion, that we do now so earnestly treat of. The enemy to God and our state (the Papists I mean) is most hateful. Yet is no man so hardly bent, as to have them punished, much less to suffer death, for what is passed. Whether her maj. hath pardoned what is past, we do not know, and whether her highness's pleasure be that it should be talked of, no man yet hath made a report. Withal, it may haply occasion dislike between her maj. and the house, which were odious and hateful; but doubtless, he prophesied it would occasion peril, such and so great, that the greatest speakers therein, yea those who should give them most and best words, could give no warranties. Neither is it that the sequel thereof might be warranted for the right of a crown, which words may not be strained or straitned.—Thus much considered, and the prince being herein not as yet determined, he therefore advised, and more than so by words of vehemency urged stay. He farther said, that the penning of the first article of the Additions was clouded and involved with secret understandings, not to be understood but by such as more curiously could, and more cunningly would, look therein than he. For matters of title of the crown, he said, he neither knew any, nor durst to intermeddle or take knowledge of any; and concluding, he said, that for obscurity of the sense, he must needs condemn the same, since that 'veritas est nuda, simplex & plana.'

Sir Thomas Smith, her maj.'s principal secretary, made mention, that the bill might be divided, lest the one might be the hindrance of the other.

Mr. Norton, in his accustomed manner of natural eloquence, first shewed that the assembly should be free of speech, so that the same did not exceed the bounds of loyalty; and as in speech free, so ought it also to be free of unjust slanders, and undeserved reproaches. For so much as might concern him, he protested that he neither thought, nor meant any other title than the sole preservation of her maj.; and to this end was he and the whole house (as he supposed) settled and bent; she being of this realm, not only in respect of our goods and lives the singular stay, but for truth and religion, yea of all Christendom not Magna, but in all the world Speciosa. And since that consultation is no other than 'consultare in commune,' he was as well to remove the surmise of ambiguity, as the slander raised of any doubleness in him; the words, quoth he, are plain, these and no other; that whatsoever person, during the life of her maj. hath or shall imagine, intend, or go about, the deposing, &c. them and their heirs to be barred of any title. And, saith he, where ambition hath once entered, such is the nature of the same, that never it will be satisfied: and the thirst for a kingdom is unquenchable. Withal, in common experience we see, that between two, for a small matter in suit, when it shall pass against the one, though by perfect trial, yet will he who loseth never acknowledge that he had either offered, or defended an injury. He said, for working of great matters, great time is required; and such a mischief, as to overthrow a crown, is not in a day compassed; and therefore what hereafter is thought, or meant to be executed, is already begun, compassed and devised. Time must therefore be taken, and therefore in time, and at all times, it is to be prevented. —Where it is said, the like hath not been seen, and a miracle made of it, as if there were never former precedents ever seen of the like, or ever heard of before. It is no longer since than in queen Mary's time, when to the parl. it was suggested, that the congregations in the city of London assembled, did use this kind of prayer to God, either to convert her, or confound her. Whereupon it was enacted, That every person whoso, and in such sort, had prayed, or whoso after should pray, should be taken for a traitor. The case of Bennet Smith is not so strange, nor so long since, but it may be remembered; his transgression was not such, nor so to be adjudged at the time of the offence perpetrated, as it was afterwards; yet by authority of parl. the offence precedent was from the old nature altered; and he, who before at the time of the offence, until the making of the law, was not to be privileged but by his clergy, was now by an act made after, by judgment executed. And since in the case of a private man, as was this of Bennet Smith, such consideration, and such good discretion was used, who can imagine it to be odious? Nay, who is it, that would not the like or greater care to be had of a prince, and especially of so good and virtuous a prince as she, of whom our conference is now? But yet we are charged with partial affection, unsettled minds, and doubleness. Whether this speech now be an offence to the house, he earnestly craved the judgment of the house. For that it might seem by the gentleman's earnestness who spake, that some one his friend, whom he was bent to serve, would be touched. Whereupon, for his own part, he eft-soons protested, he had no certain resolution with himself of any title, but was to be satisfied with the consent of that assembly; howsoever, adding further, if his motions might so sort, as they were liked, he offered this proviso to be added, That if any such person, who had made any such claim, shall disclaim and renounce all title during her highness's life, the same person, &c. to be then restored to the old estate.

Mr. Comptroller, after some declaration of grief, perceiving the matter grow to heat, as verily the greatest number of the house were more than moved with mr. Goodier's speech, and that men were disposed to talk at large of matters contrary or repugnant to the bill, moved that it might be severed; because the first part came in, and was exhibited to that house by her maj.'s learned council; the other was but the advice of a private man; which advice, though it justly deserved commendation, yet was it not, in his fancy, to be joined with that which came in other sort.

Mr. Snagg argued to this effect, That in making of laws, plainness of speech should be used, all intrapments to be shunned and avoided. And here he moved, why the statute of Edw. III. whereby it is enacted, That all such, who shall endeavour, compass or imagine the death of the king, &c. should be traitors, &c. should not be said sufficient, reaching as far, and comprehending as much, as this latter advice. For the regard of the time past, he said, he could have no good liking thereof, and what was practised in queen Mary's time (under correction) he took to be no charitable precedent; concerning the authority of the parl. he did conclude nothing, but said it was a prevention.

Sir Francis Knolles shewed, That he could not utterly dislike the conjoining of the additions, sith that they rise all of one ground, and that they both are good and charitable; whereof he acknowledged her highness to have intelligence, and the cause already to have been in conference by her counsel. And for the word 'hath,' he saith it contained no such absurdity, but with good zeal it might be maintained. And therefore such vehemency and sharpness of speech was more than requisite, yea more than convenient. And as for the obscurity, he said, of men that would mean well, it could not be misconstrued; and to stay or prevent devices past, he thought it but honest policy, which being otherwise used in a prince's case, is not to be disliked. He remembered her highness's unwillingness to punish such offences, and therefore though the law be sharp, yet such is her mildness, that if any have offended for so much as may concern her person, surely he thought it would not be executed; and her clemency tempered with authority could never grow to cruelty, wherein what his conscience was, he thought not fit to make further shew thereof; but simply and plainly he would deal herein, not meaning to treat in such sort, as if he thought to deserve thanks, or any thing of her maj.; for what he did, he did it also as mindful of his own safety.

Another spake (whose name is not expressed in the aforesaid anonymous Journal) shewing the weight of the matter, which was then in hand, to rest as well on the general safety of the subject, as on the preservation of her maj.'s person; and therefore he could not but approve the effect of the whole, both in Bill and addition; albeit for the pains in the Bill he was somewhat variant from that which was there offered, and in the understanding of some words he was doubtful; as for the word 'compassing,' he made some question; of this, 'bodily hurt,' he had no perfect intelligence, since the hurt of body may grow by grief of mind, and grief of mind perhaps by small cause. He also said, that saving in the statute of 27 H. 8. he hath not read it. But further, he said, that he that would not allow her for lawful queen, in his conceit, should also be called a Traitor; but for the speaking of those most slanderous words of Heretic, Infidel, Schismatic, he would not any man to be for the first offence taken as a Traitor; for that the not acknowledging of the Supremacy, being a far greater offence, is but the pain of Præmunire. And therefore, except the same offence also might be made Treason, he could not like thereof. But if it should so seem to them good, that it should be as he indeed wished, then was he well pleased to put them both to one predicament. And for the word 'Heretic,' he said, that the papists all, of force must be forced to say, her maj. is one; or that they themselves must be content to carry the name, and to be noted nomine, as they are re et veritate heretics, which name they willingly will not bear. He further said, that with the rest of those words of slander, he thought it might do well to insert the name Papist. That if any man should say her maj. to be an Infidel, Papist, or Heretic, &c. to be a Traitor; for that some say, there are in these days that do not spare to say, her maj. is of another religion than is published; and that it is the sole doing of the counsellors, whereby the doctrine (in sort as it is) is thus published, and not her's. He also added, that his wish was, that no man might be attainted of these words, except the speech or publication might be testified by two witnesses. For the Additions, he said, assuredly they might not be severed from the first bill, not only as they are matters materially depending on the first, but stretching so far to the maintenance of the first, that without them the first may seem to be nothing. For, said he, there can be no remedy provided, except the cause of the grief be known, and the same cause removed; wherein the Rebels of the north gave clear experiment: for doubtless, when they pretended Reformation of Religion, they thought to rend up the ground, and subvert the stay thereof, which was her maj.'s person; and by them he wished us to learn at last, and to wax wiser. He said, the court of chancery will straitly decree for saving and quiet keeping of a quiet possession, often looking to ordering things before past, and shall not the court of parl. do the like for the title of the crown? And the ancient laws of the realm, he said, do maintain the same, as long before the 35 Hen. 8, the stat. 5 Ed. 3, in such like cases hath ordained, that the heir of the father's offence shall be punished; consule locum citatum.

Mr. Mounson said, it were horrible to say, that the parl. hath no authority to determine of the crown; for then would ensue, not only the annihilating of the statute 35 H. 8, but that the statute made in the 1st of her maj.'s reign, of Recognition, should also be laid void; a matter containing a greater consequence than is convenient to be uttered.

Mr. Heneage said, that either the bill for Addition should be severed, or both to be referred to the queen's learned counsel, to consider of the conveniency thereof; and then by them to be exhibited, &c. but of his opinion he yielded no further reason.

Mr. Long, a young gent. would have proved the word, have, and a regard of the time past, not to be amiss, for that at the time of the offence the malice of the offender was as great as it is at this present.

Mr. Fleetwood endeavoured to prove the overcharging of the bill with larger words than were convenient, and more provisoes than were to the purpose, to have been the overthrow of that which was truly meant; wherein the cunning adversary, when he knoweth not how to subvert directly, will by this means easily and subtilly insert more, pretending a face of more forwardness than the rest, when indeed his heart is bent to the hindrance of the whole. For proof and experience hereof, he remembered the cunning prelates in Hen. IV. and afterwards in Edw. IV's, time, when Edw. required the Suppressing of all such Abbies, as Hen. 6, had erected. To hinder this, contrary to the king's meaning, some would needs add the colleges in Cambridge, which by him were also founded; to which, when by no means the house could be induced, as well the intent of the first, as of the last, was subverted.—The like he remembered also of the 2d year of Hen. 7, in matter of Treason, which all men would have yielded unto; the counterfeit friend heaped in, to give the king free liberty of restitution to whom he would, of all, both goods and possessions, whereof the inconveniency being seen, stay was made of the whole. So that, what men may not do directly, with face of further friendship they do covertly. He concluded therefore, it were well, and most safe, to make two bills, and to be referred to the queen's learned counsel, as Mr. Heneage had well divided.

Mr. serjeant Manwood, first answering the meaning of the words 'bodily hurt' said, it must be intended when violence and force is done or offered to the body, and not otherwise, or elsewhere. And whether the words of slander should be Treason, he thought that there was great reason they should be; for, quoth he, who so shall affirm her highness to be an heretic, doth doubtless wish her the pains of an heretic, viz. to be burnt, &c. He further would have to be added to these words of the bill, That whosoever shall affirm himself to have title, &c. to be a Traitor. He was of further opinion, that it should be no clogging to the bill, to have matter of the same nature added; being also provided for the same purpose, as good, consequent, and necessarily concurring with the effect of the bill. And for the authority of the parl. he said, it could not, in reasonable construction, be otherwise, for whoso should deny that authority, doth deny the queen to be queen, and the realm to be a realm.—After some further debate, the business was referred to a committee.

Bill for the Suppressing of Simony.] April 13, the bill for suppressing of Simony in Presentations to Benefices was read the first time, on which mr. Snagg observed, "That the cause of the slanders, which the papists have against the church of England, in that that they say coblers, taylors, tinkers, millers, &c. are of the ministry, groweth hereby, that the Livings are detained by the Patrons from the spiritual, in their own hands, to their own private uses; whereas the first original of the creation of Patronages being considered, it appeareth that nothing is left to the patron of right. The manner of their original he shewed at large, and that the same was granted 'Deo et Ecclesie;' and concluded that the patron had nothing of worth or value, but a bare nomination, if it be truly used; since that, dealing sincerely, he is neither to respect commodity, blood, affection, friendship, nor any thing else, but the worth and sufficiency of the man, &c."

A Bill relating to Vagabonds.] The same day the bill against Vagabonds was read a first time, and, though not usual in such cases, divers speeches ensued, of which this is an abstract:

Mr. St. John moved, that an old bill, before this time exhibited into the lower house, concerning this matter, might be perused.

Mr. Sandys endeavoured to prove this law for Beggars, to be over sharp and bloody, standing much on the care which is to be had for the poor; saying, that it might be possible with some travail had by the justices, to relieve every man at his own house, and to stay them from wandering. This experience he shewed, and what was done in the county of Worcester.

Mr. Treasurer talked to this effect, that he would have a bridewell in every town, and every tipler in the county to yield 12d yearly to the maintenance thereof.

Mr. Wilson, a Master of the Requests, argued thus, that Poor of necessity we must have, for so Christ hath said, until his second coming: and, as true it is, said he also, that Beggars, by God's word, might not be amongst his people: 'Ne sit mendicus inter vos.' His experience he shewed through the greatest part of Christendom, concluding, that such looseness and lewdness was no where as here: he said, it was no charity to give such a one as we know not, being a stranger unto us. Thus, said he, did the Locrenses constitute by their laws. Even as of thieves did the Grecians judge of them. To the pain of the constables for their remiss dealings, he wished might be conjoined imprisonment.

Debate on a Bill for reforming the Common Prayer.] April 14th, the bill for Reformation of the Book of Common Prayer was prepared by mr. Strickland, and read a first time, which occasioned another debate:

Mr. Treasurer, of her majesty's household, reasoned to this effect, that if the matters mentioned to be reformed were heretical, then verily they were presently to be condemned; but if they are but matters of ceremony, then it behoveth us to refer the same to her maj. who hath authority, as chief of the Church, to deal herein. And for us to meddle with matters of her prerogative, quoth he, it were not expedient. Withal, he said, what cause there might be to make her maj. not to run and join with those who seem to be most earnest, we are not to search; whether it be, for that in time and order she hopeth to bring them with her, or what other secret cause or scruple there might be in the heart of princes, it is not for all people to know.

Mr. Comptroller argued to this effect, as afore, commending the zeal, but that the place and time were not fit. And since we acknowledge her to be supream head, we are not in these petty matters to run before the ball, which to do, and therein to offend, were great folly; how forewarned we were herein, he did then refer to our consideration, insinuating in some sort, that our heady and hasty proceedings, contrary to and before the law, did rather hinder than help. Hereupon

Mr. Pistor, with a grave and seemly countenance, and good natural eloquence, shewed how conscience enforced him to speak; and rather to hazard his credit than to the offence of his conscience be silent. Albeit he would acknowledge willingly, that many hundreds of that hon. and worshipful assembly, were able to teach him, and he indeed willing to learn of them all. The matter of his grief was, that matters of importance standing us upon for our souls, stretching higher and further to every one of us than the monarchy of the whole world, were either not treated of, or so slenderly, that now after more than ten days continual consultation, nothing was thereon concluded. This cause he shewed to be God's, the rest are all but terrene, yea trifles in comparison; call you them never so great, or pretend you, that they import never so much; subsidies, crowns, kingdoms, he knew not, he said, what they were in comparison of this; this, he said, I know, whereof he most thanked God, 'primum querite regnum Dei, & cætera omnia adjicientur vobis.' This rule is the direction, and this desire shall bring us to the Light, whereupon we may stay, and then proceed unto the rest; for in his word, and by him we learn, as saith st. Paul, to correct, reform, &c. Our true home certainly is not here, 'Non habemus hic permanentem civitatem:' and the justice of God moved terror unto all, which he seemed to mean concerning the bill before-mentioned of Strickland's Propositions. And so did set it forth with vehemency, that there lacked no modesty; and with such eloquence, that it neither seemed studied, nor too much affected, but grave and learned throughout, and no whit too long, but very well approved of. After him followed

Mr. Snagg, and far after him indeed, either for order, proof, or matter, he entered into the discourse of Strickland's Articles, and seemed to maintain them; this namely, not to kneel at the receiving of the Communion, but rather, if a law hereof should be made, to lie prostrate, to shun the old superstition; or otherwise to set every man at liberty, and in this behalf to do according to his conscience and devotion, he judged it to be nothing derogatory or contrary to the prerogative; and the direction, he thought fit to be left out of the book, which should be a law, &c.—After which arguments, it was, upon the question, agreed, That a Petition should be made by this house unto the queen's maj. for her licence and privy to proceed in this bill, before it be any further dealt in.

Debate on a Bill against Licences, &c.] The same day the bill against Licences and Dispensations, granted by the abp. of Canterbury, was put to the question, Whether it should be read or no? It was over-ruled in the affirmative, and had thereupon its first reading. After which,

Mr. Alford spake against the bill; and endeavoured to prove, that Licences for marriages in some cases might be needful, and that Dispensations also for non-residence might, upon some occasion, be of great necessity; as if a minister should be employed upon some foreign ambassage, or other matter of great weight.

Mr. Yelverton spake very vehemently in maintenance of the bill, alledging, that, as he thought, no good Christian could be against it; in respect that by the very words of the bill it appears, that it was only framed for the suppression of such Licences and Dispensations, as were contrary to the word of God.

Mr. Dalton spake next against the bill; and grounded his opinion only upon this vain supposition, that a bp. can do nothing contrary to the word of God.

Mr. Manwood spake very judiciously and moderately, allowing well the scope and meaning of the law; but wished, that in respect it mentioneth the redress of many grievances, those same grievances might first be particularly made known to the house, before the bill were any farther proceeded in.

Mr. Fleetwood approved the bill, yet spake not directly for it; but very covertly guarded at the Ecclesiastical Judges, and the Office of Faculties; shewing also, that livings are given to ministers for the instructing the king and his people, and for the keeping of house, and other deeds of charity. All which, if they were absent by dispensation, he inferred must of necessity be neglected.

Serjeant Lovelace lastly, as it should seem, concluded further speech in this business, shewing the use and commodity of this bill; but doubted that there was not power enough given therein, nor sufficient remedy provided for redress of the mischiefs thereby supposed to grow, by reason of the granting the aforesaid Licence and Dispensations. Upon which, it should seem, that some members of the house were appointed to consider of the said bill, but their names are not found in the original Journal Book of the Commons, or in that before cited anonymous Journal, out of which both the preceding and ensuing speeches are transcribed.

Mr. Norton made a motion by warrant of this court, by the wisdom and godly care which in matters of weight was to be employed, That to avoid the shameful and most hateful usage amongst the ecclesiastical judges, for delivering of clerks convict upon their oaths, and the manifest perjury there, by their law against the law, committed, some order might be taken. He proved it might not be said a liberty of the church, except they will claim a liberty to sin; wherein indeed their principal liberty hath stood, and for the which they have not spared to hazard, nay to give, both their bodies and souls to become traitors to God and man.—Thus did that rebel, bp. Becket, whose principal quarrel and chief cause of all his stir, was, that the king would have punished one of his mark, a priest, for an abominable incest committed by him: which trifling fault (forsooth) this holy saint could not endure to be rebuked of by a temporal judge. 'Et hinc illæ iræ.' He shewed, it could not be termed a privilege, and encouragement to learning, since it was no other but a cloak for their naughtiness, and for such as might be of the pope's sect. As well appeared, in that it was allowed to none but to such as might enter their holy orders, and not to one that had two wives. He shewed at large the circumstance of their practised order upon the purgation of such clerks, declaring of truth, so disordered and hateful doings, that the whole house resolved to take care for redress.

The parliament was then, by the consent of the house, for that it was Easter-eve, adjourned until Thursday next; and it was agreed, that they should from thenceforth come to the house at 7 of the clock in the morning. During which said time of Easter, mr. Strickland, so often before mentioned, for the exhibiting the bill for Reformation of Ceremonies, and his Speech thereupon, was called before the Lords of the Privy Council; and required to attend upon them, and to make stay from coming to the house in the mean season.

Debate on the Bill for the Validity of Burgesses not resiant.] April 19th, the bill for the Validity of Burgesses not resiant, was read the 2nd time; upon which ensued divers arguments. The first man that spoke effectually to this bill, was

Mr. Warnecomb of Hereford; who standing up, said to this effect; that it behoveth all those which were Burgesses, to see to that bill, for, quoth he, this may touch and overreach their whole liberties, as not having whereunto to stay; but that lords letters shall from henceforth bear all the sway.

Mr. Norton first made explanation of the meaning of the bill, to be, he said, to shame the imperfection of choice, which is too often seen, by sending of unfit men; and lest happily any thing might be objected to the imperfection of the parl. which may seem to be scant sufficient by reason of the choice made by boroughs, for the most part of strangers. (Whereas by the positive law, no man ought to be chosen Burgess for any borough, but only resiants and inhabitants.) He said further, that the choice should be of such as were able, and fit for so great a place and employment, without respect of privilege of place or degree; for that, by reason of his being a Burgess, it might not be intended or thought he was any thing the wiser; withal, he argued, that the whole body of the realm, and the good service of the same, was rather to be respected, than the private regard of place, privilege, or degree of any person.—Then mr. Speaker moved the opinion of the house, whether they could like the bill should be ingrossed? and coming to the question, some said, no; but the greatest number seemed to say, yea.

Whereupon one standing up, whose name is not expressed, said thus. I run wholly with the pretence of the bill, that Boroughs decayed may be eased or relieved, knowing assuredly the same honourable for the realm, and in many respects profitable and commodious to those who do inhabit the countries adjacent to such decayed towns; that it is so, I will not stand to persuade. How far this law may help them I know not; if they be decayed, then it is most fit for them, that of their own company there may be some, who feeling the smart, can best make relation of their estate; and knowing the country, may devise and advise of such helps, as without the hurts of other places may restore the old ruins. All things are in change, and nothing so suppressed, but by God's grace the same may in time by policy be raised up.

But, to open my meaning shortly, the question is, What sort of men are to come to this court, and public consultation in parl.? whether from every quarter, country, and town, there should come (as I might say) home-dwellers, or otherwise men chosen by directions, it forceth not whom? I am surely of mind, that neither for the good service of her maj. safety of our country, or standing with the liberty, which of right we may challenge (being born subjects within the realm) this scope is to be given; or such looseness in choice to be permitted. That the whole land of this realm, we know, is to be for 3 purposes employed, and thereby 3 sorts of men are, as it were, created.—The one part given in Frank Almoigne, or for Divine Service to be used, to the glory of God and ministry of his word.—The 2nd part to be holden for Defence against our enemies, by the sword.—The 3rd for Maintenance of our Livelihood at home, and for necessary employments here. Of these 3 grounds, in the first division there groweth, to our knowledge, 3 sorts of men: the ministers and teachers of the gospel, of whom we must have care, and with whom, in making of laws, we must confer, if we will be Christians. The 2nd are the nobility, knights, and soldiers, the defenders and fortresses against our enemies. The 3rd sort be the providers, devisors, and executors of all things necessary, commodious, or seemly for a settled estate (which hath the happiness to live there where are 'pax et justitia') for increase of our wealths, sustenance of our laws, the governing of bodies, or what else soever is necessary for us: such are the counsellors, such are the judges and ministers of the laws, such be the tillers of the earth, such be merchants, such be victuallers, and in this degree be those who do use manual and mechanical arts. Of all these, in like sort, as of the others, regard, care, and respect must be had; they thoroughly consulted with, the general and particular states are by them to be known, if we mean to proceed for the public weal, or endeavour in the same a true perfection. These last sort making one kind are most ample, and thereto most effectual to be dealt with, as yielding to the rest 'supplementum, consilium et auxilium.' The 2nd sort is likewise most necessary to be thought of. The first are best, and first to be followed; but those are all to be in one knot conjoined, and as members of one body in one to be used. We may, in regard of religion, lie in the dike (as the proverb is) long enough without our own aid, if we do nothing but pray for the help of Hercules. We may not trust only to the sword, lest the common known saying of Cicero should turn to our shame: 'parva sunt foris arma, nisi consilium domi.' Neither our preaching nor our praying to God are only sufficient, but withal we must do our endeavours, and help each other; since for the driving away of a dog there is (as the countryman saith) some virtue in a stone, if it be conjoined with st. John's gospel; I mean, that every part of the body should do his own part to the aid of the other; and the hand to help the hand, the foot to help the foot, &c. This hath moved our forefathers, and on this ground hath it grown, that in this court where we are to consider of all, and (as occasion may serve) to alter, constitute, or reform all things, as cause shall be, that we do know all sorts of men, so far as may be to help all. How may her maj. or how may this court know the estate of her frontiers, or who shall make report of the ports, or how every quarter, shire, or country is in state? We who never have seen Berwick or st. Michael's Mount, can but blindly guess of them, albeit we look on the maps that came from thence, or see letters of instruction sent; some one, whom observation, experience, and due consideration of that country hath taught, can more perfectly open what shall in question thereof grow, and more effectually reason thereupon, than the skilfullest otherwise whatsoever. And that they should be the very inhabitants of the several countries of this kingdom, who should be here in times certain employed, doubtless it was the true meaning of ancient kings and our forefathers, who first began and established this court. But, leaving what I cannot reach unto, the first constitution and freedom of this court, the old precedent of parliament writs do teach us, that of every country their own burgesses should be elected; the writ to the sheriff and borough is directly so; and the writs to the cities being counties, are, 'quod ex vobis ipsis elegatis duos cives', &c. which do prove it to be so; the statute in the 1 Hen. V. for the confirmation of the old laws was therefore made, and not to create a new unknown law; and that other in the — Hen. VI. was made to redress the mischief, which by breach of that old law did grow. These do conclude it without contradiction, that for that time it was thought fit to continue the ancient use, liberty, and conveniency of service. We know that such as have spent their whole time in service, or have seen only the manner of govt. of other nations, and can tell you how the crown of France is delivered out of wardship; or otherwise tell a tale of the king of Castile and Portugal, how they in making of laws do use their own discretion; the king of Denmark useth the advice of his nobles only, and nothing of his commons; nor can paint you out the monstrous garments of the common people in some parts of Germany, on the mangled commonwealth of the allies, or shadows of the great cities, which now are to be seen in Italy; surely all those men, except they know also our own homes, are not to be trusted to conclude for our own home affairs. Doubtless the best learned for matters of commodity to be raised, or to be wrought in his own country, may happily give place to his own neighbours; even as wisely and learnedly a gent. said of late, in every commitment, according to the matter, there must be a declaration of men, as for merchandize, the merchant, and so forth: 'unicuique in sua arte perito credendum,' we hold for a maxim. And I mean this wholly to no other end, but since we deal universally, for all sorts and all places, that there be here of all sorts, and all countries, and not (seeing you list so to term it) thus to ease them of towns and boroughs, that they may choose at liberty whom they list; yet can I hardly call that a liberty which is contrary to that which the king and the queen commonly granteth as a free gift, and by these words, 'et de majori gratia nostra, &c. dedimus potestatem, &c. quod de seipsis eligant duos burgenses, or duos cives;' we take it more for a man to have of his own, than to have (by any man's discretion) of another.—It hath been of late oft and well said, that to nominate another to a benefice is nothing worth in value; but if it be, that a man may take the benefit himself that is both valuable and estimable; that cannot hurt, that is ever good for me, if it be ever tied in nearest sort unto me; and for this reason we say in law, that the estate Tail, which must continue in our own blood, is better than the estate in Fee simple, which may be got further from us, and is to be given to strangers at pleasure; mischiefs and inconveniences there may grow by this liberty; but a mischief it may be to me, and inconvenient also to utter the same: I will not speak thereof but dutifully, neither do I see any thing that is amiss at this present; what was done a hundred years since, I may safely tell; and thus it was: a duke of this realm wrote his letters to a city, which I know, to this effect; whereby he did signify, that a parl. was to be summoned in short time, and that for great causes he was to crave aid of all his friends; and reckoning them amongst the rest, he wished them of four under-nominated to choose two; the letter under the duke's seal is still preserved; but hear you the answer; he was written to with due humbleness, that they were prohibited by law, they might choose none of them.—I will venture a little nearer. In queen Mary's time, a council of this realm (not the queen's privy council) did write to a town, to choose a bishop's brother (and a great bishop's brother it was indeed) whom they assured to be a good Catholic man; and willed them to choose to the like of him some other fit man. The council was answered with law. And if all towns in England had done the like in their choice, the crown had not been so wronged, and the realm so robbed with such ease at that parl. and truth banished as it was; what hath been may be; there is no impossibility. It will be said I mistake, it is not meant but that towns shall be at liberty to choose whom they list. I say, that liberty is the loss of liberty; for when by law they may do what they will, they may not well deny what shall be required. It is too truly said, 'rogando cogit qui rogat potentior.' And I have known one, that to avoid a great man's displeasure, that dwelt near him, that was desirous, as he knew, to buy his land, did, upon small occasion, bind himself not to alienate his land from his true heirs: this being known, I mean that he was bound as aforesaid, the great man was contented to let him keep his own quietly, which otherwise he would not have done. Surely law is the only fortress of the inferior sort of people; and contrary to the law, the greater sort will not desire to expect any thing. Though now at this present, God be praised, we need not to fear the greatness of any man, justice is so well administered: yet hereafter, whatsoever hath been we may fear, either for maintenance of faction, or maintenance of mischief. Again, I say, it may be, what heretofore was, possibly again may be. We stand, and have stood of late upon the notorious manifestation of the authority of parl. except withal you keep the ancient usage of the same, and withal endeavour the freedom thereof, in effect you do nothing, if I guess aright.—It is further said, that in some towns there are not men of discretion fit; they be not the wiser (said the gent. that spoke before) for being Burgesses. I can never be persuaded, but that either the lord, whose the town is, be the town never so little; or the steward, if it be the queen's, or some good gent. of the county adjoinant, will either assign them who know the town, and can be content to be free among them, and to serve by their appointment, for their country, and for them; or else for some reasonable fee, such as be of their learned council, and who know them, and the country will deal for them. I mean it not so strictly, that those who should be chosen should of necessity be dwellers in the town; but to be either of the town, or towards the town, borderers and near neighbours at the least; and to this effect I would the bill were framed. I stand too long hereon, and abundance of matter occasioneth confusion; this is all. It was meant at the first, and first constitution of parl. that men of every quarter, and of all sorts, should come to this court, that they should be freely chosen. This in every age hitherto hath seemed best; to alter without cause is not convenient; to give every town liberty, may offer in time inconvenience. None so fit for every country as those who know the same. To choose of their own, it is a liberty; to lose their liberty, I think it a bad commodity, call it as you please; by such kind of release in easing men of their wealths, or some good part of their living, we beshrew our charity. And in like sort, and in like reason, it seems to me this law is inferred out of the preface of the same. For thus it is penned, "forasmuch as some towns are decayed, and have not of their own, therefore let every town do what they list." Of a particular proposition to make a general conclusion, it is against our rules; and nothing, as saith the philosopher, is more absurd than 'non causam pro causa.' Some towns cannot send fit men; it standeth very strongly, if you seek to help, let the plaister be fit for the sore: let not the salve be stretched too far, lest the whole and sound flesh, by the broad spreading of the salve, do either smart, fret, or fester. The medicine which healeth the sick man may be poison for the whole and sound man. All citizens and burgesses should not be thought alike, and yet all provided for, as there is due cause. Let there be therefore convenient consideration, how to heal, how to hurt. And I could wish, according to the weight of the matter, it might be rather staid on than thus abruptly overruled; and while we fly Scylla we fall not into Charybdis; while we say that boroughs cannot send to this high court so fit men as be convenient, that by altering the ancient usage, which is the only warrant and sole stay of freedom in parl. it may happily be said we have no parl. now within this realm, nor liberty at all for any such here to be holden.

Mr. Bell, in answer to this, did collect the substance of what been said, and in a long discourse shewed, that it was necessary all places should be provided for, and not Boroughs only, being but one of the members of the commonwealth; and that some of them have neither wealth to provide fit men, nor themselves any in any sort convenient. He thought not amiss, if, in respect of those manifest wants, convenient supply should be; but, without the warrant of parl. such alteration might not be. He then thought it not amiss to be advised. And for the objection of the danger which may ensue by reason of the letters of noblemen; he could not, he said, but think it convenient to prevent the same; and therefore wished, that there might be the penalty of 40l. upon every borough, that should make such election at the nomination of any nobleman.

Mr. Alford reasoned to this effect, That above all things, necessary care ought to be for the chusing and having of fit men to supply the place, that there be not imperfection. And therefore noted one great disorder, that many young men, not experienced, for learning sake, were often chosen, through whose default he knew not; whether letters of noblemen, love or affection in the country, their own ambition, or the careless accompt of the electors, or what else was the cause, he knew not; but it was to be seen: whereupon he would, none should be of that house, not of 30 years of age at the least. And for the choice of townsmen, he said, he was of his mind, that Moses and Aaron should be conjoined together; and that there should be one of their own, or some gent. near them, who had knowledge of the state of the country; and the other a man learned, and able to utter his mind and opinion, since that knowledge locked up in the breast, not being orderly opened, is to no purpose; and this part, he said, was as requisite for consultation as the other. So that he seemed to conclude the law should be in force for the one burgess, and at liberty for the other.—After which speeches the aforesaid bill touching the Validity of Burgesses, &c. was ordered to be committed to sir Tho. Hilton, knt.; mr. Bell, mr. Rob. Bowes, mr. Fleetwood, mr. Warnecomb, mr. Bedle, mr. Atkins, mr. Alford and mr. Gynes; and appointed to meet in the Temple-Church, upon Saturday next, at 2 in the afternoon.

Debate on a Bill against Usury.] April 19th, the bill against Usury was read the 2nd time, which occasioned another debate in the house. And, first,

Mr. Clarke spoke to this effect; That the referring of the punishment in the bill mentioned, being put to the ecclesiastical judges, for so much was nothing; for that they are to punish by the civil law, by the canon law, or by the temporal law. The civil law would not avail them, because by that law there is allowance of Usury. The canon law is abolished; and in that respect the temporal law saith nothing; so that the pretence may seem to be somewhat, but the effect thereby wrought is nothing; yet that it was ill, neither Christian nor Pagan ever denied. Aristotle being asked what Usury was? He said it was, 'præter naturam,' and therefore could not be defined. Plato, being asked the same question, answered it was, 'idem ac hominem occidere.' St. Augustine the same; and, in the very words of the Psalmist, answereth to the question, 'Domine quis habitabit in tabernaculo tuo?' He said, 'Qui curat proximo suo, non decipit eum, et qui pecuniam suam non dabit ad Usuram.'

Mr. Molloy shewed, what it might be thought on for any man to endeavour the defence of that which every preacher at all times, following the letter of the book, did speak against; yet, saith he, it is convenient, and being in some sort used, it is not repugnant to the word of God. Experience hath proved the great mischief which doth grow by reason of excessive taking, to the destruction of young gentlemen, and otherwise infinitely; but the mischief is of the excess, not otherwise. Since to take reasonably, or so that both parties might do good, was not hurtful; for to have any man lend his money without any commodity, hardly should you bring that to pass. And since every man is not an occupier who hath money, and some which have not money may yet have skill to use money, except you should take away or hinder good trades, bargaining and contracting cannot be; God did not so hate it, that he did utterly forbid it, but to the Jews amongst themselves only, for that he willed they should lend as brethren together: for unto all others they were at large: and therefore to this day they are the greatest Usurers in the world. But be it, as indeed it is, evil, and that men are men, no saints, to do all these things perfectly, uprightly and brotherly; yet, 'ex duobus malis minus malum eligendum;' and better may it be born to permit a little, than utterly to take away and prohibit traffick; which hardly may be maintained generally without this.—But it may be said, it is contrary to the direct word of God, and therefore an ill law; if it were to appoint men to take Usury, it were to be disliked; but the difference is great between that and permitting or allowing, or suffering a matter to be unpunished. It may be said, that 'nudum pactum non parit obligationem,' but there must be somewhat given in consideration. Let be that there is nothing given of the lenders, yet there is somewhat 'simile, & omne bonum exemplum, & omnis lex in se aliquid habet mali;' for that some body shall suffer thereby. We are not, quoth he, so straitned to the word of God, that every transgression should be surely punished here. Every vain word is here forbidden by God, yet the temporal law doth not so utterly condemn it. As for the words of the scripture, he said, the Hebrew soundeth thus in answer of this question; 'qui non dat pecuniam suam ad morsum;' so it is the biting and over-sharp dealing which is disliked and nothing else. And this, he said, was the opinion and interpretation of the most famous learned man Beza, and in these days, of Bellarmine and divers others, who say, that the true interpretation of the Hebrew word is not usura, but morsus.

Dr. Wilson, Master of the Requests, first endeavoured to prove, that the common state may be without Usury; then he shewed, how even men that have been ignorant of God or his laws, finding the evils thereof by their laws, redressed it; and utterly prohibited the use thereof. As the Athenians caused all the writings taken for interest money to be burnt; and the like did Lycurgus by a law which he made, and seeing the fire, he said, 'he never saw so fair a flame as those books yielded.' He then made a definition of Usury, shewing it was taking of any reward, or price or sum, over and above the due debt. To make any thing of that which is not mine, it is robbery. Forthwith upon the delivery of the loan money, it is not mine. And the law is, that mutuum must ever be free. And here he shewed the difference between location and mutuum; the one implying a contract, the other none. He remembered, out of Ezekiel and other the prophets, sundry places of scripture; and vouched st. Augustine's saying, that to take but a cup of wine is Usury and damnable. This he seemed to say in answer to that which had been before pronounced, that it was not Usury except it were morsus.—He shewed that loss may grow by Usury; first, to the queen, then to the common-wealth. To the queen in this, that men not using their own money, but finding great gain in Usury, do employ the same that way; so that her customs must decrease: to the common-wealth, for that, whoso shall give hire for money, is to raise the same in the sale of his commodity. All trades shall be taken away, all occupations lost; for most men seeking most ease, and greatest gain, without hazard or venture, will forthwith employ their money to such use. He shewed it to be so hateful in the judgment of the common law, that an Usurer was not admitted to be a witness; nor after his death to the common sepulchre of Christians. And for that his discourse had been long, he inserted (as he said) this tale for recreation of the hearers.—“In Italy, quoth he, a great known Usurer being dead, the curate denied him the common place of burial; his friends made suit, the priest would not hear; in fine, the suitors bethought them of a policy to bring it to pass, that he might be buried in the church; which was this:—the parson of the church did accustomedly use to carry his books daily from his house to the church on his ass; and the ass, by often going, needed not to be driven, but, knowing his journey, as soon as he was laden, would, of himself go to the church door: they desired the parson, his ass might carry the dead body; and where it should stay there it might be buried. To so fond a request the priest agreed; the body was laid on the ass, who, feeling a greater burthen than he was used to bear, did run towards the town, never staying until he came to the common place of execution.” This tale merrily told, he again entered to his matter, and proved the condemnation of Usury and Usurers, by the authority of the Nicene, and divers other councils: he shewed, that the divines do call Usury a spider, a canker, an aspis, a serpent and a devil. He shewed how, in nature, the offences of homicide and usury are to be compared; and by examples proved the ruins of divers commonwealths, when such practices for gain are suffered, as that of the commonwealth of Rome, &c. The manner of exchange now used in London, and how much abuse he shewed; a thing in old time not practised, but by the king, as in Edw. III’s time, when thereby the king obtained such treasure, and such excessive wealth, that it was first wondered at, then guessed that it grew by the science of alchymy. He here shewed the practice of the Low-countries of Germany, and namely the doings of fulchers to the very beggering of great and mighty princes; he avouched the authority of sir John Cheek in that place, concerning that matter; and the mind of the ancient English law-writers, who say that the offence of Usury in life the bishop is to punish; but after his death his executors shall not have his goods, but they appertain ‘ad fiscum.’ He concluded, that the offence, in his conscience, should be judged felony.

Mr. Bell said, this matter being so ample had occasioned much speech, and was for cunning men a fit theme to shew their wits and skills upon. Yet, saith he, it standeth doubtful what Usury is; we have no true definition of it. And, in our laws, we have little written thereon but this, ‘usura non currat super infantem.’ And not much more but to answer the objections, where it is pretended, that the not punishing of it by the temporal judge, may seem to be an approbation of it, or to leave it to the church may seem as if we had no care concerning it; for that to put over an offence to another judge, may not be so said, if to the church it may appertain, and they may well correct it. He further shewed, that the privilege of the church is by statute upon this point to be expressed, namely in the statute ‘de articulis cleri.’ He said, we must not curiously search Cicero’s paradoxes, and pronounce that ‘peccata sunt æqualia, hoc est, quod omne peccatum est peccatum;’ and no further: but be every man, according to his transgressions, to make a reasonable pain; though he who stealeth 2d. doth as well steal as he who steal-eth 100l. yet there are degrees; we have petit larceny, and that which is greater; both faults, both to be punished, both to be hated; but difference there is in punishing, even according to the greatness and smallness of the offence; for the one there is death, and for the other not so.—In the statute for punishing of Perjury, in the 5th of this queen, there are sundry degrees of perjury: not for that there is less perjury in the one than in the other; but that there is greater hurt occasioned in the one than in the other. In answer of the scripture, he said, the law of God is, ‘if thou be stricken on the one cheek, to turn the other; or if thy cloak be taken away, to give also thy gown.’ The literal sense is not to be taken, and, as there is cause, a reasonable construction must be. So he concluded, that though it were a sin, yet it was to be punished here on earth according to the good or bad, or rather according to the greater or lesser hurt which groweth thereby.

After which one, whose name is not expressed in the said anonymous Journal, endeavoured the answer of dr. Wilson, but with a protestation of his insufficiency; and then he shewed how the divines have not agreed what is Usury, but for his own part, he was to incline to the opinion of the learned of these days, whose interpretation of literal sense and skill of the tongues do appear; which took that for no Usury which is without grievance. He made a difference of the law of God concerning the divine majesty contained in the first table, and what is concerning man in the second table; saying, that nothing is to be said in that degree sin in itself, but by the circumstances; for so it is known whether it be good or bad. To kill is prohibited, yet sometimes not to kill is evil. Phineas killed, and was therefore commended. And thefts, at times, have been in scriptures approved. So likewise Usury is allowed of in the scriptures; but that it might be used to strangers only: albeit the chosen children of God amongst themselves might not use it. But let be, whether it be utterly unlawful, or in some sort to be tolerated, it is a question; and until it be determined for the common commodity and maintenance, let it be as hitherto it hath been used. And for the common sort of bargains of corn for cloth, silk for land, &c. what they be, whether Usury or no, we know not. That all should be well, it is to be wished; that all may be done well among men, it is beyond hope; for we are no saints, we are not of perfection to follow the letter of the gospel, 'Whoso striketh the one cheek,' &c. and this text, 'date nihil inde sperantes:' these are no express commandments. For the first, the law of nature doth direct, and for the other also the same law in effect maketh defence; surely there can be no sin where there can be no breach of charity. To do that therefore to another which we would to ourselves (the state, circumstance, and case to ourselves considered) is commendable, or not to be reproved; if we ourselves be to borrow, who is it that would not, in extremity, give a little to save much money? It is said, the Usurer doth or may grow rich: who hath disliked, in a commonwealth, that there should be 'homines boni frugi?' they may be considered, and may be good, more than for one purpose. He further stood on this, that God did not absolutely forbid Usury, which surely if it had been utterly ill, he would have done. And he added, that the common laws were cruel in their censures, and wished that they should be no more remembered than they are followed.

Serjeant Lovelace argued to this effect, that Usury was of money only, protesting that he hated all kind of Usury, but yet the greater the ill was, the more and more greatly did he hate the same. But to prohibit it with so sharp and extreme a law as to lose all, he thought it would be the ground of greater covetousness. Withal, he added, to prohibit the ill of covetousness in generality, were rash, void, and frivolous; since that the speech and the act itself is indefinite, comprehending all our actions and doings; and therefore, as utterly vain to prohibit it, in vain words of generality. To prohibit drunkenness, pride, envy, surfeiting, &c. were somewhat in some particular sort; to do it in generality, albeit that we know that it is every way damnable by the direct and written word of God, it were but folly. Of these great evils, (to the which man, of his nature, is born and made prone, and too apt) when we may not reach to the best, furthest and uttermost, we must do, as we may say, by degrees. As to say, there shall be no deceit, or slight in making of this or that kind of wares; that the husbandman shall till his arable land, and that he shall not keep above such a number of sheep; that there shall be no forestalling, regrating, &c. and this in particularity; whereas otherwise, generally amongst sinful men to prohibit this sin or that sin utterly on a pain, it may not be: but thus rather he that shall so sin shall suffer, or lose so much; whereupon he concluded, that there should be degrees in punishing of Usury; as he that should take so much, to lose, or be punished thus; he that shall take more, more deeply.

Mr. Fleetwood said, he had read the civil law, and of the common law somewhat; but how well he did understand it, he would not promise ought: what Usury was, he said, he was not to learn; call it, if we list, proxima homicidio, or how else by a description he forced not much; for if there were not civil law, it were not much to be accounted of for any certainty in this case thereby to be had; and the most ancient laws of this realm have taught us thereof somewhat; as the laws of do make to us mention of Usury. So do the laws made in Lucius's time, and those of Athelred; whereby it was ordained, that witches and usurers should be banished. King Edward, the saint, referreth and appointeth the offenders herein to suffer ordalium. Then was there a great kind of Usury known, which was called torus, and a lesser known by the name of Glanville, in the book de legibus antiquis, maketh mention of an inquiry of christian usurers. In the tower, he said, he had seen a commission awarded to the master of the courts (he named not what courts) to enquire of Usurers, and the punishment of them, he said, was whipping; he said further, by scripture, he knew it was damnable; and therefore, whether it was good or not good, it was no good question. For the matter of implication, whether by the pretence of the law it might be intended that it was in any sort allowed; he said, it might be construed and compared there with the statute of Tithes: where it is said, 'that till for 7 years after Heath-ground broken up, no tithe shall be paid;' the construction hereupon is clear. He shewed also, that Usury was malum in se, for that of some other transgressions, her maj. may dispense afore with; but for Usury, or to grant that Usury may be used, she possibly cannot.

Mr. Norton shewed, that all Usury is biting; as in the word 'steal' is contained all kind of injurious taking away of a man's goods: and as slanderizing is said to be murdering or homicide; so is Usury justly ever to be said biting, they being both so correlated or knit together, that the one may not be without the other. He concluded, that since it is doubtful what is good, we should be mindful of the old saying, 'Quod dubitas ne feceris,' and for that 'Quod non ex fide est peccatum est,' therefore he wished that no allowance should be of it.—After which debate, the bill was committed to Mr. Treasurer and others, but their names are not mentioned.

Debate relating to the Liberties of the House.] April 20th there were some arguments started concerning the Liberties of that House, and about some untruths which had been reported of it. On which Mr. Speaker declared, 'That the queen had as good liking of this parl. as ever she had of any parl. since her maj.'s reign.'—The same day a bill for Fugitives, or such as were fled beyond sea without Licence, was read a first time; on which

Mr. Wentworth stood up, and put the house in mind of a speech made by sir Humphrey Gilbert some days before; he proved his speech (without naming him) to be an injury to the house; he noted his disposition to flatter and fawn on the prince, comparing him to theameleon, which can change himself into all colours, saving white; even so, said he, this reporter can change himself into all fashions but honesty: he shewed further the great wrong done to one of the house, by a misreport made to the queen, meaning Mr. Bell; he shewed his speech to tend to no other end than to inculcate fear into those which should be free; he requested care for the credit of the house, and for the maintenance of free speech (the only means of ordinary proceedings) and to preserve the liberties of the house, to reprove liars, inveighing greatly out of the scriptures and otherwise, against liars. As this of David, 'Thou O Lord shalt destroy liars,' &c.

Mr. Treasurer signified his desire to have all things well; saying, he could not enter into judgment of any: but he said, it was convenient ill speeches should be avoided, and the good meaning of all men to be taken, without wresting or misreporting; and the meaning of all men to be shewed in good sort without unseemly words.

Mr. Speaker endeavoured an agreement and unity in the house, making signification that the queen's maj. had in plain words declared unto him, that she had good intelligence of the orderly proceedings among us; whereof she had as good liking as ever she had of any parl. since she came unto the crown; and wished we should give her no other cause than to continue the same, and added further her maj.'s pleasure to be, to take Order for Licenses; wherein she had been careful, and more careful would be.

Debate on a Member being detained.—Mr. Carleton, with a very good zeal, and orderly shew of obedience, made signification how that a member of the house was detained from them (meaning Mr. Strickland) by whose commandment, or for what cause he knew not. But for as much as he was not now a private man, but to supply the room, person and place of a multitude specially chosen, and therefore sent, he thought that neither in regard of the country, which was not to be wronged, nor for the liberty of the house, which was not to be infringed, we should permit him to be detained from us. But, whatsoever the intentment of this offence might be, that he should be sent for to the bar of that house, there to be heard, and there to answer.

Mr. Treasurer in some case gave advertisement to be wary in our proceedings, and neither to venture further than our assured warrant might stretch, nor to hazard our good opinion with her maj. on any doubtful cause. Withal he wished us not to think worse than there was cause. For the man, quoth he, that is meant, is neither detained nor misused, but on considerations is required to expect the queen's pleasure, upon certain special points: wherein, he said, he durst to assure that the man should neither have cause to dislike or complain, since so much favour was meant unto him as he reasonably could wish. He further said, that he was in no sort stayed for any word or speech by him in that place offered; but for the exhibiting of a bill into the house against the Prerogative of the Queen; which was not to be tolerated. Nevertheless the construction of him was rather to have erred in his zeal and bill offered, than maliciously to have meant any thing contrary to the dignity royal. And lastly, he concluded, that oft it had been seen, that speeches have been examined and considered of.

Sir Nicholas Arnold, with some vehemency, moved, that care might be had for the liberty of the house; he was enforced, he said, rather to utter, and so to run into danger of offence of others, than to be offended with himself.

Mr. Comptroller replied to the effect Mr. Treasurer had before spoken.

Mr. Cleere told, how the prerogative is not disputable, and that the safety of the queen is the safety of the subjects. He added, how that for matter of divinity, every man was for his instruction to repair to his Ordinary, being a private man; (where he utterly forgot the place he spake in, and the person who was meant; for that place required and permitted free speech with authority, and the person was not himself a private man but a public; by whom even the Ordinary himself was to be directed.) He concluded, that for as much as the cause was not known, he therefore would the house should stay.

Mr. Yelverton said he was to be sent for, arguing in this sort. First, he said, the precedent was perilous, and though in this happy time of lenity, among so good and hon. personages, under so gracious a prince, nothing of extremity or injury was to be feared; yet the times might be altered, and what now is permitted, hereafter might be construed as of duty, and enforced even on this ground of the present permission. He further said, that all matters not treason, or too much to the derogation of the imperial crown, were tolerable there; where all things came to be considered of, and where there was such fulness of power, as even the right of the crown was to be determined, and by warrant whereof we had so resolved. That to say the parl. had no power to determine of the crown, was high-treason. He remembered how that men are not there for themselves, but for their countries. He shewed, it was fit for princes to have their prerogatives; but yet the same to be straitened within reasonable limits. The prince, he shewed, could not of herself make laws, neither might she by the same reason break laws. He further said, that the speech uttered in that place, and the offer made of the bill, was not to be condemned as evil; for that if there were any thing in the book of Common-Prayer, either Jewish, Turkish or Popish, the same was to be reformed. He also said, that amongst the Papists it was bruted, that by the judgment of the council, Strickland was taken for an heretic; it behoved therefore to think thereof.

Mr. Fleetwood first shewed the order of civil arguments from the cause, to this effect, that time must be known and place observed. He said then, that of experience he could report of a man that was called to account of his speech in 5th of this queen; but he said, he could not meddle with so late matters, but what he had learned in the parliament rolls, he thought convenient should be known and considered of. In the time of Hen. IV. a bp. of the parl. was committed to prison by commandment of the king; the parl. resolved to be suitors for him. And in Hen. V. the Speaker himself was committed, and with him another of the house; the house thereupon stayed, but remedy they had none, other than to be suitors to the king for them; whereupon he resolved, that the only and whole help of the house for ease of their grief in this case; was to be humble suitors to her maj. and neither send for him, nor demand him of right.—During which speech the Council whispered together, and thereupon the Speaker moved, that the house should make stay of any further consultation thereupon.

Debate on the Bill for coming to Church and receiving the Communion.] April 21, a Proviso was offered to be made to the bill for coming to Church and receiving the Communion. Which being read a 2d time, divers arguments were used on it.

Mr. Aglionby argued, that there should be no human positive law to enforce conscience, which is not discernable in this world. To come to the Church, for that it is public, and tendeth but to prove a man a christian, is tolerable and convenient; and not to come to a Church may make a man seem irreligious, and so no man; for that by religion only a man is known and discerned from brute beasts; and this is to be judged by the outward shew. But the conscience of man is eternal, invisible, and not in the power of the greatest monarchy in the world, in any limits to be straitened, in any bounds to be contained, nor with any policy of man, if once decayed, to be again raised. He shewed, that neither Jew nor Turk do require more than the submission to the outward observance, and a convenient silence, as not to dislike what is publicly professed; but to enforce any to do the act, which may tend to the discovery of his conscience, it is never found. He shewed the difference betwixt coming to Church, and receiving the Communion; the one he allowed to be incomprehensible in law, the other he could not allow. And in answer of that which before had been said, that the conscience was not straitened, but a penalty of the loss of their goods only adjudged; whereof, no doubt, the law of God and the law of nations had given to the prince an absolute power; he said to this, out of 'Cicero de Legibus,' that man out of his own nature is to care for the safety of man, as being reasonable creatures, and not the one to seek to bereave the other of his necessary livelihood, adding out of the same book, this saying of Tully, 'qui Deum non curat hunc Deus ipse judicabit.' He shewed out of st. Paul, that we must not do ill that good may grow thereby: we must not take from him that is his, to the end thereby to make him to do what is not in his power; to be fit for so great a mystery God above of his free gift may make a man. To come unworthily the penalty is appointed, st. Paul hath pronounced it to be death and damnation, as guilty of the blood and death of Christ. Not to come our compulsory law shall now condemn, so that this our favour herein to be extended, is either to beg, or be exiled from our native country. He said, there was no example in the primitive church to prove a commandment for coming to the Communion, but an exhortation; he said, st. Ambrose did excommunicate Theodosius, and forbid him to come to the Communion, because he was an evil man. And for us to will and command men to come, because they are wicked men, it is too strange an enforcement, and without precedent.

Mr. Agmondesham made mention of a decree in the Star Chamber, made by 9 of the Privy Council, signed with their hands, and the hands of the chief justices, concerning the receiving of the Communion by gentlemen of the Temple. This decree, made by so grave and learned men, he thought for himself, and to his own conscience, was a stay what to judge, and a direction or precedent what to follow: the tenor of which decree, for so much as it did concern the reformation of the houses of courts, and principal places to be thought and considered of, he wished might be inserted into the law. The motion was well liked, and he required to bring the same the next day, which was done.

Mr. Norton shewed, that where many men be, there must be many minds, and in consultations convenient it is, to have contrary opinions, contrary reasons and contradictions; thereby the rather to wrest out the best: but this by the rule of reasoning, and reason must be 'sine jurgiis;' he then said, that not only the external and outward shew is to be sought, but the very secrets of the heart in God's cause, who is 'scrutator cordium,' must come to a reckoning. And the good seed so sifted from the cockle, that the one may be known from the other. A man baptized is not to be permitted among us for a Jew. And here somewhat slipping from the matter in speech, he moved, that all suspected for papistry might make this oath, 'that they did acknowledge the queen to be queen, for any thing the pope, in any respect, might do, noting some imperfection in the former oath.' To this end, quoth he, are the bulls now sent to discharge men of their allegiance, and to give free pardon of sins; so that he, who thus should be pardoned, should from henceforth in no sort communicate with the professors of the gospel; and now, quoth he, the very touchstone of trial, who be those rebellious calves, whom the Bull hath begotten, must be the receiving of the Communion; which whoso shall refuse, we may justly say, he savoureth, &c. And men are not otherwise to be known but by the external sign. To answer and satisfy the dilemma objected before in the first day, made concerning the disorders of certain ministers, in saying of the service contrary to the instruction of the book; he wished this proviso might be added, that mistaking of chapters, misreading, &c. should be recovered as no offence, so that there be no mass-song, or popish service used in Latin, &c.—And thus the bill rested to be further considered of.

The Queen checks the Members for debating on Points of Prerogative, &c.] This is the substance of all the Debates which the Journalist has given us in this session of parl. But, it is to be observed, that those Debates, especially on Church Affairs, were managed with caution, for the queen always shewed a dislike that the Commons should meddle in Ecclesiastical matters. Nor were they without some checks from court, on the Freedom of Speech in other things, where it bore too hard on the Prerogative. Mr. Strickland, we are told, in one of his speeches, earnestly pressing the Reformation of the Book of Common Prayer, was, the next day, called before the queen's council, and commanded by them to forbear going to the house till their pleasure was further known. This occasioned great clamour within doors; and divers speeches and motions were made, relating to Breach of Privilege, by restraint of one of their members from attending; although he was neither imprisoned nor confined. But, the Speaker got up, and desired the house to forbear any further debate on that matter; and, the next day, mr. Strickland came again to the house by the council's allowance, to the no small joy of his brethren. On another day also this session, the Speaker informed the house, that he had received a command from her maj. to caution the members to spend less time in motions, and to avoid long Speeches. The Journalist tells us, that this message was occasioned by one mr. Bell, speaking against Monopolies or granting of Licences, which, he thought, was contrary to certain statutes, and, as was said, seemed to speak against the Prerogative. Though, adds the Journalist, what he did say was so much to order, that those who were touched might be angry, but they could not blame him for it.

Proceedings in a Case of Bribery.] The next thing we think proper to mention, in the proceedings of the Commons, this Session, is a case of Bribery. It appears from the Journals of the 10th of May, that "one Thos. Long, gent. was returned for the borough of Westbury, in the county of Wilts, for this present parl. who being found out to be a very simple man, and not fit to serve in that place, was questioned how he came to be elected. The poor man immediately confessed to the house, that he gave to Anthony Garland, mayor of the said town of Westbury, and one Watts, of the same, 4l. for his place in parl. Upon which, an order was made that the said Garland and Watts should repay unto the said Thos. Long the 4l. they had of him. Also, that a fine of 20l. be assessed, for the queen's use, on the said corporation and inhabitants of Westbury, for their scandalous attempt. That the said Thomas Long should be discharged from all bonds, given to the said corporation, for executing his place in parl. And, lastly, that the mayor and Watts should be sent for by a pursuivant, to answer such things as should be objected against them by the house."—We, however, hear no more of this matter.

May 23th, upon speeches uttered in the house, 'that some of the members of it had taken Money for their Voices,' a Committee was appointed of all the Privy Council of that house, with others, to meet that afternoon, in the Star Chamber, to examine what persons, being members of that house, had taken any fees or rewards for their voices, in the furtherance or hinderance of any bills offered in the house. Who, the next day, reported, 'that they could not learn of any member that had sold his voice in the house, or any way dealt unlawfully, or indirectly, in that behalf.' Thereupon, mr. Norton declaring, that he heard some had him in suspicion that way, justified himself; and was, upon the question, cleared, and his honest and just dealing, and great pains-taking, declared and affirmed by the votes of the whole house.

The Lord Keeper's Speech at the Close of the Session.] May 29th, a bill for a general Pardon was read thrice, in the Lords, and concluded. And in the afternoon of the same day the Queen came to the House of Lords, and being seated on the throne, the Speaker of the Commons came up with the bills, and made a speech on the occasion; the particulars of which are not given, but the Journalist hath preserved the Lord Keeper, sir Nich. Bacon's Answer to it, which is as follows:—

"Mr. Speaker; The Queen's Majesty hath heard, and doth very well understand, how discreetly and wisely you have declared the Proceedings of this Session in the Nether House; for Answer whereof, and for the better signification of what her maj.'s opinion is, both of parliament men and parliament matters, this is to let you understand, her maj. hath commanded me to say unto you, that like as the greatest number of them of the Lower House, have in the proceedings of this session shewed themselves modest, discreet, and dutiful, as becomes good and loving subjects, and meet for the places that they be called unto: so there be certain of them, although not many in number, who in the proceeding of this session, have shewed themselves audacious, arrogant, and presumptuous, calling her maj.'s grants and prerogatives also in question, contrary to their duty and place that they be called unto, and contrary to the express admonition given, in her maj.'s name, in the beginning of this

parl.; which it might very well have become them to have had more regard unto. But her maj. saith, that seeing they will thus wilfully forget themselves, they are otherwise to be remembered; and like as her maj. allows and much commends the former sort, for the respects aforesaid; so doth her highness utterly disallow, and condemn the 2nd sort, for their audacious, arrogant, and presumptuous folly, thus by superfluous speech spending much time in meddling with matters neither pertaining to them, nor within the capacity of their understanding. And thus much concerning the parl. of the Lower House.—And as to the Lords here of the upper house, her maj. hath commanded me to let you know, that her highness taketh their diligence, discretion, and orderly proceedings, to be such, as redoundeth much to their honour and commendations, and much to her comfort and consolation. And here an end touching parliament men.—Now as to Parliament Matters, her maj. hath commanded me to open and declare unto you, her opinion conceived therein, touching two things; the one is concerning the Subsidy and Benevolence, the other is concerning the Execution of the Laws. As to the former, which concerneth the Subsidy and Benevolence, her pleasure is that I shall say unto you, that in your dealings in that matter she hath noted 3 things principally, every of them tending much to the setting forth of your Benevolences and good wills; the 1st is, who it was that granted; the 2nd is, the manner of the granting; the 3rd what it was that was granted. As to the 1st, her maj. forgetteth not, that it is a grant made proceeding from the earnest affections, and hearty good wills, of her good, dutiful, and obedient subjects, for the greatest part: and therefore hath commanded me to say unto you, that she maketh a greater accompt of the great good wills and benevolent minds of her good and loving subjects, than she doth of ten Subsidies; which, as it ought to bring and breed in us great comfort and delight, so in reason it ought to move us (as I doubt not but it doth) to be and continue such as be worthy such an estimation and account. Again, her maj. forgetteth not, that besides this is not a grant by good and loving subjects, that never made like grant heretofore, but by such as have contributed from time to time, as the necessary charges of the realm, and their own sureties have required; which doth much commend and set forth this Benevolence of yours. And thus much concerning the persons that have granted.—And as to the 2nd, which is the Manner of granting, her highness knoweth very well, that before her time these manner of grants have sundry times past, not without difficulties, with long persuasions, and sometimes not without sharp speeches, but this contrariwise without any such speeches or other difficulty, hath been freely and frankly offered and presented; and like as the former did much extenuate their Benevolence, so is this of yours greatly extended. It is written and very truly, concerning Benevolences, 'Qui diu distulit diu noluit,' and therefore justly concluded, 'Bis dat qui cito dat;' which sayings she cannot but apply to you, in the proceedings of your grant. Again, universality in consent doth greatly commend also your dealings in this matter; for a more universal consent than was in this, will hardly be had in any; and therefore much the more commendable. And thus much touching the manner of the gift.—And to the 3rd, which concerneth the Thing given, her maj. saith, that she thinketh it to be as great as any heretofore hath been granted, and therefore you are to receive condign thanks for it. And hath further willed me to say, that if the service of the realm and your sureties would so permit and suffer, her maj. would as gladly, as readily, and as frankly remit this grant, as you have freely and liberally granted it. Thus I have remembered unto you the three princely observations, that her maj. hath conceived of this Benevolence of yours, much to your comfort, and greatly to her maj.'s honour; to your commendation for granting, and to her highness for this honourable accepting; for her maj. shall by this grant receive no commodity or benefit, but rather a continual care in disposing and employing of it, about the necessary affairs and service of the realm, and your sureties; and yet it is a great comfort to her maj. to see you thus frankly and freely join with herself, the realm, and you.—Now to the 2nd and last part, which concerneth the Execution of the Laws, which I mean to divide into 2 parts; the 1st is the Execution of your Grant, the 2nd is the Execution of Laws, now made by you, and of the rest made before of others. As to the former, I am to remember you, that like as it hath pleased the queen's maj. thus princely, honourably, and thankfully, to think of and accept this free and liberal grant of yours; so certainly, if the like diligence and endeavour be not used, by such of you as choice shall be made of by her maj. for the due putting in execution of this grant, then surely those that shall be thus remiss, or negligent, as by that means her maj. and the realm shall be defrauded of any part of that which hath been thus freely granted, shall thereby minister just occasion to her highness to have their fidelity and truth towards her maj. much to be suspected and charged; which would touch them very near. Neither is it an offence that would be pretermitted, but severely punished. Why, if the case were between common persons, can there be a greater untruth and unthankfulness, than for a man to make a grant in appearance willingly and readily, and then to seek wilily and craftily to defraud the same grant? This amongst honest persons is utterly detested, and if so, how then might it be thought of between the prince and his subjects, where for divers respects this bond is thrice as great; for as the subject, by the duty of his allegiance, is to serve the prince truly, even so is he by his oath, and so is he by the great trust, that by the prince's choice is committed unto him, as a commissioner in this matter, above others. Plainly to speak, it may be affirmed, and that justly, that such as be in commission for the execution of this grant, and shall deal partially, either for favour or for fear, or for love to themselves or their friends, or negligently or remisly, of purpose whereby her maj. shall not be answered of what is due unto her; such, I say, may justly be charged as men forgetting their duty towards God, and their Sovereign, and to their country. It cannot be denied, that numbers respect only their private profit, and not the universal profit of the realm, which is their surety and defence; they respect themselves as private persons, and not as members of the universal body; but their imperfection would be supplied by the wisdom and persuasion of such, as the queen's maj. shall commit trust unto by her commission, to see this subsidy well and truly levied.—And thus much for the Execution of the Grant. Now to the Execution of Laws, made by you, and the rest made heretofore by others. I am to remember you, that all these labours, travels, and pains, taken about the laws now made, and before time taken about the rest heretofore made, and all the charge sustained by the realm about the making of them, is all in vain, and labour lost, without the due execution of them. For, as it hath been said, a law without execution is but a body without life, a cause without an effect, a countenance of a thing, and indeed nothing; pen, ink, and paper, are as much towards the governance of the commonwealth, as the rudder or helm of a ship serveth to the governance of it without a governor, and as rods serve for correction without hands. Were it not meer madness for a man to provide fair torches to guide his going by night, and when he should use them in the dark to carry them unlight? Or for one to provide fair and handsome tools to prune or reform his orchard or garden, and to lay them up without use? And what thing else is it to make wholesome and provident laws in fair books, and to lay them up safe, without seeing them executed? Surely in reason there is no difference between the examples, saving that the making of laws, without execution, is in much worse case, than those vain provisions before remembered; for those, albeit they do no good, yet they do no hurt; but the making of laws without execution, does very much harm; for that breeds and brings forth contempt of laws, and law-makers, and of all magistrates; which is the very foundation of all misgovernance, and therefore must needs be great and heinous in those that are the causers of this; indeed they are the very occasions of all injuries and injustice, and of all disorders and unquietness in the commonwealth. For certain and evident it is, that the queen's maj. that is head of the law, doth all meet for her maj. to do, for the due execution of them. First, she giveth her royal assent to the making of them; the most material of them she commandeth to be proclaimed and published; and yet ceaseth not there, but she granteth out her commission into every of her shires, to men which are or should be of greatest consideration within the limits of their charge, which for the better executing of them are sworn to see the execution of her laws to them committed, within the limits of their commissions; and yet besides all this, by her maj.'s commandment, a number of these justices are yearly once at the least called into her highness's Star Chamber, and there in her maj.'s name, exhorted, admonished, and commanded, to see the due execution of their charges.—And thus you see her maj. enacteth, proclaimeth, exorteth, admonisheth, and commandeth from time to time; yea, what can be devised meet for her maj. to do, for help of this, that is left undone? Surely nothing, to her maj.'s honour and renown. Whereupon it followeth, necessarily and consequently, that the whole burthen of the offence and enormity must light upon us, that are put in trust by her maj. to see those laws executed; and certainly this offence groweth great or little, as the trust committed for the execution of laws, is great or little; and therefore it standeth us greatly upon, to use our whole cares and endeavours, for the help of this hereafter. Were it possible, trow you, that if justices being dispersed through the whole realm, as they be, did carefully and diligently endeavour themselves, according to the trust committed unto them by their sovereign, duly and truly to execute their charge, as they be bound by their oath to God, and by their allegiance to their sovereign, and by duty to their natural country, and, rightly considered, by the love they should bear to themselves and their posterity; (for if their country do not well, they shall fare but ill-savourably) were it possible, I say, if this were so done, that laws should be thus remissly and negligently executed? No, doubtless. Is it not, trow you, a monstrous disguising, to have a justice a maintainer; to have him that should by his oath and duty set forth justice and right, against his oath offer injury and wrong; to have him that is specially chosen amongst a number by a prince to appease all brawlings and controversies, to be a sower and maintainer of strife and sedition, by swaying and leading of juries according to his will; acquitting some for gain, indicting others for malice, bearing with them as his servant or friend, overthrowing others as his enemy; procuring the questmonger to be of his livery, or otherwise in his danger; that his winks, frownings, and countenances may direct all inquests? Surely, surely, these be they that be subverters of all good laws and orders; yea, that make daily the laws, which of their nature be good, to become instruments of all injuries and mischiefs; these be they indeed of whom such examples would be made, as of the founders and maintainers of all enormities; and these be those whom, if you cannot reform for their greatness, you ought to complain of them; and like as this is not said of those that be good, so is this and much more to be said and done against those that be evil.—But here it may be said, the mischief appears; what is the remedy? To make all laws presently executed: I can hardly hope to make them in better case than now they be; and although I had such hopes, I could find no more helps but these. The 1st is, having great care in the choice of the officers: the 2nd, by sharp corrections imposed upon such offenders. There should be throughout the realm a triennial or biennial visitation in this nature, made of all temporal officers and ministers, that by virtue of their office have in charge to see execution of laws. By this I mean, that the queen's maj. should make choice, every 2nd or 3rd year, of certain expert and approved persons, to whom commission should be granted, to try out and examine, by all good means and ways, the offences of all such as have not seen to the due execution of the laws, and according to the offences so found and certified, to be sharply punished without omission or redemption.—Of effect like unto this, and to the like end, was the visitation of the church first devised, whereof came in the beginning great good doubtless; and reason I see none, but that a like good ought to follow upon a like visitation made amongst temporal officers. Now to find out the faults seemeth not hard, for amongst many other ways, there is one plain, evident, and easy; and that is where offences do abound in any country, contrary to the laws, which the justices should so reform, and there be nothing done by them for the reformation of those offences; I do not see but this makes a full charge of their uncarefulness and negligence, whereby they are well worthy, upon certificate made, as is aforesaid, to be removed of all governance, to their perpetual ignominy, and to the commendation of all those that remain as good officers. And besides, to set forth other pains upon them, as by law may be justified; if this were once or twice done, I doubt not but the examples following of the doing of it would cause greater diligence to be used in the execution of laws, than now there is. And the better to understand which be those justices that do offend, why might there not be order taken, that the name of every justice that hath not prosecuted any offender for any offence committed contrary to any law, which by the commission that he is in, he is authorised to see punished, might be entered into some rolls; and also how often, and how many of those kind of offences he hath also prosecuted for a declaration of his diligence, whereby it might appear when such visitation should come, who hath been careful, and who hath been negligent, to the end that the slothful drowsy drones might be severed from the diligent and careful bees. And like as I could wish this to be done concerning officers of mean degree, so do I desire that the same course might be taken with the great and greatest, for so it should be equable. But if there be nothing done therein, but things left as they have been, then must you look to have your laws executed as they have been, if not worse; for words will not reform these matters, as I have seen by proof. And this is the sum of what I have to say at this time, concerning the execution of laws.—This speech being ended, and the royal assent given to the bills, the Lord Keeper, by her maj.'s command, dissolved the parliament.

Matters began now to be very critical with the Queen of Scots, who had been a prisoner in England ever since she fled here for protection from her rebellious subjects, who had now actually deposed her, and set her young son James on the throne. Being weary of restraint, the unhappy queen had used many endeavours to escape, which were then called conspiracies against the English govt. In one of which she had drawn in the duke of Norfolk to assist her; and, by a formal contract of marriage between them, the duke fell into a snare which effectually ruined him. He was arraigned for this and some more crimes laid to his charge, was tried by his peers, and unanimously found guilty of high treason. But whilst this noble duke lay under sentence of death, another conspiracy was formed to release him; which being found out, and the actors in it executed, it was thought necessary to call a new parl. the next year after the dissolution of the last, to frame such laws as might establish the queen and the present govt. on the most lasting foundation.

A new Parl. called.] Accordingly a parl. was summoned by writs, dated at Greenwich, to meet at Westminster, May 8, 1572.—The queen had also summoned four new barons to this parl. the writs for calling them being entered in the Lords' Journals; and, on the first day of the meeting, they were introduced accordingly. Their names were, John lord Pawlet, of Basing, son to the marq. of Winchester; Henry lord Compton; Henry lord Cheney, and Henry lord Norris. There is nothing else entered in the Journals of either house, to be done on this day; but sir S. D'Ewes has supplied this defect from a MS. of his own, which gives us the Lord Keeper's speech at the opening of the parl. in these words:

The Lord Keeper's Speech at opening the Parl.] "The queen's maj. our most dread and gracious sovereign lady, hath given me commandment to declare unto you the causes of the summons of this assembly for a parl. to be holden here at this time; wherein albeit I mean to employ my whole endeavour to the uttermost of my power and understanding; yet I must needs confess, that neither shall you have it done as the maj. of this presence, neither as the gravity of the cause requireth it to be done. And yet the often experience that I have, divers and sundry times, had of the queen's maj.'s great benignity and gentleness, in bearing with and well accepting the doings of those that to her service put their good wills and diligences; and, besides all, the proof of your patience in the like matter hath so much encouraged me, that (as I trust) it shall be done, although not cunningly nor eloquently, yet plainly and truly, so as it may be well understood and easily borne away, and therewith also as briefly as the greatness of such a matter will suffer. True it is, the original and principal cause is, that things there propounded may be orderly and diligently debated, deeply considered, and thereupon wisely concluded. And to the end also, that those conclusions so made, the rather for such an universal consent as in parl. is used, remain firm and stable. Now the matters that are in this parl. to be proved, do consist altogether of 2 parts. The former is in matters of Religion, for the better maintenance of God's honour and glory. The 2nd in matters of Policy, for the more perfect upholding and establishing of the queen's maj.'s royal estate, and the preservation of the commonweal committed to her charge. The causes of Religion are again to be divided into two, that is, into matter concerning the good govt. of the subjects at home, and into causes of defence against the enemy abroad. And thus by this process you see you are, as indeed you ought: 1st. to consider in this your assembly, of God's cause, which faithfully, sincerely, and diligently done, like as it cannot but bring success to all the rest, so likewise lukewarm, deceitful, and double-dealing therein cannot but breed, nourish, and bring forth factions, divisions, seditions, &c. to the great peril and danger of all the rest. And the greater that the personages be in authority and dignity that thus deal, the greater of necessity must be the danger of the commonweal. And because God's law and doctrine, being the first law and branch, must light upon ourselves that ought to take the benefit of it, as first and chiefly upon ministers of this doctrine, either for not preaching and teaching by word and example of life so purely and reverently as they might, or else not so diligently as they were bound. And, 2ndly, upon us for not hearing it so desirously, or else hearing it and forgetting it, or not following it so effectually as we should.—3rdly, for that many of us of the laity do not yield and give that estimation, countenance, and credit to the ministers of his doctrine which of right they ought to have, and that many greatly hurt the setting forth of it: for this one thing may be holden firm by the rules of good government; that all officers, both spiritual and temporal, that have governance, during the time of their offices, ought to be preserved in credit and estimation. For how can any thing be well set forth by them that want credit? Marry, for my part, let the time of their offices last as their doings do deserve.—4th. Because the want of the number of ministers that ought to be and be not, and for the insufficiency of those that be for divers respects.

But therein the queen's highness doubteth nothing, but all that which the difficulty of time, in so great a scarcity of men meet to be ministers, will suffer to be done, shall by my lords the bps. be done in this behalf, and that as speedily, diligently and carefully as can be. And if any person admitted, or to be admitted to this ministry, shall hereafter, either of arrogancy or ignorance, shew any strange doctrine, contrary or varying from that which by common consent of the realm is published, to the breach of unity, that he by those to whom it appertaineth, sharply and speedily be reformed, all favour and fear set apart. Thus much for Doctrine. You are most earnestly also to think and consider of the Discipline of the Church, as one of the strong pillars of Religion, which doubtless at this time hath two great lacks. The 1st, the imperfection of laws for the countenance of it, which hath grown either by reason that sundry of the ordinances made for that purpose, be disused or otherwise have not their force; or else for that most of the laws that remain be such as for their softness few men make account of. The 2d imperfection is the slothfulness, corruption and fearfulness of the ecclesiastical ministers and officers in the due execution of those laws that be good and yet continue. True and too true it is, that hereby at this present two great enormities daily grow: the 1st that men of wealth and power, given to be evil, may in their countries live in what dissolute and licentious life they list; and both temporality and spirituality offend daily in all the branches of Simony, the very canker of the church, without feeling of this discipline. The 2d, that many of the laudable rites and ceremonies of the Church, or pertaining to the ministers of the same agreed upon by common consent, the very ornaments of our religion, are very ill kept or at least have lost a great part of their estimation. And here (through the many faults for want of discipline) to remember you of one particular matter of great moment. How cometh it to pass that the common people in the country universally come so seldom to common-prayer and divine service; and when they do come, be many times so vainly occupied there, or at least do not there as they should do, but for want of this discipline? And yet to the help of this there was at the last parl. a law made, but hitherto no man, no, no man, or very few, hath seen it executed; as plainly to speak, laws for the furtherance of this discipline unexecuted, be rods for correction without hands. It cannot be denied, but as superstition is every way to be abhorred for fear of idolatry; so certainly the loss of this discipline is always to be avoided, lest else contempt (that necessarily must follow) may cause irreligion to creep faster in than a man would think. For of all other it is the most pestilent and pernicious thing, never suffered nor allowed in any common-weal, nay not amongst the heathens that were most barons. But here it may be said the mischief appeareth, where is the remedy? and that it were better not opened in such a presence, than opened without the remedy both devised and declared. In mine opinion the remedies may easily be devised: all the difficulty is in the well executing of them. As 1st, if the chief parsonages of this realm, both in town and country, would give good example, it cannot be but it would be much to the remedying of a great part of this mischief. 2dly, The dividing every one of the dioceses according to their greatness into deaneries, as I know commonly they be; and the committing of the deaneries to men well chosen, as I think commonly they be not: and then the keeping of certain ordinary courts at their prescript times for the well executing of those laws of discipline, as they ought to be, with a sure controulment of those inferior ministers by the bp. or his chanc. not biennially or triennially, but every year twice or thrice: which use of necessity without very great difficulty may do much in very short time to the reformation of this; the chief officers ecclesiastical all being very well, and the laws themselves being first made sufficient and perfect, which in this parl. may very well be brought to pass. And, because the proceedings of matters in Discipline and Doctrine, do chiefly concern my lords the bps. both for their understanding and ecclesiastical function; therefore the queen's highness looketh that they, being called together here in parl. should take the chiefest care to consider and consult of these matters. And if in their conference they found it behoofull to have any temporal acts made, for the amending and reforming of any of these lacks, that then they will exhibit it here in parl. to be considered upon, and so Gladius gladium juvabit, as before-time hath been used; foreseeing always that all laws and ordinances for this matter of Doctrine and Discipline be uniform, and so one sort throughout the whole realm. And thus much concerning Religion, being the first part.—Now to the 2d, that is, matters of Policy. And herein first for the govt. of the subjects at home; the lacks and defaults whereof, as in Discipline so in this, stand altogether in the imperfection of laws, or else the fearfulness, slothfulness, and corruption of temporal officers, that ought to see the due execution of them. For the help of the former, you are to examine whether any laws already made, are too sharp or too sore and so overburthensome for the subject, or whether any of them are too loose or too soft, and so over-dangerous to the state; for like as the former may put in danger many an innocent particularly, so the 2d may put in danger both the nocent and innocent, and the whole state universally. You are also further to examine the want and superfluity of laws, and whether craft, covetousness, and malice, have devised any means to defraud laws already made, or how to do any injuries for which there is no law that hath his being to reform it: Or whether the

commonweal and state of this realm, by reason of any imperfection or cause, is like to fall to any danger or peril; for the greater the danger is, the greater should the care and consideration be for the remedy of it. You are also to examine whether there are too many laws for any one thing, which breedeth so many doubts, that the subject is sometimes to seek how to observe them, and the chancellor how to give advice concerning them.—As to the 2nd imperfection, which is the want of the due Execution of Laws; because I have thought oft with myself what might be the best remedy, if not to make all laws perfectly executed (for that I can hardly hope for) yet to make them in much better case than now they be. And when I had considered all things, I could find no help but this: the first, by having great care in the choice of those officers that have the Execution of Laws. The 2nd, to do as much as may be for the banishing of sloth, corruption, and fears, from them. A 3rd way there is, which I leave to your judgments, this it is: there should be a triennial or biennial visitation, in this nature, made of all the temporal officers and ministers that by virtue of their office have in charge to see the Execution of Laws. By this I mean that the queen's maj. should make choice every 2nd or 3rd year of certain expert and approved persons, to whom commission should be granted to try out and examine, by all ways and means, the offences of all such as have not seen to the due execution of the laws according to the offices and charges committed to them by the prince. And the offences so found and certified to be sharply punished without remission or redemption. Of effect much like this, and to the like end, was the visitation of the church first devised; whereof, in the beginning of it, came great good doubtless; and reason I see none but the like good ought to follow upon like visitation made among temporal officers. And the old commission of Oyer tended somewhat to this end. I doubt certainly if the laws and statutes of this realm should not indifferently, uprightly, and diligently, be put in execution (as my trust is they shall) especially in the great and open courts of this realm, then my burthen, I confess, is equal with the greatest; and yet, for my part, I would gladly every year bear of, and yield to such a Comptroller.—Now to the last and greatest, which is the defence against the Foreign Enemy abroad, and his Confederates, brought up and bred amongst us ourselves; because these matters be by reason now chiefly in hand, and that the dealings of the outward enemy be matters that go to the whole, and that this presence you know representeth the whole: therefore in all congruity it seemeth reason, that all we, for, and in the name of the whole, consider carefully of this cause, and give present assistance for the help of it. And to the end you may be more able to give good counsel and advice therein, it hath been thought meet I should summarily and shortly make you privy of these proceedings, which shall be the better understood if I begin at the root, as I intend:—This it is: the queen's maj. at her coming to the crown, finding this her realm in a ragged and torn state, and yet in wars with a mighty enemy, the chief fortress of the same lost, to the realm's great dishonour and weakening; her Frontier towns not sufficiently fortified, the revenue of the crown greatly spoiled, the treasure of the realm not only wasted, but the realm also greatly indebted; the land of Ireland much out of order: the Staple and store of all kind of munition for the realm's defence marvellously consumed: the Navy and Sea-Matters nothing in the state they now be, was forced to give ear to a peace with some other conditions than else it is like her highness would come to, to the end that these dangerous defaults might be in the time of peace sufficiently for the security of the realm provided for. Whereupon indeed her highness (peace being concluded) entered into the reforming and supplying of most of all those great lacks, and for the well-doing of them hath not forbore to take any care or pains, neither hath she stucked for the compassing of this both to spend her own treasure, to sell her own lands, to prove her own credit at home and abroad to the uttermost, and all this for our sureties and quiet.—Thus have you heard the sum of those proceedings; whereby it is plain and evident, that as our most dear and gracious sovereign lady, hath, for the preservation of common quiet, and for our own surety against the common enemy, forbore no care or travel in the devising; no more hath she charge or expence in the performing. I may safely affirm it, because I am well able to prove it, that the charges of the managing of these affairs, and that that hath been done since the queen's maj. came to the crown, in supplying the dangers aforementioned, amount to as much as two of the greatest Subsidies that I can remember; the matter not possibly to be borne for that which is past, nor to be continued for that which is to come by the ordinary Revenue of the Crown, and yet of necessity to be done, except all (which God forbid) should run to ruin: if when any part of the natural body happeneth to be in danger, the head and every part hasteth to the relief; what would then be done, trow ye, when peril is offered, that the head should take the whole care, and bear the whole burthen, and all the members remain uncared and uncharged therewith? How light a burthen it is when it is borne of many, is understood of us all. But hereof I make no stay, because there is no doubt your good-wills and towardness upon these considerations be such, as this last speech of mine needeth not, and so doubtless the queen's highness taketh it. And yet your wisdoms well know, that the office of this place which I occupy, craveth thus much to be said at my hands; and for that purpose chiefly could I trust you take it, and not for any necessity to draw them by persuasion that otherwise of their own disposition be forward enough. The declarations of the proceedings being uttered, I do assure myself to suffice to men of your understanding and inclination. For how can a man think that any is so void of reason, that he would not gladly offer any aid against a Foreign enemy, that he were able to make for the safety of his own country, his sovereign, himself, his wife and children; especially when by reason it is plain, that the queen's maj. hath already, and daily doth employ her own treasure, yea, and her lands and credit, not in any glorious triumphs, superfluous and sumptuous buildings of delight, vain and chargeable embassages, neither in any other matters of will and pleasure; I mean, no expence to be noted in a prince of 13 years reign, but as far as man can judge in the service of her realm and necessary defence of her people, and for the annoyance of the enemy. Yet hath it been seen e'er this, that prince's wills, pleasures and delights have been followed in expences as necessities. And now, God be thanked, the doings have been such since the queen's highness's reign, that to the indifferent man it will be probable and plain, that the relieving of the realm's necessity is become the prince's delight; a good change, God continue it, a marvellous good example for us to follow, and yet it is scant credible how long it was, and in the end with what difficulty the queen's maj. came to agree that this example should be followed by us, in being content that this parl. should be summoned, that it might be moved, that the realm might contribute to the realm's defence; with such difficulty indeed, that if any other way could have been devised (her honour and realm's surety saved) this had never been attempted: so loth she is to any offensive matter by burthen or charge, that if any other way could have been devised, this had not been: and so, from her own mouth, she commanded me to say unto you.—Oh what a grief it is to a prince (trow you) when he findeth such want, that he is not able so to consider of the service of his servants and subjects; this dangerous and necessary service, as their deserts do crave! knowing that most commonly the very life and heart of the servant and soldier, which so often offereth himself to the cannon, the pike, the fire, is either overthrown or set up as a regard is had of his perils. Except there be some odd men (as they call them) of that perfection, that virtue and well-doing is their mark, and not reward, who hold for firm, that 'recti facti merces est fecisse tantum,' but 'rara avis in terris, &c.' Yea, those are so rare as counsel cannot be given that princes service should hang on the help of such hope, and yet these be the perfectest and best, but the world is not served by such. To give good words is a good thing, but often used, albeit never so cunningly, without deeds of service, is reputed but as wind, and is indeed 'dare verba.' Marry, power serving not, then it deserveth great commendations; for it is as much as can be done: for 'ultra posse non est esse.' But hereof thinketh little the greatest number. But to a prince who thinketh thus much, and daily thinketh and feeleth of it, what a tormenting trouble is such a want think ye? These wants when they happen, would be, ought to be most holden. But here I have troubled you further than I meant, or perchance needed.—And thus no farther to hinder you, but to make an end. You have heard, 1st, the causes of this assembly. 2ndly, what I think meet to be remembered. 3rdly, what for the governance of the subject at home, and what hath been done for the defence of the enemy abroad; your office and duty is to be careful to consider of these matters, which I have the rather summarily remembered than effectually discoursed upon. The former pertaineth to my office as a remembrancer. The 2nd to you as executors of these remembrances. And because you of the Nether House cannot, without a head, thus do; therefore it resteth, that you, according to your antient order, of yourselves chuse some wise and discreet man, who, after he hath been by you chosen and presented, and that presentation by the queen's maj. allowed, shall then be your Speaker, &c."

May 10th. The Commons presented Robert Bell, esq. for their Speaker, who, with the usual ceremonies, was allowed. But no further notice is taken of the speeches commonly made on that occasion.

Proceedings relative to the Queen of Scots.]

We hear no more of this Conference in the Journals of the Lords, nor what was done in it, relating particularly to the Queen of Scots, till May the 28th, when a new Committee of Lords was appointed, about the same matter, which were only the abp. of Canterbury, the earls of Sussex and Leicester, the bp. of Lincoln, and the lords Burleigh and Grey. The result of which was, that on the 4th of June a bill passed the Lords, with this addition to the title, 'A bill touching Mary, daughter and heir of James V. late king of Scotland, commonly called the Queen of Scots.' This bill was sent down to the Commons, who kept it until the 26th of the same month, and then returned it, concluded. But though the bill went so currently through the two Houses, the queen would not suffer it to pass into a law; there being no mention of such an act, in the catalogue at the end of this session, nor in the printed statutes. For which reason, we are much in the dark what were the contents of this extraordinary bill. Mr. Cambden only writes, that, "it was proposed, that if the Queen of Scots should again offend against the laws of England, she should be proceeded against, by law, as if she were the wife of an English peer. But the queen, interposing her authority, prevented the enacting thereof."—However, though this act did not pass, yet there were two other very severe laws made against all who had designs in favour of the Queen of Scots. On the 19th of May a bill was read the first time in the Lords, for Punishment of all such as shall rebelliously take or detain, from the Queen's maj. any Castle, Tower, Fortress, Ships, or other munition of war. This passed into a law; and, by it, some of the articles were made felony, and others high treason. On the 21st, a bill was brought in, and read against all such as shall conspire or practise the Enlargement of any Prisoners. This act declared, "That if any person should go about to deliver any man, imprisoned upon the queen's writ for Treason, or suspicion of Treason, before his arraignment, the said person should forfeit his life estate, and be imprisoned during the queen's pleasure. If arraigned, he should incur the penalty of death; if condemned, the penalty of high treason."

The Duke of Norfolk beheaded.] Mr. Cambden observes, that the severity of these laws was only necessary for the times; and the parl. thought fit to make them temporary, that is, for the queen's life. He adds, that so many designs were set on foot to deliver the duke of Norfolk, out of the Tower, as hastened his execution, which had been put off for near

4 months; and it was not till after passing the last act, that the addresses of the Commons, the remonstrances of the Privy Council, and the importunity of preachers, by suggesting the greatness of the danger she was in, could overcome the queen's clemency. In fine, the duke was beheaded on a scaffold, on Tower-hill, June the 2nd. He died with great courage and magnanimity, amidst a vast crowd of sorrowful and weeping spectators; for it is incredible, says our author, "how dearly he was beloved by the populace, whose good-will he had gained by a munificence and affability suitable to so great a prince."

A Case of Privilege.] A case of Privilege was brought before the Lords, by the lord Cromwell, who had been attached, by a writ, out of Chancery, at the suit of one Taverner. The Lords adjudged the attachment void and contrary to the antient Privileges of the Peerage; but so, that at any time hereafter, by the queen's prerogative, or by the common law and custom of the realms, or any statute law, or sufficient precedent, the persons of any of the Lords of parl. in such cases as this of lord Cromwell's, ought to be attached, or attachable, if so shewed and warranted as above; this order, or any thing, therein contained, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Having done with the Proceedings of the Lords, we shall go back to those of the Commons. After the Committee for the Conference was appointed, we find no particulars entered, relating to it, till some weeks afterwards, which will appear in the sequel. In the mean time, on the 16th of May, a motion was made, 'Whether it was convenient that the Commons should join with the Lords in a petition to her maj. for the execution of the duke of Norfolk. Or, that they should only signify to her maj. their resolution and opinion that necessary execution was to be done?' upon putting the question, it was agreed by all, that their general resolution was properest to be signified to her; and not by way of petition or direction from this house.

May 19, the Attorney of the Court of Wards, in the name of the whole Committee, on the great affair of the Queen of Scots, reported to the house their Conference with the Lords. Which done, after many speeches, it was upon the question, resolved, for the better safety and preservation of her maj.'s person and govt. to proceed against the Scottish Queen in the highest degree of Treason; and therein to touch her, as well in life as in title and dignity; and this with all possible speed, and with the whole voice of the house.

A Message to the Commons, not to meddle with Religious Matters.] May 22, a bill for Rites and Ceremonies in the Church, having been read in the house 3 times; on this day the Speaker declared to the house, that it was the Queen's pleasure, that from henceforth no bills concerning Religion should be preferred, or received into this house; unless the same should be first considered and approved by the Clergy. And further, that her maj. desired to see the two last, read in the house, touching Rites and Ceremonies. On which, it was ordered, that the said bills should be delivered to her, by such members as were of the Privy Council. The next day the Treasurer of the Household reported to the house the delivery of the two bills of Rites and Ceremonies to her maj.; together with the humble request of this house, most humbly to beseech her highness not to conceive ill opinion of this house, if so it were that her maj. should not like well of the said bills, or of the parties that preferred them: and declared further, that her maj. seemed utterly to dislike the first bill, and him that brought the same into the house; and that her highness express will and pleasure was, that no preacher or minister should be impeached or indicted, or otherwise molested or troubled, as the preamble of the said bill did purport: adding these comfortable words farther, That her maj. as defender of the faith, will aid and maintain all good Protestants to the discouraging of all Papists.

Proceedings relative to the Queen of Scots.] The business of the Queen of Scots and the duke of Norfolk, having been long canvassed by the Committees of both houses; they, at length agreed upon a joint Petition to the queen. And, on the 28th of May, her maj. was attended by the said Committees, who presented her a Petition with Reasons to prove, that it not only consisted with justice, but also with the queen's honour and safety, to proceed criminally against the pretended Scottish Queen. On the same day, the Journalist tells us, "That mr. Treasurer reported to the house, that he and certain others of the committee, chosen by themselves, did presently come from her maj.; and that her maj. doth very thankfully accept the good-will and zeal of this house, in their carefulness for her maj.'s safety and preservation; and that as her maj. thinketh the course chosen by this house, and wherein the Lords have joined with this house, to be the best and surest way for her maj.'s preservation and safety indeed; yet her highness for certain respects by herself conceived, thinketh good for this time to defer, but not to reject that course of proceeding as yet; and in the mean time, with all convenient speed, to go forward in the great matter against the Scottish Queen with a 2d bill, being the other part of the said choice heretofore offered to this house. And that her maj. minding in that bill, by any implication or drawing of words, not to have the Scottish Queen either enabled or disabled to or from any manner of title to the crown of this realm, or any other title to the same whatsoever touched at all, willeth that the bill be first drawn by her learned counsel, and by them penned before the same be treated of or dealt in, in this house. And that in the mean time of bringing in of the said bill, this house enter not into any speeches or arguments of that matter. And that her maj. hath likewise signified the same her like pleasure unto the Lords, by some of the Committees of the same house." The Commons came to a Resolution on the question, "Whether a Petition was to be drawn up and presented to her maj. for the speedy execution of the duke? That the said Petition should be digested and put in writing against the next morning, and delivered to the Speaker to be presented by him to the Queen. But two days after, May 31, a question was put for respiting the said petition, and, it was carried in the affirmative. "Because, perhaps, her maj. will order it to be done sooner of her own accord than being pressed to it by the house. And therefore it was wholly laid aside." But, however, the bills and remonstrances against the Queen of Scots, took no effect till several years after. The duke of Norfolk, however, fell a sacrifice to the jealousies of the times, being beheaded, as before observed, whilst this parl. was sitting.

The Ceremonies at the conclusion of this Session are omitted in both the Journals; and, we are only told, in that of the Lords, that, on the 30th of June, the queen came to the house, when the lord keeper, by her command, prorogued this parl. to the 2d of Nov. following. From the time of the last prorogation, we meet with nothing like a parl. till the 18th year of this reign. The Journals of the Lords do not expressly give us the times of the several prorogations in this long interval; but only inform us, that on the 8th of Feb. 1575, after various and sundry prorogations, the same parl. met to transact business.

A Bill against Luxury in Apparel.] Being assembled, the Queen came not to the house, because this was no new parl.; and the first thing we find that was done by the Lords, was to read a bill for the reformation of Apparel. Mr. Cambden takes notice, that the year before this, the queen had put out a proclamation to stop the great Excess this modish Luxury had then arrived to. Observing, that, to maintain this shining vanity, a great quantity of money was yearly carried out of the land, to buy silks and other foreign fineries, to the impoverishment of the commonwealth, and the almost ruin of several noble families, who strove to vie with one another in this kind of extravagance. The reader will have observed, that several sumptuary laws were made in different reigns to restrain this vice; and now the Queen's Proclamation being little regarded, an act of parl. was designed to enforce the observance. But this way had as little success as the former, for though the bill passed the Lords, and was sent down to the Commons, they never returned it.

A Subsidy.] There is nothing remarkable else entered in the Lords Journals, till the 27th of this month; when a bill for a Subsidy of two 15ths and 10ths were sent up by the Commons: it passed the Lords on the 1st of March. The printed statutes make this grant three 15ths and 10ths, besides the Subsidy. There was also an act for confirming a grant of 6s. in the pound, from the Clergy, to be paid in 3 years.

Mr. Wentworth's Speech in behalf of the Liberties of the House.] But though the Journals of the Lords furnish us with so little to the purpose, those of the Commons were never more copious for so short a session as in this. In which are many things very remarkable, relating to the Liberties and Privileges of that house. The Journalist gives us a Speech made on the very 1st day of this session, by Peter Wentworth, Esq. member for the borough of Tregony in Cornwall. As the speech and the consequences of it are as memorable as any thing we have yet met with in the course of these enquiries, we shall make no apology for the length of it.

"Mr. Speaker;—I find writtten in a little volume these words in effect:—'Sweet is the name of Liberty, but the thing itself a value beyond all inestimable treasure.' So much the more it behoveth us to take care lest we, contenting ourselves with the sweetness of the name, lose and forego the thing, being of the greatest value that can come unto this noble realm. The inestimable treasure is the use of it in this house. And therefore I do think it needful to put you in remembrance, that this hon. assembly are assembled and come together here in this place, for three special causes of most weighty and great importance. —The 1st and principal is to make and abrogate such Laws, as may be most for the preservation of our noble sovereign. The 2nd . . . —The 3rd is to make or abrogate such laws as may be to the chiefest surety, safe-keeping, and enrichment of this noble realm of England. So that I do think that the part of a faithful-hearted subject is, to do his endeavour to remove all stumbling-blocks out of the way that may impair, or any manner of way hinder, these good and godly causes of this our coming together. I was never of parl. but the last, and the last session, at both which times I saw the Liberty of free Speech, the which is the only salve to heal all the sores of this commonwealth, so much and so many ways infringed, and so many abuses offered to this hon. council, as hath much grieved me even of very conscience and love to my prince and state. Wherefore to avoid the like, I do think it expedient to open the commodities that grow to the prince and whole state, by free speech used in this place; at the least so much as my simple wit can gather of it, the which is very little in respect of that, that wise heads can say therein, and so it is of the more force:—1st, All matters that concern God's honour, through free Speech shall be propagated here and set forward, and all things that do hinder it removed, repulsed and taken away.—Next, There is nothing commodious, profitable, or any way beneficial for the prince or state, but faithful and loving subjects will offer it in this place:—3rdly, All things discommodious, perilous, or hurtful to the prince or state shall be prevented, even so much as seemeth good to our merciful God to put into our minds, the which no doubt shall be sufficient, if we do earnestly call upon him and fear him: for Solomon saith, 'The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. Wisdom breatheth life into her children, receiveth them that seek her, and will go beside them in the way of righteousness: so that our minds shall be directed to all good, needful, and necessary things, if we call upon God with faithful hearts:—4thly, If the envious do offer any thing hurtful or perilous to the prince or state in this place, what incommodity doth grow thereby? Verily I think none, nay, will you have me to say my simple opinion therein, much good cometh thereof; how forsooth? why by the darkness of the night the brightness of the sun sheweth more excellent and clear, and how can truth appear and conquer until falshood, and all subtilties that should shadow and darken it, be found out? for it is offered in this place as a piece of fine needlework to them that are most skilful therein, for there cannot be a false stitch (God aiding us) but will be found out:—5thly, This good cometh thereof, a wicked purpose may the easier be prevented when it is known:—6thly, An evil man can do the less harm when it is known.—7thly, Sometime it happeneth that a good man will in this place (for argument sake) prefer an evil cause, both for that he would have a doubtful truth to be opened and manifested, and also the evil prevented; so that to this point I conclude, that in this house, which is termed a place of free speech, there is nothing so necessary for the preservation of the prince and state as free speech; and without this it is a scorn and mockery to call it a Parliament House, for in truth it is none, but a very school of flattery and dissimulation; and so a fit place to serve the devil and his angels in, and not to glorify God and benefit the commonwealth.—Now to the Impediments thereof, which, by God's grace and my little experience, I will utter plainly and faithfully, I will use the words of Elcha, 'Behold, I am as the new wine which hath no vent, and bursteth the new vessels in sunder, therefore I will speak that I may have a vent. I will open my lips, and make answer, I will regard no manner of person, no man will I spare, for if I should go about to please men, I know not how soon my Maker will take me away: my text is vehement; the which by God's sufferance I mean to observe, hoping therewith to offend none; for that of very justice, none ought to be offended for seeking to do good and saying of the truth.—Amongst other, mr. Speaker, 2 things do great hurt in this place, of the which I do mean to speak: the one is a rumour which runneth about the house, and this it is, 'Take heed what you do, the Queen liketh not such a matter, whosoever prefereth it, she will be offended with him, or the contrary, her maj. liketh of such a matter, whosoever speaketh against it, she will be much offended with him.' The other: Sometimes a Message is brought into the house, either of Commanding or Inhibiting, very injurious to the Freedom of Speech and consultation. I would to God, mr. Speaker, that these two were buried in hell, I mean Rumours and Messages; for wicked undoubtedly they are, the reason is, the devil was the first author of them, from whom proceedeth nothing but wickedness: now I will set down reasons to prove them wicked.—1st, If we be in hand with any thing for the advancement of God's glory, were it not wicked to say the queen liketh not of it, or commandeth that we shall not deal in it? Greatly were these Speeches to her maj.'s dishonour, and an hard opinion were it, mr. Speaker, that these things should enter into her maj.'s thought; much more wicked and unnatural were it that her maj. should like or command any thing against God, or hurtful to herself and the state. The Lord grant that this thing may be far from her maj.'s heart. Here this may be objected, that if the queen's maj. should have intelligence of any thing perilous or beneficial to her maj.'s person or the state, would you not have her maj. give knowledge thereof in this house, whereby her peril may be prevented, and her benefit provided for? God forbid! then were her maj. in worse case than any of her subjects. And in the beginning of our speech, I shewed it to be a special cause of our assembling, but my intent is, That nothing should be done to God's dishonour, to her maj.'s peril, or the peril of the state. And therefore I will shew the Inconveniences that grow of these two. 1st, If we follow not the prince's mind, Solomon saith, 'The King's Displeasure is a Messenger of Death': this is a terrible thing to weak nature, for who is able to abide the fierce countenance of his prince, but if we will discharge our consciences, and be true to God, and Prince and State, we must have due consideration of the place and the occasion of our coming together; and especially have regard unto the matter wherein we both shall serve God, and our prince and state faithfully, and not dissembling as eye-pleasers, and so justly avoid all displeasures both to God and our prince; for Solomon saith, 'In the way of the righteous there is life,' as for any other way, it is the path to death. So that to avoid everlasting death and condemnation, with the high and mighty God, we ought to proceed in every cause according to the matter, and not according to the prince's mind: and now I will shew you a reason to prove it perilous always to follow the prince's mind. Many times it falleth out, that a prince may favour a cause perilous to himself and the whole state; what are we then if we follow the prince's mind? Are we not unfaithful unto God, our prince and state? Yes truly, we are chosen of the whole realm, of a special trust and confidence by them reposed in us, to foresee all such inconveniences. Then I will set down my opinion herein, that is to say, He that dissembleth to her maj.'s peril, is to be counted as a hateful enemy; for that he giveth unto her maj. a detestable Judas his kiss; and he that contrarieth her mind to her preservation, yea though her maj. would be much offended with him, is to be adjudged an approver lover, for 'faithful are the wounds of a lover,' saith Solomon, 'but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful:' and it is better, saith Antisthenes, to fall amongst ravens than amongst flatterers, for ravens do but devour the dead corps, but flatterers the living. And it is both traitorous and hellish, through flattery, to seek to devour our natural prince, and that do flatterers; therefore let them leave it with shame enough.

—Now, to another great matter that riseth of this grievous rumour, What is it forsooth? Whatsoever thou art that pronounceth it, thou dost pronounce thy own discredit; Why so? for that thou dost what lieth in thee to pronounce the prince to be perjured, the which we neither may nor will believe; for we ought not without too manifest proof to credit any dishonour to our anointed; no, we ought not without it to think any evil of her maj. but rather to hold him a liar what credit soever he be of; for the queen's maj. is the head of the law, and must of necessity maintain the law; for by the law her maj. is made justly our queen, and by it she is most chiefly maintained: hereunto agreeth the most excellent words of Bracton (de Legibus Angliæ, lib. 1. cap. 7.) who saith, 'The king hath no peer nor equal in his kingdom.' He hath no equal, for otherwise he might lose his authority of commanding, since that an equal hath no power of commandment over his equal. The king ought not to be under man, but under God, and under the law, because the law maketh him a king. Let the king therefore attribute that to the law, which the law attributeth unto him, that is, dominion and power; for he is not a king in whom will and not the law doth rule, and therefore he ought to be under the law. I pray you mark the reason why my authority saith, The king ought to be under the law, for, saith he, 'He is God's vicegerent upon earth'; that is, his lieutenant to execute and do his will, the which is law or justice, and thereunto was her maj. sworn at her coronation, as I have heard learned men in this place sundry times affirm; unto the which I doubt not but her majesty will, for her honour and conscience sake, have special regard; for free Speech and conscience in this place are granted by a special law, as that without the which the prince and state cannot be preserved or maintained. So that I would wish every man that feareth God, regardeth the prince's honour, or esteemeth his own credit, to fear at all times hereafter to pronounce any such horrible speeches, so much to the prince's dishonour; for in so doing he sheweth himself an open enemy to her maj. and so worthy to be contemned of all faithful hearts. Yet there is another Inconvenience that riseth of this wicked Rumour: the utterers thereof seem to put into our heads, that the queen's maj. hath conceived an evil opinion, diffidence, and mistrust in us her faithful and loving subjects; for if she had not, her maj. would then wish that all the things dangerous to herself should be laid open before us; assuring herself, that loving subjects, as we are, would, without schooling and direction, with careful minds to our powers, prevent and withstand all perils that might happen unto her maj. And this opinion I doubt not but her maj. hath conceived of us; for undoubtedly there was never prince that had faithfuller hearts than her maj. hath here; and surely there were never subjects had more cause heartily to love their prince for her quiet govt. than we have. So that he that raiseth this Rumour still increaseth but discredit, in seeking to sow sedition as much as lieth in him, between our merciful queen and us her most loving and faithful subjects, the which by God's grace shall never lie in his power, let him spit out all his venom, and there withal shew out his malicious heart; yet I have collected sundry reasons to prove this a hateful and a detestable Rumour, and the utterer thereof to be a very Judas to our noble queen; therefore, let any hereafter take heed how he publish it; for as a very Judas unto her maj. and an enemy to the whole state, we ought to accept him. Now the other was a Message, mr. Speaker, brought the last session into the house (see p. 781) that we should not deal in any Matters of Religion, but first to receive from the bishops: surely this was a doleful Message; for it was as much as to say, 'Sirs, ye shall not deal in God's causes, no, ye shall in no wise seek to advance his glory;' and in recompence of your unkindness, God in his wrath will look upon your doings, that the chief cause that ye were called together for, the which is the preservation of their prince, shall have no good success: if some one of this house had presently made this interpretation of this said message, had he not seemed to have the spirit of prophecy? Yet truly I assure you, mr. Speaker, there were divers of this house that said, with grievous hearts, immediately upon the Message, that God of his justice could not prosper the session; and let it be holden for a principle, mr. Speaker, that council that cometh not together in God's name, cannot prosper; for God saith, 'Where two or three are gathered together, in my name, there am I in the midst among them?' Well, God, even the great and mighty God, whom name is the Lord of Hosts, great in Council, and infinite in Thought, and who is the only good Director of all Hearts, was the last session shut out of doors. But what fell out of it forsooth? His great indignation was therefore poured upon this house, for he did put into the queen's maj.'s heart to refuse good and wholesome laws for her own preservation; the which caused many faithful hearts for grief to burst out with sorrowful tears, and moved all Papists, traitors to God and her maj. who envy good Christian govt. in their sleeves to laugh all the whole

Parliament-House to scorn: and shall I pass over this weighty matter so slightly? Nay, I will discharge my conscience and duties to God, my prince and country. So certain it is, mr. Speaker, that none is without fault, no, not our noble queen, sith then her maj. hath committed great fault, yea dangerous faults to herself.—Love, even perfect love, void of dissimulation, will not suffer me to hide them to her maj.'s peril, but to utter them to her maj.'s safety: and these they are, it is a dangerous thing in a prince unkindly to abuse his or her nobility and people, and it is a dangerous thing in a prince to oppose or bend herself against her nobility and people, yea against most loving and faithful nobility and people. And how could any prince more unkindly intreat, abuse, oppose herself against her nobility and people, than her maj. did the last parl.? Did she not call it of purpose to prevent traiterous Perils to her Person, and for no other cause? Did not her maj. send unto us two bills, willing us to make choice of that we liked best for her safety, and thereof to make a law, promising her maj.'s royal consent thereunto? And did we not first choose the one, and her maj. refused it; yielding no reason, nay, yielding great reasons why she ought to have yielded to it? Yet did we nevertheless receive the other, and agreeing to make a law thereof, did not her maj. in the end refuse all our travels? And did not we, her maj.'s faithful nobility and subjects, plainly and openly decypher ourselves unto her maj. and our hateful enemies; and hath not her maj. left us all open to their revenge? Is this a just recompence in our Christian queen for our faithful dealings? The heathen do requite good for good: then how much more is it to be expected in a Christian prince? And will not this her maj.'s handling think you, mr. Speaker, make cold dealing in any of her maj.'s subjects toward her again? I fear it will. And hath it not caused many already, think you, mr. Speaker, to seek a salve for the head that they have broken? I fear it hath, and many more will do the like if it be not prevented in time. And hath it not marvelously rejoiced and encouraged the hollow hearts of her maj.'s hateful enemies and traiterous subjects? No doubt but it hath: and I beseech God that her maj. may do all things that may grieve the hearts of her enemies, and may joy the hearts that unfeignedly love her maj.: and I beseech the same God to endue her maj. with his wisdom, whereby she may discern faithful advice from traiterous sugared speeches, and to send her maj. a melting yielding heart unto sound counsel, that will may not stand for a reason: and then her maj. will stand when her enemies are fallen; for no estate can stand where the prince will not be governed by advice. And I doubt not but that some of her maj.'s council have dealt plainly and faithfully with her maj. herein; if any have, let it be a sure token to her maj. to know them for approved subjects; and whatsoever they be that did persuade her maj. so unkindly to intreat, abuse, and to oppose herself against her nobility and people, or commend her maj. for so doing, let it be a sure token to her maj. to know them for sure traitors and underminers of her maj.'s life, and remove them out of her maj.'s presence and favour; for the more cunning they are, the more dangerous are they unto her maj. But was this all? No, for God would not vouchsafe that his Holy Spirit should all that session descend upon our bishops; so that in that session nothing was done to the advancement of His glory. I have heard of old Parliament-Men, that the banishment of the Pope and Popery, and the Restoring of true Religion, had their beginning from this house, and not from the bishops; and I have heard that few laws for Religion had their foundation from them; and I do surely think, before God I speak it, that the bishops were the cause of that doleful message; and I will shew you what moveth me so to think: I was, amongst others, the last parl. sent unto the bp. of Canterbury, for the Articles of Religion that then passed this house. He asked us, Why we did put out of the Book the Articles for the Homilies, Consecrating of Bishops, and such like? Surely, sir, said I, because we were so occupied in other matters, that we had no time to examine them how they agreed with the Word of God. What, said he, surely you mistook the matter, you will refer yourselves wholly to to us therein? No, by the faith I bear to God, said I, we will pass nothing before we understand what it is; for that were but to make you Popes; make you Popes who list, said I, for we will make you none. And sure, mr. Speaker, the speech seemed to me to be a Pope-like speech, and I fear lest our bps. do attribute this of the Pope's canons unto themselves, 'papa non potest errare;' for surely if they did not, they would reform things amiss, and not to spurn against God's people for writing therein as they do; but I can tell them news, they do but kick against the pricks; for undoubtedly they both have and do err, and God will reveal his truth, maugre the hearts of them and all his enemies; for great is the truth, and it will prevail: and to say the truth, it is an error to think that God's spirit is tied only to them; for the heavenly spirit saith, 'first seek the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, and all these things (meaning temporal) shall be given you.' These words were not spoken to the bps. only, but to all; and the writ, mr. Speaker, that we are called up by, is chiefly to deal in God's cause; so that our commission, both from God and our prince, is to deal in God's causes: therefore, the accepting of such Messages, and taking them in good part, do highly offend God, and is the acceptance of the breach of the Liberties of this hon. council; for is it not all one thing to say, sirs, you shall deal in such matters only, as to say, you shall not deal in such matters? and so as good, to have fools and flatterers in the house, as men of wisdom, grave judgment, faithful hearts, and sincere consciences; for they being taught what they shall do, can give their consents as well as the others: well, 'He that hath an office,' saith st. Paul, 'let him wait on his office,' or give diligent attendance upon his office. It is a great and special part of our duty and office, Mr. Speaker, to maintain the Freedom of Consultation and Speech; for by this, good laws that do set forth God's glory, and for the preservation of the prince and state are made. St. Paul in the same place saith, 'Hate that which is evil, cleave unto that which is good:' then with st. Paul, I do advise you all here present, yea, and heartily and earnestly desire you from the bottom of your hearts, to hate all messengers, tale-carriers, or any other thing whatsoever it be that any manner of way infringes the Liberties of this hon. council; yea, hate it or them as venomous and poison unto our common-wealth, for they are venomous beasts that do use it; therefore I say again and again, 'Hate that which is evil, and cleave unto that which is good;' and this, being loving and faithful hearted, I do wish to be conceived in fear of God, and of love to our prince and state; for we are incorporated into this place, to serve God and all England, and not to be time-servers, as humour-feeders, as cancers that would pierce the bone, or as flatterers that would fain beguile all the world, and so worthy to be condemned both of God and man; but let us shew ourselves a people endued with faith, I mean with a lively faith, that bringeth forth good works, and not as dead. And these good works I wish to break forth in this sort, not only in hating the enemies before-spoken against, but also in open reproving them as enemies to God, our prince and state that do use them, for they are so. Therefore I would have none spared or forbore that shall from henceforth offend herein, of what calling soever he be, for the higher place he hath, the more harm he may do; therefore if he will not eschew offences, the higher I wish him hanged. I speak this in charity, mr. Speaker, for it is better that one should be hanged, than that this noble state should be subverted; well, I pray God with all my heart, to turn the hearts of all the enemies of our prince and state, and to forgive them that wherein they have offended, yea, and to give them grace to offend therein no more; even so I do heartily beseech God to forgive us for holding our peace when we have heard any injury offered to this hon. council; for surely it is no small offence, mr. Speaker, for we offend therein against God, our prince and state, and abuse the confidence by them reposed in us. Wherefore God for his great mercies sake, grant that we may from henceforth shew ourselves neither bastards nor dastards therein, but that as rightly-begotten children, we may sharply and boldly reprove God's enemies, our princes and state; and so shall every one of us discharge our duties in this our high office, wherein he hath placed us, and shew ourselves haters of evil, and cleavers to that that is good, to the setting forth of God's glory and honour, and to the preservation of our noble queen and commonwealth; for these are the marks that we ought only in this place to shoot at. I am thus earnest, I take God to witness, for conscience sake, love unto my prince and commonwealth, and for the advancement of justice; for 'justice,' saith an antient Father, 'is the prince of all virtues, yea, the safe and faithful guard of man's life, for by it empires, kingdoms, people, and cities be governed, the which if it be taken away, the society of man cannot long endure.' And a king, saith Solomon, 'that sitteth in the throne of judgment, and looketh well about him, chaseth away all evil:' in the which state and throne, God for his great mercies sake, grant that our noble queen may be heartily vigilant and watchful; for surely there was a great fault committed both in the last parl. and since also that was, as faithful hearts as any were unto the prince and state, received most displeasure, the which is but an hard point in policy, to encourage the enemy, to discourage the faithful-hearted, who of fervent love cannot dissemble, but follow the rule of st. Paul, who saith, 'Let love be without dissimulation.'—Now to another great fault I found the last parl. committed by some of this house also, the which I would desire of them all might be left; I have seen right good men in other causes, although I did dislike them in that doing, sit in an evil matter against which they had most earnestly spoken: I mused at it, and asked what it meant, for I do think it a shameful thing to serve God, their prince or country, with the tongue only, and not with the heart and body. I was answered that it was a common policy in this house, to mark the best sort of the same, and either to sit or arise with them; that same common policy, I would gladly have banished this house, and have grafted in the stead thereof, either to rise or sit as the matter giveth cause: 'for the eyes of the Lord behold all the earth, to strengthen all the hearts of them that are whole with him.' These be God's own words, mark them well, I heartily beseech you all; for God will not receive half-part, he will have the whole. And again, he misliketh these two-faced gentlemen, and here be many eyes that will to their great shame behold their double dealing that use it.—Thus I have holden you long with my rude speech; the which since it tendeth wholly with pure conscience to seek the advancement of God's glory, our hon. sovereign's safety, and to the sure defence of this noble isle of England, and all by maintaining of the Liberties of this hon. council, the fountain from whence all these do spring; my humble and hearty suit unto you all is, to accept my good-will, and that this that I have here spoken out of conscience and great zeal unto my prince and state, may not be buried in the pit of oblivion, and so no good come thereof."

Mr. Wentworth sequestered from the House, for his Speech.] Upon this speech, says the Journalist, the House out of a reverent regard of her maj.'s honour, stopped his further proceeding before he had fully finished. The Message Mr. Wentworth meant and intended, was that which was sent by her maj. to the Commons, in the 14th year of her reign, upon the 28th day of May, by sir Francis Knolles, kt. inhibiting them, for a certain time, to treat or deal in the matter touching the Scottish queen, (see p. 782.).—Mr. Wentworth being sequestered the house for his said speech, it was agreed and ordered by the House upon the question (after sundry motions and disputations had therein) that he should be presently committed to the Serjeant's ward as prisoner; and so remaining, should be examined upon his said speech, for the extenuating of his fault therein, by a Committee consisting of all the Privy-Council being of this house, and other members.

Mr. Wentworth's Examination before the Committee.] Next follows Mr. Wentworth's own account of his Examination, before the Committee, as follows:—

Committee. "Where is your late speech you promised to deliver in writing? Wentworth. Here it is, and I deliver it upon 2 conditions: the 1st is, that you shall peruse it all, and if you can find any want of good-will to my prince and state in any part thereof, let me answer all as if I had uttered all. The 2nd is, that you shall deliver it unto the queen's maj.; if her maj. or you of her privy-council, can find any want of love to her maj. or the state therein also; let me answer it.—Com. We will deal with no more than you uttered in the house. Went. Your honours cannot refuse to deliver it to her maj. for I do send it to her maj. as my heart and mind, knowing it will do her maj. good; it will hurt no man but myself.—Com. Seeing your desire is to have us deliver it to her maj. we will deliver it. Went. I humbly require your honours so to do.—Then the speech being read, they said, Com. Here you have uttered certain rumours of the queen's maj.: where and of whom heard you them? Went. If your honours ask me as counsellors to her maj. you shall pardon me; I will make you no answer: I will do no such injury to the place from whence I came; for I am now no private person, I am a public, and a councillor to the whole state, in that place, where it is lawful for me to speak my mind freely; and not for you, as counsellors, to call me to account for any thing that I do speak in the house; and therefore if you ask me as counsellors to her maj. you shall pardon me, I will make no answer; but if you ask me as committees from the house, I will make you the best answer I can.—Com. We ask you as committees from the house. Went. I will then answer you; and the willinger for that mine answer will be in some part so imperfect as of necessity it must be. Your question consisteth of these two points; Where and of whom I heard these rumours? The place where I heard them was the Parliament House; but of whom, I assure you, I cannot tell.—Com. This is no answer to say, you cannot tell of whom; neither will we take it for any. Went. Truly your honours must needs take it for an answer, when I can make you no better. Com. Belike you have heard some speeches, in the town, of her maj.'s misliking of religion and succession; you are loth to utter of whom, and did use speeches thereupon. Went. I assure your honours I can shew you that speech, at my own house, written with my hand two or three years ago. So that you may thereby judge, that I did not speak it of any thing that I heard since I came to town.—Com. You have answered that, but where heard you it then. Went. If your honours do think I speak for excuse-sake, let this satisfy you: I protest before the living God I cannot tell of whom I heard these rumours; yet I do verily think that I heard them of a hundred or two in the house.—Com. Then of so many you can name some. Went. No surely, because it was so general a speech, I marked none; neither do men mark speakers commonly when they be general: and I assure you if I could tell, I would not. For I will never utter any thing told me, to the hurt of any man, when I am not enforced thereunto, as in this case I may chuse. Yet I would deal plainly with you, for I would tell your honours so, and if your honours do not credit me, I will voluntarily take an oath, if you offer me a book, that I cannot tell of whom I heard those rumours. But if you offer me an oath of your authorities, I will refuse it; because I will do nothing to infringe the Liberties of the House. But what need I to use these speeches? I will give you an instance, whereupon I heard these rumours to your satisfying, even such a one, as if you will speak the truth, you shall confess, that you heard the same as well as I.—Com. In so doing we will be satisfied: What is that? Went. The last parliament [by which it may be conceived he meant and intended that parl. in An. 13 Reg. Eliz.] he that is now Speaker [viz. Rob. Bell, esq. who was also Speaker in the first session of this present parl. in An. 14 Reg. ejusdem] uttered a very good speech for the calling in of certain Licences granted to 4 courtiers, to the utter undoing of 6 or 8000 of the queen's subjects. This speech was so disliked of some of the council, that he was sent for; and so hardly dealt with, that he came into the house with such an amazed countenance, that it daunted all the house in such sort, that for 10, 12, or 16 days, there was not one in the house that durst deal in any matter of importance. And in those simple matters that they dealt in, they spent more words and time in their preamble, requiring that they might not be mistaken, than they did in the matter they spake unto. This inconvenience grew unto the house by the councils hard handling of the said good member, whereupon this rumour grew in the house.

'Sirs, you may not speak against Licences, the queen's maj. will be angry, the Privy-Council too will be angry;' and this rumour I suppose there is not one of you here but heard it as well as I. I beseech your honours discharge your consciences herein as I do.—Com. We heard it, we confess, and you have satisfied us in this; but how say you to the hard interpretation you made of the message that was sent into the house? [The words were recited.] 'We assure you we never heard a harder interpretation of a message.' Went. I beseech your honours, first, was there not such a message sent unto the house?—Com. We grant that there was. Went. Then I trust you will bear me record that I made it not; and I answer you that so hard a message could not have too hard an interpretation made by the wisest man in England. For, can there by any possible means be sent a harder message to a council gathered together to serve God, than to say, 'You shall not seek to advance the glory of God?' I am of this opinion that there cannot be a more wicked message than it was.—Com. You may not speak against messages, for none sendeth them but the queen's maj. Went. If the message be against the glory of God, against the prince's safety, or against the Liberty of this Parliament-House whereby the state is maintained, I neither may nor will hold my peace. I cannot in so doing discharge my conscience, whosoever doth send it. And I say, that I heartily repent me, for that I have hitherto held my peace in these causes, and I do promise you all, if God forsake me not, that I will never, during life, hold my tongue, if any message is sent, wherein God is dishonoured, the prince perilled, or the Liberties of the parl. impeached; and every one of you here present ought to repent you of these faults, and to amend them.—Com. It is no new precedent to have the prince to send messages. [Then were two or three messages recited, sent by two or three princes.] Went. Sirs, said I, you do very evil to alledge precedents in this order. You ought to alledge good precedents to comfort and embolden men in good doing, and evil precedents to discourage and terrify men to do evil.—Com. But what meant you to make so hard interpretation of messages? Went. Surely I marvel what you mean by asking this question. Have I not said, so hard a message could not have too hard an interpretation: and have I not set down the reason that moved me in my speech, that is to say, that for the receiving and accepting that message, God has poured so great indignation upon us, that he put into the queen's heart to refuse good and wholesome laws for her own preservation; which caused many loving and faithful hearts, for grief, to burst out with sorrowful tears; and moved all Papists, traitors to God, to her maj. and to every good Christian govt. in their sleeves to laugh the whole Parliament-House to scorn. Have I not thus said? and do not your honours think it did so?—Com. Yes truly. But how durst you say, that the queen had unkindly abused herself against the nobility and people? Went. I beseech your honours, tell me how far you can stretch these words of her unkindly abusing and opposing herself against her maj.'s nobility and people? Can you apply them any further than I have applied them, that is to say, in that her maj. called the parl. of purpose to prevent traitorous Perils to her person, and for no other cause; and in that her maj. did send unto us 2 bills, willing us to take our choice of that we liked best for her maj.'s safety, and thereof to make a law promising her royal consent thereunto; and did we not first chuse the one, and her maj. refused it? yet did not we nevertheless receive the other? and agreeing to make a law thereof, did not her maj. in the end, refuse all our travels? And did not the Lord-Keeper, in her maj.'s presence, in the beginning of the parl. shew this to be the occasion that we were called together? And did not her maj. in the end of the parl. refuse all our travels? Is not this known to all here present, and to all the Parliament-House also? I beseech your honours discharge your consciences herein, and utter your knowledge simply as I do; for in truth herein her maj. did abuse her nobility and subjects, and did oppose herself against them by the way of advice.—Com. Surely we cannot deny it; you say the truth. Went. Then I beseech your honours shew me if it were not a dangerous doing to her maj. in these 2 respects. 1st, in weakening, wounding, and discouraging the hearts of her maj.'s loving and faithful subjects, thereby to make them the less able or the more fearful and unwilling to serve her maj. another time. On the other side, was it not a raising-up and encouraging the hearts of her maj.'s hateful enemies to adventure any desperate enterprize to her maj.'s peril and danger?—Com. We cannot deny but that it was very dangerous to her maj. in those respects. Went. Then why do your honours ask how I dare tell a truth, to give the queen warning to avoid her danger?—I answer you thus, I do thank the Lord my God, that I never found fear in myself to give the queen's maj. warning to avoid her danger; be you all afraid thereof if you will, for I praise God I am not, and I hope never to live to see that day; and yet I will assure your honour, that 20 times and more, when I walked in my grounds, revolving this speech to prepare against this day, my own fearful conceit did say unto me, that this speech would carry me to the place whither I shall now go, and fear would have moved me to have put it out; then I weighed whether in good conscience, and the duty of a faithful subject, I might keep myself out of prison, and not to warn my prince from walking in a dangerous course; my conscience said unto me, that I could not be a faithful subject, if I did more respect to avoid my own danger than my prince's danger. Here withal I was made bold, and went forward as your honours heard; yet when I uttered those words in the house, that there was none without fault, no not our noble queen; I paused and beheld all your countenances, and saw plainly that those words did amaze you all; then I was afraid with you for company, and fear bade me to pat out those words that followed; for your countenances did assure me, that not one of you would stay me of my journey; yet the consideration of a good conscience, and of a faithful subject, did make me bold to utter it in such sort as your honours heard; with this heart and mind I spake it, and I praise God for it; and if it were to do again I would with the same mind speak it again.—Com. Yea, but you might have uttered it in better terms: why did you not so? Went. Would you have me to have done as you of her maj.'s privy council do, to utter a weighty matter in such terms as she should not have understood? To have made a fault, then, it would have done her maj. no good, and my intent was to do her good.—Com. You have answered us. Went. Then I praise God for it; and, as I made a courtesy, mr. Seckford spake these words: Com. Mr. Wentworth will never acknowledge himself to make a fault, nor say that he is sorry for any thing that he doth speak; you shall hear none of these things come out of his mouth. Went. Mr. Seckford, I will never confess that to be a fault, to love the queen's maj. while I live; neither will I be sorry for giving her maj. warning, to avoid danger, while the breath is in my body: if you do think it a fault to love her maj. or to be sorry that her maj. should have warning to avoid her danger, say so; for I cannot. Speak for yourself, mr. Seckford."

Mr. Wentworth committed to the Tower.] Feb. 9th, Mr. Treasurer, in the name of the Committee yesterday appointed for the Examination of Peter Wentworth, burgess for Tregony, declared, 'That the said Committee did meet yesterday in the afternoon, in the Star-Chamber, according to their Commission; and their examining the said Peter Wentworth, concerning the violent and wicked words, yesterday pronounced by him, in this house, touching the queen's maj. made a collection of the same words; which words so collected, the said P. Wentworth did acknowledge and confess. And then did the said mr. Treasurer read unto the house the said Note of collection; which being read, he declared further, That the said P. Wentworth being examined, what he could say for the extenuating of his said fault and offence, could neither say any thing at all to that purpose, neither yet did charge any other person as author of his said speech, but did take all the burthen thereof unto himself.—And the said mr. Treasurer thereupon moved for his punishment, and imprisonment in the Tower, as the house should think good and consider of: whereupon, after sundry disputations and speeches, it was ordered, upon the question, that the said P. Wentworth should be committed close prisoner to the Tower, for his offence, there to remain until such time as this house should have further consideration of him. And thereupon immediately the said P. Wentworth, being brought to the bar by the serjeant, received his said judgment accordingly, by the mouth of mr. Speaker, in form above recited. And so mr. Lieutenant of the Tower was presently charged with the custody of the said P. Wentworth.—The affair of his enlargement from the Tower, will appear in the sequel.

On the same day, the house came to this resolution, "That if any person, being a member of the same, was employed in the service of embassy, or in execution, or visited with sickness, he shall not lose his seat in the house, nor any other be elected for it, during such time of service, execution, or sickness." Also, the lord Russel, son and heir to the earl of Bedford, burgess for Bridport, in the county of Dorset, was ordered to continue a member of that house; notwithstanding the new-acquired earldom of his father.

Sir W. Mildmay's Speech for a Subsidy.] Feb. 10, Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the motion for a Grant of a Subsidy to her majesty, spoke as follows:—Mr. Speaker, "That in the beginning of this our meeting such matters as be of importance may be thought on in time, I am bold with your favours to move you of one that, in my opinion, is both of moment and of necessity. To the end, if you likewise find the same to be so, you may commit it further to the consideration of such as you shall think convenient.—And that you may the better judge of that which I shall propound, it is requisite that I put you in remembrance, 1st, how the queen found the realm; next, how she hath restored and conserved it; and, 3dly, how we stand now. Touching the first, no man can be ignorant how that our most gracious queen, at her entering, found this noble realm, by reason of the evil govt. preceding, miserably overwhelmed with popery, dangerously afflicted with war, and grievously loaded with Debts; the burthen of which three cannot be remembered without grief, especially if we call to mind how this kingdom, being utterly delivered from the usurped tyranny of Rome, and that many years together; was, nevertheless, by the iniquity of later time, brought back again into the former captivity, to the great thralldom both of body and soul of all the people of this land. A wretched time, and wretched ministers, to bring to pass so wretched and wicked an act to strengthen this bondage of Rome. We saw how there was brought hither a strong nation to press our necks again into the yoke; terrible this was to all the inhabitants of this land, and so would have proved, if their abode had been here so long as was to be feared from them; for by their occasion came the War that we entered into with France and Scotland, and not upon any quarrel of our own; but to help them forward to their great advantage, and our great loss and shame; by means whereof, and of other disorders, the realm grew into great Debt both at home and abroad, and so was left, to the intolerable loss and charge of her maj. and the state. The realm being thus miserably oppressed with Popery, with War, and with Debts, the queen, our most gracious sovereign, hath thus restored and conserved it; she hath delivered us from the tyrannous yoke of Rome, and restored again the most holy religion of the gospel, not slacking any time therein; but even, at the first, doing that which was for the honour of God, to the unspeakable joy of all good subjects.—But adventuring thereby the malice of the mighty princes of the world, her neighbours being enemies of our religion; whereby it did appear how much she preferred the glory of our God before her own quietness: this done, she made peace with France and Scotland, the one a mighty nation, the other, though not so potent, yet in regard of their nearness and of their habitation with us upon our continent, more dangerous: which may easily appear by consideration of former times, wherein it hath been seen how dangerous Scottish wars have proved to this realm above those of any other nation. But such hath been the Providence of our gracious Queen, as the Peace with Scotland, which, in times past was found very tickle, is now become so firm as in no age there hath been so long and so good peace between them and us.—And that is brought to pass the rather for that her maj. by two notable exploits with her forces, the one to Leith, and another to Edinburgh-Castle, hath both quieted that realm, and taken away all occasions of hostility that might arise against this country; also by the first delivering Scotland from the French which had so great a footing there, as, without aid from hence they must needs in short time have tyrannized over that country to their perpetual servitude, and to the peril also of this country, being so near them, and they so ill neighbours to dwell by. And by the 2d, ending and putting out the fire of the civil wars amongst them, to the preservation of their young king, and the perpetual quietness of that realm, both which as they have brought unto her maj. great and immortal honour and renown, and to this country and that, peace and surety: so you cannot but think therewith upon the Charges which necessarily follow two such journies furnished by land and sea, as for the atchieving of so great enterprizes was requisite. What her maj. hath done besides, for the suppressing of a dangerous and unnatural Rebellion practised by the Pope, the most principal and malicious enemy of this state, and put in ure by certain undutiful subjects in the north parts of this realm, was seen so late, even in your view, as it needeth not to be remembered; neither the Charge that belongeth to a matter of such importance, as did threaten the utter ruin to our most gracious sovereign, and to all the people of this land, if God, of his mercy, had not prevented it.—Notwithstanding all which costly journies, both into Scotland and within the realm, her majesty hath most carefully and providently delivered this kingdom from a great and weighty debt, wherewith it hath been long burthened. A Debt begun 4 years, at least, before the death of Henry VIII. and not cleared until within these 2 years; and all that while running upon interest; a course able to eat up not only private men and their patrimonies, but also princes and their estates; but such hath been the care of this time, as her maj. and the state is clearly freed from that eating corrosive; the truth whereof may be testified by the citizens of London, whose bonds, under the common-seal of the city, of assurance of payment being usually given and renewed, and which have hanged so many years to their great danger, and to the peril of the whole traffick, are now all discharged, cancelled, and delivered into the Chamber of London, to their own hands. By means whereof the realm is not only acquitted of this great burthen, and the merchants free, but also her maj.'s credit thereby both at home and abroad greater than any other prince for money, if she have need; and so in reason it ought to be, for that she hath kept promise to all men, wherein other princes have often failed to the hindrance of many. Lastly, for this point how the Justice of this realm is preserved and ministered to her people, by her maj.'s political and just govt. is so well known to all men, as our enemies are driven to confess that justice, which is the band of all commonwealths, doth so tie and link together all degrees of persons within this land, as there is suffered here no violence, no oppression, no respect of persons in judgment; but 'jus equabile' used to all indifferently. All which godly, provident and wise acts in govt. have brought forth these effects that we be in peace, and all our neighbours in war; that we be in quietness at home, and safe enough from troubles abroad; that we live in wealth and all prosperity, and that which is the greatest, we enjoy the freedom of our consciences delivered from the bondage of Rome, wherewith we were so lately oppressed. And thus we stand.—But for all this as wise mariners in calm weather do most diligently prepare their tackles, and provide to withstand attempts that may happen: even so in this our blessed time of peace that we enjoy, by the blessing of God, through the ministry of her maj. we ought in time to make provision to prevent any storm that may arise either here or abroad; and neither to be too careless or negligent, but think that the tail of these storms, which are so bitter and so boisterous in other countries, may reach us also before they be ended; especially if we do not forget the hatred that is born us by the adversary of our religion both for our profession, and for that this realm is also a merciful sanctuary for such poor christians as fly hither for succour; so as now one of the most principal cares that we ought to take in this great council of the realm is both to consider aforehand the dangers that may come by the malice of enemies, and to provide in time how to resist them; and seeing that by those great occasions which I have remembered, you can easily understand how low her maj.'s coffers are brought, it is our parts frankly and willingly to offer unto her maj. such a contribution as shall be able to restore the same again, in such sort as she may be sufficiently furnished of treasure to put in order, and maintain her forces by land and sea, to answer any thing that shall be attempted against her and us: and lest it might seem strange to some that her maj. should want this, some considering that not long since aid was granted by the realm: to that I answer, that albeit her maj. is not to yield an account how she spendeth her treasure; yet, for your satisfactions, I will let you understand such things as are very true, and which I dare affirm, having more knowledge thereof than some other, in respect of the place I hold in her maj.'s service.—First, how favourable the Taxations of Subsidies be through the whole realm cannot be unknown to any; whereby far less cometh to her maj.'s coffers than by the law is granted, a matter now drawn to be so usual as it is hard to be reformed. Next, the Clearing of all Debts that run upon Interest, to the insupportable charge of the realm. Thirdly, the Charge in Suppressing the Rebellion in the north. Fourthly, the free and honourable Repayment of the last Loans, the like whereof was not seen before. Fifthly, the Journey to Edinburgh-Castle for the quieting of that country and this. And lastly, the great and continual Charges in Ireland, by the evil disposition of the people there; all which could not have been performed by the last aid, except it had pleased her maj. to spare, out of her own revenues, great sums of money for the supplying of that which lacked, wherein she more respected the realm than her own particular estate; living, as you see, in most temperate manner, without either building or other superfluous things of pleasure; and like as these be causes sufficient to move you to devise how these wants may be repaired, so you ought the rather to do it, for that her maj. lacketh and cannot have, without great inconvenience, those helps, which, in the times of her father, her brother and sister, were used; as the Abasing of Coin, which brought infinite sums to them, but wrought great damage to the realm, which we yet feel; and should do more, had not her maj. to her perpetual fame, restored the same again, so much as the time could suffer. The Sale of Lands, whereof came also very great sums of money, but that is not hereafter to be used; saving that by the same the revenues of the crown are greatly diminished, which it cannot more bear, the Borrowing of Money upon interest, the burthen whereof the realm hath felt so heavy, as that is never more to be done, if by any means it may be avoided. And yet, notwithstanding all those helps, it is apparent that Subsidies were continually granted in those times; if so then, much more so now. Besides War and other extraordinary Charges which may happen, her maj.'s very ordinary Charges, which she cannot but sustain, are far greater, by dearth of prices and other occasions, than in any other prince's days; as you may see by the ordinary and annual Charges of the Household, the Navy, the Ordnance, the Armory, the Garrison of Berwick, the standing Garrison and Officers within the realm of Ireland. And whether these are like to be more costly to her maj. than in former times, in respect of the prices of all things, let every man judge by the experience he hath of his private expences.—I trust these few things may suffice to remember us how her maj. found the realm, how she hath restored and preserved it, and how the present state is now; and therewith all may serve as reasons sufficient to persuade us to deal in this necessary cause, as her maj. being the head of the commonwealth, be not unfurnished of that which will be sufficient to maintain both herself and us against the private or open malice of enemies; wherein let us so proceed as her maj. may find how much we think ourselves bound to God, that hath given us so gracious a queen over us; and shew thereby also such gratitude towards her, as she may perform the course of her govt. 'cum alacritate.' This speech ended, a committee was immediately appointed to draw up a bill for a Subsidy.

The Queen's Message for Mr. Wentworth's Discharge.] March 12, Christopher Hatton, esq. Captain of the Band of Pensioners, reported to the house, "that whereas a member of the same, on the 1st day of this session, Feb. 8th, had, in a set speech, uttered divers offensive matters against her maj. and for the same had been committed prisoner to the Tower by that house; yet her maj. was graciously pleased to remit her justly occasioned displeasure for the said offence; and to refer the enlargement of the party to the house." Which message was most thankfully accepted of by the whole house. Afterwards,

Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, rose and spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker; I think that by this whole action, and by her maj.'s dealing in this cause, we had just occasion to consider these 3 things: 1, her Maj.'s good and clement Nature. 2, her Respect to us. And, 3, our Duty towards her. Touching the 1st, that sovereign princes, placed by God, are to be honoured with all humble and dutiful reverence, both in word and deed, especially if they be good and virtuous, such as our most gracious sovereign is; a princess that hath governed this realm so many years, so quietly, so justly, and providently; which, being true, as no man can deny, then see how great an offence this was, to reprove so good and gracious a queen so unjustly, and that to be done not by any common person abroad, but by a member of this house; and not in any private or secret place, but openly in this most hon. assembly of the parl. being the highest court and council of the realm. And thereby see also her most gracious and good nature, that so mercifully and so easily can remit so great an offence; a thing rarely found in princes of so great estate, that use commonly to think themselves touched in honour, if they should pass over smaller injuries so lightly. The greater is her maj.'s commendation, and the more are we bound to thank God for her.—2ndly, we may see what gracious Respect her maj. had to us, that notwithstanding the just cause that was given her to punish severely so great an offence; yet the favour that she had conceived towards us, proceeding from the just trial of our dutiful affections towards her, had so qualified her displeasure, as she was contented, for our sakes, to pardon the whole; and that so freely, as she would not, at any time, think of it again, for those were her words; a marvellous grace towards us, and never hereafter, on our parts to be forgotten: the rather for that the same proceeded merely from herself, thereby preventing the suit, which we, in all humbleness, might have made unto her. 3rdly, that for so gracious a dealing, it was our bounden Duties to yield unto her maj. our most humble and hearty thanks, and to beseech Almighty God to enlarge her days as the only stay of our felicity; and not only so, but to learn also, by this example, how to behave ourselves hereafter: and not under the pretence of Liberty to forget our bounden duty to so gracious a queen: true it is, that nothing can be well concluded in a council where there is not allowed, in debating of causes brought in, Deliberation, Liberty, and Freedom of Speech; otherwise, if in consultation men be either interrupted or terrified, so as they cannot, nor dare not, speak their opinions freely, like as that council cannot but be reputed for a servile council; even so all the proceedings therein shall be rather to satisfy the wills of a few, than to determine that which shall be just and reasonable. But herein we may not forget to put a difference between Liberty of Speech and licentious Speech; for by the one men deliver their opinions freely, and with this caution, that all be spoken, pertinently, modestly, reverently, and discreetly; the other contrariwise uttereth all impertinently, rashly, arrogantly, and irreverently, without respect of person, time, or place: and though Freedom of Speech hath always been used in this great council of parl. and is a thing most necessary to be preserved amongst us; yet the same was never, nor ought to be, extended so far, as though a man in this house may speak what and of whom he list. The contrary whereof, both in our own days and in the days of our predecessors, by the punishment of such inconsiderate and disorderly speakers, hath appeared. And so to return, let this serve us for an example, to beware that we offend not in the like hereafter, lest that in forgetting our duties so far, we may give just cause to our gracious sovereign to think that this her clemency hath given occasion of further boldness; and thereby so much grieve and provoke her, as contrary to her most gracious and mild consideration, she be constrained to change her natural clemency into necessary and just severity; a thing that I trust shall never happen amongst wise and dutiful men, such as the members of this house are thought always to be."

The Speaker recommends it to the Queen to marry.] A motion had been made in the Commons this session, on the old topic of pressing the Queen to marry; but the house did not think proper to venture another petition on it; but agreed, that at the conclusion of the session, the Speaker should move her maj. about it. Accordingly, on May 14th, we are told, that in the afternoon, the Queen came to the House of Lords, where their Speaker, Robert Bell, esq. presented the bill of one Subsidy, and two 15ths and 10ths: the particulars of which, being omitted by the clerk, are supplied by sir Symonds D'Ewes; who tells us, "that the Speaker's speech was to the following effect: 1st, he spoke touching sundry kinds of govt. which had been in this kingdom; and so drew his discourse to the present time. Then he made a large enumeration of her maj.'s many virtues, and of the many benefits which the kingdom received by her gracious govt. After which he proceeded humbly to petition her maj. to make the kingdom further happy in her Marriage, that so they might hope for a continual Succession of those benefits in her posterity. To which, having added a compendious relation of such acts as had passed the House of Commons, he concluded with the presentation of the bill of Subsidy, in their names, unto her maj."

The Lord Keeper's Speech at the close of the Session.] After which, the Lord Keeper, by her Maj.'s commandment, answered as followeth:—"Mr. Speaker; The queen's maj. our most dread and gracious sovereign lady, hath heard and doth very well understand your oration, full of good-will and matter. The sum thereof may be reduced into 5 parts, whereof the 1st containeth a discourse of sundry kinds of Government, from the beginning until this time. The 2nd, the Commendations of her Majesty's Virtues, and of her great and gracious govt. from the beginning, with a remembrance of her highness's bountiful benefits. The 3rd, concerning the humble and earnest Petition moving her maj. to marry. The 4th is a Declaration of Laws past in the Lower House, with an humble suit for her highness's royal assent to be given unto the same. The 5th and last, concerning a presentation of the Subsidy granted in this session.—As concerning the 1st, which containeth the discourse of sundry kinds of Governments, I see not that this time and place doth require any answer to be given unto it other than this; that you, Mr. Speaker, are much to be commended for your diligent collecting, and also for the apt comparing of the last part of the same.—And as to the 2nd, which concerneth the Commendations of her Majesty's great Virtues and good Government, with the Remembrance of the manifold benefits that you have received at her maj.'s hand, her highness hath commanded me to say unto you, that she wisheth of God with all her heart, that all those royal virtues and principal parts, together with the great gifts of gracious govt. that you make mention of, were so perfectly planted in her, as best might serve to the maintenance of God's glory, from whom her maj. confesseth all goodness to proceed; and best also might serve for the good governance of you her good, loving and obedient subjects; and withal, prayeth you with her, and for her, to give God hearty thanks for those virtues and graces that it hath pleased him to bless her withal; and also to pray for the continuance of them with such increase, as shall best like his Divine Majesty. And besides this, I may, and dare certainly affirm unto you, by her maj.'s own mouth, that if the virtues of all the princes in Europe were united within her highness's breast, she should gladly employ the same to the best of her power about the good governance of you, that be so good and loving unto her; so great is her highness good will and inward affection toward you. Again true it is, that these your loving and reverend conceivings of the virtuous and gracious govt. of your sovereign, is taken by her maj. in very thankful part, as a special and peculiar property pertaining to faithful and loving subjects; neither will her highness admit of any occasion that may move you to conceive otherwise than you have: neither do I think that any man can devise any more ready, or any more strong persuasion to move a princely nature to be such towards her subjects as they can wish, than by such good, reverend, and loving conception and conceiving remembered by you. To conclude, as touching this point, I am to affirm unto you from her maj. that she taketh your proceedings in the parl. both in the midst, and also in the ending, so graciously, and in so thankful part, that if both parts and nature did concur in me abundantly to make me eloquent (as neither of them do) yet I am sure, I were not able to set forth this point according to her highness's desire, or to the worthiness of it. And for the more manifest declaration of this, and of the great goodliking her maj. hath conceived of you that be of this parl. her highness meaneth not to determine the same, but to prorogue it until the next winter. And as to cognizance and recognition of Benefits, her maj.'s pleasure is, that I should declare unto you, that there is none of these Benefit received by you, but she wisheth them treble in number, and quadruple in greatness and goodness. And further, her highness thinketh that the faithful recognizing of Benefits received, is one of the greatest satisfactions that a subject can make to his sovereign for them. And as to the 3rd, which concerneth your humble earnest Petition, it proceedeth from your inward affections and benevolent minds, founded upon the great good opinion that you have conceived of her maj.'s most gracious govt. over you, according to the declaration made by you, a matter greatly moving her maj. the rather to allow of your Petition.—The second Note importeth yet more than this; for therein she conceiveth that this great good opinion of this happy govt. is not conceived by you, as it appeareth by your own declarations, upon any sudden ground or cause, but hath grown upon the consideration of her highness's governance during the reign of 17 years now past: whereby it is evident, that this is a settled and constant opinion of yours, and therefore much the more moving her maj. to give a gracious ear unto this your Petition.—And yet the third Note exceedeth the other two former; for in this Note she conceiveth the abundance of your inward affection grounded upon her good governance of you to be so great, that it doth not only content you to have her maj. reign and govern over you, but also you do desire, that some proceeding from her maj.'s body might by a perpetual succession reign over your posterity also: a matter greatly to move her maj. (she saith) to incline to this your suit. Besides her highness is not unmindful of all the benefits that will grow to the realm by such Marriage; neither doth she forget any perils that are like to grow for want thereof. All which matters considered, her maj. willed me to say, that albeit of her own natural disposition she is not disposed or inclined to Marriage, neither could she ever marry were she a private person; yet for your sakes and the benefit of the realm, she is contented to dispose and incline herself to the satisfaction of your humble petition, so that all things convenient may concur that be meet for such a Marriage; whereof there be very many, some touching the state of her most royal person, some touching the person of him whom God shall join, some touching the state of the whole realm: these things concurring and considered, her majesty hath assented (as is before remembered.) And thus much touching this matter.—As to the 4th part, which concerneth a Declaration of the Laws passed in the session, wherunto you do pray that her maj. would give her royal assent, her maj. hath commended your travel and pains taken in devising of these laws, your considerations and carefulness in debating and consulting, and your judgments and determinations in concluding and passing of the same; and meaneth to give her royal assent to so many of them as her maj. shall think meet and convenient to pass at this time. But here I am to remember you, that this is not all that her highness requireth in this point; for she is desirous that the great travels, pains, and great charges employed about the making of these laws should not be lost, neither her maj.'s royal assent granted in vain; which must needs come to pass, except you look better to the execution of laws than heretofore you have done; it were much better to have no new laws made at all, than to have laws not executed: for the former doth but leave us in the state we were in before the making of the new laws; but not to execute them, is to breed a contempt of laws and law-makers, and of all magistrates, which is the mother and nurse of disobedience; and what she breedeth and bringeth forth, I leave to you to judge.—Now this offence of not executing of laws growing so great, it resteth to see in whose default this is, and who ought to have the burthen of it. First, certain it is, that her maj. leaveth nothing undone meet for her to do for the execution of laws; for 1st, she maketh choice of persons of most credit and best understanding throughout the whole realm, to whom for the great trust and fidelity that she repositeth in them, she giveth authority by commission, to execute a great part of those laws, who also by oath be bound to perform the same. Besides, the most special and needful laws her highness causeth to be proclaimed and published unto her people; as over this also (lest men should be forgetful of their duties) she causeth a number of her justices to be called into public place, and there to be exhorted and admonished in her maj.'s name to see the execution of her laws; and what here can be more devised for her maj. to do? Surely, in my opinion, nothing.—Then falleth it out necessarily and consequently, that the burthen of all these enormities, absurdities and mischiefs that do grow in the commonwealth for not executing of laws, must light upon those persons that have authority from her maj. to execute them and do it not: which is a burthen over heavy for any to bear, being justly charged. For the avoiding of this therefore, methinks, men being thus remembered, ought to seek with all diligence, and endeavour to satisfy for their negligence, and uncarefulness past; which if they shall forget to do, her maj. shall be then driven, clean contrary to her most gracious nature, and inclination, to appoint and assign private men, for profit and gain sake, to see her penal laws to be executed. The course which hitherto her maj. hath taken, hath been, to have her laws executed by men of credit and estimation for the love of justice, uprightly and indifferently; but if they shall refuse so to do, forgetting their duty to God, sovereign and country, then of necessity, rather than the laws should be unexecuted, her maj. shall be driven, I say, to commit the execution of them to those, who in respect of profit and gain, will see them executed with all extremity. And what a burthen that will bring to the commonweal, I leave it to your consideration. But it is to be hoped, that if the respects before remembered, will not move you to see better to your charge; yet the fear of this great inconveniency should constrain men that be in commission to look to the better execution of laws.—Now as to the 5th and last part, which concerneth the Grant of a Subsidy, her maj.

hath commanded me to say unto you, that that grant is a manifest declaration by deeds of that which before was declared by words: for how could such a grant be made, and in such manner granted, and by such persons, but that of necessity it must proceed from the benevolent minds and hearty affections of such loving subjects as are before remembered? True it is, that her maj. in these your doings hath noted 3 things especially and principally, every of them tending much to the setting forth of your benevolence. The 1st, who it is that granted; the 2nd, the manner of granting; the 3rd, what it was that is granted. As to the 1st, her maj. cannot forget, how this grant proceeded from the earnest affections and hearty good wills of her loving and obedient subjects. Wherefore her maj. maketh greater account thereof than 10 subsidies, and so she commanded me to say unto you. Again, her maj. remembreth very well, that this grant was made not by subjects that never did the like before, but by subjects that have been, and continued to be ready from time to time, to contribute towards the necessary charges and defence of the realm; which doth greatly commend and set forth, she saith, this great benevolence of yours. And as to the 2nd, which is, the manner of granting, her highness noteth 2 things especially; the one is universality of consent; and can there be a more universal consent than when all agreeing and none denying as this was? Nay, her highness knoweth that, before her time, these manner of grants passed not but with a great persuasion and many difficulties; whereas this was frankly offered without any persuasion or difficulty at all. The other is the readiness of granting. It is written of benevolence, 'bi dat qui cito dat,' which her maj. saith, may be justly applied to these your proceedings. And to the 3rd, which is the thing granted; she taketh it to be as liberal as any heretofore hath been granted; and therefore hath commanded me to yield unto you her most hearty condign thanks, and withal, to let you understand, that she is as willing and desirous to give you this whole subsidy again, as you have been willing to grant it, if the necessity of the realm and your surety would suffer it. And thus much touching the granting of the subsidy.—Now as to the due and true execution of the same, I am to exhort and also to admonish you, and yet it may be probably said, that persons that have thus bountifully and readily made this grant, wherein and whereby their benevolent minds and hearty affections have been so manifestly declared in granting, that to these persons neither admonishments nor exhortations are due for the true executing of that grant, no more than a spur is to a horse, that runneth as swiftly as he can. Albeit this argument in reason carrieth probability and likelihood with it; yet former experience hath taught that these grants have not been so duly and truly executed, as they have been benevolently granted."

The Queen having passed all the acts, the parl. was adjourned to the next day; when, in the afternoon, her maj. came again to the house, and the Lord Keeper, by her command, prorogued this parl. to the 5th of Nov. next. A List of the Public Acts passed in this session will be found at the end of the present reign.

Proceedings on the Death of the Speaker.] In consequence of the death of their Speaker, the Commons could not proceed to business.

Accordingly, a long representation is entered in the Lords Journals, “concerning a great defect in the other house, for want of sir Rob. Bell, kt. lord chief baron of the exchequer, their mouth and Speaker, lately dead. But that they finding good direction what to do, by a former precedent, in a session of parl. holden Sept. 30th, in the 8th year of her reign, had appointed sir F. Knolles, kt. treasurer of the queen’s household; sir Js. Crofts, comptroller; sir Fr. Walsingham, and dr. Wilson, secretaries of state; sir Walter Mildmay, kt. chancellor of the exchequer; with several others, in the name of the whole, to go and wait upon the lord chanc. and the Lords, and request their aid and assistance for intimation of the matter to her maj.—Then the lord chanc. first desiring this committee to withdraw awhile, acquainted that house with the Petition of the Commons; who, after due consideration of the premises, thought proper to appoint such of the Lords as were of the privy-council, with the marq. of Winchester and the earl of Arundele, to go along with a select number of the Commons, to represent this case to the queen.” The house was then adjourned to the 18th: on which day it is entered, that the lord chanc. produced a Commission from the Queen under the broad seal, whereby he was authorised to call the Commons before him, and to will and command them to repair to their accustomed place, and choose another Speaker. But nothing more is entered in the Lords Journals relative to this matter.

Feb. 6, a bill was brought into the Lords, to oblige all persons whatsoever to come to Church, hear Divine Service, and receive the Sacrament. But it was dropped after the first reading.

A Subsidy granted.] March 2d, a bill was sent up by the Commons, for granting a Supply to her maj. of a Subsidy, two 15ths and 10ths, which passed the Lords on the 8th.

A Difference between the Two Houses.] A bill passed the Lords, for fortifying the Borders towards Scotland, which was sent down to the Commons, who, on the 8th of March, sent up a new bill to the Lords, to the same purpose, and their old bill with it. On which this remarkable entry is made in their Journals: “This day the Commons sent up a new bill, ‘For fortifying the Borders towards Scotland,’ and withal, returned a former bill, which the Lords, with great deliberation, had passed, and sent down before, with the same title. Which course the Lords thought to be both derogatory to the superiority of the place, and contrary to the antient course of both houses. And, as they disliked this disorder, so it was their pleasure, that this their misliking should be entered in the records of parl. lest so evil an example might hereafter be used as a precedent.” This is one of the first instances we have yet met with, of any material dispute between the two houses. Whether they had any conference to settle this affair is uncertain by the Lord’s Journal; but we find, that on the 10th, the new bill was read a first time by the Lords, and passed that house on the 15th, with certain amendments, which were agreed to by the Commons.

Causes of Appeal, between party and party, came now to be tried at the bar of the House of Lords, and entered in their Journal. In this session, there is a long memorandum made of a Cause between the marq. of Winchester, his lady, and one Mr. Oughtred; which at last was referred to a committee of Lords, chosen by the parties themselves, for their determination.

A new Speaker elected.] The Journals of the Commons begin this session, with a long entry, relating to the death of their Speaker, and the election of a new one. But as this was purely matter of form, we pass it over. John Popham, esq. her majesty's solicitor-general, having been chosen Speaker, in the room of sir Rob. Bell, deceased; he was presented, and confirmed by the queen, on the 20th of Jan. with the usual ceremonies. But what is very remarkable, the Lord Chancellor, in his Answer to the Speaker, when he claimed the accustomed privileges of the house, gave him this admonition: "That the House of Commons should not deal or intermeddle with any matters touching her Majesty's Person or Estate, or Church-government."

The Commons appoint a Fast, by their own Authority.] Jan. 21st, Mr. Paul Wentworth made a motion, for a public Fast, and daily Preaching. "The fast to be appointed upon some one certain day, but the preaching to be every morning before the house did sit. That so, they beginning their proceedings, with the service and worship of God, he might the better bless them in all their consultations and actions." This motion occasioned a warm debate, and many speeches, we are told, were made, pro and con, about it. It is not said what any of their arguments were, only that sir Fs. Knolles, treasurer; mr. Tho. Cromwell, and mr. Alford, spoke against the motion; and mr. Cook, mr. Sec. Wilson, and mr. Serjeant Flowerden, for it. Mr. Norton also shewed precedents, that there had been Fasts in London, appointed only by the council. By which, says the Journalist, he seemed to infer, that a parl. ought therather to do it. However, the house being divided about this matter, it was put to the question, when 115 voices were for, and 100 against it. This Paul Wentworth was brother to Peter, who began the last session with a Speech on the Liberty of Parliaments. (See p. 784.) On the Resolution aforesaid, a Fast was appointed to be kept, in the Temple-church, on the 29th of Jan. there to assemble and meet together, to hear preaching, and join in prayer, humiliation, and fasting, &c. Jan. 24th the following entry is made in the Journals:

Mr. Speaker declared himself, for his own part, to be very sorry for the error that happened here in this house upon Saturday last, in resolving to have a public Fast; and sheweth her maj.'s great misliking of the proceeding of this house therein, declaring it to fall out in such sort as he before did fear it would do; and, advising the house to a submission in that behalf, further moved them to bestow their time and endeavour hereafter, during the session, in matters proper and pertinent for this house to deal in, and to omit all superfluous and unnecessary motions and arguments, with all due regard and consideration to the order of the house.

Mr. Vice-Chamberlain declaring a Message from her maj. to this whole house, by her highness's commandment shewed unto them her great admiration of the rashness of this house, in committing such an apparent contempt against her maj.'s express commandment, very lately before, delivered unto the whole house by the lord chanc. in her highness's name, as to attempt and put in execution, such an innovation as the same Fast, without her maj.'s privity and pleasure first known; blaming first the whole house, and then mr. Speaker; and declaring her maj.'s protestation for the allowing of fasting and prayer, with the use and exercise thereof in her own person; but reproving the undutiful proceeding of this house, as against the duty of subjects, did nevertheless, very eloquently and amply, set forth her maj.'s most hon. and good acceptance of the zeal, duty, and fidelity, of this whole house towards Religion, the safety of her highness's person, and the state of this commonwealth; (in respect whereof her maj. hath so long continued this parl. without dissolution) and declared further, to the great joy and comfort of this whole house, that her maj. nevertheless, of her inestimable and princely good love and disposition, and of her highness's most gracious clemency, construeth the said offence and contempt to be rash, unadvised, proceeding of zeal, and not of the wilful and malicious intent of this house, or of any member of the same; imputing the cause thereof partly to her own lenity towards a brother of that man which now made this motion; (mr. Wentworth) who in the last session was by this house for just causes reprehended and committed, but by her maj. graciously pardoned and restored again. And after many excellent discourses and dilatations of her highness's most hon. and loving care for the advancement of religion and the state, wherein she had before signified her prohibition to this house by the lord chanc. shewed that her highness hath already deeply consulted upon those matters in all due and needful respects, and prepared fit and apt courses to digest them, meet and ready to be delivered unto this house from her highness, by such direction as her maj. thinketh most convenient. And so persuading this house to employ the time about the necessary service of the queen's maj. and of the commonwealth, with due and grave regard to the ancient orders of this house, concludeth, that he thinketh it very meet, that this whole house, or some one of this house, by warrant of the house, in the name of the said house, do make most humble submission unto her maj.; acknowledging the said offence, and praying remission of the same at her highness's hands, with full purpose hereafter to forbear committing of the like offence.

Mr. St. Leger extenuated the said offence; urging 1st, their great affection to her maj., the sincerity of their intention in that motion of the fast; then the imperfections and sins to which not only private men, but public states are also subject, and therefore needed to be supported by prayer, and humiliation; and then he urged, the great fault and remissness of the bps. who suffered that most necessary duty of fasting and humiliation to grow even out of use in the church; lastly, he trusted that both her maj. and all her subjects, would be ready to express their true repentance to God in humbling themselves in sack-cloth and ashes.

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer admonished the house of their duty which they did owe to so good and gracious a prince, and urged the house to submission.

Mr. Seckford, urged the same submission, but thought it very fitting, and could wish it; that mr. Vice-Chamberlain who had brought the Message from her maj. of her displeasure, might also carry the house's submission back again unto her highness.

Mr. Flowerden shewed the sincerity of his intention in speaking for the Fast; but now concluded, that it was most fitting for the house to make their submission to her maj.

Mr. Carleton stood up and offered to have spoken, but was interrupted by mr. Speaker and the house. Then

Mr. Speaker asked the question, Whether mr. Vice-Chamberlain should carry the submission of the house to her maj. and it was agreed to by the consent of the whole house.

Mr. Carleton offered again to speak, saying with some repetition, that what he had to move was for the Liberty of the house; but the Speaker notwithstanding, and the house (out of a tender care as it seemeth to give no further distaste to her maj.) did stay him.

Jan. 25, Mr. Vice-Chamberlain brought Answer from her maj. of her most gracious acceptance of the submission, and of her maj.'s admonition and confidence of their discreet proceeding; with one special note, that they do not misreport the cause of her misliking, which was not, for that they desired Fasting and Prayer, but for the manner in presuming to indict a Form of publick Fast without order and without her privy, which was to intrude upon her authority ecclesiastical.

Motion for securing the Kingdom, &c. against the Pope, &c. Sir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the exchequer, rose and said, "Mr. Speaker, The principal cause of our assembly here, being to consult of matters that do concern the realm, I have thought good with your patience, to remember you of such things, as for the weight and necessity of them I take to be worthy of your considerations. Wherein I mean to note unto you what I have conceived, 1st of the present State we be in; next, of the Dangers we may justly be in doubt of; and lastly, what Provision ought to be made in time to prevent or resist them.—That our most gracious Queen did at her first entry loosen us from the yoke of Rome, and did restore unto this realm the most pure and holy religion of the gospel, which for a time was over-shadowed with Popery, is known of all the world, and felt of us to our singular comforts. But from hence, as from the root, hath sprung that implacable malice of the Pope, and his confederates against her, whereby they have, and do seek, not only to trouble, but if they could, to bring the realm again into thralldom; the rather for that they hold this as a firm and settled opinion, that England is the only settled monarchy that most doth maintain and countenance religion, being the chief sanctuary for the afflicted members of the church that fly thither from the tyranny of Rome, as men being in danger of shipwreck, do from a raging and tempestuous sea, to a calm and quiet haven. This being so, what hath not the Pope essayed to annoy the Queen and her State, thereby, as he thinketh, to remove this great obstacle that standeth between him and the over-flowing of the world again with Popery? For the proof whereof these may suffice. The northern Rebellion stirred up by the Pope, and the quarrel for Popery: The maintenance sithence of those rebels and other fugitives: The publishing of a most impudent, blasphemous and malicious bull against our most rightful queen: The Invasion into Ireland by James Fitz-Morrice, with the assistance of some English rebels: The raising of a dangerous Rebellion in Ireland by the earl of Desmond and others, intending thereby to make a general revolt of all the whole realm: The late invasion of strangers into Ireland, and their fortifying it.—The Pope turned thus the venom of his curses and the pens of his malicious parasites into men of war and weapons, to win that by force, which otherwise he could not do. And though all these are said to be done by the Pope, and in his name, yet who seeth not that they be maintained under-hand by some princes his confederates? And if any man be in doubt of that, let him but note from whence the last invasion into Ireland came, of what country the ships, and of what nation the most part of the soldiers were, and by direction of whose ministers they received their victual and furniture.—For the Pope of himself at this present, is far unable to make war upon any prince of that estate which her maj. is of, having lost, as you know, many years, by the preaching of the gospel, those infinite revenues which he was wont to have out of England, Scotland, Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, and others; and now out of France and the Low-Countries; so as we are to think that his name only is used, and all, or the most part of the charge, born by others.

The Queen nevertheless by the almighty power of God standeth fast, maugre the Pope and all his friends; having hitherto resisted all attempts against her, to her great honour, and their great shame. As; The Rebellion in the north suppressed without effusion of blood, wherein her maj. may say as Cæsar did, 'Veni, vidi, vici;' so expedite and so honourable was the victory that God did give her, by the diligence and valour of those noble men that had the conducting thereof: The Enterprize of James Fitz-Morice defeated, and himself slain: The Italians pulled out by the ears at Smirwick in Ireland, and cut in pieces by the notable service of a noble captain and valiant soldiers.—Neither these nor any other threatenings or fears of danger hath, or doth make her to stagger or relent in the cause of Religion; but like a constant christian princess, she still holdeth fast the profession of the Gospel, that hath so long upholden her, and made us to live in peace 22 years and more under her most gracious govt. free from those troubles that our neighbours have felt.—But yet notwithstanding, seeing our enemies sleep not, it behoveth us not to be careless, as though all were past; but rather to think, that there is but a piece of the storm over, and that the greater part of the tempest remaineth behind, and is like to fall upon us by the malice of the Pope, the determinations of the council of Trent, and the combination of the Pope with other monarchies and princes devoted unto Rome; assuring ourselves that if their powers be answerable to their wills, this realm shall find at their hands all the miseries and extremities that they can bring upon it. And though by the late good success which God hath given in Ireland, these lewd and malicious enterprizes seem for a time to be as it were at a stand; yet let us be assured, that neither their attempts upon Ireland, neither the mischiefs intended against England will cease thus; but if they find us negligent, they will be ready with greater forces than have been yet seen. The certain determination which the Pope and his combined friends have to root out the religion of the gospel in all places, and to begin here as their greatest impediment, is cause sufficient to make us the more vigilant, and to have a wary eye to their doings and proceedings, how smoothly soever they speak or dissemble their friendships for the time: for let us think surely, that they have joined hands together against us; and if they can, they will procure the sparks of the flames that have been so terrible in other countries, to fly over into England, and to kindle as great a fire here. And as the Pope, by open hostility, as you see, hath shewed himself against her maj.; so the better to answer in time the purposes that he hath set down in the mean season till they come to ripeness, he hath and doth by secret practices within this realm leave nothing untried, emboldening many undutiful subjects to stand fast in their disobedience to her maj. and her laws. For albeit the pure religion of the gospel hath had a free course, and hath been freely preached now many years within this realm by the protection of her maj.'s most christian govt.; yet such have been the practices of the Pope and his secret ministers, as the obstinate and stiff-necked Papist is so far from being reformed, as he hath gotten stomach to go backward, and to shew his disobedience not only in arrogant words, but also in contemptuous deeds.—To confirm them herein, and to increase their number, you see how the Pope hath and doth comfort their hollow hearts with absolutions, dispensations, reconciliations, and such other things of Rome. You see how lately he hath sent hither a sort of hypocrites, naming themselves Jesuits, a rabble of vagrant friars newly sprung up, and running through the world to trouble the church of God; whose principal errand is by creeping into the houses of men of behaviour and reputation, not only to corrupt the realm with false doctrine, but also under that pretence, to stir up sedition, to the peril of her maj. and her good subjects.—How these practices of the Pope have wrought in the disobedient subjects of this land, is both evident and lamentable to consider. For such impression hath the estimation of the Pope's authority made in them, as not only those which from the beginning have refused to obey, but many, yea, very many of those which divers years together did yield and conform themselves in their open actions, sithence the decrees of that unholy council of Trent, and sithence the publishing and denouncing of that blasphemous Bull against her maj. and sithence those secret absolutions and reconciliations, and the swarming hither of a number of Popish priests and monkish Jesuits, have and do utterly refuse to be of our Church, or to resort unto our preaching and prayers. The sequel whereof must needs prove dangerous to the whole state of the common-wealth.—By this you see what cause we have justly to doubt great mischief threatened to this realm; and therewith you may easily see also how for the preventing and withstanding of the same, it behoveth her maj. not only to provide in time sufficient laws for the continuing of this peaceable govt. but also to be ready with forces, to repress all attempts that may be enterprized, either by enemies abroad, or by evil subjects at home. What difference there is between the Pope's persecuting Church, and this mild Church of the Gospel, hath been seen in all ages, and especially in the late govt. compared with the merciful time of her maj.'s reign: the continuance of which clemency is also to be wished, so far as may stand with God's honour and the safety of the realm; but when by long proof we find, that this favourable and gentle manner of dealing with the disobeyers and contemners of Religion, to win them by fair means if it were possible, hath done no good, but hath bred in them a more arrogant and contemptuous spirit, so as they have not only presumed to disobey the laws and orders of the realm, but also to accept from Rome secret absolutions, reconciliations, and such like; and that by the hands of lewd runagates, priests, and Jesuits, harbouring and entertaining them even in their houses; thereby shewing an obedience to the Pope, by their direction also nourishing and training up their children and kinsfolks, not only at home, but also abroad, in the seminaries of Popery; now I say it is time for us to look more narrowly and strictly to them, lest as they be corrupt, so they prove dangerous members to many born within the entrails of our commonwealth.—And seeing that the lenity of the time, and the mildness of the laws heretofore made, are no small cause of their arrogant disobedience, it is necessary that we make a Provision of Laws more strict and more severe; to constrain them to yield their open obedience, at the least, to her maj. in causes of Religion, and not to live as they list, to the perilous example of others, and to the encouraging of their own evil affected minds; but if they will needs submit themselves to the benediction of the Pope, they may feel how little his curses can hurt us, and how little his blessings can save them from that punishment which we are able to lay upon them; letting them also find, how dangerous it shall be for them to deal with the Pope, or any thing of his, or with those Romish priests and jesuits; and therewith also how perilous it shall be for those seditious runagates to enter into the land, to draw away from her maj. that obedience, which by the laws of God and man are due unto her. This then is one of the Provisions which we ought to take care of in this council, whereby we may both enjoy still that happy peace we live in, and the Pope take the less boldness to trouble us, by any favour he shall find here. The next is Provision of Forces sufficient to answer any violence that may be offered either here or abroad; for the which you know it is requisite that her maj. do make preparation both by sea and by land. God hath placed this kingdom in an island environed with the sea as with a natural and strong wall, whereby we are not subject to those sudden invasions which other frontier countries be. One of our greatest defences standing by sea, the number of good ships is of the most importance for us. What the queen's navy is, how many notable ships, and how far behind is the navy of any other prince, is known to all men; and therewith also it may be easily considered how great charges be incident to the same. Necessary also it is, that her maj. have Forces by Land sufficient to chastise the rebels in Ireland, and to repress any foreign attempts either there or here. For which services, either by land or by sea, her maj. needeth not as other princes are fain to do, to entertain necessary soldiers of Foreign Countries hardly gotten, costly and dangerously kept, and in the end little or no service done them; but may bring sufficient forces of her own natural subjects, ready and easy to be levied, that carry with them willing, valiant, and faithful minds, such as few nations may easily compare with. But these forces, with their furniture and munition, can neither be prepared nor maintained to have continuance, without provision of Treasure sufficient to bear the charge, being as you know termed of old 'nervus belli.' This belongeth to us to consider, and that in time there be not lack of the sinews that must hold together the strength of our body. And because, through the malice of our enemies, her maj. is driven to keep great Forces in Ireland, for the better suppressing of that Rebellion to her exceeding charge; and for that also it is uncertain, how sudden and how great other attempts may be; therefore in reason, our Supply of that maintenance ought to be the more, especially the wars being at this day so costly as every man in his private expence may easily judge. But lest that peradventure some may judge, that the contribution granted by us now 5 years past, both frankly and dutifully, might suffice for many years without any new; I dare assure you for the acquaintance I have (though I be unworthy) with those her maj.'s affairs, that the same hath not been sufficient to answer the extraordinary charges happened since then, especially those of Ireland, by the one half; but her maj. hath supplied the rest out of her own revenues, sparing from herself to serve the necessity of the realm, and shunning thereby Loans upon Interest, as a most pestilent canker that is able to devour even the states of princes. Which being so, as it is most true, we are not to think upon the charge that is past, but the good we have received by it, being by that provision well and honourably defended against the malice of our enemies. And therefore considering the great benefit we have received by the last payment, being easily taxed and easily borne, whereby we have kept all the rest in peace; let us, as provident counsellors of this state, prepare again in time that which may be able to withstand the mischiefs intended against us. To do this willingly and liberally, our duty to our queen and country, and our safeties, move us. The love and duty that we owe to our most gracious queen, by whose ministry God hath done so great things for us, even such as be wonderful in the eyes of the world, ought to make us more careful for her preservation and security than for our own.—The same love and duty that we owe to our gracious sovereign, and to this our native country, ought to make us all think upon the realm of Ireland as upon a principal member of this crown, having continued so this 400 years or more. To lose that land, or any part thereof, which the enemies seek, would not only bring with it dishonour, but also prove a thing most dangerous to England; considering the nearness of that realm to this, and the goodness of so many notable havens as be there. Again, to reform that nation by planting therein religion and justice, which the enemies labour to in-interrupt, is most godly and necessary; the neglecting whereof hath and will continue that people in all irreligion and disorder, to the great offence of God, and to the infinite charge of this realm.—Finally, let us be mindful also of our safety, thereby to avoid so great dangers, not seen afar off, but imminent over our heads. The quietness that we have by the peaceable govt. of her maj. doth make us to enjoy all that is ours in more freedom than any nation under the sun at this day: but let not that breed in us a careless security, as though this clear sun-light could never be darkened; but let us think certainly that the Pope and his favourers do both envy our felicity, and leave no practice unsought to overthrow the same. And if any man be so dull (as I trust there be none here) that he cannot conceive the blessedness of this our golden peace, except he felt the lack of it; let him but cast his eyes over the seas, into our neighbour's countries, and there behold what trouble the Pope and his ministers have stirred against such as profess the same religion of Jesus Christ as we do.—Therefore to conclude. Seeing the malice of the pope and his confederates are so notorious unto us, and seeing the dangers be so great, and seeing that preparations to withstand them cannot be made without support of the realm; and seeing that our duties to God, our queen and country, and the necessity that hangeth upon our own safe-guards, be reasons sufficient to persuade us; let us think upon these matters as the weight of them deserveth; and so provide in time both by laws to restrain and correct the evil affected subjects, and by provision of that which shall be requisite for the maintenance of forces as our enemies finding our minds so willing, and our hands so ready to keep our country in order, and to furnish her maj. with all that shall be necessary, may either be discouraged to attempt any thing against us, or if they do, they may find such resistance, as shall bring confusion to themselves, honour to our most gracious queen, and safety to us all."

Mr. Norton pursued the same admonition, and required the house to proceed to a manner of executing it; which in his opinion was to appoint all the privy-council of this house, and certain other fit persons, to consult of bills convenient to be framed according to the said motion to be presented to the house; which motion also was well allowed, and Committees were accordingly appointed.

There were few debates on any considerable points during this session; the bill for a Supply being passed without any. There are also many orders and regulations relating to Elections, &c. but none of them are material enough for our purpose. The house also thought fit to petition the queen, on the old score of making some farther Reformation in Religion. But this was touched so tenderly, in the Petition, that she thought fit to give them a favourable answer to it: on which the house came to a resolution to take no more notice of this affair, but to leave it to the Speaker, in his Speech at the end of the session, to recommend this Reformation to her maj. as he thought proper.

The Speaker's Speech to the Queen at the close of the Session.] March 18th, the Queen came to the house of lords, when the Speaker of the Commons, &c. being admitted, on the presenting of the Bills to her maj. he spoke to this effect:—"That the chief purpose in making of Laws did consist of 3 principal parts, to wit, the first, for the true and sincere service and glory of God; 2ndly, for the surety and preservation of her maj.'s person; and 3rdly, for the good, quiet, and benefit of the commonwealth; ascribing the sincere and plentiful preaching of God's Word, with the due and right use of Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments, and the true exercise and discipline in the churches, to be the ordinary means both of the advancement of God's glory, her maj.'s safety, and of her subjects prosperity; the dew of the Word watering and bringing forth in all good christian consciences, the true knowledge and fear of God, faithful love and due obedience unto her maj. and perfect unity in the general society of this commonwealth. And the exercise of the sword of Discipline to cut off, repress and correct all excesses and errors tending to the impeachment of all good effects aforesaid. Declaring further unto her highness, that her maj.'s nobles and commons in this present parl. had very carefully, gravely, and dutifully travelled in this present session, to devise and ordain good and wholesome laws for those ends and purposes, to be established and allowed by her highness; and also, some other good and necessary laws, as well for the whole state of the commonwealth in general, as for the private benefit and necessary relief of sundry her maj.'s particular good subjects: and so recommending all the same unto her highness, and especially 2 of them, whereof one doth chiefly and principally tend to the bridling and reforming of her maj.'s disobedient and obstinate subjects, the utter adversaries of true religion, and the most pernicious and dangerous enemies of her highness's most royal person, state and govt.; the 2nd, for the due maintenance and preservation of her majesty's honour, good fame and dignity; humbly besought her majesty to give life unto all the said Laws by her royal assent. And then yielding unto her highness most humble thanks, in the name of the whole house, for her maj.'s most gracious acceptation of their most humble petition unto her highness for Reformation of some Abuses yet remaining in the church; and most humbly renewing the speedy consideration thereof unto her maj.'s good remembrance at her good will and pleasure, did further most humbly beseech her highness, in the name and behalf of the Commons of her realm, that her maj. would (at their most humble suit, the rather) have a vigilant and provident care of the safety of her most royal person, against the malicious attempts of some mighty foreign enemies abroad, and the traitorous practices of most unnatural disobedient subjects both abroad and at home, envying the blessed and most happy and quiet govt. of this realm under her highness; upon the thread of whose life only, next under God, dependeth the life and whole state and stay of every her good and dutiful subjects.—And withal, that it might please her highness to have such good care and regard generally for the maintenance of Mariners, and of Navigation, the very strength and walls of her maj.'s realms and dominions, as may seem most convenient unto her highness from time to time. And so declaring, that her maj.'s Nobles and Commons, having had consideration of her highness's great charges many ways for defence of her realms and people against foreign enemies, and rebellious subjects, both already employed, and hereafter to be employed, have granted unto her highness one Subsidy, and two 15ths and 10ths, which they besought her highness to accept in good part according to their humble duties; and gave her maj. most humble thanks for her highness's most gracious, general and free Pardon."

The Lord Chancellor's Answer.] The Lord Chancellor by her maj.'s commandment, answering very excellently and briefly the parts of mr. Speaker's oration, did amongst other things deliver her maj.'s most hearty thanks unto both Houses, for their great and good care for the safety of her person, and also of her honour, good fame and dignity; not yet comprehending within those general thanks, such members of the Commons as have this session dealt more rashly in some things than was fit for them to do; and giving them withal like hearty thanks for the said contribution of a Subsidy and two 15ths and 10ths, in that it was granted as willingly and frankly, and also as largely and amply, and to be answered as speedily, as any other like ever hath been; taking the same in as good part as if it had been to her own private use; where in very deed it is to be employed to the general service and benefit of the whole realm.—Then giving the royal assent to 15 public and 15 private bills, he prorogued the parl. to the 24th of April.

We have now another chain of Adjournments, from time to time, of the same parl. for 3 years more. During this period, except the affair of the still imprisoned Queen of Scots which will be treated of in the sequel, there is nothing to our purpose.

The Parl. dissolved, after 18 Prorogations.] On the 19th of April 1583, the parl. being met, after 18 prorogations, the lord chancellor delivered a Commission from the queen, directed to himself, and many of the peers, to the clerk of parl. to be read; by which Commission, they were authorized to dissolve it. Accordingly, this parl. was dissolved, after it had subsisted very near 11 years.

A new Parl. called.] Writs were issued for a new parl. to meet on the 23d of Nov. 1585. The Journals of the Lords are now a little more particular in the recital of their daily proceedings, than of late years. We are told that, on the meeting, the lord chancellor, Bromley, opened the cause of the summons, by the queen's command, being seated on the throne, in a short, but accurate Speech for that purpose. The Receivers and Tryers of Petitions, being appointed, the next day the Commons presented John Puckering, esq; serjeant at law, to the queen, for their Speaker, who, with the usual ceremonies, was admitted. No particular speeches are entered, in either Journal, at the meeting of this parl. On the 21st of Dec. the Queen by her letters patents, adjourned the parl. to the 4th of Feb. following.

Act against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, &c.]

Two days before the said adjournment happened, a remarkable bill was sent up by the commons, entitled, 'A bill against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and other such disobedient Persons.' On the 2d day of their meeting, after the adjournment, this bill was re-assumed; and on the first reading in the lords, was committed. We hear no more of this bill till March 10th, when a Conference was desired by the lower house with some of the Lords about it. On the same day another was sent up with this title, 'An act for the Security of her Majesty's most Royal Person, and continuing the Realm in Peace.' March 15, the Jesuit's bill passed the Lords with some amendments, agreed to by both houses, and afterwards became a statute. By it was enacted, "That they, and all other Popish priests, should depart the realm within 40 days. That those who should afterwards return into the kingdom, should be guilty of high-treason. That he, who shall wittingly and willingly harbour, relieve, and maintain them, should be guilty of felony; that those English who were brought up in seminaries abroad, if they returned within 6 months after notice given, and submitted not themselves to the queen, before a bp. or two justices, should be guilty of high-treason. And if any, so submitting themselves, should within 10 years approach the queen's court, or come within 10 miles thereof, their submission should be void. That they, who by any means whatsoever, should send or convey over any money to students in such seminaries, should incur the penalty of a Præmunire. That if any of the peers of the realm, or barons of parl. should offend against these laws, he should be brought to his trial by his peers. That if any should know of any such Jesuits, or other priests, above said, lurking within the realm, and should not discover them within 12 days, he should be fined and imprisoned at the queen's pleasure. That if any man should be suspected to be a Jesuit or Priest, aforesaid, and not submit himself to examination, he should, for his contempt, be imprisoned till he did submit. That he who should send his children, or any others, to seminaries and colleges of the Popish profession, should be fined 100l. And that those, who were so sent thither, should not succeed as heirs, nor enjoy any estates, which should any way fall to them; the like for all such as should not return home from the said seminaries, within a year, unless they did conform themselves to the church of England. That if the wardens or officers of the ports should permit any others, besides seamen or merchants, to cross the seas, without licence from the queen or 6 privy-counsellors, they should be put out of their places; and the masters of such ships as carried them, should forfeit their ships and goods, and suffer imprisonment for a year."—Camden informs us that the bill met with no opposition, in either House, but, only, from one member of the Commons. His name was Wm. Parry, a Welshman, and a civilian; who, pleading against it, said, that 'it was a cruel, bloody and desperate law, and would be of pernicious consequence to the English nation.' Being desired to shew his reasons, he obstinately refused, unless it was before the queen's council. Upon this he was taken into custody; but, his reasons being afterwards heard, and submission made, he was admitted again into the house. Though, this zealous man had better have held his tongue; for, shortly he was accused of being in a plot to subvert the govt. and take away the Queen's life: and was found guilty and executed, as a traitor for it, before the palace-gate at Westminster, whilst the parl. was yet sitting. See Camden, p. 501, also, a long account of this conspiracy and Parry's confession, &c. in Hollingshead, p. 1384.

Act for the Surety of the Queen's Person] Another strong bulwark was framed this parl. in support of the present govt.; and that was a bill mentioned before, for the Surety of the queen's Royal Person, and the continuance of Peace in the Realm. This was a stroke, aimed, directly, at the Queen of Scots and her title, and whoever durst attempt to set it up. It was passed in the Lords, March 13; and by it an Association, as it is here called, was established; the first of this kind we have yet met with. Thereby it was enacted, "That 24, or more, of the privy council and house of lords, to be deputed by the queen's commission, should make inquisition after all such as should invade the kingdom, raise rebellion, or attempt to hurt or destroy the queen's person, for or by whomsoever employed that might lay claim to the crown of England. And that the person, for whom or by whom they should attempt the same, should be utterly incapable of any title to the crown, be deprived wholly of all right to it, and prosecuted to death by all faithful subjects; if the person should be judged, by these 24 men, to be guilty of such rebellion, invasion, or treasonable attempt, and by public proclamation so declared."

A Subsidy.] March 13th, the Commons sent up a Grant of a Supply to her maj. consisting of one entire Subsidy, which was 2s. 8d. on goods, and 4s. on lands, according to Stowe, p. 702; and two 15ths and 10ths. On the 2d reading, the Lords dropped the 10ths; and it was passed so by the printed statutes. An act for a Subsidy of 6s. in the pound, from the Clergy, to be paid in 3 years, was, also, confirmed this session.

The first bill of moment read in the Commons was, for the better and more reverent observance of the Sabbath-Day. Nov. 27, it was committed to a number of members; who, we find, framed a new one, which was read, but did not pass the two houses without much dispute and great difficulty.

Nov. 28, sir Walter Mildmay, chanc. of the excheq. taking occasion to speak of the sudden calling of this parl. at such an unseasonable time of the year, and the likelihood of the short continuance of it, did thereupon declare the same to be called for very urgent and necessary causes. Sir C. Hatton, spoke to the same effect; but both the speeches are omitted in the Journals, though they lasted above 2 hours. At the end of which a Committee was appointed to consider of a Supply.

Dec. 14, three Petitions were read touching the Liberty of godly Preachers, to exercise and continue their ministry; and also, for the speedy supply of able and sufficient men into divers places, now destitute of the ordinary means of Salvation. But though the farther proceedings were deferred to a more convenient time by the house, yet, one dr. Turner rose up and put the house in mind of a Bill and Book which he had offered to them; and, as he said, this Bill and Book being framed by certain godly and learned ministers, tending, as he conceived, to the glory of God, the safety of her maj. and the good of the commonwealth; therefore prayed that it might be read. To this, sir Fr. Knolles replied, but in few words; and after him sir C. Hatton more largely; who pressed and moved the house so much therein, that it was at length resolved that the said Bill and Book should not be read. And, as to all necessary liberty to the aforesaid ministers, or a supply of able men in places that wanted, it was not doubted but that her maj. would take some speedy order about them. Then sir C. Hatton moved, "That for the better and more speedy expedition of other great matters now in hand, the house would proceed to the reading of a bill, lately finished, for the Safety and Preservation of the Queen's Royal Person. And the rather because he conceived they would shortly be adjourned till after Christmas."

Dr. Parry opposes the Bill against Jesuits and Seminary Priests, &c.] Dec. 17, the bill against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and such like disobedient Subjects was passed with little or no opposition, but from dr. Parry, mentioned before. The Journals of the Commons are more particular, than the historian before quoted, about this affair, which we shall give in their own words as follows:—"The bill passed the house with little or no argument, except from one dr. Parry, who in very violent terms spake directly against the whole bill; affirming it to savour of treasons, to be full of blood, danger, despair, and terror or dread to the English subjects of this realm, our brethren, uncles, and kinsfolks; and also full of confiscations, but unto whom? Not, said he, to her maj. (which he wished they were) and said, he did not think the contrary but that zeal would cause the bill to have passage both in this House and with the Lords; but yet he hoped when it should come into her highness's most merciful hands, that it would stay and rest there; until which time he would reserve his reasons of his negative voice against the bill, then to be discovered by him only unto her maj.—Whereupon dr. Parry, by order of this House, was appointed to be sequestered into the outer room of this house into the serjeant's custody, and without conferring with any, whilst the matter now in question, concerning his former speeches against the bill last passed, is in debating, until he shall be called in again. And afterwards, being brought to the bar, and there kneeling upon his knee, he was told by mr. Speaker in name of the whole House, That if he thought good, the House was contented to hear him what reasons he could yield for himself in maintenance of his said speeches against the aforesaid bill, to the better satisfaction of this House; or what other matter of excuse he could alledge touching his former contempt, uttered in the presence of this said house, in very unseemly manner, and in unfitting words, in that he did speak so reproachfully against a bill, first travelled in, and publicly allowed of in the House; and then considerately and maturely perused and digested by so great and grave a committee, selected out of the ablest members of this House, who having further diligently and dutifully laboured therein, and brought it again into the House with one unanimous approbation of it as of a good and necessary bill; and that, lastly, it had been also so approved of this day, and upon the 3rd reading had passed the House; and yet, that he, the said dr. Parry, had termed the said bill to be a bill savouring of treasons, and to be full of confiscations, blood, danger, despair, and terror to the subjects of this realm; and withal, that he would well prove and justify the same by good reasons, which nevertheless he would not deliver to this House; but would reserve them only to be revealed to her maj. Whereupon being further demanded as aforesaid, What further excuse or defence he could make for himself? He answered, That what he had said (and bound it with a protestation) was without any intent of offence towards the Queen or towards the House; and made repetition of his said former words, and still avowed the justification of the same. And so entering into some declaration of his own estate tending altogether to his own credit, as of his sundry good services done to her maj. his reputation with persons of good sort, and other such like speeches, concluded, that as before when he spake to the bill, and gave his negative voice to the same, he then concealed his said reasons from this house, so he would now conceal the same still.—Whereupon being sequestered again, it was resolved, That for that he did speak to the bill, and gave his negative voice so directly and undutifully, and in contempt of this house would not shew his reasons for the same, being merely against the ancient orders and usage of this high court, and not for that he said he would shew them only to be discovered to her maj. it was resolved, That he should be committed to the serjeant's ward till the matter shall be further considered of by this House, the day being then very far spent.—The next day mr. Vice-Chamberlain declared unto the House, that her maj. having been made privy unto the misbehaviour of dr. Parry yesterday shewed in this house, and of the order of this House taken therein with him for the same; her highness doth not only deem him to have given just cause of offence unto this house, but also doth very well allow of the grave discretion of this House, in forbearing for the time to use any sharp course of correction against him; in respect that he had said he reserved his reasons to be imparted to her maj. only; which as he had discovered unto some of the Lords of the Council by her highness's appointment, and that partly to the satisfaction of her maj. so her highness did think, that upon his humble submission unto this House, with a dutiful acknowledgment of his fault, this house would the rather dispense with him therein.—Which done, dr. Parry was called to the bar, where humbly acknowledging his fault upon his knees, it was told him by mr. Speaker, after he had put him in remembrance of the manner of his offence, that it might be the House would nevertheless deal favourably with him, if they should see such cause upon his unfeigned and earnest confession and repentance of his fault, and his humble submission unto the house, with good and dutiful endeavour of amendment hereafter. And then kneeling upon his knee in very humble manner, affirmed directly, that he had very undutifully misbehaved himself, and had rashly and unadvisedly uttered those speeches he used, and was with all his heart very sorry for it; alledging withal, that he had never been of this House before this session, and so could not so well know the orders of the House as he should do; and that he would not willingly offend this House, nor any man in it; and so humbly prayed their good favour towards him.—Whereupon being sequestered again out of the House, it was after some arguments and speeches had, resolved, That upon that his said acknowledgment of his fault, and his humble submission, he should be received into this House again as a member of the same, and take his place as before, so that he would afterwards use himself in good sort as he ought to do. And thereupon being called again to the bar, and there kneeling upon his knee, and directly reiterating his former confession of his fault, and also, his former humble submission; protesting further, that if ever after he should give any just cause of offence again to this House, or any member thereof, he would then never after crave any more favour of them.—Whereupon Mr. Speaker declared the good pleasure of this House in remitting his said offence by receiving him again into them, with condition and hope of his better behaviour hereafter. Which as he professed and promised to perform accordingly, so did he in very good dutiful sort, give most humble thanks unto God, and to her maj. and also unto this whole House, and to every member of the same, for their good, courteous, and favourable dealing towards him in this behalf.—But the affair had a more tragical end after Christmas, as hath been already related.

The Parl. adjourned.] Dec. 19, Mr. Vice-Chamberlain declared unto the house, that her maj. considering the great pains and faithful travels of that house in the service of affairs in the realm, had determined to adjourn the parl. till after Christmas; that gentlemen might the more conveniently repair to their own home, in the mean time, for their better ease and recreation. On which it was resolved, that the most humble and dutiful Thanks of this House be returned to her maj. for this her most gracious consideration, and for her gracious acceptation of their dutiful care for providing for the security of her royal person.

The Queen's Answer to the Address of Thanks.] To this Address of Thanks Mr. Vice-Chamberlain returned the following Answer; “in which he set forth her maj.’s most gracious acceptation of the humble and most dutiful thankfulness of this House, so presented unto her highness, to her right great and high satisfaction, joy, and comfort; and declared withal, that her highness did for the same give most hearty and loving Thanks unto this whole House, yea, and that in redoubling to them their thanks ten thousand thousand-fold; and so further shewed both the ready, careful, and obedient affections of this whole House to the dutiful service of her maj. and also on the other side, her highness’s incomparable princely account and regard of all such loyal, loving, and faithful subjects; and concluded, that her maj.’s pleasure was, that this House should well know, that in the consideration of the free course of the gospel of Jesus Christ amongst us, our long continued peace, and plenty of God’s good blessings and benefits bestowed upon us under the ministry of her highness, her maj. doth most sincerely ascribe all the same only and wholly to the great goodness and mercy of Almighty God; attributing the cause of these good effects (next under God’s Providence) to the good demerits of so religious, godly, and obedient subjects, of whom how well and kindly her maj. doth think and conceive, her highness had much rather have told them in her own most royal person, than have signified it unto them by any other, if it might have conveniently been so done, as upon the opportunity of a prorogation or dissolution of this court. And further declared, that her maj. having regard to the great charges and expences of their attendance in the service of this great council of the realm, wisheth them, at their next meeting again, to bestow the time as much as may be, in public and general actions, fittest for the commonweal of this realm, and that with as little loss of time as may be. And withal, that those of this House towards the Law would join together, to do their best endeavours to devise some good laws to abridge and cut off the long and tedious courses, and extreme chargeable circuits, and superfluous delays of Suits in Law; not doubting, but that in so doing God will bless their wealth and good estates, both in themselves and in their posterity. And so having, as he thought, dutifully imparted unto them the sum and substance of her maj.’s pleasure and message committed unto this house by him, though not in such effectual and singular kind terms and forms as her princely wisdom delivered the same unto him; and so referring himself to the residue of this house of her maj.’s council, then and now present, to be put in remembrance by them, if he have omitted any part thereof, and they affirming he had not, he ended his speech.”

Mr. Vice-Chamberlain's Prayer in the House, &c.] Dec. 21, when the parl. was adjourned to the 4th of Feb. following, “the said Mr. Vice-Chamberlain stood up again, and putting the House in mind of her maj.’s most princely and loving kindnesses, signified unto this house, in the former Messages and Declarations of her highness’s thankful acceptations of the dutiful cares and travels of this House in the service of her maj. and the realm, moved the House, ‘that besides the rendering of our most humble and loyal Thanks unto her highness, we do, being assembled together, join our hearts and minds together in most humble and earnest Prayer unto Almighty God, for the long continuance of the most prosperous preservation of her maj. with most due and thankful acknowledgment of his infinite benefits and blessings, poured upon this whole realm, through the mediation of her highness’s ministry under him.’ And he said, he had a Paper in writing in his hand, devised and set down by an honest, godly, and learned man, and which, albeit it was not very well written, yet he would willingly read it as well as he could, if it pleased them to follow and say after him, as he should begin and say before them. Which being assented unto most willingly of all the whole House, and every one kneeling upon his knees, the said Mr. Vice-Chamberlain begun the said prayer. Which being ended, every one departed away for that time, until the said day of adjournment.” At which time this parl. being met again, we find nothing in their proceedings to our purpose; the first days of their sitting being taken up with a long dispute between the two Houses relative to the form of passing a bill to prevent fraudulent Conveyances; and another, for the better Observance of the Sabbath-day.

A Subsidy granted.] Feb. 23d, the Commons took into consideration the state of the nation, the dangers which were imminent over the kingdom, and the means to prevent them; the great expences her maj. had been at, &c. In which the following particulars are observed: "The open Dangers threatened to this kingdom are from Spain, the pope and the holy league in France; the secret from the Jesuits, that secretly lurked here to stir up her maj.'s subjects of the Roman religion to all manner of treason and rebellion: both which dangers though the time of them were a while intermitted in respect of the execution, yet the purpose was not; which their late conspiracies and attempts both here and in Ireland did plainly shew."—The Means to prevent these Dangers were to suppress the spreading of Jesuits and the growing of popery; to exact such oaths of the Papists as had been already ordained; to provide for the preservation of her maj.'s person; to terrify Ireland, and to provide sufficient forces at home both by land and sea.—The great Expence that her maj. had been at, even since the last parl. did appear plainly in respect of divers places and forts which had been repaired, much powder and munition had been stored up, and her navy also since that time increased: besides many other extraordinary charges and expences which she had been at, in the assisting of her allies, and the preserving of Ireland; and that her maj. did specially shun danger from Ireland, of which they conceived this proverb to be true, 'Look to Ireland if we will rest quiet in England.' And therefore some members, of the privy-council, did move to think of what Supply were now fit to be given to her maj. towards the supporting and sustaining of all her said great Expences and Charges.—On the next day a motion being made for a Supply to be granted to her maj. a large Committee of the Commons were appointed to meet and draw up a bill for that purpose; which was mentioned before in our account of the lords.—March 29th, when the Queen came to the Lords, and the Commons attending, the Speaker after his humble reverence made, and some expressions of his thankfulness to her maj. proceeded according to the usual course, to desire her maj. to give life to such Laws, by adding her gracious allowance unto them, as had passed either House, and remained as yet but as a dead letter; and withal, gave her maj. knowledge of the free gift of the Commons, of one Subsidy and two 15ths and 10ths. To which Speech the lord chanc. by her maj.'s commandment, answered, "That she did graciously accept of the said gift of her Commons, and was come thither to give her royal assent to divers of those Laws which had passed the two Houses."

The Speaker's Speech to the Queen at the close of the Session.] There is no Speech entered in the Journal of either House, made by the Speaker at this time; nor does sir S. D'Ewes supply it from any other authority. We are obliged to mr. Strype however, for bringing the following to light, from the MS. Collections in the Burleigh Family, belonging originally to the lord treasurer:—"Most excellent prince and gracious queen; "The last time of my being in this place before your most excellent maj. and this hon. assembly of your 3 estates, I did make my most humble submission and request, upon the knowledge of my disability and unworthiness, that I might have been forborn to have occupied in this place. But such was your maj.'s gracious opinion, as it seemed, conceived of me upon the election of your faithful and obedient subjects, the whole Commonalty of your realm; that I was thereto directed. And as then I best knowing mine own insufficiencies did, for my excuse, desire your maj.'s gracious acceptation of that which was only in my power; which was of my good will, diligence, and endeavour to be bestowed in this service: so now, if I should not acknowledge in this place, (having here in my company so many witnesses against me) the multitude of imperfections, that I have found in myself, during the time of this my service, I should shew myself to be over partial to mine own cause, and, in some sort, to be void of modesty. But knowing your maj.'s accustomed goodness, to accept the good wills and endeavours of all men in your services, without any strait regard or account of the events or successes of their actions; and therewith having also had, in this session of parl. daily proofs of the favourable toleration of my lacks, by grave, wise, and experimented persons and the good will generally of the whole body of your Commons towards me, in their quiet allowance of my service; I am the bolder, throwing behind my back these my lacks and wants, as things not now to be imputed to me; and am to present myself in your maj.'s sight according to my office, as a person allowed by your maj.'s goodness only, and not by my deserts; and so to proceed to present to your maj. in the name of all your Commons, 1st, our most humble thanks for the benefits that we have received by your maj.'s permission, to have this assembly so long continued: 2ndly, our like humble requests for pardon of any thing, which through ignorance, without any intention of offence, in our consultations might be, by your maj.'s great wisdom, imputed to us. And lastly, I am also, in their names, to exhibit our most humble and earnest petitions to your maj. to give life to the works not of our hands, but of our minds, cogitations and hearts: which otherwise than being lightened by the beams of your favour, shall be but vain, dumb and dead.—For the 1st I do confess, that in the name of all your Commons here assembled, and so I may presume to add the like for the Lords here assembled in your maj.'s presence, we cannot imagine, how your maj. can bestow a greater Benefit, that can deserve more thanks of your subjects universally, than that your maj. as you have heretofore at many times, so now especially in this time, when our necessity, for many respects required the same, summoned your whole realm, by calling your estates together to this parl. to consult freely what were first meet for the advancement of God's service, by which we only have our being; and what were also necessary for the preservation of your maj.'s person, by whose long life and continuance we are kept free from the tyranny and subjection of foreign oppression. And lastly, to devise among ourselves, and provide not only as should be, both in general and particular, good and profitable for our own estates, but also to foresee how to avoid things hurtful to the same; to which good end we do acknowledge that, by your maj.'s goodness and permission, our assembly now hath tended. And for that good which we are to receive thereby, we do yield to your maj. our most humble thanks; beseeching God to grant to your maj. many happy years, above the term of our lives. That as we have already, so after us our posterity may receive the like benefits of your goodness from time to time, as cause shall require; to procure to themselves by good laws under your govt. like means to live in such peace, happiness and wealth, as we have done, from the beginning of your reign: and as our forefathers never did the like with such continuance; 2ndly, we humbly beseech your maj. to give your accustomed gracious interpretations to all our proceedings. Wherein if any speeches, motions, or petitions have past from us, that might have miscontented your maj. in your great wisdom above our capacities; I can assure your maj. that in this assembly, wherein I was always present, there was never found in any speech, private or public, any argument or token of the mind of any person that shewed any intention to be offensive to your maj. And for proof hereof, when it pleased your maj. to direct me to declare your pleasure to the Commons House, in what sort you would they should stay any further debating of the manner of reformation of such things as they thought might be reformed in the Church, I found them all ready to obey your maj.'s pleasure therein: which as it seemed to me, and so I have cause to persuade with myself, they did. For that it was well understood, that your maj. as having by God's ordinance a supreme authority for that purpose, had straitly charged the abps. bps. and your whole Clergy now assembled in their convocation, to have due regard to see to the Reformation of divers abuses in the govt. and discipline of the Church. And so our firm hope is, that your maj. will, by your strait commandment to your Clergy, continue your care to see, and command, that such abuses as are crept into the Church by the negligence of the ministers, may be speedily reformed, to the honour of Almighty God, and to your own immortal praise, and comfort of your subjects.—The next matter whereof I have to speak, is most humbly to request your maj. to yield your royal assent to such Petitions, both general and particular, as have been upon long deliberation determined and conceived in writing, with uniform consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and us your Commons, in this your parl. assembled. And though in your maj.'s princely sight many of those our Petitions may seem to be of mean value, either because they be, some of them, particular; or because the matters of some of them may seem to be of low and base degree: yet considering of them to whom they belong, the same are of as great importance and benefit, as to greater estates greater matters are; and the lack of the benefits which to them may grow thereby, shall be as grievous, as the lack of greater in greater bodies: and, as in every natural body, the meanest parts and members are by the head regarded as beneficial, for one means or other, to the rest of the whole body: so we with all humbleness, in the name of the whole body, do beseech your maj. as our only head, and fountain of our life, to accept the meanest Petitions for the comforts of the parts of the body, to whom the same may belong: as we know your maj. of your clemency, is accustomed with your most gracious eyes and countenance, to comfort daily your basest and poorest subjects, seeking relief at your feet.—Next to this we do offer to your maj. with our whole hearts, our bodies and lives, to be serviceable to the safety of your maj.'s noble Person. For defence whereof, and for revenge of any act imagnate against your maj. we have by a form of law, if it shall like your maj. to assent thereto, given a testimony to the whole world, how dear the safety of your life is to us. And this I do assure your maj. that we were most willing to have extended this ordinance to a far straiter course, as we thought the same meet for your safety, and for terrifying of all persons not well-willing to you; if otherwise we had not understood, that your maj.'s pleasure was, that it should not be extended to any straiter points than it is.—And as your maj. hath a manifest demonstration hereby of our hearts and minds, so also we have added (for a further outward declaration thereof by our deeds, offered to your maj. of our voluntary minds) a small portion out of those worldly goods which God hath given us, and by the long peace under your blessed govt. we have increased; by way of a Subsidy, and two 15ths to be used by your maj. as in former times you have always done, for the defence of your realm, and us your humble subjects. Which though we know shall not amount to the value that percase shall be needful for the defence of your realms, against all attempts that may be ministered by the enemies of God, and of your maj.; yet your maj. may make an assured account, that besides this our offer, you cannot lack a further Supply of the rest that we have, to be spent, or committed to your direction, as cause shall require.—Lastly, upon our knees we do most humbly yield our hearty thanks for your most gracious and free general Pardon: whereby a great multitude of your subjects are to be relieved of divers pains and penalties; which by the order of your laws your maj. might most justly have inflicted upon them. By which your clemency we all shall take occasion, besides our thankfulness for so great a benefit, to endeavour ourselves more carefully to observe your laws, both to the honour of God, and to the comfort of your maj.; and, finally to the maintenance of peace, tranquillity and concord among ourselves.”

The Queen's Speech at proroguing the Parl.]

The royal assent being given to 30 public and 13 private Acts, her Majesty, in person, made the following Speech to both Houses of parl.:

“My Lords and ye of the Lower House; My silence must not injure the owner so much, as to suppose a substitute sufficient to render you the thanks that my heart yieldeth you, not so much for the safe keeping of my life, for which your care appears so manifest, as for the neglecting your private future peril, not regarding other way than my present state.—No prince herein, I confess, can be surer tied or faster bound than I am with the link of your good-will, and can for that but yield a heart and a head to seek for ever all your best; yet one matter toucheth me so near, as I may not overskip, Religion, the ground on which all other matters ought to take root, and being corrupted, may marr all the tree. And that there be some fault-finders with the Order of the Clergy, which so may make a slander to myself and the Church, whose over-ruler God hath made me; whose negligence cannot be excused, if any schisms or errors heretical were suffered. Thus much I must say, that some faults and negligences may grow and be, as in all other great charges it happeneth, and what vocation without? All which if you my Lords of the Clergy do not amend, I mean to depose you. Look ye therefore well to your charges. This may be amended without heedless or open exclamations. I am supposed to have many studies, but most philosophical. I must yield this to be true, that I suppose few (that be no professors) have read more. And I need not tell you, that I am so simple that I understand not, nor so forgetful that I remember not; and yet amidst my many volumes, I hope God's Book hath not been my seldomest lectures, in which we find that which by reason (for my part) we ought to believe; that seeing so great wickedness and greives in the world in which we live, but as wayfaring pilgrims, we must suppose that God would never have made us but for a better place, and of more comfort than we find here. I know no creature that breatheth, whose life standeth hourly in more peril for it than mine own, who entred not into my state without sight of manifold dangers of life and crown, as one that had the mightiest and greatest to wrestle with.

Then it followeth that I regarded it so much, as I left my life behind my care; and so you see that you wrong me too much (if any such there be) as doubt my coldness in that behalf; for if I were not persuaded that mine were the true way of God's will, God forbid that I should live to prescribe it to you. Take you heed lest Ecclesiastes say not too true, ‘They that fear the hoary frost, the snow shall fall upon them.’ I see many over-bold with God Almighty, making too many subtle scannings of his blessed will, as lawyers do with human testaments. The presumption is so great, as I may not suffer it (yet mind I not hereby to animate Romanists, which what adversaries they be to mine estate is sufficiently known) nor tolerate New-fangledness. I mean to guide them both by God's holy true rule. In both parts be perils; and of the latter I must pronounce them dangerous to a kingly rule, to have every man, according to his own censure, to make a doom of the validity and privity of his prince's govt. with a common veil and cover of God's word, whose followers must not be judged but by private men's exposition. God defend you from such a ruler that so evil will guide you. Now I conclude that your love and care neither is nor shall be bestowed upon a careless prince; but such as but for your good will passeth as little for this world as who careth least, with thanks for your free Subsidy, a manifest shew of the abundance of your good wills, the which I assure you but to be employed to your weal, I could be better pleased to return than receive.”

The Parl. dissolved.] After this Speech was ended, her maj. in person prorogued this parl. to the 20th of May next; from which day it was again prorogued, at 6 different times, without any intervening session, to the 14th of Sept. Accordingly on that day, the parl. being met, it is entered in the Journals of the Lords, ‘That whereas this present parl. stood prorogued to the said 14th of Sept. yet the queen, by the advice of her privy-council, many great and urgent causes occasioning it, had given her letters-patents, directed to sir Tho. Bromley, knt. chancellor of England, and others her commissioners, to dissolve this parl. Which letters patent being read in the House, the lord chancellor declared it to be dissolved accordingly.’

A new Parl. called.] Writs were sent out to call a new parl. to meet at Westminster, the 15th Oct. 1586. From that day, ‘for divers good causes and considerations,’ the parl. was prorogued to the 27th, and from thence to the 29th of the same month. On which day, the Lords and Commons being assembled in the House of Peers, expecting the coming of the Queen, the Lord Chancellor informed them, that great and urgent business prevented her maj. from being present; but that she had, by her letters patents, constituted and appointed the most rev. father in Christ, John abp. of Canterbury, Wm. Cecil, lord Burleigh, lord high-treasurer of England; and Henry, earl of Derby, lord high-steward, her maj.'s commissioners; in her name, to hold and do every thing that was necessary for her in this present parl. Which letters patents being openly read in the House, the said Commissioners left their own seats, and went to a seat prepared for them, on the right side of the Chair of State, beneath the steps. Then the Lord Chancellor, after going first to the said Lords, and conferring with them, from his accustomed place spoke to the Houses to this effect:—"That the present parl. was summoned for no usual causes; not for making of new laws, whereof her maj. thought there were more made than executed: nor for Subsidies and Fifteenths, of which, although there was some occasion for them, yet her maj. would not charge her loving subjects at this time; but the cause was rare and extraordinary; of great weight, great peril, and dangerous consequence. He then declared what dangers had been contrived of late, and how miraculously the merciful providence of God, by the discovery thereof beyond all human policy, had preserved her maj. The destruction of whose sacred person was most traitorously imagined and designed to be compassed." He then shewed, "what misery the loss of so noble a Queen would have brought to all estates; that although some of these traitors had suffered according to their demerits, yet one remained, that by due course of law had received her sentence; which was the chief cause of this assembly, and wherein her maj. required their faithful advice. Wherefore, said he, that you may usually and orderly proceed herein, you of the Commons House, are to make present choice of some one amongst you to be your Speaker, and present to the lords-lieutenants as soon as conveniently you may." After which the lords-lieutenants adjourned the parl. to Monday next.—Oct. 31, the Commons presented to the lords-lieutenants John Puckering, esq. serjeant at law, as their Speaker; who, with the usual forms, was admitted by them; and then the House was adjourned to Nov. 4th. On which day also, nothing is entered in the Journals.

Proceedings relative to the Queen of Scots.] Nov. 5, the Lord Chancellor made another speech to the Lords, in which he set forth the foul and indiscreet dealings, practised by the Queen of Scots, against her maj. and the whole realm; notwithstanding the many great Benefits and Favours which the said Queen had received of her maj. After the chancellor had ended, lord Burleigh, lord treasurer, stood up; and, as one unto whom the whole Proceedings of the said Queen of Scots were better known, because of his long services to his most gracious sovereign lady, ever since the beginning of her reign, related them at large to the House. Which two speeches made the whole business of that day.—To make the Proceedings of this parl. against this unhappy Queen, more intelligible to our readers, we shall join those of the Lords and Commons together. And, we are told, in the Journals of the latter, that on Nov. 3d, whilst a private bill was reading, and one member offering to speak to it,

Sir Christopher Hatton, vice-chamberlain, stood up and told the House, "That having matter of most great importance to deliver unto this House, from her maj. he was so hold, with their good favours, for this time to interrupt the speech intended by the gentlemen that offered to speak to the said bill. And then shewed, that her maj. thinking that all those of this House, which were lately in the Higher House when the lord chanc. declared the cause of her highness's summoning of this parl. could not hear the same; and also that many of the members of this House now here present, were not then come up or returned; commanded him to deliver unto this House the Summary Cause of her maj.'s calling and assembling of this great Council at this time; which was not to make any more Laws, as being many more already than well executed; nor yet any Subsidy, albeit, if need so required, the same were convenient enough to be done; but to consult for such matters as the like were never almost heard of, nor any parl. called for, in former time, that can be found or read of. And so very excellently, plainly, and effectually, made relation of the horrible and wicked Practices and Attempts, caused and procured by the Queen of Scots, so called; meerly tending to the ruin and overthrow of the true and sincere Religion established in this realm; the invasion of this realm by foreign forces; rebellion and civil wars, and dissensions within this realm. Yea, and withal (which his heart quaked and trembled to utter and think on) the Death and Destruction of the Queen's most sacred person, to the utter desolation and conquest of this most noble realm of England. And so discoursing of the matter, and the great, execrable treacheries and conspiracies of the said Queen of Scots, even from the first to the last, in particularities very amply and effectually (such of them, at the least, as have been hitherto discovered) shewing also, very manifestly and evidently, the proofs and all other circumstances of the same treachery and conspiracies; and so thinketh good, for his part, that speedy consultation be had by this house for the cutting of her off by course of justice; for that otherwise our said sovereign lady, the queen's majesty's most royal person, cannot be continued with safety; concluding with this sentence, 'Ne pereat Israel, pereat Absolon.'—This speech was seconded by the chanc. of the excheq. the chanc. of the duchy, and mr. sec. Woolley; who all spoke, at large, to the same point; reciting the horrible treasons and conspiracies, caused and procured by the said Queen of Scots. Which speeches being ended, the house resolved to resume the affair on the morrow.

Accordingly, on the next day, the House being reminded, by the Speaker, of going upon the 'Great Cause,' as they termed it, several more speeches were made by other ministers of state; as also by sir Wm. Herbert, sir Thos. Scott, mr. Francis Bacon, mr. Alford, mr. Throgmorton, mr. Barker, mr. Dalton, mr. Baynbrigg, and mr. Solicitor; all vehement against the Queen of Scots, charging her with treasonable practices against the life of the Queen, and procuring a foreign invasion to further those attempts. Concluding, that such practices could never be prevented hereafter, unless the said Scottish Queen did presently suffer the execution due to justice and her deserts.—It was then moved that a Committee should be appointed to consider of a Petition to her maj. to that purpose, and also to request the Lords, if they thought good, to join with them in it. Accordingly, a Committee was appointed of all the Privy Council belonging to that House, and 44 other members. There is an Entry made in this Journal of the conclusion of a Speech, said to be spoke by one mr. George Moore, who averred, "That only Popery is the chief and principal root of all the late horrible and wicked treacheries and practices, and the Queen of Scots a principal branch, issuing from the same root, and the most perilous and full of poison of all the other branches; for that the Papists, in very deed, for the most part, not knowing the person of the said Queen of Scots, do wish the establishing of her in the crown of this realm, rather in respect of Popery (which she would set up) than for any affection they bear to her person; and so likewise, for the most part, all of them either wish or could easily bear the death of her maj. though, perhaps, they would not shew themselves to be actors or dealers therein." He therefore moveth, "That it may be joined in the petition for the 'Great Cause,' That her maj. may be moved to retain no servants about her highness's person, but such only as may be well known both to profess the true and sincere Religion, and also to be every way true and faithful subjects." And further, "That the laws already in force against Papists may be put in due execution."—These speeches being ended, mr. Speaker shewed, that the said motion, or any other, tending to the safety of her maj.'s person, may be very well delivered and remembered to the committees in the 'Great Cause,' by any member of the house.

Nov. 7th. Whilst the Lords were debating the matter of the Queen of Scots, the Commons came up, and desired a Conference with some of their lordships, what number they should please to appoint, about the affair of the Scottish Queen, which had been opened to them. Whereupon, the Lords appointed the abps. of Canterbury and York, the lord treasurer, the lord steward; the earls of Northumberland, Kent, Rutland, and Sussex; the bps. of London, Durham, Winchester, and Worcester; the lord admiral, the lord chamberlain; the lords Cobham, Grey, Lumley, Chandois, Buckhurst, De la Ware, and Norris, for the conference. There was also appointed to attend the said Lords, the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, the chief baron, and mr. justice Gaudie.

Nov. 9th, several letters were read, as well from Babington to the Queen of Scots, as from her to him, Charles Pagett, and others. The sentence pronounced by the commissioners, against the Scots Queen, was also read. And a form of a Petition agreed upon by the committees of both houses.

Nov. 10th, the Lords of the Committee made report to the whole House, that those of the Commons, upon hearing of the sentence, and divers of the special evidences and proofs, on which the sentence was grounded, openly read unto them, after long deliberation and consideration had betwixt them, both publicly and privately, they all, with one assent, allowed the said sentence to be just, true, and honourable; and that the Commons humbly desired their Lordships to make choice of such number of Lords as they should think meet to join with them in petitioning her maj. Whereupon, the Lords made choice of the following, viz. the lord chanc. the lord treasurer, the lord great chamberlain, the lord steward; the earls of Northumberland, Kent, Rutland, Sussex, Pembroke, and Hertford; the lord high admiral, and the lords Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Cobham, Grey, Lumley, Chandois, Buckhurst, De la Ware, and Norris.—Mem. The Commons made a request to have the Petition assented unto by both the Houses, to be enrolled in the rolls of Parl.; which their lordships thought better to defer, until her maj.'s liking or disliking of it was first had of the same.—The Lords then adjourned to the 15th; again to the 19th, and from thence to the 22nd of the same month, without any thing being entered in their Journals.

In the mean time, the Petition was presented to the Queen by the said Committee of Lords, and the members of the Commons, who were of the Privy Council, with as many more of that body as to make up the number of 42. Nov. 12 was the day appointed by the Queen to receive it; when the lord chanc. in the name of the Lords, and on behalf of the Commons, declared unto her maj. That both Houses, after many Conferences, and long consultations, had concluded to be humble suitors to her maj. by way of Petition; the effect whereof was declared, at length, unto her, by the orators aforesaid, and the Petition itself delivered to her maj. in writing.—Sir S. D'Ewes has given us, from an authentic copy of his own, a series of notes, which, he says, were made use of by the Speaker, in his oration to the queen, on this occasion. Which, for fear of making this matter too tedious, we purposely omit and hasten to the words of the Petition itself; which, with the Answer to it, are both preserved by Camden.

Petition from the Lords and Commons, for the Execution of Mary Queen of Scots.

"May it please your most Excellent maj. We, your humble, loving, and faithful subjects, the Lords and Commons in this present parl. assembled, having of long time, to our intolerable grief, seen by how manifold, most dangerous, and execrable practices, Mary, daughter and heir of James V. late king of Scots, dowager of France, commonly called the Queen of Scots, hath compassed the destruction of your maj.'s most sacred and royal person: and thereby not only to bereave us of the sincere and true religion of Almighty God, bringing us and this noble crown back again into the thralldom of the Romish tyranny; but also utterly to ruinate and overthrow the happy state and commonwealth of this realm. Which being, from time to time, by the great mercy and providence of God, and your highness's singular wisdom, foreseen and prevented; your maj. of your exceeding great clemency, and princely magnanimity, hath most graciously passed over (although often and instantly moved by your most loving and faithful subjects, to the contrary, in times, in your parliaments, and at many other times), and hath also protected and defended the said Scottish Queen from those great dangers, which her own people, for certain detestable crimes and grievous offences to her imputed, hath determined against her. All which notwithstanding, the said queen was nothing moved with these and many other your maj.'s most gracious favours toward her; but rather obdurate in malice, and, by hope of continual impunity, inboldened to prosecute her cruel and mischievous determination, by some speedy and violent course; and now lately a very dangerous plot, being conceived and set down by Anthony Babington and others, that 6 desperate and wicked persons should undertake that wicked and most horrible enterprize, to take away your maj. life (whom God, of his infinite mercy, long preserve), she did not only give her advice and direction upon every point, and all circumstances concerning the same; and make earnest request to have it performed with all diligence; but did also promise assurance of large reward and recompence to the doers thereof. which being informed to your maj. it pleased your highness, upon the earnest suit of such as tendered the safety of your royal person, and the good and quiet state of this realm, to direct your Commission, under the Great Seal of England, to the Lords and others of your highness's Privy Council, and certain other Lords of Parl. with some of your principal judges, to examine, hear, and determine the same cause; and thereupon to give sentence or judgment, according to a statute in that behalf made, in the 27th of your most gracious reign. By virtue whereof, the more part of the same Commissioners, being in number 36, having at sundry times fully heard what was alledged and proved against the said Scottish Queen, in her own presence, touching the said crimes and offences, and what she could say for her defence and excuse therein; did, after long deliberation, give their sentence and judgment, with one consent, that the Death and Destruction of your Royal Person, was imagined and compassed by the said Babington, with the privacy of the said Scottish Queen; and that she did also compass and imagine the Death and Destruction of your most royal person. Now, forasmuch as we, representing unto your maj. the universal state of your whole people of all degrees in this your realm, do well perceive, and are fully satisfied, that the same sentence and judgment is in all things most hon. just and lawful; and having carefully and effectually, according to our most bounden duties, weighed and considered, upon what ground and cause, so many traitorous and dangerous practices, against your most royal person and estate, and for the invading of this realm, have, for the space of many years past, grown and proceeded; do certainly find, and are undoubtedly persuaded, that all the same have been, from time to time, attempted and practised by and from the Scottish Queen, and by her confederates, ministers, and favourers; who conceive an assured hope to atchieve speedily, by your maj.'s untimely death, that which they have long expected, and whereof, during your life, they despair; to wit, to place her, the said Scottish Queen, in the imperial and kingly seat of this realm, and by her to banish and destroy the professors and professing of the true Religion of Jesus Christ, and the ancient nobility of this land; and to bring this whole state and commonweal to foreign subjection, and utter ruin and confusion; which their malicious and traiterous purpose they will never cease to prosecute, by all possible means they can, so long as they may have their eyes and imaginations fixed upon that lady, the only ground of their treasonable hope and conceits, and the only seed-plot of all dangerous and traitorous devices and practices, against your sacred person. And seeing also what insolent boldness is grown in the heart of the same Queen, through your maj.'s former exceeding favours towards her; and thereupon weighing, with heavy and sorrowful hearts, in what continual peril in such-like desperate conspiracies and practices, your maj.'s most royal and sacred person and life (more dear unto us than our own) is and shall be still, without any possible means to prevent it, so long as the said Scottish Queen shall be suffered to continue, and shall not receive that due punishment, which, by justice and the laws of this your realm, she hath, so often, and so many ways, for her most wicked and detestable offences, deserved: therefore, and for that we find, that if the said lady shall now escape the due and deserved punishment of death for these her most execrable treasons and offences; your highness's royal person shall be exposed unto many more, and those more secret and dangerous conspiracies, than before; and such as shall not, or cannot, be foreseen or discovered, as these her late attempts have been; and shall not hereafter be so well able to take away the ground and occasion of the same, as now, by justice, may and ought to be done.

We do most humbly beseech your most excellent maj. that, as well in respect of the continuance of the true Religion now professed amongst us, and of the safety of your most royal person and estate, as in regard of the preservation and defence of us your most loving, dutiful, and faithful subjects, and the whole commonwealth of this realm, it may please your highness to take speedy order, that Declaration of the same sentence and judgment be made and published by proclamation, and that thereupon direction be given for further proceedings against the said Scottish Queen, according to the effect and true meaning of the said statute: because, upon advised and great consultation, we cannot find that there is any possible means to provide for your maj.'s safety, but by the just and speedy Execution of the said Queen, the neglecting whereof may procure the heavy displeasure and punishment of Almighty God, as by sundry severe examples of his great justice in that behalf, left us, in the Sacred Scriptures, doth appear. And if the same be not put in present execution, we your most loving and dutiful subjects, shall thereby (so far as man's reason can reach) be brought into utter despair of the continuance, amongst us, of the true Religion of Almighty God, and of your maj.'s life, and the safety of all your faithful subjects, and the good estate of this most flourishing commonwealth."

The Queen's Answer.] After hearing the Petition read, the Queen with great majesty, both of countenance and speech, says our historian, answered to this purpose:—"So many and so great are the unmeasurable graces and benefits bestowed upon me by the Almighty, that I must not only most humbly acknowledge them as benefits, but admire them as miracles, being in no sort able to express them. And though none alive can more justly acknowledge himself bound to God than I, whose life he has miraculously preserved from so many dangers: yet am I not more deeply bound to give him thanks for any one thing than for this which I will now tell you, and which I account as a miracle; namely, That as I came to the crown with the hearty good-will of all my subjects, so now, after 28 years reign, I perceive in them the same, if not greater affection towards me; which should I once lose, I might, perhaps, find myself to breathe, but never could I think that I were alive. And now, though my life has been dangerously shot at, yet, I protest, there is nothing has more grieved me, than that one, who differs not from me in sex, one of like quality and degree, one of the same race and stock, and so nearly related to me in blood, should fall into so great a misdemeanor. And so far have I been from bearing her any ill-will, that, upon the discovery of some treasonable practices against me, I wrote privately to her, that if she would confess and acknowledge them, by a letter betwixt her and me, they should be wrapt up in silence. Neither did I write this with a purpose to intrap her; for I knew already as much as she could confess. And even yet, though the matter be come thus far, if she would truly repent, and no man would undertake her cause against me, and if my life alone depended hereupon, and not the safety and welfare of all my people, I would (I protest unfeignedly) willingly and readily pardon her. Nay, if England might by my death obtain a more flourishing condition and a better prince, I would most gladly lay down my life. For, for your sakes it is, and for my people's, that I desire to live. As for me, I see no such great reason (according as I have led my life) why I should either be fond to live, or fear to die. I have had good experience of this world; I have known what it is to be a subject, and I now know what it is to be a sovereign. Good neighbours I have had, and I have met with bad; and in trust I have found treason. I have bestowed benefits upon ill-deservers; and where I have done well I have been ill requited and spoken of. While I call to mind these things past, behold things present, and look forward toward things to come, I count them happiest that go hence soonest. Nevertheless, against such evils and mischiefs as these, I am armed with a better courage than is common in my sex; so as whatsoever befalls me, death shall never find me unprepared.—And as touching these treasonable attempts, I will not so far wrong myself, or the laws of my kingdom, as not to think but that she, having been the contriver of the said treasons, was bound and liable to the ancient and former laws, though the late act had never been made; which notwithstanding was in no sort made to prejudice her, as divers who are inclined to favour her have imagined. So far was it from being made to entrap her, that it was rather intended to forewarn and deter her from attempting any thing against it. But seeing it had now the force of a law, I thought good to proceed against her according to the same. But you lawyers are so curious in scanning the nice points of the law, and proceeding according to forms, rather than expounding and interpreting the laws themselves, that if your way were observed, she must have been indicted in Staffordshire, and have holden up her hand at the bar, and have been tried by a jury of 12 men. A proper way, forsooth, of trying a princess! To avoid therefore such absurdities, I thought it better to refer the examination of so weighty a cause to a select number of the noblest personages of the land and the judges of the realm; and all little enough. For we princes are set as it were upon stages, in the sight and view of all the world: the least spot is soon spied in our garments, the smallest blemish presently observed in us at a great distance. It behoves us therefore to be careful that our proceedings be just and honourable. But I must tell you one thing, that by this last act of parl. you have reduced me to such straits and perplexities, that I must resolve upon the punishment of her who is a princess so nearly allied to me in blood, and whose practices against me have so deeply affected me with grief and sorrow, that I have willingly chosen to absent myself from this parl. lest I should increase my trouble by hearing the matter mentioned; and not out of fear of any danger or treacherous attempt against me, as some think. But I will now tell you a farther secret, (though it be not usual with me to blab forth in other cases what I know.) It is not long since these eyes of mine saw and read an oath, wherein some bound themselves to kill me within a month. Hereby I see your danger in my person, which I will be very careful to prevent and keep off.—The Association you entered into for my safety I have not forgotten; a thing I never so much as thought of, till a great number of hands and seals to it were shewed me. This has laid a perpetual tie and obligation upon me, to bear you a singular good will and love, who have no greater comfort than in your and the commonwealth's respect and affection towards me. But forasmuch as the matter now in hand is very rarely exemplified, and of greatest consequence, I hope you do not look for any present resolution from me: for my manner is, in matters of less moment than this, to deliberate long upon that which is but once to be resolved. In the mean time, I beseech Almighty God so to illuminate and direct my heart, that I may see clearly what may be best for the good of his Church, the prosperity of the Commonwealth, and your Safety. And that delay may not breed danger, we will signify our resolution to you with all conveniency. And whatever the best of subjects may expect at the hands of the best princes, that expect from me to be performed to the full."

The Commons' Journals inform us, that on the 14th of Nov. when the Speaker had reported to the House the substance of the Queen's Answer, Mr. Vice-Chamberlain stood up, and having first affirmed that the Speaker's Report was true, he added, that the Queen had commanded him that morning to signify to the house, "That her highness, moved with some commiseration for the Scottish Queen, in respect of her former dignity and great fortunes in her younger years, her nearness of kindred to her maj. and also of her sex, could be well pleased to forbear taking of her blood; if, by any other means to be devised, by the Great Council of this realm, the safety of her maj.'s person and govt. might be preserved, without danger of ruin and destruction. But herein she left them nevertheless to their own free liberty and dispositions, of proceeding otherwise at their choice. For, as her maj. would willingly hearken to the reasons of any particular member of this house; so, he added, they might exhibit their thoughts in that case either to any of the Privy Council, being of that house, or to the Speaker, to be by him delivered to her maj."—After the aforesaid orator had delivered this message, he took occasion to put the House in mind, that at the beginning of this parl. the Lord Chanc. told them, that it was her maj.'s express command, no Laws at all should be made in this session; her maj. purposing not to be present to give her royal assent to any. Wherefore he desired that this House might be adjourned to Nov. 18; in which time, he said, it might be her maj. would send some other answer to their Petition, which she yet had not read. And the House was adjourned accordingly.—On that day, after many speeches and arguments, the House came to a Resolution, "That no other way, device, or means whatsoever could or can possibly be found or imagined, that such safety can in any wise be had, so long as the said Queen of Scots doth or shall live."

The Lords' Journals say nothing of this Message, but there is reason to believe it was sent to them; because that authority informs us, that on the 22nd, "After many debates in that House, the Lords agreed that the matter should be put to the question; and every peer being asked his several voice, answered, with one consent, "That they could find no other way."—Item, "The same day, they of the Lower House came up, and desired the Lords to be content to appoint some of their House to confer with them, upon the Answer that was to be made to her highness. Whereupon the Lords made choice of the abps. of Canterbury and York, and the lord-treasurer, &c. And the Lords, after conference had with the Committee of the Lower House, made report that the like question was proposed to them of the Commons' House, and that they answered all with one consent, no man gainsaying, "That they could find no other way." Whereupon the Committees of both Houses agreed upon this Answer to be made to her maj. That having often conferred and long debated on that question, according to her highness's commandment, they could find no other way than what was set down in their Petition. Which Answer, for the Lords, was delivered to her majesty by the lord chancellor, and for the Commons by their Speaker, at Richmond, Thursday, Nov. 24. On the 25th, the lord chanc. delivered to the Lords her maj.'s Answer to their last Resolution, the effect whereof was, 'If,' said her maj. 'I should say unto you that I mean not to grant your petition, by my faith I should say unto you more than perhaps I mean. And if I should say unto you I mean to grant your petition, I should then tell you more than is fit for you to know. And thus I must deliver you an answer answerless.'

Thus much verbatim from the Lords' Journal. And all we have to add from the same authority is, that an entry is made in this day's proceedings of every thing done in the foregoing relating to this affair; with a copy of the Petition at the conclusion. The unhappy Queen of Scots had not one advocate, in either House, that would or durst plead in her favour. The current against her was so strong, as would then have overthrown all opposers, and involved them in the same ruin. There are several pieces of broken speeches inserted in the Commons' Journals, all tending to her destruction; but so interspersed and unconnected, as to render them tiresome to a reader. It is easy to see, by the scope of the arguments used, that methods had been proposed to save this wretched Queen's life. It is very probable that all the princes then in Christendom thought themselves interested in it. But it is certain that the violent party against her in the Commons were eager to have her speedily destroyed, for fear some foreign application should have force enough to save her. This House, we are told, was greatly alarmed at the coming of the French ambassador, who arrived in England about this time, to make some proposals for saving the Queen of Scots. One mr. Grice, a member, took notice in the House, that since that ambassador was to have audience of her maj. the next day, who, he was fully persuaded within himself, came not for any good to her maj. or to the realm; yet, knowing that in such cases they are usually attended with a company of rascals, and the basest sort of people of their nation; and this rabble using to thrust into the presence of the prince, along with their master; he moved, That for better safety of her maj.'s person, from any desperate attempt of the said Frenchmen, it would please those of this house, who were of the privy council, to take order that the said ambassador might both be heard and receive his answer from the council; and in no wise to have access to her royal person. To which it was answered by the Vice Chamberlain, that this matter had been considered of at the committees of both houses, and orders given accordingly.

The last thing that seems necessary to extract from the Journal, relating to this business, is, that one day when sir F. Knolles was giving his opinion to the House, "that there was no other course, &c." he took occasion to propose, that earnest and devout Prayer should be made to God, to incline her maj.'s heart to the Petition of this House; and that some apt and special course of prayer might be devised and put down by some of this house; and not only be exercised here every day, but also by all the members elsewhere abroad, and privately in their chambers. To this motion it was answered by mr. Treasurer, that he took it to proceed from a good intention; but said that there was already a form of prayer extant in print, and used in this House for that purpose; and every member might do the same privately if he pleased.—On the 2nd of Dec. the Lords Commissioners adjourned this parl. to the 15th Feb. following.

Feb. 15, 1587, both Houses met pursuant to adjournment. The two first days nothing was done, because the Lord Chanc. was sick; on the 17th sir Edm. Anderson, knt. Lord Chief justice of the commons pleas, read publicly in the House of Lords, a commission from the queen, directed to himself, by which he was authorized and appointed, in the absence of the ld. chanc. to act in his stead.

A Subsidy.] March 7, a bill was sent up by the Commons, entitled, 'An act for one entire Subsidy, and two 15ths and 10ths, to be granted to her maj. by the temporality.' It passed on the 9th and the next day a bill for the Confirmation of one entire Subsidy, from the Clergy, of 6s. in the pound, to be paid in 3 years, was read and passed also.

A Benevolence from both Houses.] But these acts not answering the pressing occasions of the state; on the 11th of March, a Message was sent from the Commons, requesting that it would please the Lords to appoint a number of their House for a Conference with a committee of the other. Accordingly the abps. of Canterbury and York, the lord steward, the lord chamberlain, the earls of Kent, Worcester, Rutland, Hertford, and Leicester, the bps. of London, Winchester and Salisbury, the lords Cobham, Morley, Grey, Stafford, Stourton, Cromwell, North, Delaware and Norris, were appointed. Who, the same day, after the Conference, made a Report to the House, "That the Commons made humble suit to their lordships, to have the Lords of this House join with them in a contribution or Benevolence, which they of the Lower House meant to offer unto her maj. The manner, how they meant to proceed therein, was opened by the abp. of Canterbury. On which report of the committee, the Lords thought good to refer their Answers herein till Monday next." But we hear no more of this matter until the 15th; when another Mem. is entered, "That this day the Lords of the Committee made report unto the whole House, that upon divers conferences had with the Committee of the Lower House, touching their request made to the Lords to join with them in petition to her maj. about a Benevolence, or contribution, which they of the Lower House thought good to offer unto her maj.; the said Lords of the Committee thought it good, for divers reasons, to join with the Commons therein, which reasons, when the whole House had heard and considered, their lordships did resolve that the Commons should be left to themselves, and that they would take such order herein as to their lordships shall seem convenient." Accordingly, the same Lords, as before, were chosen a new Committee to resolve upon the contribution; when after some conference had amongst themselves, in respect of the great charges her maj. hath heretofore been at, and that her highness must be enforced to be at hereafter, for the defence of this realm, and other her maj.'s dominions, they resolved freely to offer and give unto her 2s. in the pound, after the rate of the valuation of the Subsidy of the temporality, granted in this present session of parl. Which resolution being afterwards openly declared unto the whole House, the Temporal Lords, in regard that the Lords Spiritual had made a prior offer of contribution to her maj. did altogether, with one consent, most willingly, ratify the said resolution, both touching the sum and the payment thereof.

On the last day of the session, the Commons sent up a new bill, 'for the Sale of the Lands of one Tho. Handford, for a debt due to the crown, &c.' when the Lords had before passed a bill to the same effect, and sent it down to the Commons. Therefore it is entered that since the Commons had rejected their bill, without conference with some of the Lords of this House, and framed a new bill and sent it up; their lordships thought it a precedent so strange, and so far contrary to the orders of this House, that they resolved to put it to the question, Whether this new bill should be read here or not? The whole House being particularly asked their opinions, with one consent, they concluded, that it should not be read.—This is all that is material in the Lords Journals, but that of the Commons is much more filled with matters of consequence, which happened at this 2d meeting of the parl.

Sir C. Hatton opens to the House the Affair of the Spanish Invasion.] Feb. 22, Sir Christ. Hatton, Vice-Chamberlain, acquainted the House, "That it was her maj.'s pleasure that they should have disclosed to them the dangers the nation then stood in; that she thanked God she had so good a House of Commons, and wished this session might be short, that men concerned as governors might go home to their governments, for the sake of hospitality and defence; and to take another time for making laws, except such as are now necessary." The dangers which he spoke of, he urged, were those of ancient malice against the queen; which were to be prepared for, and God invoked for his assistance. The substance of the rest of his speech, he drew up under the following heads: "The Catholics abroad, the Pope, the King of Spain, the Princes of the League, the Papists at home, and their Ministers."—The principal root thereof: the Council of Trent, which agreed to extirpate christian religion (which they term heresie) whereunto divers princes assented, and bound themselves in solemn manner. Pope Pius V. sent his excommunication against her maj.; dr. Morton and Mendoza, a Spanish ambassador, bestirred them; a northern rebellion was bred, the Pope and the rest practised for the Scottish queen, and she being acquainted proceeds by their means. Pope Paulus XIII. proceeds, and sends Jesuits and Seminaries to England and Ireland, and they proceed to inveigle the subjects, and dissuade them from obedience. Visko beginning a Rebellion in Ireland. James Fitz-Morris furthereth the execution thereof. Dr. Sanders and Desmond stir new rebellion there, and wrote into England, &c. Parry was moved to kill her majesty and persuaded it was meritorious, Pope Sixtus V. imitateth the other Popes to execute their former devices, and writeth to the cardinals of Lorrain and Guise, that he will overthrow the glorious gospel; and therefore moved them to join with the princes of the league, and to practise to win the king of Scots, and to set up the Scottish queen in England, and made his reckoning of the Cantons that be popish, the Switzers, the duke of Savoy, the duke of Ferrara, king of Spain, and king of France. A chief instrument to work this, was father Henry. He was sent into Germany, and over Italy and France, and wrote to the Scottish queen, that the powers will join to overthrow England, and make known the effect of his labour to the Pope. Invasion should have been made into England and Ireland the last year, and not unlike to be attempted this year. The Pope excommunicateth the king of Navarr. The Pope accounteth not of popish preaching and persuasions that way; but nevertheless moveth all to use the world, and for maintenance thereof spareth his treasure otherwise, and withdraweth maintenance from Jesuits and Seminaries: and divers others letters were found with the Scottish queen, which prove all these to be true. If we serve Almighty God in sincerity of heart, we need not to fear. It is to be remembered that the king of Spain sought to recover some part of his father's credit, by using our treasure and force to get st. Quintin's; but he soon made his advantage of it, and regarded not our territories in France, but suffered the loss of Calais and all our territories; and after the death of queen Mary what he could. Her maj. sought for his good-will, sending the lord Montague, the lord Cobham, sir Tho. Chamberlain, mr. Maun, and others; and they were but hardly used, some of them were offered great indignity and mr. Maun's son forced, by strength, to do a kind of penance. He comforted the queen's enemies, he giveth colour of wars, he chargeth the queen that her subjects have aided his rebels in the Low Countries, with countenancing Monsieur with money at Cambray, with sending her nobility with him into the Low Countries, with the actions of sir Francis Drake, with assistance of the Low Countries. Of the Purpose of the Combined Princes: Their shew is to deal with the king of Navarr to extirpate him, but their drift is to ruin religion, not only there, but to set upon and to work the ruin of it here also; wherein the cardinals of Lorain and Guise are now very busy. Their malice is the more for executing the Scottish queen, but their hope is the less. The king of Spain's designments are to invade England and Ireland.—His Preparation: 360 sail of Spain; 80 gallies from Venice and Genoa; 1 galliass with 600 armed men, from the duke of Florence; 12,000 men maintained by Italy and the Pope; 6000 by the Spanish Clergy; 12,000 by his nobility and gentry of Spain. It is reported that 10,000 of these be horsemen; I think it not all true, but something there is.—We must look to the Papists at home and abroad. It hath touched us in the blood of the nobility, and the blood of many subjects. They practise to frame subjects against all duty, and bring in doctrine of lawfulness and merit to kill the Queen, and have sent their instruments abroad to that purpose.—Two manner of forces are to be handled. Assistance to the Low Countries, and defence by force otherwise. That God may assist us in justice, in right, in defence against those princes. The assistance is acceptable that will be profitable. Her maj. oweth relief there in honour, according to the Leagues, especially between us and the house of Burgundy: which Leagues differ from leagues growing between prince and prince, for they grew between the people and this state. We are bound to help them in honour according to the leagues. Many marriages and many secrecies have been long between us, and the relieving of the afflictions of that people may not be omitted.—The heads of their miseries are the Spanish Inquisition by Placard, using strange tortures not to be suffered; great impositions without and against law, sending some of their people into Spain and there tyrannized over; their noblemen done away; taking their towns, and setting tyrants over them to use them like dogs. The purpose was to bring the Low Countries into a monarchal seat, and then, væ nobis. The queen's dealing there is warranted by God. The queen is occasioned of necessity for safety of her dominions and us, that that country may be preserved, that the English commodities may be vented there with readiness, safety and profit; the recovery thereof will be good for this country and crown; it may not be suffered that a neighbour should grow too strong.—The king of Spain seeketh to be yet greater; he hath already a seat in council amongst the princes of Germany, by reason of territories his father got there; and, if he could, he would frame the Low Countries to his desire.—As to the pretence of Injuries before remembered: as to the first going over, her maj. misliked it, and punished some of the captains (he named sir Humfrey Gilbert for one.) Concerning Monsieur, the first time her maj. drew him from proceeding for the Low Countries; the 2nd time she consented that he should only assist the Low Countries, which Monsieur afterwards abused, contrary to her maj.'s meaning. Concerning mr. Drake's first Voyage, her maj. knew it not; and when he came home, she seized the whole mass of substance, brought by him, to satisfy the king of Spain (if cause so required) and thereupon desired certificate for Invasion into Ireland.—Concerning mr. Drake's last Voyage, it was to meet with the restraints and seizures in Spain, and their purpose of war was thereupon discovered; for there was found by the master of mr. Bond's ship, who took the Corrigedore, and others, a commission from the king of Spain, whereby he termed us his rebels, as he termed the Low Countries.—He then remembered another Grievance not touched before, which was the entertaining of don Anthony. Which he answered to be done in hon. courtesy, because of his state, who was a king anointed and crowned; though his seat was not long untroubled, and coming hither in hon. and courteous manner, though something weakened, required the entertainment he had.—Then he iterated, that the great grief is Religion, and said that all godly ones are bound to defend it. He then commended her maj.'s courage against her enemies malice, esteeming it no less than the stoutest kings in Europe.

Mr. Chanc. of the Exchequer concluded, that the great preparations of war which was fit speedily to be thought of and provided, would grow chargeable; and therefore thought it fit with expedition, that the house should appoint a convenient number to set down articles for a Subsidy. Whereupon all the privy council being of this house, the first knight for every shire, and others, were appointed to meet in the exchequer-chamber.

Motion for altering the Common Prayer.
Feb. 27. Mr. Cope, after touching upon the necessity of a learned Ministry, and the amendment of things amiss in the Ecclesiastical Estate, offered to the house a bill, and a written book; the bill containing a petition that it might be enacted, that all laws now in force, touching Ecclesiastical government should be void: and that it might be enacted, that the Book of Common Prayer, now offered and none other, might be received into the church to be used. The book contained the form of prayer and administration of sacraments, with divers rites and ceremonies, to be used in the church. And desiring that the book might be read, mr. Speaker, in effect, used this speech: "For that her maj. before this time had commanded the house not to meddle with this matter, and that her maj. had promised to take order in those cases, he doubted not but to the good satisfaction of all her people; he desired that it would please them to spare the reading of it. Notwithstanding the house desired the reading of it. Whereupon mr. Speaker willed the clerk to read it. And the clerk being ready to read it, mr. Dalton made a motion against the reading of it; saying, that it was not meet to be read, and that it did appoint a new form of administration of the Sacraments and Ceremonies of the Church, to the discredit of the Book of Common Prayer and the whole state; and thought that this dealing would bring her maj.'s indignation against the house, thus to enterprize the dealing with those things which her maj. especially had taken into her own charge and direction. Whereupon mr. Lewkenor spoke, shewing the necessity of preaching, and of a learned ministry, and thought it very fit that the petition and book should be read. To this purpose spake mr. Harleston and mr. Bainbrigg; and so the time being passed, the house brake up, and neither the petition nor book read." This done, her maj. sent to mr. Speaker, as well for this Petition and Book, as for that other petition and book for the like effect, that was delivered the last session of parliament which mr. Speaker sent to her majesty.

Mr. Wentworth's Speech relating to the Liberties of the House.] March 1, "Mr. Wentworth delivered unto mr. Speaker certain Articles, which contained Questions touching the Liberties of the House, and to some of which he was to answer, and desired they might be read. Mr. Speaker required him to spare his motion until her maj.'s pleasure was further known, touching the Petition and Book lately delivered into the house; but mr. Wentworth would not be so satisfied, but required his Articles might be read. Mr. Speaker said he would peruse them, and then do what was fit." This is all the Journals afford us; but sir S. D'Ewes has given us mr. Wentworth's Speech and the Questions at large, which are too important to be omitted: the Speech was as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, forasmuch as such laws as God is to be honoured by, and that also such laws as our noble sovereign and this worthy realm of England are to be enriched, strengthened, and preserved by, from all foreign and domestic enemies and traitors, are to be made by this hon. council, I as being one moved and stirred up by all dutiful love, and desirous even for conscience sake, and of a mind to set forward God's glory, the wealth, strength, and safety of our natural queen and commonweal, do earnestly desire, by question, to be satisfied of a few Questions to be moved by you, mr. Speaker, concerning the Liberty of this hon. council: for I do assure you, I praise my God for it, that I do find in myself a willing mind to deliver unto this hon. assembly some little taste and account of that simple talent, which it hath pleased God, of his singular favour and goodness, to bestow upon me, to gain to his highness's honour and glory; and to shew unto my noble prince and commonwealth, true, faithful, and dutiful service; of the which mind, I am sure, mr. Speaker, here are many godly, faithful, and true-hearted gentlemen in this hon. assembly; howbeit, the want of knowledge and experience of the Liberties of this hon. council, doth hold and stay us back. For as we have a hearty desire to serve God, her maj. and this noble realm; even so are we fearful and loth to give or offer any offence to her maj. or unto her laws; the which, we presume, we shall not do, if we keep ourselves within the circle of them, and no man can observe that whereof he is ignorant. Wherefore I pray you, mr. Speaker, eftsoons to move these few Articles, by Question, whereby every one of this house may know how far he may proceed in this hon. council, in matters that concern the glory of God and our true and loyal service to our prince and state. For I am fully persuaded, that God cannot be honoured, neither our noble prince or commonweal preserved or maintained, without free speech and consultation of this hon. council, both which consist upon the Liberties of this hon. council, and the Knowledge of them also. So here are the Questions, mr. Speaker: I humbly and heartily beseech you to give them a reading, and God grant us true and faithful hearts in answering of them; for the true, faithful, and hearty service of our merciful God, our lawful prince, and this whole and worthy realm of England, will much consist hereafter upon the answer unto these questions. Wherefore it behoveth us to use wise, grave, and godly considerations in answering of them. Therefore the Lord direct our tongues, that we may answer them even with his spirit, the spirit of wisdom, without the which our wisdom is nothing else but foolishness."

The Questions.] "Whether this council be not a place for any member of the same here assembled, freely and without controulment of any person, or danger of laws, by bill or speech, to utter any of the griefs of this commonwealth whatsoever, touching the service of God, the safety of the prince, and this noble realm?—Whether that great honour may be done unto God, and benefit and service unto the prince and state without free Speech in this council, which may be done with it?—Whether there be any council which can make, add to, or diminish from the laws of the realm, but only this council of parl.?—Whether it be not against the orders of this council to make any secret or matter of weight, which is here in hand, known to the prince or any other, concerning the high service of God, prince, or state, without the consent of the house?—Whether the Speaker, or any other, may interrupt any member of this council in his speech used in this house, tending to any of the fore-named high services?—Whether the Speaker may rise when he will, any matter being propounded, without consent of the house or not?—Whether the Speaker may over-rule the house in any matter or cause there in question; or whether he is to be ruled or over-ruled in any matter or not?—Whether the prince and state can continue, stand, and be maintained without this council of parl. but by altering the govt. of the state?"

We are told that the Speaker did not think proper to put these Questions to the house; but shewed them to sir Tho. Heneage, a privy counsellor; and soon after mr. Wentworth was committed prisoner to the Tower. And March 2nd, mr. Cope, mr. Lewkenor, mr. Harleston, and mr. Baynbrigg, the 4 speakers to the motion aforesaid, were sent for before the ld. chanc. and divers of the privy council, and by them sent to the Tower after mr. Wentworth. Two days after this,

Sir John Higham made a motion, "That since several good and necessary members of that house were taken from them, it would please them to be humble petitioners to her maj. for the restitution of them again to the house." To which

Mr. Vice-Chamberlain answered, "That if the gentlemen were committed for matter within the compass of the privilege of the house, then there might be room for a petition. But if not, adds he, we shall occasion her maj.'s further displeasure. He rather advised to stay till they heard more, which could not be long. And further, as to the Book and Petition, her maj. had, for divers good causes best known to herself, thought fit to suppress the same, without any farther examination of them. And yet he conceived it very unfit for her maj. to give any account of her actions."—We hear no more of this matter, nor how long these gentlemen were prisoners in the Tower; and it is surprising that neither Camden, nor any other historian, take any notice of so important an affair.

March 23rd, the Lord Chief Justice declared to both Houses in form, that her maj. for certain reasons, could not come down to the house to pass the bills; and therefore had granted her letters patents, in which the titles of all the bills are particularly recited for that purpose. Which commission being openly read, the said lord chief justice produced other letters patents, directed to the two abps. the great officers of state, &c. constituting them her maj.'s commissioners to dissolve this parl.; which being read, the parl. was dissolved accordingly.

A new Parl. called.] A new parl. was summoned to meet at Westminster on the 12th of Nov. in the 30th year of her maj.'s reign. When being assembled accordingly, it was, by letters patents, directed to sir Christ. Hatton, knt. then lord chancellor, Wm. lord Burleigh, lord treasurer, &c. prorogued to the 4th of Feb. 1588-9. At which time, being again assembled, and the Queen present, the Lord Chancellor opened the cause of the summons to this effect: he told them, say the Lords' Journals, "That her maj. had made it her constant study, from the very beginning of her reign to this time, to preserve peace, not only at home, but also abroad. That she had given no occasion to the many princes about her to invade her dominions; nor had taken arms to revenge the many injuries which others had brought against her. Peace she ever had above all things at heart, had nourished and preserved it. Neither the infant state of Scotland, nor the treachery of France, nor the divisions of her enemies, nor the frequent solicitations of the Dutch, nor even all these things, could move her to make war. And, when she heard that mighty preparations were making against her and her kingdom, she chose rather to propose peace than to cast all hopes of it aside: for she sent a set of grave, prudent, and noble persons, as her ambassadors, to treat of it. Which, whilst they were labouring to effect, behold, a vast navy of Spanish ships were seen on our English coasts. Such a navy, that for number and greatness of the ships, for quantity of arms and military forces, and for all kinds of necessary stores, was never seen to float on the ocean before. But God Almighty, her maj.'s hope, defender, and preserver, rendered this vast Armado of her enemies vain and useless. For the British navy, by far inferior in number and strength, happily attacked, once and again, those huge raised-up rocks and mountains of ships; and, at the third conflict, so dispersed, shattered, and disabled them, that never thinking to renew the fight, they fled for it, and took a long course hitherto unheard of; for they steered round Scotland, Ireland, and the most northern regions, and by those means hoped to regain the Spanish coasts. But what shipwrecks they suffered, what hardships they bore, how many ships, soldiers, and seamen they lost, neither can they yet know, nor we for certain learn. Some few ships escaped to Spain; but so shaken, shattered, and forlorn, as they can never be of use to them again. The soldiers and sailors who have survived were so miserably harrassed by hunger, thirst, and other hardships, that they cannot of a long time recover their former health. But to what end, says he, do I, by this recital, endeavour to make you secure and void of fear? Do not you imagine, I say, that they are ardently studious of revenge; and that they will not employ the power, the strength, the riches of Spain, and the forces of both kingdoms, to accomplish it? Know you not the pride, fury, and bitterness of the Spaniard against you? Yes, adds he, this is the great cause of summoning this parl.; that in this most full assembly of the wisest and most prudent persons, called together from all parts of this kingdom, as far as human counsel can advise, a diligent preparation may be made, that arms and forces and money may be in readiness; and that our navy, which is the greatest bulwark of this kingdom, may be repaired, manned, and fitted out for all events with the utmost expedition."

After the Chancellor had ended his oration, the Queen adjourned the House of Lords to Feb. 6, to give time to the Commons to choose their Speaker. Accordingly, on that day, the Commons presented to the queen George Snagg, serjeant at law, for their Speaker, who, with the usual ceremonies, was confirmed. The Lord Chancellor, at the end of the admission speech only admonishing the commons not to extend their privileges to any unreverend and misbecoming Speeches, or unnecessary accesses to her maj. The first thing the Lords went upon was to bring in a bill concerning the Raising and Regulating of Officers and Soldiers; and the Commons about raising a Supply. The former bill passed the Lords, and went no further; but a bill against the embezzling of Armour, Habiliments of War, and Victual, which was made felony, became a statute.

A large Supply granted.] March 11, an "Act for three 15ths and 10ths, and ——— entire Subsidies, granted by the temporality," was sent up to the Lords. Whether there is any mistake in this entry or no is uncertain; but, on the 14th, when the bill was first read in the Lords, it was intituled, "an Act for the granting of four 15ths and 10ths and two entire Subsidies;" and was passed under the same title on the 17th. On the same day a bill was read for the Confirmation of a Supply granted by the Clergy, which consisted of two subsidies of 6s. in the pound, to be paid yearly by 2s. in the pound. How this vast Supply was carried in the Commons will appear in the sequel.

Debate on a Bill for Regulating Abuses in the Exchequer, &c.] Feb. 17th, when the motion was made for a Supply to be granted to her maj. sir Edw. Hobby complained to the house that several particulars of a speech, he had made on the bill for Regulating Abuses in the Exchequer, had been reported out of the house, for which he had been sharply rebuked by a very great Person. And praying that the said bill might be again read and committed, he was in some sort interrupted by the Chanc. of the Excheq.; who said, "That he offered not to speak to any prejudice of the said motion; but putting the house in remembrance of their charge given unto him and others, for conference to be had touching some convenient Supply of treasure to be had and levied for the necessary defence of her maj. and this realm, now presently in danger of such mighty and great enemies, as erst of late hath been at large delivered unto this house by some members of the same, declared unto them, that he and the greater part of the residue of the committees therein, though divers of them did not give that attendance therein which so great and weighty a cause doth require, have met and had conference together about the same, 4 several times; and, that at the last time of their said conference, they resolved upon such an extraordinary proportion of provision, as they thought, the present extraordinary occasion of necessity doth require, and that they did set the same down in writing, which he also moved might be read unto them; to the end that if it might upon the reading thereof, stand with their good-liking to allow of it and give their assents unto it, mr. Speaker might then deliver it to her maj.'s learned council, to have the same framed into the form of a bill to be proceeded in and past in this house; and shewed further, that as the grant of this contribution is greater than hath been heretofore for the most part ordinarily used to be granted (the present necessity so requiring it) so thinking good amongst them it should not hereafter be an occasion of a precedent to posterity for the like (without like cause) divers of them were of opinion, that some meet words to such an effect might be inserted in the preamble to the bill. And shewed further, that one of the committees, to wit, mr. Francis Bacon, had for that purpose set down a Note in writing, which, he said (if it pleased them) they might also hear read, and afterwards (if they thought good) might also be delivered to her maj.'s said learned council likewise with the said other note; and that withal the said mr. Bacon might repair to her maj.'s said learned council for the further proceeding therein with them, if this house should so think good. Whereupon the house liking well of this motion, both the said notes in writing were read by the clerk, and afterwards agreed by the whole house, that the same notes should be forthwith delivered by mr. Speaker to her maj.'s said learned council accordingly, and the said mr. Bacon also to repair unto them." —After the Chancellor had ended, sir Henry Knyvet entered upon the complaint made by sir E. Hobby, and desired the house would take it into consideration. He commended the motion, and urged the present Reading of the bill. And, upon the question, it was ordered to be read immediately, and committed.

The Queen's Message thereupon.] This bill, and another concerning Purveyors, gave great offence at court. We find that Feb. 27th, a Message came from the Lords to desire a conference with some of the Lower House concerning a Message they had just received from her maj. On this, a large committee were appointed, who, returning, made report, "That the lord treasurer had informed them the Message from her maj. was concerning the bills aforesaid, which she greatly disliked in both cases. The one tending to regulate the officers and ministers of her own household; and the other, those of her own court and of her own revenues. In both which, if any should demean themselves ill, her maj. was of herself both able and willing to reform them. And would make public examples, to other officers, of those of her household or court who should at any time be found to offend."—Many speeches and motions were made upon this, what was best to be done to satisfy her maj. about their proceedings in these bills. At length, it was resolved to chuse another Committee to consider of this matter; and, also to search precedents that might best serve to that purpose. And two days after, it was reported to the house, that the Committee thought the best way was to represent the case, as it stood, to her maj. by the mouth of their Speaker. Accordingly, March 8th, mr. Speaker shewed unto the House, "That he and others of this house, who were appointed to attend upon her maj. had access unto her highness yesterday; and that they received from her maj. most comfortable and gracious speeches in far better sort and measure than he was any way able to repeat or open unto them, of her highness's great and inestimable loving care towards her loving subjects, yea more than of her own self, or than any of them have of themselves. And as to the parts of the present humble Petition of this house unto her highness, in the grievances by the Purveyors and in the Court of Exchequer, it pleased her maj. to tell them, That for the one, to wit, the abuses of Purveyors, her highness had given orders unto the late lord steward to address his letters unto all the shires of this realm, for the due inquiry and certificate of the misdemeanors of Purveyors in all places, for some courses thereupon to be had for convenient redress in the same: and that before any order could well be taken for accomplishing that good intended effect, the Spaniards upon a sudden attempted the invasion of this realm; by reason whereof her maj. said, the said purpose was not performed. And so shewing further, that her maj. having as much skill, will and power to rule and govern her own household, as any subject to rule and govern theirs without the help or aid of their neighbours; so her majesty minding very carefully of her own mere great love and affection towards her subjects very shortly to cause a collection to be made of all the laws already in force touching Purveyors, and also all the constitutions of her highness's household in that case, and thereupon by the advice of her judges and her learned council, to set down such a form and plot for the said redresses, yea, and that before the end of this present session, as shall be as good and better for the ease of the subjects, than that which this house had attempted without her privy, and in which they would have bereaved her maj. of the honour, glory and commendation of the same. And touching the Exchequer she said, it was her Chamber, and so more near unto her than the household: and that in the 10th year of her reign, her maj. had caused certain orders and constitutions to be set down, for the due and fit course of such things in the said court, as her subjects seem to be grieved for.—On which these two bills were dropped, for that time; but, as it seems, they were soon after revived, by the Queen's allowance, and passed into laws this parliament.

Debate on the Supply.] It was not till Feb. 28th that the bill for granting a Supply was again considered; and several speeches being made for having it speedily ingrossed, it was opposed by others, who argued, "That it was better to proceed with other bills, as necessary for the commonwealth, which ought to be treated on and expedited before the Subsidy bill; because it was their opinions when that bill was once passed this house, there would soon be an end of this session. On which the question being put, it was carried for the ingrossment of the bill. After this, it met with no more opposition, but was passed and sent up to the lords on the 11th of March.

The Parl. dissolved.] March 29th, a Message was brought from the Lords, that their lordships desired the Lower House to concur with them in opinion, "That since most of all those Treasons, which had been practised against her maj. had either been plotted in Spain, or procured by Spain; and that all the rebellions, either in England or Ireland, during her maj.'s reign, had been countenanced from thence; and, as the upshot of all, his late intended ambitious and blood-thirsty conquest, yet fresh in memory, might be added: her maj. ought to be desired to denounce open war against the king of Spain, as against a most dangerous enemy to her maj. and her realms." On which Message it was resolved, upon the question, "That this House would join with their lordships in requesting her maj. to denounce war as aforesaid; and that the Speaker should deliver the same to her on presenting the Supply." And that very day her maj. being come to the Upper House, the Speaker went up with the bills, and, in his speech, moved the queen to denounce open war against the Spanish king, who had so lately threatened destruction to her maj. and these realms by his open and hostile invasion. Then after giving the royal assent to 16 public and 8 private acts, sir Christ. Hatton, knt. lord chanc. by the Queen's command, dissolved this parliament.

A new Parl. called.] It was not till the year 1592-3, that a new parl. was called; when the necessities of the state again requiring a Supply, writs were issued for one to meet at Westminster, on the 19th of Feb. At which time and place the Queen came to the House of Lords, and the Commons being called up,

The L. Keeper's Speech at opening the Session.] Sir John Puckering, knight, then lord-keeper, declared the cause of the summons to this effect:

"He shewed, in the first place, the antiquity, nature, and use of parliaments. Then he set forth as the principal matter, (which her maj. did desire to have made known and manifest to all her loving subjects) the great malice of the king of Spain, which he had towards this realm, and this he shewed, by sundry instances; as the last intended Invasion, his forces then addressed out of the Low-Countries for that purpose, to have been conducted by the duke of Parma, &c. And then he proceeded in the rest of his oration, to the purpose following: The high and mighty ships that then he prepared and sent for that purpose, because he found them not fit for our seas and such an attempt, he is building ships of a less bulk, after another fashion; some like French ships, some like the shipping of England; and many hath he gotten out of the Low-Countries. He is now, for the better invading of England, planting him in Brittain, a country of more facility to offend us than the Low-Countries; there he hath fortified himself in the most strong holds of that country.—In Scotland he hath, of late, wrought most of the nobility to conspire against their king; to give landing to his forces there; and to assist him in his invasion thither. A greater part of the nobility in Scotland be combined in this conspiracy, and they have received great sums of money for their service therein. And to assure the king of Spain of their assistance, they have signed and sent their promises, sealed, to the king.—This conspiracy the king of Scots was hardly brought to believe, but that her maj. advertised him thereof, having entertained intelligence thereof, as she hath of all things done and intended in those parts. And that the king might better advise thereupon, her maj. hath sent one of her noblemen now into Scotland; and the king hath assured her maj. with all his ability and endeavour to prevent the Spaniard, whose purpose is on the north parts to assault us by land, and, on the south side, to invade us by sea; which is the most dangerous practice that could be devised against us. And now the rage of this enemy being such, his forces joined with other princes, his adherents, greater; the charge of her maj. for defence of her realm, both with forces by sea, and armies by land hath been such, as hath both spent the contribution of her subjects, by subsidies, and what otherwise they offered her; and also consumed her treasure; yea, caused her to sell part of her highness's crown. And, it is not to be marvelled how all this is consumed, but rather to be thought how her maj. could be able to maintain and defend this her realm, against so many realms conspired against us.—Wherefore, we her majesty's subjects, must, with all dutiful consideration, think what is fit for us to do; and, with all willingness, yield part of our own, for the defence of others, and assistance of her maj. in such an insupportable charge. Were the cause between friend and friend, how much would we do for the relief of one another? But the cause is now between our sovereign and ourselves: seeing there is so much difference in the parties, how much more forward ought we to be? The aid that formerly hath been granted unto her maj. in these like cases, is with such slackness performed, as that the 3rd of what hath been granted cometh not to her maj. A great shew, a rich grant, and a long sum, seemeth to be made, but it is hard to be gotten, and the sum not great which is paid. Her maj. thinketh this to be, for that the wealthier sort of men turn this charge upon the weaker, and upon those of worst ability; for that one dischargeth himself, and the other is not able to satisfy what he is charged withal.—These things should be reformed by such as are commissioners in this present service.—Her majesty further hath willed me to signify unto you, that the calling of this parliament now, is not for the making of any more new laws and statutes, for there are already a sufficient number both of ecclesiastical and temporal; and so many there be, that rather than to burthen the subjects with more, to their grievance, it were fitting an abridgement were made of those there are already.—Wherefore it is her maj.'s pleasure, that the time be not spent therein: but, the principal cause of this parl. is, that her maj. might consult with her subjects for the better withstanding of those intended Invasions, which are now greater than were ever heretofore heard of. And whereas heretofore it hath been used, that many have delighted themselves in long orations, full of verbosity and of vain ostentations, more than in speaking things of substance; the time that is precious should not be thus spent. The sessions cannot be long, by reason of the spring-time, 'tis fit that gentlemen should repair to their countries; the justices of assize also to go to their circuits. So the good hours should not be lost in idle speeches, but the little time we have should be bestowed wholly on such businesses as are needful to be considered of." And he then desired them to elect a speaker.

The Speaker's Speech.] Feb. 22. The queen being come again to the Upper House, the Commons presented the famous Edward Coke, esq. solicitor-general, as their Speaker; who, being placed at the bar of the house, delivered himself as follows: "Your maj.'s most loving subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of the house of commons, have nominated me, your grace's poor servant and subject, to be their Speaker. Though their nomination hath hitherto proceeded, that they present me to speak before your maj.; yet this their nomination is, only as yet, a nomination and no election, until your maj. giveth allowance and approbation. For, as in the heavens, a star is but 'opacum corpus,' until it have received light from the sun; so stand I 'corpus opacum,' a mute body, until your highness's bright-shining wisdom hath looked upon me, and allowed me. How great a charge this is, to be the mouth of such a body as your whole Commons represent, to utter what is spoken, Grandia Regni, my small experience, being a poor professor of the law, can tell. But, how unable I am to do this office, my present speech doth tell, that of a number in this house, I am most unfit. For, amongst them are many grave, many learned, many deep wise men, and those of ripe judgments: but I am untimely fruit, not yet ripe, but a bud scarcely blossomed. So, as I fear me, your maj. will say, 'Neglecta frugi eliguntur folia;' amongst so many fair fruit ye have plucked a shaken leaf.—If I may be so bold as to remember a speech (which I cannot forget) used the last parl. in your maj.'s own mouth, Many come hither 'ad consulendum qui nesciunt quid sit consulendum;' a just reprehension to many as to myself also, an untimely fruit, my years and judgment ill befitting the gravity of this place. But, howsoever, I know myself the meanest, and inferior unto all that ever were before me in this place; yet, in faithfulness of service, and dutifulness of love, I think not myself inferior to any that ever were before me. And, amidst my many imperfections, yet this is my comfort; I never knew any in this place, but if your maj. gave them favour, God, who called them to the place, gave them also the blessing to discharge it."

The Lord Keeper's Answer.] The Lord Keeper having received instructions from the queen, answered him: "Mr. Solicitor, her grace's most excellent maj. hath willed me to signify unto you, that she hath ever well conceived of you since she first heard of you, which will appear, when her highness elected you from others to serve herself. But, by this your modest, wise, and well-composed speech, you give her maj. further occasion to conceive of you, above that which ever she thought was in you; by endeavouring to deject and abase yourself and your desert, you have discovered and made known your worthiness and sufficiency to discharge the place you are called to. And, whereas you account yourself 'corpus opacum,' her maj. by the influence of her virtue and wisdom, doth enlighten you; and not only alloweth and approveth you, but much thanketh the lower house, and commendeth their discretion in making so good a choice, and electing so fit a man. Wherefore now, mr. Speaker, proceed in your office, and go forward, to your commendation, as you have begun."

The Speaker's Reply.] The lord keeper's speech being ended, the speaker began a new speech: "Considering the great and wonderful blessings, besides the long peace we have enjoyed under your grace's most happy and victorious reign, and remembering with what wisdom and justice your grace hath reigned over us, we have cause daily to praise God that ever you were given us; and the hazard that your maj. hath adventured, and the charge that you have borne for us and our safety, ought to make us ready to lay down ourselves and all our living, at your feet, to do you service.—After this he related the great attempts of her maj.'s enemies against us, especially the Pope, and the king of Spain, who adhered unto him. How wonderfully we were delivered in 88, and what a favour God therein manifest unto her maj. His speech, after this, tended wholly to shew, out of the history of England and the old state, how the kings of England, ever since Hen. III.'s time, have maintained themselves to be the supreme head over all causes within their own dominions. And then reciting the laws that every one made in his time, for maintaining their own supremacy, and excluding the Pope, he drew down this proof by a statute of every king since Hen. III. to Edw. VI. This ended, he came to speak of laws, that they were so great, and so many already, that they were fit to be termed 'elephantinae leges.' Therefore to make more laws it might seem superfluous. And to him that might ask, 'Quid causa ut crescant tot magna volumina legis?' It may be answered, 'In promptu causa est, crescit in orbe malum.' The malice of our arch-enemy, the devil, though it were always great, yet never greater than now; and that 'dolus et malum' being crept in so far amongst men, it was requisite that sharp ordinances should be provided to prevent them, and all care be used for her maj.'s preservation. Now am I to make unto your maj. 3 Petitions, in the name of the Commons; 1st, That Liberty of Speech, and Freedom from arrests, according to the ancient custom of parl. be granted to your subjects; 2d, That we may have access unto your royal person, to present those things that shall be considered amongst us; lastly, That your maj. will give your royal assent to the things that are agreed upon. And, for myself, I humbly beseech your maj.

if any speech shall fall from me, or behaviour found in me, not decent and fit, it may not be imputed blame upon the house, but laid upon me, and pardoned in me."

The lord Keeper's further Answer.] To this speech, the Lord Keeper, having received new instructions from the queen, made his reply. "In which he first commended the Speaker greatly for it; and then he added some examples of history for the king's supremacy in Hen. II. and other kings before the conquest. As to the deliverance we received from our enemies, and the peace we enjoyed, the queen would have the praise of all those attributed to God only. And, touching the commendations given to herself, she said, 'Well might we have a wiser prince, but never should they have one that more regarded them, and in justice would carry an even stroke, without exception of persons; such a prince she wished they might always have.' To your 3 demands the Queen answereth; Liberty of Speech is granted you; but how far this is to be thought on, there be two things of most necessity, and those two do most harm, which are wit and speech: the one exercised in invention, and the other in uttering things invented. Privilege of speech is granted, but you must know what privilege you have; not to speak every one what he listeth, or what cometh in his brain to utter that; but your privilege is, aye or no. Wherefore, mr. Speaker, her maj.'s pleasure is, That if you perceive any idle heads, which will not stick to hazard their own estates; which will meddle with reforming the Church, and transforming the Commonwealth; and do exhibit any bills to such purpose, that you receive them not, until they be viewed and considered by those, who it is fitter should consider of such things, and can better judge of them. To your Persons all privileges is granted, with this caveat, that under colour of this privilege, no man's ill-doings, or not performing of duties, be covered and protected. The last; Free Access is granted to her maj.'s person, so that it be upon urgent and weighty causes, and at times convenient; and when her maj. may be at leisure from other important causes of the realm."

Bill against Popish Recusants.] The first bill we find brought into the Lords, of any note, was for the restraining of Popish Recusants to some certain places of abode. The bill was first introduced, under a different title, viz. 'An act for the restraining and punishing of vagrant and seditious Persons; who, under the feigned Pretence of Conscience and Religion, corrupt and seduce the Queen's subjects.' Under the first title it passed into a law and was, no doubt, calculated to keep up fears against popery; for no parl. in this reign passed without an act to that purpose. By this act they were confined within 5 miles of their respective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their goods, chattels, and lands, during life.

another religious sect, called Puritans, they had much occasion at this time to guard against. The legislature took particular notice of these, also, in reviving a former act 'for keeping the Queen's Majesty's Subjects in their due Obedience.' In the preamble to this act, it is declared to be made for the 'preventing and avoiding of such great inconveniences and perils, as might happen and grow by the wicked and dangerous practices of seditious sectaries, and disloyal persons.' The act itself ran, "That if any person, above the age of 16, shall refuse to repair to some Church, or forbear to do the same for the space of a month, he shall be committed to prison there to remain, without bail or main-prize, till they shall conform; and make such open submission and declaration of their conformity as the act appoints." The offenders against this statute, who refused to make this submission, were to abjure the realm, and not to return without her maj.'s licence, under the penalty of suffering as felons without benefit of clergy.—Feb. 28th, the bill was read a 2nd time. It was levelled, at first, only against the Papists; but, after some arguments, amongst which, one member asked, Whether those that came not to church, by reason of the dislike they had to church-govt. were to be in the same case with a Popish Recusant? The matter was committed for further consideration. March 12th the said Committee brought in the bill as before; and also a new one framed, on a more moderate system, which was read a first time, and the old one dropped. The next day it was read again, and then occasioned a farther debate; Mr. Sandys thought the bill ought to pass, as it was first meant, against all Recusants, and not restrained to Popish Recusants only; and that, under this bill, all Brownists, Barrowists, &c. ought to be included. Another member was for the restriction to Papists alone; and the Speaker said, That as the title of the bill, and the preamble, ran only against such as are enemies to the state, and adherents to the Pope, other Recusants than popish could not be comprised in it; since another bill might be framed against those persons, and these not included in it. Mr. Dalton argued, that the sectaries ought to be comprised in this bill, as well as Papists; that the preamble might be altered, and be to repress all disloyal subjects, and force them to a more due obedience: or it might be wholly left out, and go directly to the act itself; for he cited several bills overthrown by too many superfluous words in the preamble. Dr. Lewin spoke against the Brownists and Barrowists; and concluded, that they ought to be provided against as well as Papists: but whether in this or another bill, he left it to the wisdom of the house. After which, the said bill was re-committed, and a new bill framed against disloyal subjects, &c. both which passed the house, without any more remarkable opposition.

nals tell us, that March 13th, this session, on a motion of the bp. of Worcester; the Lords condescended to a Contribution, for the relief of such poor Soldiers as went begging about the streets of London, after this rate: that every earl should give 40s. every bp. 30s. every baron 20s. and appointed the said bp. of Worcester and the lord Norris collectors; and the earl of Essex and the lord Willoughby, distributors thereof. These last lords had been generals abroad, and therefore proper persons to disburse this charity. But the matter did not rest here; for, on the 9th of April, another entry is made, that, "whereas the Lords of parl. both spiritual and temporal, assembled in the parl. chamber, at Westminster, have all, with uniform consent, in their own names, and the rest of the Lords absent, ordered, That there should be a charitable Relief and Contribution made towards the aid and help of a number of Soldiers, that are seen, in the time of this parl. maimed and sore hurt, in the wars of France, the Low-Countries, and over the seas for the service of the queen's maj. and this realm. And for that purpose have allotted, that every abp. marquis, earl, and viscount, should pay towards this contribution the sum of 40s. every bp. 30s. and every baron 20s. for collecting whereof there hath been appointed the queen's maj.'s almer, the bp. of Worcester, for the bps. and the lord Norris for the lords temporal, which hath been diligently done and received of all those lords who have attended their great charge in parl. And, considering the number of the soldiers being many to be relieved, notwithstanding the knights, citizens and burghesses of the lower house, have yielded very good and large contribution, according to their degrees; yet, for the better relief of the said maimed Soldiers, it is by the lords spiritual and temporal, that have given their chargeable attendance, and also charitably and honourably yielded to this contribution, thought meet, and so it is ordered and decreed by them, with common and full assent; That all the lords of parl. who have been altogether absent in this session, and that shall not have contributed to this charity before the end of this session, shall be required, by letters sent to them, by the lords their proxies in their absence, or from the lord keeper of the great seal, requiring and charging them, to make payment, according to their degrees and vocation, the double of the sums of money paid by the lords that have been here present and continued their attendance; that is to say, every absent earl, with the abp. of York, 4 pounds; every absent bp. 3l. and every baron 40s. Likewise, such lords as have attended sometimes, though seldom, shall, according to their degrees pay a third part more than the lords that are constant here. All such sums of money shall be delivered to the lord keeper, and afterwards distributed, by such lords as are chosen for that purpose, to the maimed Soldiers that stand the most in need thereof. And, as the Commons, in this present parl.

have rated their absent members double, so we think this order very just; considering the absent lords and others who have been at no charge to come up and give their attendance, may, very reasonably, and with great saving of their charge, contribute to this order. And, if any lord, spiritual or temporal, shall refuse or forbear to do this, (which it is hoped in honour none will do) there shall be ordinary means used to levy the same."—But this was not all; for this parl. resolved to make the rest of the kingdom contribute to the same, by bringing in a bill for the Relief of Soldiers and Mariners; by which act every parish was charged with a sum, weekly, for the relief of sick, hurt and maimed soldiers and seamen. Which act is the first of its kind for this charitable and necessary purpose.

Lord Burleigh's Speech for a Supply.] Mr. Strype, the annalist, has restored to us a Speech of the lord treasurer Burleigh, made in the house of lords during this session, but on what day is not mentioned. It was most probably delivered before the Subsidy bill came up from the Commons, in order to acquaint the Lords with the State of the Nation at this time, and to prepare them for furthering the Supply. Our author says he copied it from a M.S. in the lord treasurer's own hand-writing. The Speech, together with the Schedule of the Queen's Extraordinary Charges on account of the War annexed to it, are as follow:—

"To make a declaration of the first cause, and original beginning, whereby her maj. was provoked to arm her realms with forces, were a labour lost in this place: where in former times the same hath been often declared; and wherein a great number of the nobility here present have heard many circumstances thereof, at the proceedings with the late queen of Scots. For whom, and by whom, the quarrels were first made against the queen's maj.'s person, against the religion and quietness of the realm.—And therefore, leaving the repetition of that cause, by which her maj. was detained in a kind of war, to withstand both the king's of France and Spain, who intermeddled in the case of the Queen of Scots against her maj.; yet there hath followed continually such a deadly malice from the king of Spain, the bp. of Rome, and their confederates, as unto this day, wherein no intermission hath been of attempts against her maj. and the realm; although at some time more vehement than at some others; as appeared in the year 88, by his open armies both by sea and land; being of greater force than ever was known to be made by his father the emperor Charles, or by himself, or by any Christian prince within the memory of man.—But minding to overpass all the attempts afore that huge enterprize, that was frustrate by God's special goodness beyond the expectation of the world: and considering there hath been no assembly of parl. since that time, wherein her maj. might publicly declare to the states of her realm the continuance of the former attempts, but the increase of more dangers than were seen in any time before. Therefore, as was delivered by the Lord-keeper, her maj. hath summarily imparted the same to this assembly, referring the consideration thereof to the whole three estates, whereof two are in this place; how the same danger may be withstood, and by what provision her majesty and realm may be preserved in domestic peace, as yet it is, as in a centre of happiness, where the circumference is in open calamity.—And, because it is all our parts and duties, first to God, and to our sovereign head, and our native country, to apply all our endeavour, being every one of us called to this place, by special commandment, in express words, upon consideration of the hardness of the business, and the perils imminent, to treat with her maj. and with the prelates and great men of the realm, and to give our counsels, so as it is convenient for us all: first to consider the perils, and then to give counsel. Therefore, in discharging of my duty, with your patience in suffering an old man, beside his years, decayed in his spirits with sickness, to declare some part of his knowledge of the dangers and perils imminent. But for advice and counsel how to withstand the same, I shall be constrained, for lack of sufficient understanding in so great cause, to require some further conference with your lordships, or with so many as shall appear more able than I am, to give some good entry thereto. As to the Dangers, that they be great and imminent, that they have both lately grown and likely to increase, these be manifest arguments. First, the king of Spain, since he hath usurped upon the kingdom of Portugal, he hath thereby grown mighty by gaining the East Indies. So as how great soever he was before, he is now thereby more manifestly great. But for increase hereof to be greater, yea, greater than any Christian prince hath been, he hath lately joined with his intended purpose newly to invade this realm, with more might than before he did the invasion of France, by sundry ways. Not as in former times, when the emperor Charles and the French kings, the great Francis and the warlike Henry, made former wars for towns their greatest wars. Yea, when the present king of Spain had his great army against Henry of France. For in those wars none of them intended to do any thing more but to be revenged of supposed injuries, by burning or winning of some frontier towns by besieging. And after such revenges, mutually had to the satisfaction of their appetites, wherein neither party had any special advantage, they fell to truces, and in the end with knots sometimes of intermarriages. And by these kind of wars none of them did increase in greatness, to be dangerous to their enemies. And in these kind of wars our kings of England had their interest, for the most part, to the expence of men and money; and never to the loss of any small portion of any ground in England and Wales, nor otherwise; but by yielding to the king of Spain, by means of the marriage of queen Mary, to make war with France, the realm lost that noble town and port of Calais, with great seignories and territories thereunto belonging. But now the case is altered. The king of Spain maketh these his mighty wars, by means only of his Indies; not purposely to burn a town in France or England, but to conquer all France, England, and Ireland. And for proof hereof: 1st, for France, he hath invaded Britain, taken the fort, builded his fortresses, carried in his army, waged a navy in Britain, received into wages a great number of his subjects, as rebels to France. And there he keepeth a navy armed, to impede all trade from England to Gascoign and Guienne; which he attempted to do this last vintage. And so he had had his purpose, if to the great charges of the merchants, and by countenance of her maj.'s navy, sent to the coast of Britain, the shipping of England had not been much stronger than his. Besides this, his possessing a great part of Britain towards Spain, he hath at his commandment all the best ports of Britain towards England. So as now he is become as a frontier enemy to all the west of England. And by his commandment, and his waged troops in Newhaven, he hath enlarged his frontiers now against all the south parts of England, as Sussex, Hampshire, Isle of Wight. Yea, by means of his interest in st. Malo's, a port full of shipping for the war, he is a dangerous neighbour to the queen's isles of Jersey and Guernsey, ancient possessions of this crown, and never conquered in the greatest wars with France.—Of this matter of Britain a man might enlarge, the danger so great to England, as if he had attempted nothing at all in Normandy and France; yet the danger hereof might appear so great as ought to induce England to spare no cost to withstand it. And herewith he is not contented to seek this reduction, but he destines all his forces to conquer the kingdom of France, the principal kingdom of Christendom. And, to atchieve his enterprize, he hath, these two years-day and more, corrupted, with great sums of money and large pensions, certain factious noblemen, not of the blood of France, nor the great officers of the crown; and by them, and with these rebels, and by waging of his soldiers in some of the principal towns of France, as Paris, Roan, Orleans, Lyons, Toloze, and others, he hath procured a rebellion against the king, against all the princes of the blood, against all the great officers of the crown. But finding these rebels not strong enough of themselves, notwithstanding they are well waged by him to withstand the king, he hath, to his great charges, levied and sent into France, even to Paris and Roan, armies collected of Walloons, Lorainers, Italians, Spaniards, Almains, and Switzers. Wherewith he hath twice entered into France; though God gave him no good success, but great loss and reproach. Besides these foreign armies, sent from the Low Countries, he hath caused his son-in-law, the duke of Savoy, to invade France by Provence and Dolphiné; and the duke of Lorain by Burgundy and Champaign, and to environ France. Further, he hath sent armies by sea, out of Spain, to invade Languedoc. And even now at this present, all these foreign forces are newly made ready to enter into all parts of France, made by a colourable assembly of the rebels in Paris, to represent the three estates; yet without a king or a head. He intendeth to be a king of that realm, or to make his daughter the queen, and to appoint her a husband, to be as his vassal. He hath also the Pope so addicted to him, as he that never was wont to send to any parts but only Italy, by bulls with lead and parchment, did now levy and send an army into France. And though he coloureth it with matter of defence of Catholic religion, yet both he and the king of Spain make war against all the princes of the blood, and officers of the realm, being sound Catholics. And so they have, by their ambassades, lately advertised the Pope; as by the cardinal Gundy, and marq. Pysany, ancient counsellors of France, and Catholics. So as the pretence of the Pope, and the king of Spain, in that point, are merely France. These are the dangers in France, and must of consequence draw England into like peril; without God's special goodness, and the speedy support to be given to her maj. for prevention thereof.—Now, to manifest the king of Spain's attempt to invade England, whereof I think no good Englishman so want of feeling to think otherwise, yet I will remember to you divers manifest arguments thereof; and afterwards, to supply the want of any man's feeling only by arguments or tokens, I will declare to you, the very truth of his determination, by manifest proofs. So as none ought to think, because he was disappointed of his intention for the conquest of England by his huge navy, therefore he will put that disgrace up, and leave off with that loss. But it is certain he hath, the two last years, builded a great number of ships of war, as near as he can to the mold and quality of the English navy; finding, by experience, his monstrous great ships not fit for our narrow seas. He hath lately armed a number of gallies on the coast of Britain, which he intendeth to send this summer to Newhaven. He hath also, these two years-day, both bought and built great ships in Eastland. He hath, both from thence and by corruption of our faint and covetous neighbours in Holland, recovered, with silver hooks, both mariners, ships, cordage, and all provisions. These being now on the point of readiness to serve on the seas, a good argument may be made, That this navy must be for England. For now that he hath all the maritime coast of Britain, and that he hath, in Normandy, Newhaven, there is no service by sea to enter into any part of France with this navy.—How he and the Pope ply themselves to win a party in England to be ready to second his Invasion, I am sorry and loth to relate; and how far they have prevailed herein to gain so great a multitude of vulgar people; yea, of some that are of wealth and countenance, to adhere to these invaders at their entry, with vain hopes to attain the places, honours, and livelihoods of such as are now known true natural Englishmen, and good subjects.—But to such as these arguments will not suffice to be persuaded, that this intention of the king of Spain to invade this realm is certain; this that followeth shall fully satisfy any man, yea, any man that useth to believe nothing until he shall see it. There are taken in Scotland and imprisoned, certain that came first out of Spain, near afore Christmas, from the king; who before had been sent out of Scotland to the king of Spain. These messengers brought assurance to certain noblemen, of the greatest calling in Scotland, that if they would send their bonds, under their hands and seals, to serve the king of Spain, for the Invasion of England, by land, next summer, the king would send an army of 25,000 to the west of Scotland; and would give the noblemen wages for 10,000 Scots, to be joined with 20,000 of his, to invade England; and would keep 5000 of his in Scotland, to aid them to overrule the king of Scots, and to change the religion. This accord was perfected by three noblemen, earls Arrol, Huntley, and Angus; promising their own assistance, besides assurance, in general words, of divers more, not yet discovered. And for an earnest penny, these earls have received good sums of money from the Low Countries. Now for proof hereof, the messenger that was sent, and on ship-board, was taken, with the bonds of the noblemen, some signed and sealed by them all, and of every earl a part, in several bonds in French and Latin. The messenger hath confessed the whole to the king, who so carefully proceeded therein as if he had not travailed therein himself; such of his council as were appointed to examine the parties that were taken, durst not, for fear of the greatness of the noblemen that had offended, and were not fled, examine the messenger of any thing that might concern these noblemen. They are since all fled; and the king hath gathered of his good subjects a certain power to pursue them. But it is doubted, that they will flee into the west islands; and from thence either to pass into Spain, or to have forces sent out of Spain. But the king, the day before he went, caused one Fentry, an old practiser with Spain for the Queen of Scots, a man of a good house and great wealth, to be executed, being a principal contriver of this conspiracy. To animate the king to follow this action, her maj. hath sent my lord of Bourgh. Thus far have I observed my purpose, to shew the danger; and to give counsel to the remedy, ‘hoc opus, hic labor est.’ And I would gladly to have some company, of whom I might have some light, how to find out the darkness of the question; wherein, when time shall serve, I will not be silent, but deliver mine opinion, and reform it upon good ground.”

March 24th, the Commons sent up a bill to the Lords, entitled, ‘an Act for the grant of 3 entire Subsidies, and six 15ths and 10ths, by the temporality;’ which passed the Lords on the 30th without any opposition.

Four Members committed, for proposing a Bill for Entailing the Succession.] This is all that the Lords Journals give us; but, that of the Commons is not so barren. For after the ceremonies of the opening this session were finished, the next thing we find entered, is, “That on Feb. 24, mr. Peter Wentworth and sir Hen. Bromley delivered a Petition to the Lord-Keeper, therein desiring the Lords of the Upper House to be suppliants, with them of the lower, unto her maj. for ‘Entailing the Succession of the crown; for which they had a bill ready drawn.’ This matter was highly resented by the Queen, as contrary to her former strict commands. They were soon after called before the Council; and, though the lords there spoke favourably to them, yet, they were told that her maj. was so highly offended at them that they must be committed. Accordingly, mr. Wentworth was sent prisoner to the Tower, sir Hen. Bromley to the Fleet; and one mr. Rd. Stevens and mr. Welch, two other members concerned in drawing the Petition, were sent to the Fleet with him. How long these 4 members were confined is uncertain; for, on the 10th of March, one mr. Wroth, moved the House, on the Subsidy-bill, “That since some countries might complain of these very large taxations, their knights and burgesses never consenting, not being present at the grant: and, because, an instrument, taking away some of its strings, can give but an unpleasant sound: therefore, he desired that the house would be humble suitors to her maj. that she would be pleased to set at liberty those members of it that were restrained." This was opposed by all the members of the Privy-Council in that house; who argued "That her maj. had committed them for reasons best known to herself; and for them to press her in that suit was but to make their case the worse. They added, that it was not to be doubted but her maj. of her gracious disposition, would shortly do it of her own accord, and that it was much better to have it left to herself than sought for by them." This severity of the Queen's had its effect; for no more mention is made of settling the Succession in this parl. nor in any other of her reign.

Debate on the Supply.] Feb. 26, the business of a Supply was moved in the Commons. Sir S. D'Ewes is very particular in the Speeches made on that occasion. We are told they were not entered in the Original Journal Book of the Commons, but taken from an anonymous MS. Journal, kept by some member of it. This gentleman proves to be Heywood Townshend, esq. who hath left a collection of all the proceedings in the four last parliaments of Elizabeth, which were printed, folio, London, 1680. The Journals of sir Symonds D'Ewes were not published till 2 years after, but then they were posthumous, and dedicated to sir Willoughby D'Ewes his son; so that it is probable he never knew who was the author of the former. This being premised, we next proceed to the speeches on the Supply, and first,

Sir Rob. Cecil rose and said: "Mr. Speaker, as I remember, I have been of this house these 5 parliaments; and I have not determined to say any thing, in these assemblies, further than my cogitations should concur with my conscience in saying bare aye, or no. Give me leave, I pray you, to rehearse an old saying, and it is in Latin, 'Nec te collaudes, nec te vituperes ipse;' for me to do the one were exceeding arrogancy, and to do the other, I do confess, I hope, you will pardon me. The occasion of this parl. as I take it by that which we received from the hon. and learned speech of the Lord Keeper of and from her maj. to us in the Higher House, is for the Cause of Religion and Maintenance thereof amongst us; the Preservation of her maj.'s Person, and the Good of this Realm. All which because they be things of most dear and greatest price, and at this present in imminent danger, it is most behoofful to consult of speedy remedies, which should proceed from the wisest heads. The enemy to these is the king of Spain, whose malice and ambition is such, as together with the Pope, that Antichrist of Rome, (for I may well couple them together, the one being always accompanied with envy at our prosperity, the other with unsatiable desire) makes them by all means to seek the subversion of the state. But concerning the 1st, the Cause of God and his Religion, which her maj. professed before she came to sit in this royal seat, which she hath defended and maintained, and for which cause God hath so blessed her govt. since her coming to the crown: yea, while the crown was scarce warm on her head, she abolished the authority of Rome, and did set up God's truth amongst us; and to her great renown made this little land to be a sanctuary for all the persecuted saints of God: whereby the people perceived her magnanimity, zeal and judgment; magnanimity in undertaking so great an enterprize; zeal in professing the same, not for the shew, but of sincerity; judgment in defending it and preventing all the Pope's designs. He sent forth his bulls and missives against her maj. thereby unnaturally depriving her of her natural right, the duty and loyalty which her subjects should owe unto her, &c. He touched the many dangers her maj. had been in, which as it caused him to fear to think, so did he tremble to speak concerning the danger of our country, and so the loss of our lives, liberties, wives, children, and all other privileges. Let me not trouble you with things past so long, and perhaps beyond my reach, but with things past of late years and since 38. When we were so secure, and never thought that the king of Spain would have set up his rest for England: then sent he his navy termed Invincible, and was almost upon the banks of us before we were aware. Yea, we were so slack in provision, that it was too late to make resistance, had not God preserved us. His attempt against us, by seeking to win the Low-Countries and to obtain Ireland, being but trifles and paultry devices, which I mean not to trouble you with; he hath now of late gone about to win France, wherein he hath greatly prevailed, as in Lorrain and in other parts, as you have heard, but specially in Brittain, having most part of the port-towns in his possession, whither he still sendeth supply daily, and reinforces them every 4 or 5 months, which port is always open and his men and forces never wanting. This province he especially desireth, for it lyeth most fitly to annoy us, whither he may send forces continually, and there have his navy in a readiness; the which he could not so easily, unless he had the wind in a bag. Besides, having this province, he will keep us from traffic to Rochell and Bourdeaux, as he doth in the Streights from Tripoly and st. Jean de Luze: and so hinder us from carrying forth and bringing into this land any commodities: from those parts, whereby the realm might be enriched and her maj.'s impost increased, being one of the greatest revenues of her crown. He hath also gone about with them of Stade and the king of Poland, one of his own faction, and who by reason he cannot do in that kingdom what he listeth, he may not so easily command him to impede, or hinder our traffic in those eastern parts, which if he could bring to pass, you see how hurtful it would be to this land. But to descend yet lower into these latter actions. He hath seen it is but a folly to make wooden-bridges to pass into England, therefore he hath found out a surer way and stronger passage into it by land, and that by Scotland; which though it be not talked of on the Exchange, nor preached at Paul's cross, yet it is most true; and in Scotland as common as the highway, 'That he hath procured unto him many of the nobility there.' It may be he hath sent thither no great navy, and that her maj. would not suffer him to do; yet do what she can, some one paltry fly-boat may escape her maj.'s ships, and carry gold enough in her to make them traitors, and stir them to sedition. These things her maj. understood before, and advertised the king thereof; which the effect hath proved to be true. For unless I be deceived, the last letters, that came from thence, might shew that the king is gone to make a road into the north, and to bring back the lord Bothwell and the lord Huntley. The king of Spain's malice thus daily increaseth against us, and seeketh also to stir up sedition amongst us by his instruments. The number also of Papists daily increaseth, or at lestwise becomes more manifest. My advice is, that you would consult how to withstand such imminent dangers, which the greater they be, the sooner they should be looked into and remembered. Wherefore I would desire mr. Speaker, that he would appoint some committees of the sufficientest and wisest men in the house to consider thereon."

Sir John Wolley spake to the like effect, saying, "That upon the Cause of the Danger the realm was now in, and of the Remedy, his speech should consist; which he likened to a natural body, in which the more danger the principal member was in, the greater means there should be used for the preservation thereof. Roan being made now Admiral of France by the League, should say, that he was a poor admiral now, but yet he doubted not, but that shortly he should be able to bring such a navy as should terrify the queen of England. Also he shewed how the princes of the Holy League had conspired the overthrow of the realm, the extirpation of religion, and the confusion of her maj. and her loyal subjects. And exhorted the house, now because the season of the year groweth on, which calleth many of the knights and burgesses to be in their countries, besides the sickness being in the town, so that many of that house knew not whether they lodged in houses infected or not, that they would seek to dispatch and end the parl. so soon as might be. He also shewed how the Dunkirkers troubled our fishermen in small barks upon the sea-coasts. And so that this matter might be committed to some of the sufficientest in the house. He also exhorted the house to a speedy agreeing of a subsidy, and shewed that the wars with Spain had cost her maj. a million of money: but this he avouched, that where it cost her maj. one, it cost the king of Spain three."

Sir John Fortescue said, "They that spake before me, spake sufficiently of the authors of our troubles, of the great danger which is now imminent, insomuch that it is come to this point now, 'Non utrum imperare, sed utrum vivere.' I will speak of nothing but that which concerns my calling. Her maj. not being only careful for the preservation of her own realm, but of her neighbours also; she hath not only defended her own subjects from being invaded, but also hath aided strangers which wanted money, with whom otherwise it would have gone ill by this time both with them and ourselves. Insomuch that the burthen of four kingdoms hath rested upon her maj. which she hath maintained with her purse, England, France, Ireland, and Scotland. For how could the French king, at his first coming to the crown, have held out against those leaguers, had not her maj. assisted him with her men and money, which hath cost her maj. above 100,000l.? For it is well known that the French king had not been able to withstand the duke of Parma's coming into France, had it not been for our Englishmen and money. As for the Low-Countries, they have stood her maj. yearly, since she undertook the defence of them, 150,000l. All which her maj. bestowed for the good of the realm, to free us from war at home. Besides, when her maj. came to the crown, she found it 4 millions indebted; her navy when she came to view it, she found greatly decayed: yet all this she hath discharged, and (thanks to God) is nothing indebted; and now she is able to match any prince in Europe, which the Spaniards found when they came to invade us. Yea, she hath with her ships compassed the whole world, whereby this land is made famous throughout all places. She did find in her Navy all iron-pieces, but she hath furnished it with artillery of brass; so that one of her ships is not a subject's but rather a petty king's wealth. As for her own private expences, they have been little in building; she hath consumed little or nothing in her pleasures. As for her Apparel, it is royal and princely, becomming her calling, but not sumptuous nor excessive. The charges of her house small, yea, never less in any king's time. And shortly (by God's Grace) she will free her subjects from that trouble which hath come by the means of Purveyors. Wherefore she trusteth, that every good subject will assist her maj. with his purse, seeing it concerns his own good and the preservation of his estate. For before that any of us would lose the least member of his body, we would bestow a great deal, and stick for no cost nor charges: how much more ought we in this political body, whereof not only a member but the whole is in jeopardy, if we do not make haste to the preservation thereof? And for these Subsidies which are granted now adays to her maj. they are less by half than they were in Henry VIIIth's time. Now although her maj. has borrowed some money of her subjects besides her Subsidies, yet she has truly repaid and answered every one fully. I desire the matter may be put to a committee."

Mr. Francis Bacon spake to the effect following; "That which these hon. personages have spoken of their experiences, may it please you to give me leave likewise to deliver of my common knowledge. The cause of assembling all parliaments hath been hitherto for laws or moneys: the one being the sinews of peace, the other of war. To the one I am not privy, but the other I should know. I did take great contentment in her maj.'s Speech the other day delivered by the Lord Keeper, how that it was a thing not to be done suddenly nor at one parl. nor scarce a whole year would suffice to purge the Statute-Book, and lessen the volume of Laws; being so many in number, that neither common people can practise them, nor the lawyer sufficiently understand them: than the which nothing should tend more to the praise of her maj.—The Romans appointed ten men, who were to correct and recal all former Laws; and to set forth those 12 Tables so much of all men to be commended. The Athenians likewise appointed six for that purpose. And Lewis IX. of France, did the like in reforming his laws."—The rest of his argument tending to the appointing a committee, both to consider of the dangers of the realm, and of speedy Supply to be given to her maj. And thereupon the House did accordingly nominate the said Committee; to deliberate and consult in what proportion they might now relieve her maj. with Subsidies, in respect of those many and great enemies against whose power and malice she was to provide, and prepare for necessary defence and preservation of her realms and dominions.

Debate on a Bill to reform the Abuses of the Ecclesiastical Courts. Feb. 27. Mr. Morrice moved the house, "Touching the hard Courses of the Bishops and Ordinaries, and other Ecclesiastical Judges in their Courts, used towards sundry learned and godly ministers and preachers of this realm, by way of Inquisition, subscription and binding absolution, contrary (he said) to the honour of God, the regality of her maj. the laws of this realm, and the liberty of the subjects; compelling them, upon their own oaths, to accuse themselves in their own private actions, words and thoughts, if they shall take such oaths, because they know not to what questions they shall answer till after the time they be sworn; and also after such examination proceed against them by deprivation, degradation or suppression, upon such their own accusations of themselves. And if they refuse to take such oath, then they commit them to prison, and there keep and detain them at their own pleasure, not absolving or releasing them until they shall first have taken a corporal oath of their canonical obedience to their ordinaries. And shewing further at large, the great inconvenience thereby grown unto the free subjects of this realm, doth in the end pray a consultation to be had therein by this house, for redress of the said enormities; and offereth unto mr. Speaker two Bills, the one concerning the said Inquisitions, Subscriptions and Offering of Oaths, and the other concerning the Imprisonments upon their refusal of the said Oaths; praying that the said latter bill which concerneth the said imprisonments might be read, and the other to be offered to this house at some more convenient time."

Mr. Dalton answered thus: "This bill pretends great things in shew, tending to the hindrance of God's service, and the derogation of her maj.'s prerogative, to the overthrow of our laws and violating of our liberties: things, I say, great in shew, but no such things to be found in the matter spoke against. It is easy to make of a mole-hill a mountain in words, so by a well compiled speech to make a great and dangerous thing of nothing; nay, a thing indeed needless, for that the state hath hitherto always stood upon this govt. And so he shewed how Ecclesiastical govt. was distinct from Temporal. The reasons he gave were few or none: only his great dislike was, that having received strait commandment from her maj. not to meddle with things concerning the Reformation of the Church and State, therefore in his opinion the bill ought to be suppressed."

Sir John Wolley spake also against the bill, "disallowing the matters in it; and taking it as too busy a meddling in such a thing so forbidden by her maj. so he thought it not fit that it should be read."

Sir Francis Knowles answered, "That whereas it was condemned as seeking the overthrow of a member of the state, and so against the law; it tended, in his opinion, but, to the reforming of abuses, and so restraining of the prelates, that if they meddle against the laws, they shall incur a præmunire. So that he thought the bill to be good and fit to be read."

Dr. Lewen endeavoured to shew, "That as the natural body was delighted in change, so was it also in the politic body, greedy of alteration. That this eversion of bps. had long been sought for; and in shooting at their jurisdiction, their aim was at their places; as being no more able to stand the one without the other, than a house without a foundation. Then he entered into a discourse of Government, as Monarchies, Aristocracies, and Democracies. He approved the monarchies; and, in the most famous monarchies in the world, shewed this govt. now exercised by the bps. to have been used. He endeavoured to prove the bishops to be such a part of the body politic, as without them it could be no body. And in comparing it with the state of the natural body, he termed the prince and the counsellors of the state to be as the senses, and as the head; the bps. and ministers as the shoulders and arms; the common people the legs. Now, to take away the shoulders from the body, were as great a blemish and prejudice as to have the fingers tied unto the shoulders. Then came he to 3 parts of mr. Morrice's speech, Inquisition, Subscription, and binding Absolution. Inquisition he proved lawful; 1st, because it had been so long used, and in the greatest monarchies allowed. For before inquisition came in, the manner of trial was by accusation, and then the party accusing was to suffer the penalty that the law inflicted upon the party accused, if he failed in his accusation. Then it might be that the party accused, if the accuser failed in his accusation, might solicit two witnesses to answer for him, which was sufficient to acquit him: so the guilty escaped, and the guiltless accuser was punished. This seeming grievous, they changed their trials into inquisitions. And whosoever reads Demosthenes and Tully, shall see how unwillingly they were hired to accuse. And if we look into the laws of this realm, it is altogether by inquisitions in courts baron, leets, and in the king's courts, and in the star-chamber. So that this course is as lawful in the ecclesiastical as in the temporal law. Subscription was a thing we were bound unto by statute. The like was used in our churches as at Geneva, so as allowable here. Absolution, termed binding, is no other than in the common law; for in the writ 'de excommunicato capiendo,' the party absolved is to be sworn 'ad servandum jus,' and his oath to perform the law in this absolution is not grievous: whereas otherwise the party accused was to find pledges for the same. Nay, it is a liberty to him, when upon his oath he may be freed. And so as to the bill, he thought it fittest that it should be first considered of by the bishops and judges of the realm before it were read."

Mr. Oliver St. John spoke for the bill. "It hath been the manner of this house to allow a mixture in speaking, and after the grave, hon. and wisest, then to hear the meanest also. For myself, I am but young, yet will I shew unto you matter which is old. In answer to them that spake last, the ancient Charter of this realm says, 'Nullus liber Homo,' &c. which is flatly violated by bishops' jurisdiction. You know what things Thomas Becket stood upon against the king, which things are now also crept in. And for more full answer of one that spake before, his antiquity and prescription cannot be allowed in this govt. for any reason; for so were the official prebendary to take and exact fees, because time out of mind they had done so; and set it down that it was answered in the parliament house, 'that thieves may prescribe to take purses on Shooters-hill, because time out of mind they had done so.'—For that of Inquisition, it seems to him (specially) that spake last, to be allowed before that trial by accusation: 1st, by reason of the antiquity of the trial. But it cannot be proved so ancient as the manner of trials by accusations. For in John, the adulterous woman being brought to Christ, he asked who were her accusers? And for that manner of accusation, the lawyers themselves speak against it; for one saith of it, 'Ut libere fatear quod sentiam, nunquam mihi placebat.' For Subscription, the statute alledged is meant but a subscription to certain articles in religion, and not a subscription in this form. And because it is allowed in Geneva, so to allow it here, that is no reason. For in Geneva there be many things allowed, which the party speaking would, I dare say, be loth to have used here. As to Absolution, there is no such oath to be required therein in our writ 'de excommunicato capiendo,' as was said. So I think the bill very worthy and fit to be read."

Sir Robert Cecil answered, "I am unwilling to speak, yea, I speak against my will; and to answer speeches well studied and premeditated upon the sudden, it is hard for me. What the bill containeth, I am ignorant of; and whether to allow of it or not, I will suspend my opinion. To say the truth, the man that offered it was learned and wise, and one whom I love; yet a bill to be offered and enforced in this sort, being of such effect, I know not how to allow of it. For her maj. had straitly forbidden to meddle in such cases; yet not forgetting the cause, she had, in her excellent wisdom, cared and intended that a redress should be had of things that are amiss. To which end her maj. before the parl. summoned, had directed her letters to the abps. to certify her. Now her highness's care for our good shall be prevented, by our hasty speaking of these things before our time. Sure it is not fit, and her maj. cannot but be offended at it. For the bill, I protest, I know it not; but it seemeth to contain things needful. Wherefore it were fittest it should be commended to her maj. and so recommended unto us. And if I may do this office and service for the house, I will in all dutiful love and service do it. But if the other course be taken, I fear the things sought will be denied for the violence used in it."

Mr. Speaker said, "In favour and free love, above my merits or desert, you have elected me, which should bind me to do all my best service, and to be faithful toward you. This bill delivered me is long, and containeth important matters of great weight, and such matters as cannot be expressed in few words. It hath many parts, and if you put me presently to open it, I cannot so readily understand it, and do it as I should; for indeed it is a matter far above my ordinary practice: and to deliver a thing before I conceive it, I could not. Wherefore, if it would please you to give me leave to consider of it, I protest, I will be faithful, and keep it with all secrecy." Hereupon the house was in question, whether it should be committed to the Speaker only, or to the Privy-Council and him: but it was holden to be against the order of the house, that any bill should be committed before it was read. Therefore, upon a motion made by mr. Wroth, it was agreed, that mr. Speaker should have it.

Debate on the Bill relating to Recusants.] The same day, in a debate on the bill relating to Recusants, Mr. Nath. Bacon said, "The children might not be committed to the bp. of the diocese, because their chancellors are so much affected to the canon law, that some are infected with Popish religion. Besides, the office of bps. is to preach; and this duty in the one calling should not be hindered by other affairs committed to their care. Wherefore fitter it is, that the justices of assize should have the appointment of them."

Sir Edw. Stafford. "It may be the party is enemy to him to whom the child is committed, therefore the commitment ought to be by 2 or 3."

Mr. Wroth said, "The law hath no proviso for leases, nor remedy is appointed, as by the distress or otherwise, how the guardian is to come by the money appointed to him for the custody of the child of a Recusant. And it were fit to make a proviso that no party, being next heir to the child, should be his guardian. And the recusant not to forfeit 10l. a month for the keeping of his wife; otherwise for keeping of servants recusants." After all these speeches, it was agreed to commit the bill to all of the privy council and many other members.

Further Debate on the Supply.] Feb. 28, Mr. Chanc. of the Exchequer reported from the committee, that they had considered of the Supply, and had agreed that 2 entire Subsidies, and four 15ths and 10ths, should be granted to her maj. if the house should think fit. Upon which the question was put, and it was agreed by the whole house that the said supply should be granted. Then Mr. Nath. Bacon, one of the committee, informed the house that it was also agreed by them, That the present necessities of the state, moving them to grant the said double taxes, might be entered in the bill.

Sir Henry Knivett spoke next, "Allowing the Subsidies, but withal desired these things: 1st, that it might be lawful for every subject to annoy the king of Spain that would, that weak forces might not be spent against him, but a royal army. That we should not wrestle with him on our own ground, but abroad. Further, that all her maj.'s debtors might be called in, and her maj. to have power to sell all the debtors lands, of what estate soever they were seized of. No steward or commissioner but to answer her maj. the royal fines and sums they received. All her woods to be viewed, and the great timber to be for sale, the copy-wood to be sold to encrease the revenues. Licences granted to any to have benefit of penal statutes, to be taken in; and the whole benefit of inns and alehouses to come to the queen. By this new statute against recusants, their children to be committed to persons of sound religion. The whole benefit of their relief and living to come to the queen, deducting only charges for education of children."

Serjeant Harris agreed on the Subsidy, "Because parliaments were seldom, whereas by the statute 4 Edw. III. they may be called every year. The Subsidies to be granted to maintain wars; but whether it be war or no war; as yet we know not: and the things which we take from the Spaniard is doubted by many not to be lawful prize. Therefore desires in the Subsidies to have it set down, that those Subsidies be to maintain a war impulsive and defensive against the Spaniard."

Sir Walter Raleigh agreed in all things with the serjeant, and said, "He knew many that held it not lawful in conscience, as the time is, to take from the Spaniards; and he knew, that if it might be lawful and open war, there would be more voluntary hands to fight against the Spaniard, than the queen should stand in need of to send to sea."

After the former and other like speeches, in which also some had moved, that to make the wars against the king of Spain and his subjects lawful and warrantable, it should be inserted into the preamble of the said bill, "[That so great and extraordinary Supply was at this time given for the resisting of his power, and preventing of his malice,]" it was ordered, "That a committee, consisting of all the serjeants at law, and several other members, be appointed to draw the articles and preamble of the said bill accordingly; to the end the same being considered of afterwards by this house, may be delivered by Mr. Speaker to her maj.'s learned counsel, for the framing and drawing of the said bill." Notwithstanding all this, the house went on but slowly in the matter; occasioned by an affair of another nature, which will appear in the sequel.

Message from the Lords to hasten the Supply.] March 1st, the House was informed that two messengers from the Lords attended at the door. After being let in, they acquainted the House, "That their lordships had sent them, to put this house in mind of what the lord keeper had intimated in his speech, on the first day of this parl. concerning the necessities of the state, and provision of money to be made against the great and imminent danger this realm was threatened with from its mighty enemies. That their lordships expected to have heard from the Commons, about this matter, before this time; and therefore had omitted to do any thing in it themselves. But now they desired this house would appoint a Committee, to confer with their lordships about this business, according to the ancient and laudable usage of both houses." On which message a Committee was appointed accordingly, who were to confer with a certain number of the lords that afternoon.

March 2, Sir Robert Cecil, one of the Committee appointed by this House for conference with the Committee of the Lords, shewed, "That he and the residue of the committees of this house did yesterday, in the afternoon, repair unto the said committees of the Lords at the place appointed, where the lord treasurer, in the name of the residue of the said committee of the Lords, shewed unto the committee of this House, the great and present need of provision of treasure to be employed for the defence of the realm, against the invasion of the great and mighty enemies unto this realm and state; and shewing further, that the double Subsidy and 15ths and 10ths lastly granted unto her maj. amounting but unto two hundred and fourscore thousand pounds, her maj. hath nevertheless, in these defensive wars, expended of her own treasure alone, ten hundred and thirty thousand pounds since the time of the granting of the said double Subsidy, and of the said 15ths and 10ths. And that therefore their lordships, weighing the great present necessity of greater and more speedy Supply of treasure to be had than 2 entire Subsidies and four 15ths, do negatively affirm, that their lordships will not give, in any wise, their assents to pass any act in their house of less than 3 entire Subsidies, to be paid in the 3 next years, at two payments in every of the same years; the 1st to begin soon after the next Easter, and the 2nd soon after the next Michaelmas, and so yearly after Easter and Michaelmas during the said 3 years. And that as to what proportion of Benevolence, or unto how much their lordships would give their assents in that behalf, they would not as then shew unto the said Committee of this House. But insisting for conference again to be had, he further urged, that this House might be moved to yield a greater Supply. To which end he alledged, that the usual late Subsidies were very small, and were also imposed, for the most part, upon the meaner sort of her maj.'s subjects; declaring, that he knew one shire of this realm, wherein there were many men of good living and countenance, but none of them, in the said last Subsidies, assessed at above four-score pound lands per annum. And that in the city of London also, where the greatest part of the riches of the realm are, there was no one assessed at above 200l. goods a man, and that not yet past above 4 or 5 such." Which speech, in effect, being ended, "He, in conclusion, referred the further consideration thereof to the gravity of the house."

Mr. Francis Bacon spoke next. "He yielded to the Subsidy, but misliked that this house should join with the upper house in the granting of it. For the custom and privilege of this house hath always been, first to make offer of the Subsidies from hence, then to the upper house; except it were that they present a bill unto this house, with desire of our assent thereto, and then to send it up again. And reason it is, that we should stand upon our privilege, seeing the burthen resteth upon us, as the greatest number; nor is it reason the thanks should be theirs. And in joining with them in this motion, we shall derogate from ours? for the thanks will be theirs, and the blame ours, they being the first movers.—Wherefore I wish, that, in this action, we should proceed, as heretofore we have done, apart by ourselves, and not join with their lordships. And to satisfy them, who expect an answer from us to-morrow, some answer should be made in obsequious and dutiful manner." Then out of his bosom he drew an Answer, framed by himself, to this effect; "That they had considered of their lordships motion, and thought upon it as was fit; and, in all willingness, would address themselves to do as so great a cause deserved. To join with them, he said, he could not, but with prejudice to the privilege of the said house. Wherefore he desired, as they were wont, so that now they might proceed herein by themselves, apart from their Lordships; and that they might do it without discontent. To this purpose he cited a precedent in Hen. VIIIth's time (see p. 485,) where cardinal Wolsey came down into the House of Commons, and informed them what necessity there was of a Subsidy; and that thereupon the House took it to consideration, apart by themselves, and at large granted it. By which it sould seem that he did infer, that the Lords might indeed give notice unto the said House of Commons, what need or danger there was, but ought not to prescribe them what to give, as at the meeting of the Committee the lord treasurer had done."

Whereupon the House ordered, that the former Committee should meet again in the afternoon. And being met accordingly, great part thereof was spent in arguing what the matter was which was referred unto them by the house; whether a Subsidy should be yielded, and that signified for an answer from them to the Lords: or whether the Committee were only to consider of an Answer according to mr. Bacon's motion, "That this house would alone, by themselves, consider of the Subsidy, without joining." These following spake for the Subsidy, especially enforcing the necessity of it:

Sir Wm. Moore shewed, first, "That her maj. had more cause to have the Subsidy than had Hen. VIII. Edw. VI. or Mary; for Henry's wars continued not, though they were violent for the time. His wars were impulsive and not defensive. He had the suppression of all the abbies, a matter of great riches unto him. He had a Benevolence, and then a Subsidy, paid within 3 months. Edw. VI. had chantries, and all the church-plate, for relief, paid him. Mary had a relief paid her, which she never repaid. But her maj. that now is, hath been a continual defence of her own realm and her neighbour's kingdoms, England, Ireland, France, and the Low Countries; yet hath she repaid the loans, and had not such helps."

Sir George Carey said, "I speak for the Subsidy, (first answering one that had said, 'We must regard them and their estates for whom we are here') saying, he regarded and came for them as was meet; and they will more thank us for taking somewhat from them, than if we should abandon them and leave them and all that they have to the spoil of the enemy; which will be, if, with our forces, we provide not to withstand them. For imminent dangers hang over our heads, and are intended to us this summer. The Spaniard already hath sent 7000 pistoles of gold into Scotland, to corrupt the nobility; and, to the king, 20,000 crowns now lately were dispatched, out of France, into Scotland, for the levying of 3000, which the Scottish lords have promised; and the king of Spain will levy 30,000 more, and give them all pay. Her maj. is determined to send sir Francis Drake to sea, to encounter them with a great navy. Wherefore this our danger is to be prevented, and those her maj.'s infinite charges by us to be supplied."

Sir Walter Raleigh spake for the Subsidy, not only (as he protested) to please the queen, to whom he was infinitely bound above his deserts, but for the necessity he both saw and knew. "He very well discovered the great strength of the king of Spain. And, to shew his mightiness, he told how he possessed all the world. As also, that his malice and ill purpose was evident to this realm: he shewed how, on every side, he had beleaguered us.—In Denmark, the king being young, he had corrupted the council and nobility, so as he was very like to speed himself of shipping from thence. In the marine towns of the Low Countries, and in Norway, he laid in great store of shipping. In France he had the parliament towns at his command. In Britany he had all the best havens. And in Scotland he had so corrupted the nobility, that he had promised them forces to re-establish Papistry. That they were ready to join with any foreign forces that would make them strong, to be by themselves, and to resist others. For, as he thought there were not six gentlemen of that country of one religion. In his own country there is all possible repairing, and he is coming with 60 gallies, besides other shipping, with purpose to annoy us. We must then have no ships (if he invade us) riding at anchor; all will be little enough to withstand him. At his coming, he fully determineth to get Plymouth, or at least to possess some of the havens, this summer, within our land. And Plymouth is a place of most danger, for no ordnance can be carried thither to remove him; the passages will not give leave. Now the way to defeat him is this: to send a royal army to supplant him in Britany, and to possess ourselves there; and to send a strong navy to sea, and to lie with it upon the Cape and such places as his ships bring his riches to, that they may set upon all that come. This we are able to do, and undoubtedly with fortunate success, if we undertake it."—The Committee for considering of an Answer to be given to the Lords, on their last message, came to this resolution, "That it was the opinion of the majority to grant another conference with the Lords, if the House should think fit." But,

Mr. Wroth, one of the said committee, stood up and said, "That he dissented from the question, and neither gave his assent in the committee, nor would now do it, that any conference should be had with the lords in this case. For, that, in his opinion, the same would be very prejudicial to the ancient liberties and privileges of this house, and to its authority."

Mr. Beale seconded him, "He insisted upon their maintenance of the usual and ancient liberties and privileges of this House in treating of subsidies, contributions, and other like benevolences, among themselves; without any conference therein at all had or used with the Lords: and gave an instance of a former precedent in the like case; and offered to shew that the same precedent to this House, was followed in the 9th Hen. IV. The two houses being divided about the Subsidy, and the higher house desiring a greater Subsidy than was granted by the lower house; hereupon 12, that were sent as committees to the lords, came down, and informed what was desired by the upper house; namely a greater Subsidy; and, to that end, conference to be had with them of the Commons. The commons thought themselves grieved therewith, and so returned their answer, That they would consider what was meet to be done in so general a matter, but thought the conference a derogation to the privilege of the house. Hereupon the king answered, That he could not, neither was it fit to violate the privilege of his Commons, but in all things he thought it just to prefer them."—The court party were very earnest for this conference; and thereupon

Sir Robert Cecil spoke again. "He put the house in mind of the great and urgent necessity, for the speedy prevention and avoiding of the great and imminent perils and dangers of this realm and state, to be effected both by consultation and also by provision of treasure; and thinketh good that conference of this house were had with the Lords, as a matter very behoofful: especially for that their lordships, some of them being of her maj.'s privy council, do know both the purposes and strength of the enemies on the one side, and also her maj.'s present store of treasure, more or less, on the other side, much better than those of this house do. Resolveth, for his own opinion, still to give his consent, That conference be had therein with the Lords, by the committees of this house; according to their lordship's said former motion and request for the same."

Sir Wm. Brunker stood up, and, "He reciting the said great present necessity of consultation and provision, and that it cannot be otherwise, but that the proportion of convenient supply of treasure, answerable to the greatness of the dangers which are imminent, must needs require a greater mass of treasure to be had, than hath been as yet treated of in any resolution by this house."—Then the Speaker put the question, For a Conference or not? And, on a division of the house, it was carried, in the negative, 217 against 128. —After this, it was thought proper to appoint a Committee to wait upon the Lords, and acquaint them with their last Resolution, in as soft terms as possible. Who, returning, made report, "That their lordships well hoped that this house would have granted their request. However, they desired the Commons to take due care for a speedy and a proper Supply, according to the pressing necessity of the state: and to see these precedents on which the conference was denied. But this matter was again resumed the next day, when

Mr. Beale stood up and desired to satisfy the house, "By reason it was conceived by the Lords the other day, that upon his motion, and by his precedent shewed, the house was led to deny a conference with the lords, he acknowledged he had mistaken the question propounded. For there being but a conference desired by the Lords, and no confirming of any thing they had done, he thought we might, and it was fit we should confer. And to this end only, he shewed the precedent, that in the 9th of Hen. IV. the Commons having granted a Subsidy, which the Lords thought too little, and they agreed to a greater, and would have the Commons to confirm that which they had done; this the Commons thought they could not do without prejudice to this house. Wherefore he acknowledged himself mistaken in the question, and desired if any were led by him, to be satisfied, for that he would have been of another opinion if he had conceived the matter as it was meant."

Sir Tho. Heneage "proponed the question anew, and thought that with the privilege of the house, and by precedents to be shewed, there had been conference with the Lords used upon the like motion."

Sir John Wolley thought, "That the former denial grew upon mistaking of the question, and upon better consideration would have the matter reversed, and now to assent to that which was denied before."

Sir Hen. Knivett moved, "That for the freedom of the house, it might be concluded amongst them, a matter answerable at the bar, for any man to report any thing of any speech used, or matters done in this house."

Sir Hen. Upton spake "in defence of the former proceedings of the house, and shewed how it had proceeded; 1st, agreeing to a double subsidy and four 15ths; this being offered, and the lords thinking it seemed little, and considering the present necessity, the lack of payment of subsidies, and the true rating of subsidies over that they were wont to be, they desired a Conference with the Lower House, giving reasons of great importance for a greater aid; and they gave us a taste of what was needful, as 3 Subsidies at the least; and upon those great causes desired a conference the next day. This being delivered unto the house by one of the committees sent to the Lords, the house upon consideration thought it not to stand with their privilege to confer with their lordships in matter of subsidies, because it was the liberty of the house to make offer themselves to her maj. And in regard it stood not with the privilege of this House to confer with the Lords, hereupon they advise upon an answer to be made unto the Lords, wherein they should give them thanks that they had vouchsafed to confer with them of this House; but shewed, that with the privilege of the house they could not have conference with them in matter of Subsidy.—Further he thought the House much injured, that they should be reported to be against the Subsidy; and the parties injured, who speaking the last day against the Subsidy, their names were given up, and were noted for it to the queen.—And now my motion is, that we must confer with the Lords upon the Subsidy, but not in any sort to be conformed therein unto them. And for that occasion past, he desired that Mr. Speaker might be sent and report the truth of the whole matter and manner of our proceedings."

Sir Robert Cecil said, "I desire now I may be somewhat long, because I must include an answer to 3 speeches. Those 2 hon. persons that sit above, the one of them declared the true state of the question, the other what was fit we should do. But my answer shall tend only to those tales that followed. The 1st was a kind of satisfaction for a former mistaking; but in the same satisfaction, a new mistaking was also; which was by way of information, casting it into the house, that the queen should seem to demand 3 Subsidies. Now the queen never demanded 3, nor 1. So there is a new mistaking added to the former satisfaction.—The 2nd man's motion thus far I allow, That the counsel of this house be secretly kept, and that nothing be reported in malam partem: but if his meaning be, that we may not impart any thing that is done here unto the queen, but that all things must be secret from her, I am altogether against it. This only I should desire, what ought to be observed, That nothing ought to be reported unto her in malam partem.—The 3rd man's motion consisted of 3 points. The 1st was news, the 2nd was history, and the 3d and last a motion. His news was, that men's names were given up to the queen. This was news. For I heard it not before. The history was a large report of the progress of this matter. His motion was, that we should confer with the Lords about a Subsidy, but not conclude a Subsidy with them. His manner seems contrary to his meaning, or else is more than ever was meant; for it was never desired of us by the lords, that we should confer with them about a Subsidy."

Sir Walter Raleigh spake next and moved, "That seeing the division of the house the last day grew, as he conceived, upon the mistaking of the question; and that since some had reported unto him, that had the question been propounded, Whether they should only yield to a conference in general with the Lords, they would not have been against it; therefore he desired Mr. Speaker to put it to the question, Whether they should confer with the Lords generally or not, without naming a Subsidy?" This motion being well liked, Sir Walter was desired by the house, to repeat it again, that so it might be the better heard of them all. And thereupon he said, "That touching the aforesaid question which had received a No upon Saturday last, he would not make it a question again, for by the order of the house he could not; but propounded this for a new question in these or the like words, Whether the house would be pleased to have general conference with the Lords, touching the great and imminent dangers of the realm and state, and the present necessary supply of treasure to be provided speedily for the same, according to the proportion of the necessity?" Which said question being propounded unto the house, it was assented unto accordingly by them all without any negative voice.

Whereupon the former committee, appointed for conference with the Lords, were presently sent up to acquaint their lordships of this last resolution. Who appointed the next day for the conference. On that day, before the meeting, the Commons went upon this affair again; and, after many more speeches and altercations, a subsequent resolution was agreed to by the whole house; That their committee should have authority to confer with that of the Lords, in a general way, concerning dangers and remedies to be provided against: but not in any way to conclude or resolve on any thing in the said conference, particularly; without the farther privity and assent of the whole house, on the report to be made to them of their proceedings. One of the speeches, made on the occasion of this resolution, is too remarkable to be omitted.

Mr. Fulk Grevile said, "There are two scruples in this house, which I would gladly satisfy; the one the Privilege of the house, the other the Poverty of the people. For precedents they are but examples of things past. Now every example ought to be stronger than the thing we fear: for if the thing be otherwise, and our necessity greater, the former doings are no rules to us. And so precedents as they are not to be rejected, so they ought not to be eternal. For the poverty of our country, we have no reason to think it poor; our sumptuousness in apparel, in plate, and in all things, argueth our riches. And our dearth of every thing amongst us, sheweth plenty of money. But, it is said, our countries are poor, and we must respect them that sent us hither. Why, so we must also remember who called us hither. This cause is hard; for there is necessity against necessity, danger against danger, and inward discontent against outward forces. The poor are grieved by being overcharged; this must be helped by increasing our own burthen; for otherwise the weak feet will complain of too heavy a body; that is to be feared. If the feet knew their strength as well as we know their oppression, they would not bear as they do. But to answer them, it sufficeth that the time requireth it: and in a prince power will command. To satisfy them, they cannot think we overcharge them, when we charge ourselves with them and above them: but if nothing will satisfy them, our doings are sufficient to bind them. If the multitudes of parliaments be remembered heretofore, many subsidies now in one parl. cannot seem burthensome. The more laws we make, the less liberty we have to ourselves. And now one word for myself, if my speech hath offended, excuse me, I will not often trouble you hereafter."

It was not till the 22d day of March, that the Commons brought the matter to a conclusion; and then the bill for a Grant of 3 entire Subsidies and six 15ths and 10ths, was read a third time and passed upon the question.

A Message from the Queen, by the Speaker, forbidding the Commons to meddle with the State or the Church. Feb. 27, the day after the Supply was moved for, Mr. Morrice, attorney of the court of wards, a place under the crown, stood up and moved the house touching the abuses of the Ecclesiastical Courts: the bill was after debate delivered to the Speaker's care, to prevent giving offence to the queen: but the matter did not rest here; for, in the afternoon of the same day the Speaker was sent for to court; and, on the next, he stood up and said, he had a Message to deliver from her Majesty to the House; which he gave in these words:

"Yesterday a great member of this house, after a speech used, and his reasons laid forth, delivered two bills unto me; which bills, though not being read, yet were diversely spoken of. They being long, and the matters grave and of great importance, and the day being almost spent, I desired further time to consider of these bills. I humbly thank this hon. house, time was granted me freely, it being almost 12 of the clock. I have perused and read both of the bills; I have them about me, and they have been continually with me ever since they were delivered to me; never any man saw them, nor ever any man's eye more than my own ever saw one word of them. A little after I had perused the bills, I was sent for by a special messenger from her maj.: coming in her royal presence, I was commanded to deliver these words from her most excellent maj. unto the body of the realm (for so she termed this house:) the matter I have to speak is great, yea, it is the greatest matter I ever had to deal in; wherefore I pray God direct Mentem et linguam hanc. I must be short, for her maj.'s words were not many; and I may perhaps fail in the delivery of them: for though my auditors be great, yet who is so impudent that the presence of such a maj. would not appale him? And it did greatly fear me, when I did see none of these hon.

persons, in her presence, who were present at the holding of the matter in this house; yet so God in his providence had appointed it, that even in this while came in some of the persons here present, who, if I fail in delivering what was given me in charge, can report it unto you: and I am glad that there are witnesses with me in this action, what was my faithful service for the house. I protest a greater comfort never befel me, than that this my integrity and faithful promise to this house, is not violated; for her maj. in her most gracious wisdom, before my coming, determined not to press me in this, neither indeed did she require the bill of me; for this only she required of me, 'What were the things spoken of by the house?' which points I only delivered, as they that heard me can tell. The Message delivered me from her maj. consisteth of 3 things; 1st, the End for which the parl. was called. 2dly, the Speech which her maj. used by my lord keeper. 3dly, what her Pleasure and Commandment now is. For the 1st, 'It is in me and my power' (I speak now in her maj.'s person) 'to call parliaments; and it is in my power to end and determine the same; it is in my power to assent or dissent to any thing done in parl.' The calling of this parl. was only that the maj. of God might be more religiously served; and those that neglect this service might be compelled by some sharper means to a more due obedience, and more true service of God, than there hath been hitherto used. And further, that the safety of her maj.'s person, and of the realm, might be by all means provided for against our great enemies the Pope and the king of Spain. Her maj.'s most excellent pleasure being then delivered unto us by the lord-keeper, it was not meant we should meddle with Matters of State, or in causes Ecclesiastical; (for so her maj. termed them.) She wondered 'that any would be of so high Commandment to attempt' (I use her own words) 'a thing contrary to that which she hath so expressly forbidden;' wherefore, with this she was highly displeased. And because the words, then spoken by my lord-keeper, are not now perhaps well remembered, or some be now here, that were not there; her maj.'s present charge and express command is, 'That no bills touching matters of State, or reformation in causes Ecclesiastical, be exhibited.' And, upon my allegiance, I am commanded, if any such bill be exhibited, not to read it."—Thus the bill was quashed, and Mr. Morrice, the mover of it, being also sent for to court, the same day he was committed to the custody of Sir John Fortescue, chanc. of the exchequer.

The Speaker's Speech to the Queen at the Close of the Session.] April 10, the Queen came to the House of Lords; and the Commons being called up, the Speaker, on delivering the bills, made the following most elaborate Speech on the Dignity and Antiquity of Parliaments:—"The high court of parl. most high and mighty prince, is the greatest and most ancient court within this your realm. For before the Conquest in the high places of the West-Saxons, we read of a parl. holden; and since the Conquest they have been holden by all your noble predecessors kings of England.—In the time of the West-Saxons a parl. was holden by the noble king Ina, by these words: 'I, Ina, king of the West-Saxons, have caused all my Fatherhood, Aldermen and wisest Commons, with the godly men of my kingdom, to consult of weighty matters, &c.' Which words do plainly shew all the parts of this high court still observed to this day. For by king Ina is your maj.'s most royal person represented. The Fatherhood, in ancient time, were these which we call bps. and still we call them rev. Fathers, an ancient and chief part of our state.—By Aldermen were meant your noblemen. For so honourable was the word Alderman in ancient time, that the nobility only were called Aldermen.—By Wisest Commons is meant and signified knights and burgesses, and so is your maj.'s writ 'de discretioribus & magis sufficientibus.'—By Godliest Men is meant your convocation-house. It consisteth of such as are devoted to religion. And as godliest men do consult of weightiest matters, so is your highness's writ at this day 'pro quibusdam arduis & urgentibus negotiis, nos, statum & defensionem regni nostri & ecclesie tangentibus.'—Your highness's wisdom and exceeding judgment with all-careful Providence needed not our councils: but yet so urgent causes there were of this parl. so important considerations, as that we may say (for that we cannot judge) never parl. was so needful as now, nor any so honourable as this. If I may be bold to say it, I must presume to say that which hath been often said (but what is well said cannot be too often spoken) this sweet council of ours I would compare to that sweet Commonwealth of the little bees:

'Sic enim parvis componere magna solebam.' The little bees have but one governor whom they all serve, he is their king, 'quia latera habet latiora;' he is placed in the midst of their habitations, 'ut in tutissima turri.' They forage abroad, sucking honey from every flower to bring to their king. 'Ignavum fucos pecus à præsepibus arcent.' The drones they drive away out of their hives, 'non habentes aculeos.' And whoso assails their king, in him 'immitunt aculeos, & tamen rex ipse est sine aculeo.'—Your maj. is that princely governor and noble queen, whom we all serve; being protected under the shadow of your wings we live, and wish you may ever sit upon your throne over us. And whosoever shall not say Amen, for them we pray 'ut convertantur ne pereant, & ut confundantur ne noceant.' Under your happy govt. we live upon honey, we suck upon every sweet flower: but where the bee sucketh honey, there also the spider draweth poison. Some such venoms there be. But such drones and door bees we will expel the hive and serve your maj. and withstand any enemy that shall assault you. Our lands, our goods, our lives are prostrate at your feet to be commanded. Yea, and (thanked be God, and honour be to your maj. for it) such is the power and force of your subjects, that of their own strength they are able to encounter your greatest enemies. And though we be such, yet have we a prince that is 'sine aculeo;' so full of that clemency is your maj. I fear I have been too long, and therefore to come now to your Laws.

—The Laws we have conferred upon this session of so honourable a parl. are of two natures; the one such as have life, but are ready to die, except your maj. breathe life into them again; the other are laws that never had life, but, being void of life, do come to your maj. to seek life.—The first sort are those laws that had continuances until this parl. and are now to receive new life or are to die for ever. The other, that I term capable of life, are those which are newly made, but have no essence until your maj. giveth them life.—Two laws there are, but I must give the honour where it is due; for they come from the noble wise Lords of the upper house; the most hon. and beneficial laws that could be desired: the one a Confirmation of all Letters Patents, from your maj.'s most noble father, of all Ecclesiastical Livings, which that king took from those superstitious monasteries and priories, and translated them to the erecting and setting up of many foundations of Cathedral Churches and Colleges, greatly furthering the maintenance of learning and true religion.—The other law to suppress the obstinate Recusant and the dangerous sectary, both very pernicious to your govt.—Lastly, your loving and obedient subjects, the Commons of the lower house, humbly and with all dutiful thanks, stand bound unto your gracious goodness for your general and large Pardon granted unto them, wherein many great offences are pardoned. But it extendeth only to offences done before the parl. I have many ways, since the beginning of this parl. by ignorance and insufficiency to perform that which I should have done, offended your maj.; I therefore most humbly crave to be partaker of your maj.'s most gracious pardon."

The Lord Keeper's Answer.] The Lord Keeper having received instructions from the Queen, answered the Speaker to the following effect:—"That her maj. did most graciously accept of these services and devotions of this parl.; commending them that they had employed the time so well and spent it in so necessary affairs, save only that in some things they had spent more time than needed. But she perceived that some men did it more for their satisfaction than the necessity of the thing deserved. She misliked also that such irreverence was shewed towards privy counsellors, who were not to be accounted as common knights and burgesses of the house, that are counsellors only during the parl.; whereas the other are standing counsellors, and for their wisdom and great service are called to the council of the state.—That the Queen had heard that some men in the cause of great necessity, and grant of aid, had seemed to regard their country, and made their necessity more than it was; forgetting the urgent necessity of the time, and dangers that were now imminent.—That her maj. would not have the people feared with a report of great dangers, but rather to be encouraged with boldness against the enemies of the state. And that therefore she straitly charged and commanded that the mustered companies in every shire should be supplied, if they were decayed; and that their provisions of armour and munition should be better than heretofore it hath been used.—That for this offer of 3 Subsidies, her maj. most graciously, in all kindness, thanketh her subjects: but except it were freely and willingly given, she did not accept of it; for her maj. never accepteth any thing that is not freely given.—That if the coffers of her maj.'s treasures were not empty, or if the revenues of the crown and other princely ornaments could suffice to supply her wants and the charges of the realm, on the word of a prince she doth pronounce it, she would not have charged her subjects, nor have accepted of this they give her."

The Queen's Speech on dissolving the Parl.] Then, after some little intermission, the Queen, being set in her Chair of State, spoke as follows:—"This kingdom hath had many wise, noble, and victorious princes, I will not compare with any of them in wisdom, fortitude, and other virtues; but saving the duty of a child, that is not to compare with his father, in love, care, sincerity, and justice, I will compare with any prince that ever you had, or shall have. It may be thought simplicity in me, that all this time of my reign I have not sought to advance my territories, and enlarge my dominions; for opportunity hath served me to do it. I acknowledge my womanhood and weakness in that respect. But it hath not been the hardness to obtain, or doubt how to keep the things so obtained, that only hath withheld me from these attempts: my mind was never to invade my neighbours, or to usurp over any. I am contented to reign over my own, and to rule as a just prince. Yet the king of Spain doth challenge me to be the quarreller, and the beginner of all these wars. He doth me the greatest wrong that can be; for my conscience doth not accuse my thoughts, wherein I have done him the least injury; so that I am persuaded in my conscience, if he knew what I know, he would be sorry himself for the wrong he hath done me. I fear not all his threatenings, his great preparations and mighty forces do not stir me: for though he come against me with a greater power than ever was his Invincible Navy, I doubt not but (God assisting me, upon whom I always trust) I shall be able to defeat him and overthrow him; for my cause is just. I heard say, when he first attempted his last invasion, some upon the sea coasts forsook their towns and fled up higher into the country, and left all naked and exposed to his entrance: but I swear unto you, by God, if I knew those persons, or may know of any that shall do so hereafter, I will make them know and feel what it is to be so fearful in so urgent a cause.—The Subsidy you give me I accept thankfully, if you give me your good-will with it; but if the necessity of the time and your preservations did not require it, I would refuse it. But let me tell you, the sum is not so much, but that it is needful for a prince to have so much always lying in her coffers for your defence in time of need, and not be driven to get it when she should use it.—You that are lieutenants and gentlemen of command in your countries, I require you to take care and special order, that the people be well armed, and in readiness upon all occasions.—You that be judges and justices of peace, I command and straitly charge you, that you see the laws to be duly executed, and that you make them living laws when we have put life into them.”—After this speech ended, and the bills passed, the lord keeper, by her maj.’s command, dissolved this parl.

A new Parl. called.] A new parl. was called to meet, at Westminster, on the 24th of Oct. 1597. On the 1st day of the meeting, the Queen being present, the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, then sir Tho. Egerton, by her maj.’s command, declared the cause of the summons, in these words:

The Lord Keeper’s Speech.] “The queen’s most excellent maj. my most gracious and dread sovereign, hath commanded me to declare unto you, my lords and others here present, the causes which have moved her highness to summon this parl. at this time; which before I can express, I must confess truly, that the royal presence of her maj. the view of your lordships and this hon. assembly, together with the consideration of the weightiness of the service, and of my own weakness, doth much appale me, and cause me to fear. Wherefore, if, either through fear I forget, or through my many wants and imperfections I fail, to perform that duty which is required; I do most humbly crave pardon of her maj. and beseech your lordships to bear with me. The great princely care which her highness now hath, as heretofore she hath ever had, to preserve her kingdoms in peace, and safe from all foreign attempts, hath caused her, at this present, to assemble this hon. and great council of her realm, to advise of the best and most needful means whereby to continue this her peaceable and happy govt. and to withstand the malice of her mighty and implacable enemy; which hitherto, by the space of many years, through her provident and princely wisdom, hath been performed, to the great and inestimable benefit of her subjects, as that the simplest of them could not but see, and the wisest but admire their happiness therein; the whole realm enjoying peace in all security, while our neighbour-countries have been torn in pieces, and tormented with cruel and bloody wars. This her maj. is pleased to ascribe to the great power and infinite mercy of the Almighty: and therefore it shall well become us all, most thankfully, upon the knees of our hearts, to acknowledge no less unto His holy name; who, of his infinite goodness, still preserve her highness, and send her many years more over us, in all happiness, to reign. In this her blessed govt. her highness’s chief care and regard of all, hath been of the honour and service of Almighty God, that true religion might be planted and entertained in the hearts of the people, through all the parts of her realm; and as well in that behalf, as for the peace and benefit of her subjects, she hath, from time to time, established many good laws to meet with the disorders, and to punish the offences of wicked and ungodly men; that continuing in their bad ways, they may not be hardened and go forward in their wickedness: for ‘Mora in peccato dat incrementum sceleris.’ And whereas the number of the Laws already made are very great, some also of them being obsolete and worn out of use; others idle and vain, serving to no purpose: some again over heavy and too severe for the offence; others too loose and slack for the faults they are to punish; and many of them so full of difficulties to be understood, that they cause many controversies: you are therefore to enter into a due consideration of the said laws; and where you find superfluity, to prune and cut off; where defect, to supply; and where ambiguity, to explain; that they be not burthensome, but profitable to the commonwealth: which being a service of importance, and very needful to be required, yet is nothing to be regarded, if due means be not had to withstand the malice and force of those professed enemies which seek the destruction of the whole state. This, before all, and above all, is to be thought of, and with most endeavour and care to be provided for: for in vain are laws made, and to little purpose do they serve, be they never so good, if such prevail as go about to make a conquest of the kingdom, and destruction of the people. Wars heretofore were wont to be made either out of ambition to enlarge dominions, or out of revenge to requite injuries; but this against us is not so: in this the holy religion of God is sought to be rooted out, the whole realm to be subdued, and the precious life of her excellent maj. to be taken away; which hitherto, by the powerful hand and great goodness of the Almighty, have been preserved, maugre the Devil, the Pope, the Spanish tyrant, and all the mischievous designs of all her enemies. Wherefore it is high time that this be looked into, and that noway be left unsought, nor means unused, that may serve for defence thereof, her maj. hath not spared to disburse a mass of treasure, and to sell her land for the maintenance of her armies by sea and land, whereby, with such small helps as from her subjects hath been yielded, she hath defended and kept safe her dominions from all such forcible attempts as have been made;

which being still to be performed by infinite charge, her maj. notwithstanding hears nothing more unwillingly than of Aids and Subsidies to be received from her people; though what she doth receive, she doth carefully bestow, and infinitely more of her own. The taxations at this day, howsoever they seem, are nothing so great as heretofore, in the reigns of former kings, they have been. In the time of Edw. III. and the two next before him, and those three which succeeded next after him, the payments of the Commons then did far exceed any that have been since her maj.'s reign; which is of record in the histories of those times to be seen: but never cause so great to employ great sums of money as now. Now therefore you are to consider how to provide needful and convenient Aid, in some measure to maintain and support her maj.'s charge which at present she is at, and is to continue at, for the defence of the realm. He cannot be well advised, which in this case will not be forward to contribute and bestow whatsoever he hath: for if, with the commonwealth it goes not well, well it cannot be with any private or particular person. That being in danger, he that would seek then to lay up treasure and enrich himself, should be like to him that would busie himself to beautify his house, when the city wherein he dwelleth is on fire; or to him that decketh up his cabin, when the ship wherein he saileth is ready to sink. To spare in that case, is to spare for those which seek to devour all; and to give, is to give to ourselves. Her maj.'s part being only carefully to bestow what is delivered into her hands, wherein, men performing their duties, there is no cause at all to fear: for the war is just; it is in defence of the religion of God, of our most gracious sovereign, of our native country, of our wives, children, liberties, lands, lives, and whatsoever we have. Wherefore, not mistrusting your forwardness, that I may not offend in too much enlarging this point, as a poor remembrancer to her maj. I shortly say to your lordships, 'Quod justum et necessarium est;' nothing can be more just than this war; nothing ought to be more necessary, than carefully to provide due maintenance for the same. And, to you of the house of commons, that you may orderly proceed, and wisely consult of these weighty causes delivered unto you, her maj.'s pleasure is, you should, according to your accustomed manner, go down to the Lower house, and there make choice of some grave, learned, and wise man amongst you, to be your Speaker; who shall be for understanding sufficient, and for discretion fit, as your mouth, to signify your minds, and to make your petitions known unto her highness; and him, upon Thursday next, to present in this place."

Christopher Yelverton, esq. elected Speaker.] On the said day, Oct. 27, the Commons presented mr. serjeant Yelverton as their Speaker, who claiming the ancient and usual freedom of speech, access, &c. was answered by the lord keeper, that her maj. did give her assent to it; with admonition, however, that the said liberties and privileges should be discreetly and wisely used, as was meet.

Proceeding in the Case of Lord De la Ware, as to Precedency, &c.] There was the greatest introduction of new bps. and lords to this parl. that we have yet met with at one time. The very first day there were no less than one abp. four earls, ten bps. and five barons introduced; besides the lord De la Ware, who put in his Claim for the Seat his ancestors enjoyed in parl. His Petition was referred to a committee of lords appointed for that purpose, to examine into his pretensions and make their report to the house accordingly. This lord's father had attempted to poison his uncle, the then lord La Ware, in expectation of his estate; and was, by an order of parl. in the reign of Edw. VI. excluded from any estate or honour that might come to him after his uncle's death. The said Wm. was also condemned for treason in Mary's reign; but afterwards his attainder taken off as if he had never been arraigned. But, whereas, by reason of the former sentence, he could not by law enjoy the honour of his ancestors, he was, by this queen's special favour, created lord La Ware, by a new patent, and as long as he lived claimed precedency according to the date of his creation. The queen referred the whole matter to the lords in parl.; who, finding that the former sentence concerned only the person of the said Wm. and that his children were no ways involved in the same, and that the attainder in Mary's reign was no manner of bar, because it was impossible for him to lose a title which he never had, besides, that he was afterwards fully and entirely restored, and the ancient dignity no way extinct by the new creation, but only laid aside in his life-time, because he was not in possession of it when he received his new patent. For all these reasons, he was adjudged by the lords to hold the same rank with his predecessors, betwixt the lord Willoughby of Eresby and the lord Berkley; and he was accordingly reinstated with the usual ceremonies, and an entry was made in the Lords Journals of this Award.

Lords' Journal to be authenticated.] The same day the Lord Treasurer made a motion, "That forasmuch as the Journal-Books kept heretofore, by the clerks of parl. seemed to have some errors in them in the misplacing of the Lords, it was doubted how the same might be of true record. Therefore he thought proper that the lords would please to take order that the said books, which henceforth should be kept by the clerk of parl. may be viewed and perused every parl. by certain lords of that house to be appointed for that purpose, and the list of the lords, in their order, to be subscribed by them. Taking unto them for their better information, the king at arms; and that this order might begin this present parl." On another motion of the Lord Treasurer, such lords as were absent from parl. and had not sent their proxies, and such others as made their appearance in the beginning of the parl. and have not since attended, should be admonished to reform the same.

The first bill of consequence we meet with, is intituled, 'An act for the increase of Mariners and maintaining of Navigation.' This act, which is still extant in our Statute-Books, shews what care the legislature then took to support and maintain the navy of England. Nor were they less careful to preserve peace at home, by bringing in a bill, this parl. for erecting of Houses of Correction, and for the punishment of rogues, vagabonds and sturdy beggars. Which is the first time those houses were established in every county by law. These and some other bills for the relief of the poor, by erecting of Hospitals and Work-houses in parishes, the endowments of which were not to exceed 200l. per annum; for the maintenance of Tillage and Husbandry; for preventing of Frauds by the receivers, collectors, &c. of the public money; and for preventing or punishing extortion, rapes, and taking away women against their wills; for the encouragement of the Woollen Manufactory, and to prevent the deceitful stretching and tentering of northern cloth, &c. were passed this session, and are in the printed statutes.

A large Subsidy granted.] Dec. 16, was passed in the Lords, 'An act for a Grant of 3 entire Subsidies and six 15ths and 10ths to the queen's maj.' The bill had been brought into the Commons on the 7th, and passed there on the 14th. This large supply they said was given to her, as a compliment, 'for her maj.'s wise administration; for restoring religion to a better state; for the security of the kingdom from the common enemy; for the defence of Ireland, and the relief of France and the Netherlands. But, intreated her withal, as they had done in the last parl. not to advance this special instance of their bounty into a precedent, but only upon such pressing necessities of the state.' The Clergy were more moderate this time, giving only 4s. in the pound, to be paid at 6 several payments.

Dec. the 20th, the lord keeper adjourned the parl. to the 11th of Jan. next coming. Some less matters relating to Breaches of Privilege and Forms of managing Committees of both houses, on a Conference, are entered this session in the Journals of the Lords; nothing else of any moment occurred, but what will fall better in our account of the proceedings of the Commons during this parl. to which we now come.

Serjeant Yelverton's Excuse, on being chosen Speaker.] On the first day of their meeting, serj. Yelverton having been nominated by sir Wm. Knolles, comptroller of her maj.'s household, as a fit man for that office; the said serjeant stood up, and urged his disabilities in too remarkable a manner to be omitted.—“Whence your unexpected choice of me to be your mouth or Speaker should proceed, I am utterly ignorant. If from my merits, strange it were that so few deserts should purchase, suddenly, so great an honour. Nor from my ability doth this your choice proceed; for well known it is to a great number in this place now assembled, that my estate is nothing correspondent for the maintenance of this dignity: for my father, dying, left me a younger brother, and nothing to me but my bare annuity. Then growing to man's estate and some small practice of the law, I took a wife, by whom I have had many children, the keeping of us all being a great impoverishment to my estate, and the daily living of us all nothing but my daily industry. Neither from my person nor nature doth this choice arise; for he that supplieth this place ought to be a man big and comely, stately and well spoken, his voice great, his courage majestic, his nature haughty, and his purse plentiful and heavy: but contrarily, the stature of my body is small, myself not so well spoken, my voice low, my carriage lawyer-like, and of the common fashion, my nature soft and bashful, my purse thin, light, and never yet plentiful. Wherefore I now see the only cause of this choice is, a gracious and favourable censure of your good and undeserved opinions of me. But I most humbly beseech you, recall this your sudden election; and therefore because the more sudden, the sooner to be recalled. But if this cannot move your sudden choice, yet let this one thing persuade you, that myself not being gracious in the eye of her maj. neither ever yet in account with any great personages, shall deceive your expectation in those weighty matters and great affairs which should be committed unto me. For if Demosthenes, being so learned and eloquent as he was, one whom none surpassed, trembled to speak before Phocion at Athens; how much more shall I, being unlearned and unskilful, supply this place of dignity, charge, and trouble, to speak before so many Phocions as here be? Yea, which is the greatest, before the unspeakable majesty and sacred personage of our dread and dear sovereign; the terror of whose countenance will appale and abase even the stoutest heart; yea, whose very name will pull down the greatest courage. For how mightily doth the estate and name of a prince deject the haughtiest stomach, even of their greatest subjects? I beseech you therefore, again and again, to proceed unto a new election, here being many better able, more sufficient, and far more worthy than myself, both for the honour of this assembly, and general good to the public state.” This speech being answered by mr. Comptroller, and the whole house being unanimous in their option, the said serjeant was presented, and confirmed by the queen, as hath been before related.

The Speaker's Prayer during the Session.] It had been the custom of these later Protestant parliaments, for the Speaker to compose a Prayer, to be read by him every morning during the session. Accordingly, the present Speaker made and read the following:—“O eternal God, Lord of Heaven and Earth, the great and mighty Counsellor, we thy poor servants, assembled before thee, in this hon. senate, humbly acknowledge our great and manifold sins and imperfections, and thereby our unworthiness to receive any grace and assistance from thee: yet, most merciful father, since, by thy Providence, we are called from all parts of the land to this famous council of parl. to advise of those things which concern thy glory, the good of thy church, the prosperity of our prince, and the weal of her people; we most intirely beseech thee, that pardoning all our sins in the blood of thy son Jesus Christ, it would please thee, by the brightness of thy spirit, to expel darkness and vanity from our minds, and partiality from our speeches; and grant unto us such wisdom and integrity of heart as becometh the servants of Jesus Christ, the subjects of a gracious prince, and members of this hon. house.—Let not us, O Lord, who are met together for the public good of the whole land, be more careless and remiss than we use to be in our own private causes. Give grace, we beseech thee, that every one of us may labour to shew a good conscience to thy majesty, a good zeal to thy word, and a loyal heart to our prince, and a Christian love to our country and commonwealth.—O Lord, so unite and conjoin the hearts of her excellent maj. and this whole assembly, as they may be a threefold cord not easily broken; giving strength to such godly laws as be already enacted, that they may be the better executed, and enacting such as are further requisite for the bridling of the wicked, and the encouragement unto the godly and well-affected subjects: that so thy great blessing may be continued towards us, and thy grievous judgments turned from us. And that only for Christ Jesus sake, our most glorious and only mediator and advocate, to whom, with thy blessed majesty and the Holy Ghost, be given all honour and praise, power and dominion, from this time forth for evermore.”

Bill for increase of Husbandry.] Nov 5, Mr. Francis Bacon stood up, and made a motion, “against Inclosures and Depopulation of Towns and Houses of Husbandry and Tillage. And to this purpose he brought in, as he termed it, two bills, not drawn with a polished pen, but with a polished heart, free from affection and affectation. And because former laws are medicines of our understanding, he said, that he had perused the preambles of former statutes, and by them did see the inconveniences of this matter, being then scarce out of the shell to be now full ripened. And, he said, that the overflowing of the people here, makes a shrinking and abate elsewhere: and that these two mischiefs, though they be exceeding great, yet they seem the less, because ‘Quæ mala cum multis patimur, leviora videntur.’ And though it may be thought ill, and very prejudicial to lords that have inclosed great grounds, and pulled down even whole towns, and converted them to sheep pastures; yet considering the increase of people, and the benefit of the commonwealth, I doubt not but every man will deem the revival of former moth-eaten laws, in this point, a praiseworthy thing. For, in matters of policy, ill is not to be thought ill, which bringeth forth good. For, Inclosure of grounds brings depopulation, which brings first idleness; 2ndly, decay of tillage; 3rdly, subversion of houses, and decay of charity, and charges to the poor; 4thly, impoverishing the state of the realm. A law, for the taking away of such inconveniences, is not to be thought ill or hurtful unto the general state. And I would be sorry to see, within this kingdom, that piece of Ovid’s verse prove true, ‘Jam seges ubi Troja fuit:’ so in England, instead of a whole town full of people, nought but green fields, but a shepherd and a dog. The eye of experience is the sure eye, but the eye of wisdom is the quick-sighted eye; and by experience we daily see, ‘Nemo putat illud videre turpe, quod sibi sit quæstuosum.’ And therefore there is almost no conscience made in destroying the savour of life, bread I mean, for ‘panis sapor vitæ.’ And therefore a strict and rigorous law had need to be made against those viperous natures, who fulfil the proverb, ‘Si non posse quod vult, velle tamen quod potest;’ which if it be made by us, and life given unto it by execution in our several counties, no doubt but they will prove laws tending to God’s honour, the renown of her maj. the fame of this parl. and the everlasting good of this kingdom. And therefore I think them worthy to be read and received.”—This speech was seconded by sir John Fortescue, chanc. of the excheq. who also moved for a Committee to consider of the bill; which was ordered accordingly.

Motion for a large Supply.] Nov. 15, the Chanc. of the Excheq. made a motion for a Supply. “He put the house in mind of the lord keeper’s speech to them, on the 1st day of this parl. by her maj.’s direction, touching the causes of her calling of this parl. and shewing, at large, her maj.’s great and excessive charges, sustained for the defence of her realms and dominions, against the force of the king of Spain, amounting to more than a treble value of the last 3 Subsidies and six 15ths and 10ths, granted unto her in the last parl.; and declaring further the great necessity of some mass of treasure, to be provided towards the supply of her highness’s charges in the continuation of the maintenance of her maj.’s forces, in defence of her highness’s realms, dominions, and subjects, against the forces and invasions of the said king of Spain; and further referring the particulars of the designs and attempts of the said king of Spain, since the last parl. to be reported unto this house, by mr. Secretary; moved for a selected committee of this house, to be nominated to treat and consult concerning that matter.”

Mr. Secretary Cecil shewed, at large, “The practices and attempts of the said king of Spain, against her maj. and her realms, dominions, and subjects, in divers sorts, and at sundry times; together with his great overthrows in the same by the mighty hand of God, and of her highness's forces, to his perpetual ignominy and great dishonour throughout the whole world." And so, after a large discourse, most excellently delivered by him, says the Journalist, he concluded with a motion "for proceeding to the said committees."

Sir Francis Bacon* rose and spoke as follows:—"And please you, mr. Speaker, I must consider the time which is spent; but yet so, as I must consider also the matter, which is great. This great cause was, at the first, so materially and weightily propounded; and after in such sort persuaded and enforced; and by him that last spake, so much time taken, and yet to good purpose; as I shall speak at a great disadvantage: but because it hath been always used, and the mixture of this house doth so require it, that in causes of this nature there be some speech and opinion, as well from persons of generality, as by persons of authority, I will say somewhat, and not much: wherein it shall not be fit for me to enter into, or to insist upon secrets, either of her maj.'s coffers, or of her council; but my speech must be of a more vulgar nature. I will not enter, mr. Speaker, into a laudative speech of the high and singular benefits, which by her maj.'s most politic and happy government we receive, thereby to incite you to a retribution; partly because no breath of man can set them forth worthily; and partly because, I know, her maj. in her magnanimity doth bestow her benefits like her freest patents, 'absque aliquo inde reddendo;' not looking for any thing again, if it were in respect only of her particular, but love and loyalty. Neither will I now at this time put the case of this realm of England too precisely; how it standeth with the subject in point of payments to the crown: though I could make it appear by demonstration, what opinion soever be conceived, that never subjects were partakers of greater freedom and ease; and that whether you look abroad into other countries at this present time, or look back to former times in this our own country, we shall find an exceeding difference in matter of taxes; which now I reserve to mention; not so much in doubt to acquaint your ears with foreign strains, or to dig up the sepulchres of buried and forgotten impositions, which in this case, as by way of comparison, it is necessary you understand; but because speech in the house is fit to persuade the general point, and particularly is more proper and seasonable for the committee: neither will I make any observations upon her maj.'s manner of expending and issuing treasure; being not upon excessive and exorbitant donatives; nor upon sumptuous and unnecessary triumphs, buildings, or like magnificence; but upon the preservation, protection, and honour of the realm: for I dare not scan upon her maj.'s actions, which it becometh me rather to admire in silence, than to gloss or discourse upon them, though with never so good a meaning. Sure I am that the treasure that cometh from you to her maj. is but a vapour which riseth from the earth, and gathereth into a cloud, and stayeth not there long; but upon the same earth it falleth again: and what if some drops of this do fall upon France or Flanders? It is like a sweet odour of honour and reputation to our nation throughout the world. But I will only insist upon the natural and inviolate law of preservation. It is a truth, mr. Speaker, and a familiar truth, that safety and preservation are to be preferred before benefit or increase, inasmuch as those counsels which tend to preservation seem to be attended with necessity: whereas, those deliberations which tend to benefit, seem only accompanied with persuasion. And it is ever gain and no loss, when at the foot of the account there remains the purchase of safety. The prints of this are every where to be found: the patient will ever part with some of his blood to save and clear the rest: the sea-faring man will, in a storm, cast over some of his goods to save and assure the rest: the husbandman will afford some foot of ground for his hedge and ditch, to fortify and defend the rest. Why, mr. Speaker, the disputer will, if he be wise and cunning, grant somewhat that seemeth to make against him, because he will keep himself within the strength of his opinion, and the better maintain the rest. But this place adviseth me not to handle the matter in a common place. I will now deliver unto you that, which, upon a 'probatum est,' hath wrought upon myself, knowing your affections to be like my own. There hath fallen out, since the last parl. four accidents or occurrences of state; things published and known to you all; by every one whereof it seemeth to me, in my vulgar understanding, that the danger of this realm is increased: which I speak not by way of apprehending fear, for I know I speak to English courages; but by way of pressing provision: for I do find, mr. Speaker, that when kingdoms and states are entered into terms and resolutions of hostility one against the other; yet they are many times restrained from their attempts by four impediments:—The 1st is by this same 'aliud agere;' when they have their hands full of other matters, which they have embraced, and serveth for a diversion of their hostile purposes.—The next is, when they want the commodity or opportunity of some places of near approach.—The third, when they have conceived an apprehension of the difficulty and churlishness of the enterprise, and that it is not prepared to their hand. And the fourth is, when a state, through the age of the monarch, groweth heavy and indisposed to actions of great peril and motion; and this dull humour is not sharpened nor inflamed by any provocations or scorns. Now if it please you to examine, whether by removing the impediments, in these four kinds, the danger be not grown so many degrees nearer us by accidents, as I said, fresh, and all dated since the last parl.—Soon after the last parl. you may be pleased to remember how the French king revolted from his religion; whereby every man of common understanding may infer, that the quarrel between France and Spain is more reconcileable, and a greater inclination of affairs to a peace than before: which supposed, it followeth, Spain shall be more free to intend his malice against this realm. Since the last parl. it is also notorious in every man's knowledge and remembrance, that the Spaniards have possessed themselves of that avenue and place of approach for England, which was never in the hands of any king of Spain before; and that is Calais; which in true reason and consideration of estate of what value or service it is, I know not; but in common understanding, it is a knocking at our doors. Since the last parl. also that ulcer of Ireland, which indeed brake forth before, hath run on and raged more: which cannot but be a great attractive to the ambition of the council of Spain, who by former experience know of how tough a complexion this realm of England is to be assailed; and therefore, as rheums and fluxes of humours, is like to resort to that part which is weak and distempered.—And lastly, it is famous now, and so will be many ages hence, how by these two sea-journeys we have braved him, and objected him to scorn: so that no blood can be so frozen or mortified, but must needs take flames of revenge upon so mighty a disgrace. So at this concurrence of occurrents, all since our last assembly, some to deliver and free our enemies, some to advance and bring him on his way, some to tempt and allure him, some to spur on and provoke him, but cannot threaten an increase of our peril in great proportion.—Lastly, mr. Speaker, I will but reduce to the memory of this house one other argument, for ample and large providing and supplying treasure; and this it is:—I see men do, with great alacrity and spirit proceed when they have obtained a course they long wished for and were restrained from. Myself can remember both in this honourable assembly, and in all other places of this realm, how forward and affectionate men were to have an invasive war. Then we would say, a defensive war was like eating and consuming interest, and needs we would be adventurers and assailants; 'habes quod tota mente petisti:' shall we not now make it good, especially when we have tasted so prosperous fruit of our desires?—The 1st of these expeditions invasive was atchieved with great felicity, ravished a strong and famous port in the lap and bosom of their high countries; brought them to such despair as they fired themselves and their Indian fleet in sacrifice, as a good odour and incense unto God for the great and barbarous cruelties which they have committed upon the poor Indians, whither that fleet was sailing; disordered their reckoning so, as the next news we heard of was nothing but protesting of bills and breaking credit. The 2nd journey was with notable resolution borne up against weather and all difficulties; and besides the success in amusing him and putting him to infinite charge, sure I am it was like a Tartar's or Parthian's bow, which shooteth backward, and had a most strong and violent effect and operation both in France and Flanders; so that our neighbours and confederates have reaped the harvest of it; and while the life-blood of Spain went inward to the heart, the outward limbs and members trembled, and could not resist. And lastly, we have a perfect account of all the noble and good blood that was carried forth, and of all our sea-walls and good shipping, without mortality of persons, wreck of vessels, or any manner of diminution. And these have been the happy effects of our so long and so much desired invasive war. To conclude, mr. Speaker, therefore, I doubt not but every man will consent that our gift must bear these two marks and badges: the one, of the danger of the realm by so great a proportion, since the last parliament, increased; the other, the satisfaction we receive in having obtained our so earnest and ardent desire of an invasive war."

Whereupon it was agreed, "that all the privy council, being members of this house, all the knights returned for the counties into this present parl. and all citizens for cities returned into this house, should meet about the said business, on Friday next, in this house; and any other of this house then to come to them also at their pleasure."—Dec. 7, a bill for a Grant of 3 Subsidies and six 15ths and 10ths, was read a first time. On the 10th it was ordered to be engrossed; and, on the 14th it passed this house, and was sent up to the lords. On which the Journalist makes this Observation: "That as this grant exceeded that in the last parl. in respect of the manner of payment, so in the next, a still larger supply was given." By which we must either judge that the necessities of the state were in these times exceedingly urgent; or that the former grants served as leading precedents to the latter. Notwithstanding the clause in the preamble to the bill of the first grant expressly says, "That these large and unusual grants, made to a most excellent princess, on a most pressing and extraordinary occasion, should not, at any time hereafter, be drawn into a precedent."

The rest of the proceedings of the Commons in this session are relative to matters of small moment, and are therefore omitted. Dec. 20, the house was adjourned to the 11th of Jan. And, on the 9th of Feb. the Queen came to the House of Lords in the afternoon, as was the usual custom in those days; when, sending for the Commons, the Speaker, having made his three reverences to her maj. spake, in effect, as follows:

The Speaker's Speech at the dissolution of the Parl. "First, he shewed the happiness of a commonwealth governed by laws, by which subjects are held in due obedience; which her maj. observing, had now called a parl. for the preservation of some laws, amending of others, cutting off unnecessary statutes, and the making of new, never before enacted: and that her maj.'s subjects in this parl. considering the strength of the realm to consist in the strength of the prince and subjects, and their strength to stand first in the hands of God, and next in provision of treasure; therefore, said he, your maj.'s most humble, dutiful, and obedient subjects, have, by me their mouth and Speaker, presented here a free gift of their free and loving hearts; the which, I hope and think, was granted without a thought of a no. Sure I am, without the word of a no. The 2nd part shewed a commandment imposed on him by the House of Commons, which was touching monopolies or patents of privilege, the which was a set and penned speech, made at a committee.—The 3rd shewed a thankfulness of the Commons for the pardon.—The 4th and last contained the said Speaker's own petition, "That if any faults had been committed in the house, they might not be now again revived. And if either he had spoken too much, or not so much as in duty he ought to have done, he besought her maj.'s pardon. And that as it had pleased her maj. to grant pardon to all her loving subjects, so that she would not exempt him alone, &c."

The Ld. Keeper's Answer.] To which speech the Lord Keeper, by the Queen's command, made the following Answer: "Our most dread sovereign, her excellent maj. hath given me, in charge, to say unto you and the rest of her loving subjects, that she doth thankfully accept of their free gift of Subsidy granted by the Commons, which she would not have required, had not the puissance of the enemy constrained her therunto; 2ndly, touching the monopolies, her maj. hoped that her dutiful and loving subjects would not take away her prerogative, which is the chiefest flower in her garden, and the principal and head pearl in her crown and diadem; but that they will rather leave that to her disposition. And as her maj. hath proceeded to trial of them already, so she promiseth to continue, that they shall all be examined, to abide the trial and true touchstone of the law; 3rdly, touching her Pardon, her maj.'s pleasure is, that I shew unto you, that you do not so willingly accept it as she giveth it; 4thly, for your Pardon, mr. Speaker, her maj. saith, That you have so learnedly and so eloquently defended yourself now, and painfully behaved yourself heretofore, as that your labour deserveth double her thanks: but, in your petition, I must also join with you, in beseeching her most excellent maj. that if any thing, through want of experience, or through mine imperfections and ignorance, have overslipped me, it may be pardoned and remitted."—The Lord Keeper having finished his speech, and the queen given the royal assent to 15 private and 28 public acts, and refused or quashed 48 several bills, which had passed both houses, the said great officer, by her maj.'s command, dissolved this parliament.

A new Parl. called.] We now come to Queen Elizabeth's last parl. which was called to meet at Westminster, on the 27th of Oct. 1601. When, being assembled, and the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, having notice that her maj. with divers lords spiritual and temporal, and others, were set in the Upper House, hasted thither; but before they came, the door of the house was shut, and notwithstanding any means that was made by them, was still kept shut, until the Lord Keeper had ended his Speech; their resentment of which will appear in the sequel. The substance of what the Lord Keeper spoke at this time was as follows:

The Ld. Keeper's Speech at opening the Session.] "He used persuasion of thankfulness, and of obedience, and also shewed her maj.'s desire of dissolution of this parl. before Christmas. He shewed unto us the Necessity we stand in, and the Means to prevent it; the Necessity, the wars between Spain and England; the Means, treasure, &c. His advice was, that laws in force might be revised and explained, and no new laws made. Our enemies, he said, were enemies to God, the queen, and the peace of this kingdom, conspired to overthrow religion, to reduce us to a tyrannical servitude. These enemies he named to be the bp. of Rome and the king of Spain. Our state being thus, he summoned us to be provident, by reason we deal with a provident enemy; and confident, because God hath ever, and he hoped, will ever bless the queen with successful fortune. He shewed how apparent his Providence was, by the means and course he taketh for our instruction: and 2ndly, the success we had against him by God's strong arm of defence in 1588, and divers other times since. You see, said he, to what effect the queen's support of the French king's estate hath brought him; even made him one of the greatest princes in Europe; but when her maj.'s forces left him, how was he fain to ransom a servile peace at our enemies the Spaniard's hands with dishonourable conditions. For the Low-Countries, how by her aid, from a confused govt. and state she brought them to an unity in council, and defended them with such success, in her attempts against the greatest power of the Spaniards tyrannical designs; which have so much galled him, that, how many desperate practices have been both devised, consented to, and set on foot by commandment of the late king his father, I need not shew you, neither trouble you with arguments for proof thereof; being confessed by them that should have been authors themselves. But, 'de mortuis nil nisi bonum.' I would be loth to speak of the dead, much more to slander the dead. I have seen her maj. wear at her girdle the price of her blood; I mean jewels which have been given to her physicians to have done that unto her, which I hope God will ever keep from her; but she hath rather worn them in triumph than for the price, which hath not been greatly valuable.—Then he fell to persuade us, because new occasions were offered of consultations, to be provident in provision of means for our own defence and safety, seeing the king of Spain means to make England miserable by beginning with Ireland; neither doth he begin with the rebels, but even with the territory of the queen herself. He shewed that treasure must be our means, for treasure is the sinews of war, &c."

The Speaker's Speech to the Queen.] Notwithstanding this unusual exclusion of the Lower House, on the 30th of Oct. when the queen came to the house of lords, the Journalist tells us, that the commons presented John Croke, esq. Recorder of London, for their Speaker, who, after three low reverences to her maj. spoke as follows:—"Most sacred and mighty Sovereign; upon your maj.'s commandment, your most dutiful and loving Commons, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Lower House, have chosen me your maj.'s most humble servant, being a member of the same house, to be their Speaker; but finding the weakness of myself, and my ability too weak to undergo so great a burthen, I do most humbly beseech your sacred maj. to continue your most gracious favour towards me, and not to lay this charge, so unsupportable, upon my unworthy and unable self: and that it would please you to command your Commons, to make a new election of another, more able and more sufficient to discharge the great service to be appointed by your maj. and your subjects. And I beseech your most excellent maj. not to interpret my denial herein, to proceed from any unwillingness to perform all devoted dutiful service; but rather out of your maj.'s clemency and goodness, to interpret the same to proceed from that inward fear and trembling which hath ever possessed me, when heretofore, with most gracious audience, it hath pleased your maj. to license me to speak before you. For, I know, and must acknowledge, that under God, even through your maj.'s great bounty and favour, I am what I am; and therefore none of your maj.'s most dutiful subjects more bound to be ready, and being ready, to perform even the least of your maj.'s commandments. I therefore do most humbly beseech your maj. that in regard the service of so great a prince, and flourishing kingdom, may the better and more successfully be effected, to command your dutiful and loving Commons, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Lower House, to proceed to a new election."

The Ld. Keeper's Answer.] To which the Lord Keeper, having received her maj.'s orders, answered thus: "Mr. Speaker; her maj. with gracious attention having heard your wise and grave excuse for your discharge, commanded me to say unto you, that even your eloquent speech of defence for yourself, is a great motive, and a reason very persuasive, both to ratify and approve the choice of the loving commons, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, as also to commend their wise and discreet choice of yourself, in her gracious censure, both for sufficiency well able, and for your former fidelity and services well approved and accepted of: and therefore her maj. taketh this choice of you for bonum omen, a sign of good and happy success, when the beginning is taken in hand with so good wisdom and discretion. Her maj. therefore commanded me to say unto you, that she well liketh of your election, and therefore she ratifieth it with her royal assent."

The Speaker's Reply.] The Speaker replied in this manner; "Most sacred and most puissant Queen; seeing it hath pleased you to command my service, by consenting to the free election of your dutiful and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of me to be their Speaker, I most humbly beseech your maj. to give me leave to shew unto you the dutiful thoughts and earnest affections of your loyal subjects to do your maj. all services, and to defend your royal and sacred person both with their lives and goods, against, &c. And so made a vehement invective against the tyranny of the king of Spain, the Pope's ambition, the rebels of Ireland, which, he said, were like a snake cut in pieces, which did crawl and creep to join themselves together again. And lastly, with prayers to continue the prosperous estate and peace of this kingdom, which hath been defended, as he said, by the mighty arm of our dread and sacred queen. To which she answered openly herself, 'No, but by the mighty hand of God; mr. Speaker.' Then he proceeded to the last part, to beseech her maj. for freedom of speech to every particular member of this house and their servants. And lastly, if any mistaking of any speech delivered unto him from the Commons should happen, that her maj. would attribute that to his weakness in delivery or understanding, and not to the house, as also any forgetfulness through want of memory, or that things were not so judiciously handled or expressed by him as they were delivered by the house."

The Ld. Keeper's Answer.] The Ld. Keeper, receiving further instructions from her maj. answered as follows: "Mr. Speaker, her maj. doth greatly commend and like of your grave speech, well divided, well contrived; the first proceeding from a sound invention, and the other from a settled judgment and experience. You have well, and well indeed, weighed the estate of this kingdom; well observed the greatness of our puissant and grand enemy the king of Spain, the continual and excessive charges of the wars of Ireland; which if they be well weighed, do not only shew the puissance of our gracious sovereign in defending us; but also, the greatness of the charge continually bestowed by her maj. even out of her own revenues to protect us; and the exposing of her maj. to continual trouble and toilsome cares for the benefit and safety of her subjects. Wherefore mr. Speaker, it behoveth us to think and say, as was well delivered by a grave man lately in a 'Concio ad Clerum,' 'Opus est subsidio nē fiat excidium.' Touching your other requests for Freedom of Speech, her maj. willingly consenteth thereto, with this caution, That the time be not spent in idle and vain matter, painting the same out with froth and volubility of words, whereby the speakers may seem to gain some reputed credit, by imboldening themselves to contradiction, and by troubling the house of purpose, with long and vain orations, to hinder the proceeding in matters of greater and more weighty importance. Touching Access to her Person, she most willingly granteth the same, desiring she may not be troubled unless urgent matter and affairs of great consequence compel you thereunto: for this hath been held for a wise maxim, 'In troubling great estates, you must trouble seldom.'—For Liberties unto yourselves and Persons, her maj. hath commanded me to say unto you all, That she ever intendeth to preserve the liberties of the house, and granteth freedom even unto the meanest member of this house: but her maj.'s pleasure is, you should not maintain and keep with you notorious persons, either for life or behaviour, and desperate debtors who never come abroad, fearing laws, but at these times; pettifoggers and vipers of the common-wealth; prolling and common solicitors, that set dissention between man and man; and men of the like condition to these: these her maj. earnestly wisheth a law may be made against; as also, that no member of this parl. would entertain or bolster up any man of the like humour or quality, on pain of her highness's displeasure. For your Excuse of the house and of yourself, her maj. commanded me to say, That your sufficiency hath so oftentimes been approved before her, that she doubteth not of your sufficient discharge of the place you shall serve in. Wherein she willeth you, to have a special eye and regard not to make new and idle laws, and trouble the house with them; but rather look to the abridging and repealing of divers obsolete and superfluous statutes; as also, first, to take in hand matters of greatest moment and consequence. In doing thus, mr. Speaker, you shall fulfil her maj.'s commandment, do your country good, and satisfy her highness's expectation."

The first thing the Lords went upon, was to bring in a bill to restrain the excessive and superfluous use of Coaches. What the tenor of it was, we know not; for, at the 2nd reading, it is entered, That whereas the said bill did in some sort concern the maintenance of Horses, within this realm, consideration ought to be had of the statutes heretofore ordained, relating to the breed and maintenance of Horses; and a new bill was to be framed for that purpose, wherein the use of Coaches might be included. But we hear no more of this matter. —A bill was also read a 1st and 2nd time, for the Preservation of Pheasants and Partridges; but though, at the 2nd reading, this bill was of that consequence as to be referred to a committee of 23 lords, yet no farther notice is taken of it in the Journals.—Another bill passed the Lords, for the suppressing of the Multitude of Ale-houses and Tipling-houses. A bill was also sent up by the Commons, much to the same purpose, entituled, "An Act against Drunkards, and common Haunters of Ale-houses and Taverns; but we do not find by the printed statutes, that either of these bills passed into a law at this time.

Orders of the Lords in relation to Bills.] A bill was read twice in the Lords this session, and committed, which had this short title, "An act for the Assurance of Lands." Since it did not pass, and we know not to what purpose it was designed, we only mention it for two extraordinary Rules of the house made concerning the debates about this bill. When the abp. of Canterbury, the chairman of the committee, returned the bill to the house, with certain amendments, they were presently twice read, and the bill ordered to be engrossed. But the bishop of London, one of the committee, offering to speak to the bill, or to the amendments, a question was moved by the earl of Nottingham, lord steward, "Whether it was agreeable to the good order and ancient custom of that house, that the said bp. being one of the committee, and dissenting from the rest, in some matter, either of the bill or of the amendments, might speak thereto upon the bringing in and presenting the amendments?" The lord keeper proposed this matter to the house, and the question being put, it was carried in the affirmative, "That any member of a committee might speak, in this case, either to the body of the bill, or the amendments before they were engrossed." And order was given that this Resolution should be entered in the Journals, for clearing the same doubt, if it should happen to arise in any future parl.—The next was, that on the 3rd reading of this bill, many objections arising against some points of the same, made by the bp. of London and several other lords; insomuch that the house was divided in opinion, whether it should be put to the question for the passing thereof, or no? Many lords were desirous that any defect in the said bill might be rather reformed, than, by this question, to put it to the hazard of being rejected. Another way was therefore first proposed, and the question put, "Whether the said bill, having been referred to a committee, at the 2nd reading, and by them returned with some amendments, and thereupon ordered to be engrossed, might after the engrossing and the 3rd reading, be recommitted, or no?" The numbers pro and con being equal; it was judged that the negative part, who were against recommitting the said bill, should prevail. Following the usual rule in law, as the Lord Keeper observed, "That where the Negatives and Affirmatives were equal, 'semper presumitur pro negante.' Lastly, the bill itself being put to the question, "whether it should pass or no?" Was, by the majority, rejected.

It seems, by the Lords Journals, as if the whole business of this session was employed in trying complaints upon breaches of privilege: insomuch, that on the 10th of Dec. the Lord Keeper acquainted the house, that he had received command from her maj. to inform them, "That the parl. should end on the 17th or 18th of this month at the farthest; that they might repair to their several countries against Christmas. She therefore required them to employ and spend that time which remained in matters concerning the public, and not on private business.

Some few bills, indeed, of consequence, had been proceeded upon; but the main bill for a Supply was yet to come, which, no doubt, the queen's message expedited; for it was delivered on the 10th of December, and on the 12th the commons sent up a bill for a grant of four entire subsidies, and eight 15ths and 10ths, which, in a few days more, had the assent of both houses. And very soon after, a grant of four subsidies of four shillings in the pound, from the clergy, was confirmed by parliament.

The Commons resent their being shut out of the House of Lords.] It was observed at the opening of this parl. that the Commons were not admitted, as usual, into the House of Lords, to hear the Lord Keeper's Speech. Nor is there any notice taken, in the said speech, of their being commanded to go to their own house and chuse a Speaker. Much discontented at this usage, they returned back, however; and, being assembled, mr. Richard Liefe, one of the barons of the cinque-ports, stood up and addressed himself to mr. Comptroller of the Household, telling him the wrong done unto the greatest part of the members of this house, by their not being suffered to come into the upper house, to hear her maj.'s pleasure, by the mouth of the Lord Keeper. Humbly desiring him, as Comptroller, to be a means, that the reason thereof might be imparted unto some of the members of this house, for their better satisfaction. The Comptroller answered, That he thought this request very reasonable and meet, and it should be done at convenient time; but seemed to impute the said fault wholly to the gentleman-usher of the upper house.

Mr. Sec. Cecil recapitulates the Heads of the Lord Keeper's Speech.] Nov. the 3rd. Mr. Liefe stood up and moved, "That since many of the members were strangers to the Lord Keeper's Speech, and consequently of the cause which moved her maj. to call this parl. they might be in some sort satisfied in that point." On which

Mr. Secretary Cecil repeated the heads of the said speech to the house, and then proceeded: "For my own advice, touching the particular counsels of this house, I wish that we would not trouble ourselves with any fantastic speeches or idle bills, but rather such as be for the general good, both light in conception, and facile in execution. Now seeing it hath pleased you all hitherto with patience to hear me, if with your favour, I may particularize and shew the grounds of the former-delivered speech, touching the State of Ireland, I shall be very glad, both for my own discharge, and for your satisfaction. The king of Spain, having quit himself of France, by a base and servile peace, forgetteth not to follow the objects of his father's ambition, England and the Low-Countries. He hath made overtures of peace, which, if they might both be honourable and for the public good, I hold that neither a wise nor an honest man would impugn them. He hath put an army into Ireland, the number 4000 soldiers, under the conduct of a valiant, expert, and hardy captain, who chooseth, rather than return into his own country without any famous enterprize, to live and die in this service. These 4000 are three parts natural Spaniards, and of his best expert soldiers, except them of the Low-Countries: those he could not spare, because of his enterprize of Ostend. And how dangerous the loss of that town would be to this land, I think there is no man of experience but can witness with me. For he would easily be master of all that coast, so that the trade between England and the Low-Countries would be quite dissolved. Yea, he would be so dangerous a neighbour to us, that we, which are now tenants by discretion, are likely shortly to be tenants by the courtesy. When he is our neighbour of the Low-Countries, what neighbour hath Spain, to whom he shall not be troublesome.—I will shew you further what besides this he hath done, and how eagle-eyed he is continually over us. To resist the Turk's attempts, he hath sent 10,000 men; to the Low Countries 9000; in an enterprize of his own against the Turk he hath sent; which being dispatched, those soldiers shall return against the next spring, and second these 4000 men. Now in the enterprize for Ireland, to resist those attempts in being, and the ensuing provisions against us, let us consider the certainty of our estate in Ireland: we have there an army, and nothing but an army, fed even out of England; with what charge it brings to the queen, what trouble to the subject, what danger it is to them there left, if the provision should fail; what hurt to the commonwealth, by making things at a higher rate than otherwise they would be, I refer it to your wisdoms to imagine. Over this, I assure you, it is beyond all precedent and conjecture: his presence and cause of war there, is to defend the Catholic cause; I mean, to tear her maj.'s subjects from her; for I may say she hath no Catholic obedient subject there, because she standeth excommunicate at this present by force of two bulls of this Pope's, by which the subjects are absolved of their obedience. That you do only remember you do it 'pro aris et focis;' yea, we do it for a prince that desireth not to do any thing extraordinary out of the coffers of her subjects. She selleth her land to defend us, she supporteth all the neighbouring princes to gain their amities and establish our long peace; not these

5, or 7, or 10 years, but 43 years, for all our prosperities. I hope I shall not see her funeral, upon which may be written, 'Hic solum restat victrix orientis.' And I pray God, I may not. What we freely give unto her, she, living, bestows it to our good; and dying, doubtless, will leave it for our profit. Thus have I out of mine own genius, for mine own part, delivered unto you what I know. And touching that I have spoken in performing your commandment, I will take no thanks from you for my pains; for no man cares with less affection to speak in this assembly, or desireth to gratify any particular member of this house more than myself."

Mr. George Moore moved, "That whereas the lord-keeper's oration was, 'That the greatest matters should be handled in the beginning of the parl.' a Committee might be chosen to certify the house what those matters were, that order might be taken accordingly."—On this motion, a Committee was immediately appointed, which consisted of all the privy-council, being members of this house, the knights of the shires, the barons of the cinque-ports, the knights and citizens for London, York, Norwich, Bristol, Totness, and about 40 more, who were appointed to meet in this house upon Saturday next at two in the afternoon.

Bill relating to Bishop's Leases.] Nov. 4, a bill for Explanation of such Statutes as regard Leases to be made by abps. and bps. was read; to which only Mr. Boise stood up and said, "That this act would be prejudicial to the bp. present and the successor, to their servants and to the bps. own servants and tenants: to the bp. present, in the maintenance of his estate, which cometh only by continual fines; which if they be taken away, then are they not able to maintain that hospitality, and keep that retinue either belonging to their place or answerable to their living. For, consider the revenue of the greatest bishopric in England, it is but 2,200l. whereof he payeth, for annual subsidies, to the queen 500l. And what damage we shall do both to him and his successor herein, his revenue being so beneficial to her maj. I refer to all your judgments. To the successor it must needs be more hurtful; for when he first cometh in, he payeth first-fruits, and yet is not allowed to make his benefit by fines, which all bps. farmers are content to do; so that he is cast one whole annual value behind hand, and perhaps hath no power, neither to make leases in 12 or 16 years. This, mr. Speaker, will induce the Ministers of the Word not to seek bishoprics, whereby we may bring the clergy both to poverty and contempt; from which they have ever been carefully defended and provided for, even by the most ancient statutes and laws of this land now extant. Hurtful it is to their servants, for this may be every man's case. We know very many good gentlemen's sons serve bps. and how can they reward their long and faithful services, but only by means of granting over of these fines or some other means out of their spiritual function? But this act is good for the courtier; and I may speak no more of that point. Lastly, mr. Speaker, I myself am farmer to a bp. and I speak this as in my own case (on my knowledge) to the house, that it is ordinary upon every grant after 4 or 5 years, ever to fine and take a new lease, but I refer it to the consideration of the house to do their pleasures therein: only this I can certify, that I have the copy of the bill the last parl. exhibited to this purpose, which I having conferred together with the present bill, do find them to be, word for word, all one; and the last was rejected."—Whereupon this was also rejected.

Bill for suppressing Abuses in Weights and Measures.] Nov. 5, Mr. Francis Bacon stood up and spoke thus: "Mr. Speaker, I am not of their mind that bring their bills into this house obscurely, by delivery only to yourself or to the clerk, delighting to have the bill to be 'incerto authore,' as though they were either ashamed of their own work, or afraid to father their own children: but I, mr. Speaker, have a bill here, which, I know, I shall no sooner be ready to offer, but you will be ready to receive and approve. I liken this bill to that sentence of the poet, who set this as a paradox in the fore-front of his book, 'First water, then gold,' preferring necessity before pleasure. And I am of the same opinion, that things necessary in use, are better than those things which are glorious in estimation. This, mr. Speaker, is no bill of state nor of novelty, like a stately gallery for pleasure, but neither to dine in nor sleep in; but this bill is a bill of repose, of quiet, of profit, of true and just dealings; the title whereof is, 'An act for the better Suppressing of Abuses in Weights and Measures.' We have turned out divers bills without disputation: and for a house of wisdom and gravity as this is, to bandy bills like balls, and to be silent as if no body were of counsel with the common-wealth, is unfitting in my understanding for the state thereof. I will tell you, mr. Speaker, out of mine own experience, that I have learned and observed, having had causes of this nature referred to my report: that this fault of using false Weights and Measures, is grown so intolerable and common, that if you would build churches, you shall not need, for battlements and bells, other than false Weights of lead and brass. And because I would observe the advice given in the beginning of this parl. that we should make no new laws; I have only made this bill a confirmation of the statute of the 11th Hen. VII. with a few additions, to which I will speak at the passing of the bill, and shew the reasons of every particular clause, the whole being a revival of a former statute: for I take it far better to scour a stream, than to turn a stream. And the first clause is, That it is to extend to the principality of Wales, to constrain them to have the like Measures and Weights to us in England."

Debate on the Manner of issuing Writs for

Elections.] Sir Robert Cecil moved the house, "To have their opinions, in that there wanted a chief member, viz. a knight of Denbighshire. And he said, I am to certify the house thus much, in respect of some disorder committed there, touching the election, by sir Rd. Trevor and sir John Fludd, to which sir John Salisbury is a party, the sheriff could not proceed in election. For mine own part, I think it fit that mr. Speaker should attend my lord keeper therein. And then produced a letter from the sheriff, that there happening a great riot and disturbance on the county-court day, he had it not in his power to execute the writ."

Sir Edw. Hobby answered, "Methinks under favour, the motion mr. Secretary made is good, but the form therein (I speak with all reverence) not fitting the state of this house. For, he said, mr. Speaker shall attend my lord keeper. Attend! It is well known that the Speaker of the House is the mouth of the whole realm; and that the whole state of the commonalty of a kingdom should attend one person, I see no reason. I refer it to the consideration of the house: only this proposition I hold, That our Speaker is to be commanded by none, neither to attend any, but the queen only."

Mr. Johnson said, "The Speaker might 'ex officio' send a warrant to the clerk of the crown who is to certify the lord keeper, and so to make a new warrant."

Sir Edw. Hobby said, "That for Election of burgesses, he had seen half a score yesterday with sir John Puckering's hand, when he was Speaker."

Mr. Speaker said, "I may inform you of the order of the house, That a warrant must go from the Speaker to the clerk of the crown, who is to inform the lord keeper, and then to make a new writ."

Mr. Sec. Cecil said, "I should be very sorry to detract from any particular member of this house, much more from the general state; my meaning was mistaken, and my words misconstrued."

Debate on the Supply.] Nov. 7, in the afternoon, the Committee on the Subsidy sat; when Sir Walter Raleigh moved the house, "To consider to what intent they came together, and now in their coming what was to be considered. For the Subsidy, and the manner and quality thereof, I will now only intimate thus much unto you: that the last parl. only 3 Subsidies were granted, upon fear that the Spaniards were coming; but we see now they are come, and have set foot even in the queen's territories already, and therefore are the more of us to be respected and regarded. And seeing the sale of her highness's own jewels, the great loans the subjects have lent her, yet unpaid, the continual selling of her lands and decaying of her revenues, the sparing ever out of her own purse and apparel for our sakes will not serve, but yet she must be fain to call her court of parl. for our advice and aid in this case; I wish for my own part (as a particular member of this commonwealth) that we may not do less than we did before; and that we also would bountifully, according to our estates, contribute to the necessity of her maj. as now it standeth."

Mr. Wiseman: "Her maj. hath spent so much, that now she is fain to desire the help of her subjects; let us therefore draw to some head, and leave our orations and speeches. We are to consider only what is fit to be given; and as for my part, as a poor member and one of the meanest in this house, I will be bold to deliver mine opinion first, because some must break the ice. Three pound land and under to pay 2s. 8d. in the pound, and five pound goods and under to pay 1s. 8d. in the pound, and double tenths and fifteenths as soon as may be. Although I may seem over bold, being but a rural and countryman, to speak even out of my element in this case; yet I do heartily crave pardon of all, beseeching that neither my unaptness or disorder of speech, nor the unworthiness of my person may prejudice the cause."

Sir Robert Wroth. "That four pound land full Subsidy, and six pound goods full Subsidy, might be paid to her maj."

Sir Fran. Hastings moved, "That three pound men might be exempted, and all others above that rate to pay according to the rate to make up a full Subsidy."

Mr. Philipps moved, "That the four pound men might be exempted, and four Subsidies received from the rich, which should be termed a contribution, because it might make no innovation."

Sir Walter Raleigh said, "If all pay alike, none will be aggrieved; if any be exempted, doubtless, it will breed much grief, and the feeling will be great to those three pound men that will feel any thing, but it will be nothing to them that know any thing."

Sir Edw. Hobby said, "We cannot hear you, speak out, you should speak standing, that so the house might the better hear you." So

Sir Walter Raleigh said, "That being a Committee, he might speak either sitting or standing, and so repeated over again the former speech."

Mr. Sec. Cecil said, "Because it is an argument of more reverence, I chuse to speak standing. As long as the queen by the advice of her council did find means to spare you, so long she ever desired that her subjects might not be charged: but if her maj. as soon as the last subsidy had been spent, should have again resorted unto you, I do assure you, this parl. had been called in Oct. last. Now if upon providence and foresight, you did contribute unto her maj.; much more should we now do the same, seeing a resolute company of soldiers have intrenched themselves in her maj.'s kingdom of Ireland, and more supplies thither are daily expected. It is time to open our coffers, that we may obviate, in the beginning, these few forces of the Spaniards, lest growing to greater forces we cannot expel them with less than 500,000l. which we may now do with 100,000 in present. If there be any that sits next the door that desires to sit next the chair to give his opinion, I will not only give him my place, but thank him to take my charge."—(This was conceived to be sir Edw. Hobby, who coming to sit near the chair, and not giving him place, sat next the door.)—"We that sit here, for my part, take your favours out of courtesy, not out of duty; but to the purpose. The queen hath occasion to use, as divers in this house do know, 300,000l. before Easter; how this shall be raised and gathered, that is the question; for without this proportion of charge, neither the Spaniards in Ireland can be repelled, and the wars there maintained, neither her maj.'s other affairs be set on foot, neither provision sufficient can be set on foot, or made for defence from foreign invasions. Admit with a less charge we should now expel him; will any man be so simple to think he will give over the enterprise, being of so great consequence, and grow desperate? I should think him but a man of shallow understanding and less policy. Surely, if we had been of that mind when we had that great overthrow of his invincible navy in 88, we had been destined to perdition. For how many chargeable enterprises of puissant and great consequence hath he since made? The like, if his forces in Ireland should now fail, would he do again. And therefore that provision we now make, if he should be expelled with a less matter, would serve to make defence against his next invasion of that kingdom; as also, enrich her maj. to be ready to furnish her navy and forces the speedier for her safety. Besides, if he bestow such masses of treasure for the gaining of one poor town, Ostend, what will he do to gain so strong and famous a kingdom as Ireland? I will, by the leave of a worthy person who sits by me, and knows these things better than I do, yield a particular account unto you of the state itself. First; the last whole Subsidy after the rate of 4l. lands and 8 groats goods came not to above 80,000l. the Subsidy of the clergy 20,000l. the double 15ths 60,000l. All which is 160,000l. Since my lord of Essex's going into Ireland, she hath spent 300,000l. So the queen is behind 140,000l. Thus we refer the matter to your judicious consideration: we only shew you the present state of the queen and her affairs, wishing no man to look that we should give advice what is to be done, as though you yourselves, who are the wisdom of the land could neither direct yourselves nor upon these reasons alledged, judge the necessity of the state."

Sir John Fortescue added this, "That what pleased the house in the name of the Subsidy to bestow the same, her maj. did and would ever employ to their uses; so that dying, it might be written on her tomb, 'Quod occupatus vixit,' so that she dying, liveth still, employing all to the safety of her subjects. And I beseech you remember, that the Great-Turk when he conquered Constantinople, found therein 300 millions of gold; if they, quoth he, had bestowed 3 millions in defence of their city, he could never have gotten it. From this blindness, I pray God defend us, that we may not be backward to give 4 Subsidies to her maj. for want whereof in time, we may happen to lose that which will not be recovered or defended with a hundred."—After which it was agreed by general consent the three Pound men to be included.

A Bill to repress the Multitude of Common Solicitors.] Nov. 9, Heywood Townshend, esq. in preferring a bill against the Multitude of common Solicitors, spoke as follows:—"Mr. Speaker; it is well said by a worthy member of this house, mr. Francis Bacon, that every man is bound to help the commonwealth the best he may; much more is every man in his particular bound, being a member of this house, if he knew any dangerous enormity towards the commonwealth, not only to open it, but, if it may be, oppose it. We being all here within these walls together, may be likened to a jury close shut up in a chamber; every man there upon his oath, and every man here upon his conscience, being the grand-jurymen of the land, bound to deal both truly and plainly. Herewith (though a most unworthy and least sufficient member of this house) myself being touched, I had rather adventure my credit by speaking, though confusedly, than to stretch my conscience (knowing so great a mischief and inconvenience unto this kingdom) by silence in so pleasing a cause, as I do persuade myself this bill will be to every man that hears it. To which mr. Speaker, because I may have benefit of speech if occasion serve, at the second reading thereof, I will not speak more at this present, but only touching the very tract of the bill itself. The honourable personage, that in the upper house in the beginning of this parl. spake against the lewd abuses of prolling solicitors and their great multitude, who set dissension betwixt man and man, like a snake, cut in pieces, crawl together to join themselves again to stir up evil spirits of dissension: he, I say, advised us, that a law might be made to repress them. I have observed that no man in this parl. ever offered to prefer any such bill to this house, but, sure I am, no man spake to this purpose. I have therefore, mr. Speaker, presumed out of my young experience, because I know part of their abuses, and with that small portion of learning that I have, to draw a bill, and here it is. The title is thus: 'An act to repress the multitude of Common Sollicitors.' The body of the act disableth all persons to solicit any cause other than their own. There are excepted and fore-prized four several sorts, lawyers and attornies in their own courts; where they be sworn servants in livery, and kinsmen within the fourth degree of consanguinity. And no man within this kingdom but may find a sitting and convenient solicitor within these four degrees. And I humbly pray, it being so short, that the bill may be read and received."

Debate on the Supply renewed.] On the same day the affair of the Supply was again brought before the house; and mr. Secretary

Cecil began first, and said, "When it was the good pleasure of this house to give order to the committees to consider the common danger of this realm, in which not only every member of this house, but every man in the kingdom is interested, it liked the committees after their resolution to chuse one among all to give account of their proceedings, and that is myself. I do know, it were the safest way for a man's memory, to deliver the last resolution without any precedent argument; for rare is the assembly in which there is not some variety of opinions. And I am of opinion, if we had all agreed upon the manner, as we did speedily upon the matter, all had been dispatched in an hour. It seemed by the ready consent of the committees, that they came not to look on one another, or like sheep to accompany one another; but the matter was well declared by some, and at length consented unto by all. Our contention bred difference, and difference cause of argument, both how to ease the state, and make this subsidy less burthensome which shall be received. Some were of opinion, that the 3 pound men should be spared, because it was to be considered they had but small portions. Others were of opinion that the 4 pound men should give double, and the rest upwards should be higher assessed. Others were of other opinions. Again it was moved, whether this Subsidy should go in the name of a Benevolence or Contribution, or whether in the name of a 4th Subsidy; but at length most voices resolved it should have the old name of a Subsidy, because 'subsidiū and auxiliū' are all one. The most voices concluded, That there should be no exception of the 3 pound men, because according to their rate some were assessed under value; besides, separation might breed emulation, suspicion of partiality and confusion. And the whole realm, when each man comes into his country, will be better satisfied, when they shall know they have spared no man, nor made any disjunction. It was said by a member of the house, that he knew some poor people pawned their pots and pans to pay the Subsidy. It may be you dwell where you see and hear; I dwell where I hear and believe. And, this I know, that neither pot nor pan, nor dish nor spoon should be spared when danger is at our elbows. But he that spake this, in my conscience, spake it not to hinder the Subsidy, or the greatness of the gift, but to shew the poverty of some assessed, and by sparing them to yield them relief. But, by no means, I would have the 3 pound men exempted, because I do wish the king of Spain might know, how willing we are to sell all in defence of God's religion, our prince and country.—I have read when Hannibal resolved to sack Rome, he dwelt in the cities adjoining, and never feared or doubted of his enterprize, till word was brought him that the maidens, ladies, and women of Rome sold their ear-rings, jewels and all their necessities to maintain war against him. I do take myself in duty bound to acquaint this house with the modesty of the committee at the proposition; that where first this house never stuck to commit it, they never stuck (understanding the reasons) to grant it."

Sir Rob. Wroth then moved, "That this new Subsidy might be drawn in a bill by itself, to which should be annexed a preamble of the great necessities, the willingness of the subject, and that it might be no precedent; but that would not be yielded unto."

Mr. Francis Moore moved that, "That which was done might be compleatly done, and the Subsidy gathered by commission, and not by the old roll; for peradventure some were dead, others fallen to poverty, others richer, and so deserved to be enhanced, &c. And withal he said, that the granting of this Subsidy seemed to be the alpha and omega of this parl."

Mr. Wingfield moved the hon. of the council, members of this house, "That seeing the Subsidy was granted, and they yet had done nothing, it would please her maj. not to dissolve the parl. till some acts were passed."

Mr. Francis Bacon, after a repetition that the 3 pound men might not be excluded, concluded, "That it was 'dulcis tractus pari jugo,' therefore the poor as well as the rich not to be exempted."

Sir Walter Raleigh said, "I like not that the Spaniards, our enemies, should know of our selling our pots and pans to pay Subsidies; well may you call it policy, as an hon. person alledged, but, I am sure, it argues poverty in the state. And for the motion that was last made, of 'dulcis tractus pari jugo,' call you this 'par jugum,' when a poor man pays as much as a rich, and peradventure his estate is no better than he is set at, or but little better; when our estates that be 30 or 40l. in the Queen's books, are not the hundred part of our wealth? Therefore it is not 'dulcis' nor 'pari.'"

Mr. Sec. Cecil. "That for what the gentleman said, 'That the Subsidy was the alpha and omega of this parl.' I think he spoke it not simply out of humour, but rather upon probability; for, I can assure you, her maj. is as respective over you touching her laws, which she desireth may be perused and amended, that she meaneth not to dissolve this parl. until some things be amended: for that, that I said, touching the Spaniard's knowing of our sale of our pots and pans, and all we have, to keep him out, which should be a matter of policy, to which the gent. (sir Walter Raleigh) took exceptions; I say, it is true, and yet I am mistaken. I say, it is good the Spaniards should know how willing we are to sell our pots and pans and all we have to keep him out: yet I do not say, it is good he should know we do sell them. That is, I would have him know our willingness to sell, (though there be no need) but not of our poverty in selling, or of any necessity we have to sell them, which I think none will do, neither shall need to do." Then all the house cried, "No, No;" as much as to say, no man did so.

Sir Arthur Gorge moved, "That it would please the council, that order might be taken that justices of the peace might be assessed according to the statute, viz. at 20l. lands, whereas there be few justices that be above 8 or 10l."

Serjeant Heyle. "Mr. Speaker, I marvel much that the house will stand upon granting of a Subsidy, or the time of payment, when all we have is her maj.'s; and she may lawfully, at her pleasure, take it from us: yea, she hath as much right to all our lands and goods, as to any revenue of her crown." At which all the house hemmed, and laughed and talked. "Well," quoth serj. Heyle, "all your hemming shall not put me out of countenance." So mr. Spkr stood up and said, "It is a great disorder that this should be used; for it is the ancient use of every man to be silent when any one speaketh; and he that is speaking should be suffered to deliver his mind without interruption." So the serjeant proceeded, and when he had spoken a little while, the house hemmed again, and so he sat down. In his latter speech he said, "He could prove his former position by precedent in the times of Hen. III. king John, king Stephen, &c." which was the occasion of their hemming.

Mr. Montague said, "That there were no such precedents; and if all preambles of subsidies were looked upon, he should find it were of free gift. And although her maj. requireth this at our hands, yet it is in us to give, not in her to exact of duty. And for the precedents there be none such, but touching a 10th fleece of wool, and a 10th sheaf of corn that was granted to Edw. III. at his going to the conquest of France; because all the money, then in the land to be levied by way of subsidy, would not be any way answerable to raise that great mass he desired. And so, having these 10ths, he sold them to private men to gain that subsidy, and so raised money to himself for his enterprize."

Bill against Pluralities of Benefices.] Nov. 16. A bill for redressing certain inconveniencies in the statute of 21 Hen. VIII. c. 13, intituled, 'An act against Pluralities of Benefices for taking of Farms by Spiritual Men, and for Residence,' was read the 2d time.

Mr. Dunn said, "It was no reason that men of unequal desert should be equally beneficed, or equalized with the best."

Dr. Crompton wished "That pluralities of offices might be taken from the laity, and then pluralities of benefices from the spirituality. Also in former ages, he said, impropriations were given to the spirituality, and then no pluralities allowed; as also spiritual men bound by ecclesiastical canons of their own from marriage, so that they might live with far less charge than now they do. But having taken from them first the impropriations, they cannot keep that hospitality which is required. And next, marriage being tolerated among them, they living at great charge both of wife and children, one benefice of small cure sufficeth not."

Sir Geo. Moore "Thought the bill most fit to be committed, it being, in the general opinion, a good law, and tending to a good and a religious end; and such is the iniquity of this age, that for want of a good law of this nature, many souls do not only languish but perish everlastingly, for want of spiritual food."

Mr. Lock. "I think bare silence is not an exoneration of a man's conscience: the similitude of offices and benefices, made by the doctor, doth not hold, under favour; for 'Non est incipiendum cum laicis, sed incidiendum a domo Dei:' therefore if they begin first, we shall follow in avoiding Pluralities."

Dr. James. "That it had been said, that Pluralities were the cause of bringing corruption into the church; but for that, under favour, said he, I think the contrary, because corruption is commonly where poverty is; but if competent living be given to the minister, I see no reason why just men should judge there to be corruption. 2dly, it was said, that it would be a means of preaching the word; for that I answer, that if hope of competent living be taken away, it will be a means to make the best wits refuse the study of divinity. And therefore an historian saith well, that 'sublatis præmiis corrumpunt artes.' Consider besides, that in England there are above eight thousand eight hundred and odd parish-churches; six hundred of which do but afford competent living for a minister: what then shall become of the multitude of our learned men? They have no other preferments unless it be to get some deanery, prebend, or such like, which is no easy matter to do, they being so few, especially in this catching age. To give the best scholar but as great proportion as the meanest artisan, or to give all alike, there is no equality; for 'Inæqualibus æqualia dare absurdum.' And this will breed poverty in the greatest learned, which, is the mother of contempt, a thing both dangerous and odious unto divinity: this must needs enforce preachers to preach 'placentia;' which is a thing abhorred even of God himself. A preacher, who is no ordinary person, ought to have an extraordinary reward; for the canon saith, he must be 'ad minimum artium magister, aut publicus aut idoneus verbi divini concionator.'"

Mr. David Waterhouse. "Because myself am an officer, I mean only to speak of the doctor's similitude of pluralities of offices. By the common law, an officer shall forfeit his office for non-attendance; so for a benefice the incumbent shall also forfeit. But after the statute came which made this toleration upon 18 days absence: so that now, if we set this statute at liberty again, this shall be no innovation in us, but a renovation of the common law. And I will end only with this caution to the house, that commonly the most ignorant divines of this land be doubled beneficed."

Serj. Harris. "We seem to defend the privileges and customs of the house, but if we proceed to determine of this bill, mr. Spkr, we shall not only infringe a custom which we have ever observed, viz. to meddle with no matter that toucheth her maj.'s prerogative; but also procure her great displeasure. Admit we should determine of this matter, yet her maj. may grant toleration with a 'non obstante.' And, mr. Speaker, the last parl. may be a warning to us when the like bill by us was preferred, and the same not only rejected, but also her maj. commanded the ld. keeper to tell us, that she hoped we would not hereafter meddle in cases of this nature so nearly touching her prerogative royal."

Mr. Martin. "I agree with one that said, 'learning should have her reward:' but I say more, that our souls should have their spiritual food."

Mr. Francis Hastings. "I protest that which I shall speak, I will utter to you all, out of the conscience of a christian, loyalty of a subject, and heart of an Englishman. I know that 'distributio parochiarum est ex jure humano non divino.' But he that said so much, give me leave to tell him, that 'distributio verbi divini est ex jure divino et humano.' If then by the distributing and severing of benefices to divers learned men, the word may be the better distributed unto the people, and preached as, God be thanked, it hath been these 43 years, under her maj.'s happy govt.; (the point of whose days, I beseech the Almighty, may be prolonged) I see no reason, mr. Speaker, why we should doubt of the goodness of this bill, or make any question of the committing thereof, &c."

Mr. Roger Owen shewed, "That a statute was but 'privatio communis juris:' and this act will make no innovation, because it repeals only the proviso, and not the body. Whereas it was said, that 'honos alit artes,' and much more to that purpose; and if you take away the honour and reward, then you take away the study itself. For answer thereunto, mr. Speaker, I say, under favour, that this statute takes away no benefices from the clergy, but doth only better order the distribution of benefices among the clergy. For another doctor that alledged a canon confirmed under the great seal of England, I say, under favour, that they of the clergy, and not we of the laity, are bound thereby; for they are, as it were, bye-laws to them, but not to us."—After which it was committed.

Debate on a Bill against Monopolies.] Nov. 20, the grand affair of Monopolies began in this house. It was first brought in by mr. Laurence Hide, and was then intituled, 'An act for the explanation of the common law in certain cases of Letters Patents.' After it was read, the question was to be put for the committing of it; and some crying out, 'Commit it,' some 'Ingross it,' a great debate arose. When

Mr. Spicer, burgess for Warwick, said, "Mr. Speaker, this assembly may be said to be 'libera mens et libera lingua,' therefore freely and faithfully, that which I know I will speak to this house. This bill may touch the prerogative royal, which, as I learned the last parl. is so transcendent, that the of the subject may not aspire thereunto. Far be it therefore from me, that the state and prerogative royal of the prince should be tied by me or by the act of any other subject. First let us consider of the word Monopoly, what it is, Μονοπωλις is Unus, and Πωλις is Civitas; so then the meaning of the word is, a restraint of any thing public in a city or commonwealth to a private use, and the user called a Monopolitan, 'quasi cujus privatum lucrum est urbis et orbis commune malum.' And we may well term this man the whirlpool of the prince's profit. Every man hath 3 special friends, his goods, kinsfolks, and good name: these men may have the two first but not the last. I speak not, mr. Speaker, neither repining at her maj.'s prerogative, or misliking the reasons of her grants, but out of grief of heart, to see the town, wherein I serve, pestered and continually vexed by the substitutes and vicegerents of these Monopolitans, who are ever ill-disposed and affected members. I beseech you, give me leave to prove this unto you by this argument. Whosoever transgresseth the royal commission of her maj. being granted upon good and warrantable suggestions, and also abuseth the authority and warrant of her maj.'s privy council, being granted unto him for the more favourable execution of his patent: this man is an evil-disposed and dangerous subject. But that this is true, and hath been done by one person, a substitute of a patentee, I will prove unto you. The substitutes for aquavitæ and vinegar came not long since to the town where I serve, and presently stayed sale of both these commodities; unless the sellers would compound with them, they must presently to the council-table. Myself, though ignorant, yet not so unskilful, by reason of my profession, but that I could judge whether their proceedings were according to their authority, viewed their patent, and found they exceeded in three points: for where the patent gives four months liberty to the subject, that hath any aquavitæ, to sell the same, this person comes down within two months and takes bond of them to his own use, where he ought to bring them before a justice of peace, and they there to be bound in recognizance, and after to be returned into the exchequer; and so, by usurpation, retaineth power in his own hands to kill or save. Thus her maj.'s commission being transgressed, as a sworn servant to her maj. I hold myself bound to certify the house thereof; and also that this substitute stands indicted as an obstinate recusant: yea, when her maj.'s name hath been spoken of and herself prayed for, he hath refused to stir hat or lip. My humble motion is, that we might use some caution or circumpective care to prevent this ensuing mischief."

Mr. Francis Bacon. "I confess the bill, as it is, is in few words, but yet ponderous and weighty. For the prerogative royal of the prince, for my own part I ever allowed of it, and it is such as I hope shall never be discussed. The queen, as she is our sovereign, hath both an enlarging and restraining power. For, by her prerogative, she may first set at liberty things restrained by statute-law, or otherwise; and, 2ndly, by her prerogative, she may restrain things which be at liberty. For the first, she may grant 'non obstante' contrary to the penal laws, which truly, according to my own conscience," [and so struck himself on the breast] "are as hateful to the subject as monopolies. For the 2nd, if any man, out of his own wit, industry, or endeavour, finds out any thing beneficial for the commonwealth, or bring any new invention, which every subject of this kingdom may use; yet in regard of his pains and travel therein, her maj. perhaps, is pleased to grant him a privilege to use the same only by himself or his deputies for a certain time. This is one kind of monopoly. Sometimes there is a glut of things when they be in excessive quantity, as perhaps of corn, and her maj. gives licence of transportation to one man; this is another kind of monopoly. Sometimes there is a scarcity or a small quantity, and the like is granted also. These and divers of this nature have been in trial, both at the common pleas, upon actions of trespass, where, if the judges do find the privilege good, and beneficial to the commonwealth, they then will allow it, otherwise disallow it. And also I know that her maj. herself hath given commandment to her attorney-general, to bring divers of them, since the last parl. to trial in the exchequer; since which time at least 15 or 16, to my knowledge, have been repealed; some by her maj.'s own express commandment, upon complaint made unto her by petition, and some by 'quo warranto' in the exchequer. But mr. Speaker, (said he, pointing to the bill) this is no stranger in this place, but a stranger in this vestment: the use hath been ever to humble ourselves unto her maj. and by petition desire to have our grievances remedied, especially when the remedy toucheth her so nigh in point of prerogative. All cannot be done at once, neither was it possible since the last parl. to repeal all. If her maj. make a patent (or, as we term it, a monopoly) unto any of her servants, that must go, and we cry out of it: but if she grant it to a number of burgesses, or a corporation, that must stand, and that forsooth is no monopoly. I say, and I say again, that we ought not to deal, to judge, or meddle with her maj.'s prerogative. I wish every man therefore to be careful in this business; and humbly pray this house to testify with me, that I, the queen's attorney-general, have discharged my duty, in respect of my place, in speaking on her maj.'s behalf; and protest I have delivered my conscience in saying that which I have said."

Dr. Bennet. "He that will go about to debate her maj.'s prerogative royal, had need walk warily. In respect of a grievance out of the city, for which I come, I think myself bound to speak that now which I had not intended to speak before; I mean a monopoly of salt. It is an old proverb, 'Sal sapit omnia;' fire and water are not more necessary. But for other Monopolies of cards" (at which word sir Walter Raleigh blushed) "dice, starch, and the like; they are, (because Monopolies) I must confess, very hurtful, though not all alike hurtful. I know, there is a great difference in them; and I think, if the abuses in this monopoly of salt were particularized, this would walk in the fore-rank. Now, seeing we are come to the means of redress let us see that it be so mannerly and handsomely handled, that after a commitment, it may have good passage."

Mr. Lawrence Hide. "I confess, mr. Speaker, that I owe duty to God, and loyalty to my prince. And for the bill itself I made it, and I think I understand it: and far be it from this heart of mine to think, this tongue to speak, or this hand to write any thing, either in prejudice or derogation of her maj.'s prerogative royal and the state. But because you shall know that this course is no new invention, but long since digested in the age of our forefathers above 300 years ago, I will offer to your considerations one precedent 10th Edw. III. At which time, one John Peach was arraigned at this bar in parl. for that he had obtained of the king a monopoly for sweet wines. The patent, after great advice and dispute, was adjudged void, and, before his face, in open parl. cancelled, because he had exacted 3s. 4d. for every tun of wine; himself adjudged to prison until he had made restitution of all that ever he had recovered, and not to be delivered till after a fine of 500l. paid to the king. This is a precedent worthy of observation; but I dare not presume to say, worthy the following. And, mr. Speaker, as I think it is no derogation to the omnipotence of God, to say he can do all but evil; so I think, it is no derogation to the maj. or person of the queen, to say the like in some proportion. Yet, mr. Speaker, because two eyes may see more than one, I humbly pray, that there might be a commitment had of this bill, lest something may be therein which may prove the bane and overthrow thereof at the time of the passing."

Serjeant Harris. "For ought I see, the house moveth to have this bill in the nature of a petition; it must then begin with more humiliation: and truly, sir, the bill is good of itself, but the penning of it is somewhat out of course."

Mr. Montague. "The matter is good and honest, and I like this manner of proceeding by bill well enough in this matter. The grievances are great, and I would note unto you only thus much, that the last parl. we proceeded by the way of petition, which had no successful effect."

Mr. Francis Moore. "I know the queen's prerogative is a thing curious to be dealt withal, yet all grievances are not comparable. I cannot utter with my tongue, or conceive with my heart, the great grievances that the town and country for which I serve, suffereth by some of these Monopolies; it bringeth the general profit into a private hand, and the end of all is beggary and bondage to the subjects. We have a law for the true and faithful currying of leather; there is a patent sets all at liberty, notwithstanding that statute. And to what purpose is it to do any thing by act of parl. when the queen will undo the same by her prerogative? Out of the spirit of humiliation, mr. Speaker, I do speak it, there is no act of her's that hath been, or is more derogatory to her own maj. more odious to the subject, more dangerous to the commonwealth than the granting of these monopolies."

Mr. Martin. "I speak for a town that grieves and pines, for a country that groaneth and languisheth under the burthen of monstrous and unconscionable substitutes to the monopolitans of starch, tin, fish, cloth, oil, vinegar, salt, and I know not what, nay what not? The principal commodities, both of my town and country, are ingrossed into the hand of those blood-suckers of the commonwealth. If a body, mr. Speaker, being let blood, be left still languishing without any remedy, how can the good estate of that body long remain? Such is the state of my town and country; the traffic is taken away, the inward and private commodities are taken away, and dare not be used without the licence of these monopolitans. If these blood-suckers be still let alone to suck up the best and principal commodities which the earth there hath given us, what shall become of us, from whom the fruits of our own soil and the commodities of our own labour, which, with the sweat of our brows, even up to the knees in mire and dirt, we have laboured for, shall be taken by warrant of supreme authority, which the poor subjects dare not gainsay?"

Sir George Moore. "I make no question but that this bill offereth good matter; and I do wish, that the matter may in some sort be prosecuted, and the bill rejected. Many grievances have been laid open touching the monopolies of salt; but, if we add thereunto petre, then we had hit the grief aright; with which my country is perplexed. There be three persons, her maj. the patentee, and the subject; her maj. the head, the patentee the hand, and the subject the foot. Now here's our case, the head gives power to the hands, the hand oppresseth the foot, the foot riseth against the head. We know the power of her maj. cannot be restrained by an act, why, therefore, should we thus talk? Admit we should make this statute with a 'non obstante,' yet the queen may grant a patent with a 'non obstante,' to cross this 'non obstante.' I think therefore, it agreeth more with the gravity and wisdom of this house, to proceed with all humbleness by petition than bill."

Mr. Wingfield. "I would but put the house in mind of the proceeding we had in this matter the last parl.; in the end whereof, our Speaker moved her maj. by way of petition, that the griefs touching these Monopolies might be respected, and the grievances coming of them might be redressed. Her maj. answered, by the ld. keeper, 'that she would take care of these monopolies, and our griefs should be redressed; if not, she would give us free liberty to proceed in making a law the next parl.' The grief, mr. Speaker, is still bleeding, and we green under the sore, and are still without remedy. It was my hap the last parl. to encounter with the word Prerogative; but as then, so now I do it with all humility, and wish all happiness both unto it, and to her maj. I am indifferent touching our proceeding either by bill or petition, so that therein our grievances may follow, whereby her maj. may specially understand them."

Sir Walter Raleigh. "I am urged to speak in two respects; the one because I find myself touched in particular; the other, in that I take some imputation of slander to be offered unto her maj. I mean, by the gent. that first mentioned tin (mr. Martin) for that being one of the principal commodities of this kingdom, and being in Cornwall, it hath ever, so long as there were any, belonged to the dukes of Cornwall, and they had special patents of privilege. It pleased her maj. freely to bestow upon me that privilege; and that patent being, word for word, the very same the duke's is, and because by reason of mine office of lord warden of the stannary, I can sufficiently inform this house of the state thereof; I will make bold to deliver it unto you. When the tin is taken out of the mine, and melted and refined, than is every piece, containing 100 cwt. sealed with the duke's seal. Now I will tell you, that before the granting of my patent, whether tin were but of 17s. and so upwards to 50s. a cwt.; yet the poor workmen never had above 2s. a week, finding themselves: but since my patent, whosoever will work, may; and buy tin at what price soever, they have 4s. a week truly paid. There is no poor that will work there, but may, and have that wages. Notwithstanding, if all others may be repealed, I will give my consent as freely to the cancelling of this, as any member of this house."

Mr. Downland. "If we proceed by way of petition, we can have no more gracious answer than we had the last parl. to our petitions. But since that parl. we have no reformation; and the reason why I think no reformation hath been had, is, because I never heard the cry against Monopolies greater and more vehement."

Mr. Johnson. "I would we were all so happy, that her gracious self had heard but the fifth part of that, that every one of us hath heard this day; I think verily, in my soul and conscience, we should not be more desirous in having those monopolies called in, than she would be earnest therein herself." After all this debate, the question was put for committing the bill or not, and it was carried in the affirmative. On which a committee was appointed, consisting of all the members of the privy-council, and the learned counsel of that house, sir W. Raleigh, sir Fr. Hastings, sir Edw. Stafford, sir Edw. Hobby, sir Geo. Moore, sir Rob. Wroth, and divers others.

In the afternoon of the following day, the Committee met; and our Journalist gives us the following particulars of what happened at their first conference.

Sir Edw. Hobby informed the house of the great abuse of the patentee for Salt in his country, "That betwixt Michaelmas and st. Andrew's tide, where salt (before the patent) was wont to be sold for 16d. a bushel, it is now sold for 14 or 15s. a bushel: but, after the lord president had understanding thereof, he committed the patentee, and caused it to be sold for 16d. as before. To Lyme, there is brought every year above 3000 wey of salt; and every wey of salt is, since the patent, enhanced to 20s.; and where the bushel was wont to be 8d. it is now 16d. And I dare boldly say it, if this patent were called in, there might well 3000l. a year be saved in the ports of Lyme, Boston, and Hull. I speak of white salt."

Mr. Francis Bacon. "The bill is very injurious and ridiculous; injurious, in that it taketh or rather sweepeth away her maj.'s prerogative; and ridiculous, in that there is a proviso, that this statute shall not extend to grants made to corporations; that is a gull to sweeten the bill withal, it is only to make fools fain. All men of the law know, that a bill which is only expository, to expound the common law, doth enact nothing; neither is any promise of good therein. And therefore the proviso in the statute of 34 Hen. VIII. of wills, (which is but a statute expository of the statute of 32 Hen. VIII. of wills) touching sir John Gainsford's will, was adjudged void. Therefore I think the bill very unfit, and our proceedings to be by petition."

Mr. Flemming, the Solicitor General, said, "I will briefly give account of all things touching these monopolies: her maj. in her provident care, gave charge unto mr. Attorney and myself, that speedy and special order may be taken for these patents; this was in the beginning of Hillary term last: but you all know the danger of that time, and what great affairs of importance happened to prevent these businesses: and since that time, nothing could be done for want of leisure."

Sir Rob. Wroth. "I would but note, mr. Solicitor, that you were charged to take order in Hillary term last; why not before? There was time enough ever since the last parl. I speak it, and I speak it boldly, these patentees are worse than ever they were: and I have heard a gentleman affirm in this house, that there is a clause of revocation in these patents; if so, what needed this stir of 'scire facias, quo warranto,' and I know not what, when it is but only, to send for the patentees, and cause a re-delivery? There have been divers patents granted since the last parl.; these are now in being, viz. the patents for currants, iron, powder, cards, ox-shin bones, train-oil, transportation of leather, lists of cloth, ashes, anniseeds, vinegar, sea-coals, steel, aquavita, brushes, pots, salt-petre, lead, accidents, oil, calamin-stone, oil of blubber, fumachoes, or dried piltchers in the smoak, and divers others."—Upon reciting of the patents aforesaid,

Mr. Hackwell stood up and asked thus; "Is not bread there?" "Bread," quoth one, "bread," quoth another; "this voice seems strange," quoth another; "this voice seems strange," quoth a third: "No," quoth mr. Hackwell, "but if order be not taken for these, bread will be there before the next parliament."

Mr. Heywood Townshend, seeing a disagreement of the committee, made a motion to this effect; "First, to put them in mind of a petition made the last parl. which, though it took no effect, yet we should much wrong her maj. and forget ourselves, if we should think to speed no better now in the like case; because then there was a commitment for this purpose, and the committees drew a speech, which was delivered by the Speaker, word for word, at the end of this parl.; but now we might help that, by sending our Speaker presently, after such a committee and speech made, with humble suit, not only, to repeal all monopolies grievous to the subject; but also, that it would please her maj. to give us leave to make an act, that they might be of no more force, validity, or effect, than they are at the common law, without the strength of her prerogative. Which though we might now do, and the act being so reasonable, we might assure ourselves, her maj. would not delay the passing thereof, yet we her loving subjects, would not offer, without her privy or consent, (the cause so nearly touching her prerogative,) or go about to do any such act. And also, that at the committee which should make this speech, every member of this house, which either found himself, his town, or country grieved, might put in (in fair writing) such exceptions against Monopolies, as he would justify to be true: and that the Speaker might deliver them with his own hands, because many obstacles and hindrances might happen."

Mr. Francis Bacon. "Why, you have the readiest course that possibly can be devised. I would wish no further order be taken, but to prefer the wise and discreet speech made by the young gentleman (even the youngest in this assembly) that spake last. I will tell you, that even, 'ex ore infantium et lactantium,' the true and most certain course is propounded unto us."—The committee agreed to this motion, and appointed to meet again on the 23d instant: on which day the subject of Monopolies was again re-assumed in the house, and

Mr. Spicer said, "I think it were good this bill were re-committed; I am no apostate, but I stick to the former faith and opinion that I was of, that, by way of petition, will be our safest course; for, it is to no purpose to offer to tie her hands by act of parl. when she may loosen herself at her pleasure. I think, it were a course, 'nec gratum, nec tutum.' And therefore, the best way is to have a committee to consider what course shall be proceeded in; for, I doubt not, but we be all agreed of the reformation, though not of the manner."

Mr. Davies said, "God hath given that power to absolute princes which he attributeth to himself, 'dixi quod dii estis.' And as attributes unto them, he hath given majesty, justice and mercy; majesty, in respect of the honour that the subject sheweth to his prince; justice, in respect he can do no wrong, therefore the law is 1 Hen. VII. 'That the king cannot commit a disseizin;' mercy, in respect he giveth leave to subjects, to right themselves by law: and therefore in 43 Assis. an Indictment was brought against bakers and brewers, for that, by colour of licence, they had broken the assize; wherefore according to that precedent, I think it most fit to proceed by bill, not by petition."

Mr. Secretary Cecil. "If there had not been some mistaking or some confusion in the committee, I would not now have spoken. The question was, of the most convenient way to reform these grievances of Monopoly: but after disputation, of the labour we have not received the expected fruit. If every man shall take leave to speak for the common subject, I am afraid in these vast powers of our mind, we shall dispute the project of reformation quite out of doors. This dispute draws two great things in question; 1st, the prince's power; 2dly, the freedom of Englishmen. I am born an Englishman, and am a fellow-member of this house; I would desire to live no day, in which I should detract from either. I am servant unto the queen; and before I would speak or give consent to a case, that should debase her prerogative or abridge it, I would wish my tongue cut out of my head. I am sure, there were law-makers before there were laws. One gentleman went about to possess us, with the execution of the law in an ancient record of 10th king Edw. III. likely enough to be true in that time, when the king was afraid of the subject. Though this precedent be a substance, yet it is not the whole of the parl. For in former times, all sate together as well king as subject; and then, it was no prejudice to his prerogative to have such a monopoly examined. If you stand upon law, and dispute of the prerogative, heark ye what Bracton saith, 'Prærogativam nostram nemo audeat disputare.' And for my own part, I like not these courses should be taken. And you Mr. Speaker, should perform the charge her maj. gave unto you in the beginning of this parl. not to receive bills of this nature; for her maj.'s ears be open to all grievances; and her hand stretched out to every man's petitions. For the matter of access I like it well; so it be first moved and the way prepared. I had rather all the patents were destroyed, than her maj. should lose the hearts of so many subjects as is pretended. I will tell you what I think of these Monopolies: I take them to be of three natures, some of a free nature and good, some void of themselves, some both good and void. For the 1st, when the prince dispenses with a penal law that is left to the alteration of sovereignty, I think it powerful and irrevocable. For the 2d, as to grant that which taketh from the subject his birthright, such men as desire these kind of patents, I account them misdoers and wilful and wicked offenders. Of the third sort is, the licence for the matter of cards, &c. And therefore I think, it were fit to have a new commitment, to consider what her maj. may grant, what not; what course we shall take, and upon what points."

Mr. Montague. "I am loth to speak what I know, lest perhaps I should displease. The prerogative royal is that which is now in question, and which the laws of the land have ever allowed and maintained. Then my motion shall be but this, that we may be suitors unto her maj. that the patentees shall have no other remedies than by the laws of the realm they may have, and that our act may be accordingly."

Mr. Martin. "I think the common grievance and the queen's prerogative have inspired this gentleman that spake last (whom for reverence sake, I must needs name, Mr. Montague,) to make that motion which he hath done."—Then a committee was appointed to meet the same day in the afternoon, when Mr. Sec. Cecil shewed the committee a large catalogue consisting of near 40 different patents, mostly granted since the 16th year of the queen's reign. Whereupon after Mr. Davis had moved to have these Monopolies proceeded against by bill, and Mr. Martin had moved to have them dealt in by petition to her maj. and that the house had heard the particular relation of the said Monopolies, there was nothing concluded upon."—But in the morning of next day, Nov. 24, upon loud confusion in the house about these Monopolies,

Mr. Sec. Cecil stood up, and said, "The duty I owe, and my zeal to extinguish Monopolies, makes me to speak now, and to satisfy their opinions that think there shall be no redress of these Monopolies. Order is attended with these two handmaids, Gravity and Zeal; but zeal with discretion. I have been (though unworthy) a member of this house in 6 or 7 parliaments, yet never did I see the house in so great confusion. I believe there never was in any parl. a more tender point handled than the Liberty of the Subject. But that when any is discussing this point, he should be cried and caught down; this is more fit for a grammar-school than a court of parl. I have been a counsellor of state these 12 years, yet did I never know it subject to construction of levity and disorder. Much more ought we to be regardful in so great and grave an assembly. Why, we have had speeches upon speeches, without either order or discretion. One would have had us proceed by bill, and see if the queen would have denied it: another, that the patents should be brought here before us and cancelled; and this was bravely done. Others would have us to proceed by way of petition, which course, doubtless, is best; but for the 1st, and especially for the 2d, it is so ridiculous, that I think we should have as bad success as the devil himself would have wished in so good a cause. Why, if idle courses had been followed, we should have gone, forsooth, to the queen with a petition to have repealed a patent of Monopoly of tobacco-pipes, and I know not how many conceits; but I wish every man to rest satisfied until the committees have brought in their resolutions according to your commandments."

The Speaker acquaints the House, by the Queen's Order, that the Monopolies shall be revoked.] Nov. 25, after some bills had been read in the house, and silence commanded, the Speaker arose out of his chair, and every man wondering why he stood up, he said; "It pleased her maj. to command me to attend upon her yesterday in the afternoon, from whom I am to deliver unto you all, her maj.'s most gracious message sent by my unworthy self. She yields you all hearty thanks for your care and special regard of those things that concern her state, kingdom, and consequently ourselves, whose good she had always tendered as her own; for our speedy resolution in making of so hasty and free a subsidy; which commonly succeeded but never went before our councils; and for our loyalty: I do assure you with such and so great zeal and affection she uttered and shewed the same, that to express it, our tongues are not able, neither our hearts to conceive it. It pleased her maj. to say unto me, 'That if she had an hundred tongues she could not express our hearty good-wills.' And further she said, 'That as she had ever held our good most dear, so the last day of our (or her) life should witness it; and that the least of her subjects was not grieved, and she not touched.' She appealed to the throne of Almighty God, how careful she hath been, and will be, to defend her people from all oppressions. She said, 'That partly by intimation of her council, and partly by divers petitions that have been delivered unto her both going to the chapel and also to walk abroad, she understood that divers patents, which she had granted, were grievous to her subjects; and that the substitutes of the patentees had used great oppressions.' But she said, 'she never assented to grant any thing which was 'malum in se.' And if in the abuse of her grant there be any thing evil (which she took knowledge there was) she herself would take present order of reformation.' I cannot express unto you the apparent indignation of her maj. towards these abuses. She said that her kingly prerogative (for so she termed it) was tender; and therefore desireth us not to fear or doubt of her careful reformation; for she said, that her commandment was given a little before the late troubles, (meaning the earl of Essex's matters,) but had an unfortunate event: but that in the midst of her most great and weighty occasions, she thought upon them. And that this should not suffice, but that further order should be taken presently, and not 'in futuro,' (for that also was another word, which I take it, her maj. used;) and that some should be presently repealed, some suspended, and none put in execution, but such as should first have a trial according to the law for the good of the people. Against the abuses her wrath was so incensed, that she said, that she neither could nor would suffer such to escape with impunity. So to my unspeakable comfort, she hath made me the messenger of this her gracious thankfulness and care. Now we see that the axe of her princely justice is laid to the root of the tree; and so we see her goodness hath prevented our counsels and consultations. God make us thankful, and send her long to reign amongst us. If through weakness of memory, want of utterance, or frailty of myself, I have omitted any thing of her maj.'s commands, I do most humbly crave pardon for the same; and do beseech the hon. persons which assist this chair, and were present before her maj. at the delivery hereof, to supply and help my imperfections; which joined with my fear, have caused me (no doubt) to forget something which I should have delivered unto you."—After a little pause and low talking one with another,

Mr. Secretary Cecil stood up and said, "There needs no supply of the memory of the Speaker: but, because it pleased him to desire some that be about him to aid his delivery, and because the rest of my fellows be silent, I will take upon me to deliver something which I both then heard, and since know. I was present with the rest of my fellow-counsellors, and the message was the same that hath been told you; and the cause hath not succeeded from any particular course thought upon, but from private informations of some particular persons. I have been very inquisitive of them, and of the cause why more importunity was now used than afore; which I am afraid comes by being acquainted with some course of proceeding in this house. There are no patents now of force, which shall not presently be revoked; for what patent soever is granted, there shall be left to the overthrow of that patent, a liberty agreeable to the law. There is no patent if it be 'malum in se,' but the queen was ill apprized in her grant. But all to the generality be unacceptable. I take it, there is no patent whereof the execution hath not been injurious. Would that they had never been granted. I hope there shall never be more." [All the House said Amen.] "In particular, most of these patents have been supported by letters of assistance from her maj.'s privy council; but whosoever looks upon them shall find, that they carry no other stile, than with relation to the patent. I dare assure you from henceforth there shall be no more granted.

They shall all be revoked. But to whom do they repair with these letters? to some out-house, to some desolate widow, to some simple cottage, or poor ignorant people, who rather than they would be troubled and undo themselves by coming up hither, will give any thing in reason for these caterpillar's satisfaction. The notice of this is now public, and you will perhaps judge this to be a tale to serve the time. But I would have all men to know thus much, that it is no jesting with a court of parl.; neither dares any man (for my own part, I dare not) so mock and abuse all the states of this kingdom, in a matter of this consequence and importance. I say therefore, there shall be a proclamation general throughout the realm, to notify her maj.'s resolution in this behalf. And because you may eat your meat more savoury than you have done, every man shall have salt as good and cheap as he can buy it or make it, freely without danger of that patent, which shall be presently revoked. The same benefit shall they have which have cold stomachs, both for aquavitæ and aqua composita and the like. And they that have weak stomachs, for their satisfaction, shall have vinegar and alegar, and the like, set at liberty. Train-oil shall go the same way; oil of blubber shall march in equal rank; brushes and bottles endure the like judgment. The patent for pouldavy, if it be not called in, it shall be. Oade, which, as I take it, is not restrained either by law or statute, but only by proclamation (I mean from the former sowing) though for the saving thereof it might receive good disputation; yet for your satisfaction, the queen's pleasure is to revoke that proclamation; only she prayeth thus much, that when she cometh on progress to see you in your countries, she be not driven out of your towns by suffering it to infect the air too near them. Those that desire to go sprucely in their ruffs, may at less charge than accustomed, obtain their wish; for the patent for starch, which hath so much been prosecuted, shall now be repealed. There are other patents which be considerable, as the patent of New Drapery, which shall be suspended and left to the law: Irish yarn, a matter that I am sorry there is cause of complaint; for the salvageness of the people and the war have frustrated the hope of the patentee; a gentleman of good service and desert, a good subject to her maj. and a good member of the commonwealth, mr. Carmarthen: notwithstanding, it shall be suspended and left to the law. The patent for calf-skins and fells, which was made with a relation, shall endure the censure of the law. But I must tell you, there is no reason that all should be revoked, for the queen means not to be swept out of her prerogative. I say, it shall be suspended, if the law do not warrant it. There is another servant of her maj.'s, mr. Onslow, one of her pensioners, an honest gent. and a faithful servant, he hath the patent for steel, which one mr. Beale once had; this too because of complaints shall be suspended.

There is another that hath the patent for Leather, sir Edw. Dyer, a gent. of good desert, honest, religious, and wise; this was granted unto him 30 years ago. It crept not in by the new misgovernment of the time; yet this shall also be suspended. The patent for Cards shall be suspended and triable by the common law. The patent for Glasses, which though I do least apprehend to be prejudicial to the public good, yet it is left to the law. There is another patent for Saltpetre, that hath been both accused and slandered; it digs into every man's house, it annoys the inhabitant, and generally troubleth the subject; for this I beseech you be contented. Yet I know, I am to blame to desire it, it being condemned by you 'in foro conscientiæ'; but I assure you it shall be fully sifted and tried 'in foro judicii.' Her maj. means to take this patent unto herself, and advise with her counsel touching the same. For I must tell you the kingdom is not so well furnished with powder as now it should be. But if it be thought fit upon advice to be cancelled, her majesty commanded me to tell you, that though she be willing to help the grave gent. that hath that patent, yet out of that abundant desire that she hath to give you compleat satisfaction, it shall be repealed. This hath come to the ear of the queen, and I have been most earnest to search for the instrument, and as a counsellor of state, have done my best endeavour to salve the sore? but I fear we are not secret within ourselves. Then I must needs give you this for a future caution, That whatsoever is subject to public expectation cannot be good, while the parliament matters are ordinary talk in the street. I have heard myself, being in my coach, these words spoken aloud, 'God prosper those that further the overthrow of these Monopolies; God send the Prerogative touch not our Liberty!' I will not wrong any so much as to imagine he was of this assembly; yet let me give you this note, That the time was never more apt to disorder and make ill interpretation of good meaning; I think those persons would be glad that all sovereignty were converted into popularity; we being here, are but the popular mouth, and our liberty, the liberty of the subject: and the world is apt to slander, most especially, the ministers of govt.—Thus much have I spoken to accomplish my duty unto her maj. but not to make any further performance of the well uttered and gravely and truly delivered speech of the Speaker. But I must crave your favours a little longer to make an apology for myself. I have held the favour of this house as dear as my life, and I have been told that I deserved to be taxed yesterday of the house. I protest my zeal to have the business go forward in a right and hopeful course; and my fear to displease her maj. by a harsh and rash proceeding, made me so much to lay aside my discretion, that I said it might rather be termed a school than a council, or to that effect. But by this speech if any think I called him school-boy, he both wrongs me and mistakes me.

Shall I tell you what Demosthenes said to the clamours which the Athenians made, that they were 'pueriles & dignos pueris.' And yet that was to a popular state. And I wish that whatsoever is here spoken may be buried within these walls. Let us take example of the Jewish synagogue, who would always 'sepelire senatum cum honore,' and not blast their own follies and imperfections. If any man in this house speak wisely, we do him great wrong to interrupt him; if foolishly, let us hear him out, we shall have the more cause to tax him. And I do heartily pray, that no member of this house may 'plus verbis offendere quam consilio juvare.'

Address of Thanks, &c. to the Queen upon that Occasion.] Mr. Francis Moore rose and said, "I must confess mr. Speaker, I moved the house both the last parl. and this touching this point; but I never meant (and I hope this house thinketh so) to set limits and bounds to the prerogative royal. But now seeing it hath pleased her maj. of herself, out of the abundance of her princely goodness, to set at liberty her subjects from the thralldom of those Monopolies, from which there was no town, city, or country, free; I would be bold, in one motion, to offer two considerations to this house. The 1st, that mr. Speaker might go unto her maj. to yield her our most humble and hearty thanks, and withal to shew the joy of her subjects for their delivery, and their thankfulness unto her for the same: the other, that where divers speeches have been made extravagantly in this house, which doubtless have been told her maj. and perhaps all ill-conceived of by her; I would therefore that mr. Speaker not only should satisfy her maj. by way of apology therein, but also humbly crave pardon for the same."

Mr. Wingfield said, "My heart is not able to conceive the joy which I feel, and I assure you my tongue cannot utter the same. If a sentence of everlasting happiness had been pronounced unto me, it could not have made me shew more outward joy than now I do, which I cannot refrain to express; there could nothing have been more acceptable to the subject than this message. And I verily think, if ever any of her maj.'s works be meritorious before God, this is: I do agree with all my heart in the first part of the gent.'s motion that last spake; but do utterly dislike the latter: for it is not to be intended, we should have had so good and gracious a message, if the truth of some particular speeches had been delivered unto her. And now for us to accuse ourselves, by excusing a fault with which we are not charged, were a thing in my opinion inconvenient, and unfitting the wisdom of this house."—Upon which it was put to the question and concluded, That thanks should be returned by the Speaker, and 12 members were named to go with him, and intreaty made to the privy council to obtain liberty to be admitted.

Nov. 26. Mr. Downald moved the house, "First that this gracious Message, which had been sent from her maj. might be written in the books of Records of this house, (being worthy to be written in gold) as well as it is written and fixed in the true heart of every good subject; 2ndly, That the hon. assembly of this house would move her maj. and be earnest means of speed, lest that which is now meant indeed, may, by protraction of time be altered, or perhaps not so happily effected."

Mr. Sec. Cecil said, "I promised to be as silent as I could. Among much speech of the wise, there wants not much folly, much more in me. I do not speak because I do dislike the motion of the gent. that last spake, but to defend the diligence and grace of the queen. It is no matter of toy for a prince to notify in public a matter of this weight. Though the idol of a monopoly be a great monster, yet after two or three days I doubt not but you shall see him dismembered: and I protest there is not any soul that lives deserves thanks in this cause but our sovereign. Yesterday the queen gave order for a draught of a proclamation. I had it in my hand. You all know, I went even now out of the house; then I read it and sent for him that should deliver it to her hands. Now what needs this new zeal?"

Mr. Davis said, "Mr. Speaker, that which was delivered unto you from her sacred self, I think to be gospel, that is, glad tidings: and as the gospel is registered and written, so would I have that also; for if ever glad tidings came to the heart of the subject, they now come."

Sir George Moore said, "This eating and fretting disease of Monopolies I have ever detested with my heart; and the greater the grievance is, the more inestimable is the grave wisdom of her maj. in repealing them. And therefore for us to think we can sufficiently requite the same, it were to hold a candle before the sun to dim the light. And seeing she, in her clemency and care to us, hath taken the matter into her own hands, I wish the matter may be no more spoke of, much less proceeded in."

Sir Francis Hastings said, "It ought to be written in the tables of our hearts, &c."

Mr. Lawrence Hide. "I think the gent. that set this motion on foot, spake out of joy for her maj.'s grace and zeal to have performance of her promise. In that he wished it might be recorded in paper here or parchment, it is not to be intended but he meant also in our hearts, which remain no longer than we live: but records remain long, and will give a lively memory in ages to come. And therefore for that part of his motion I think it very good, and wish the clerk may do it accordingly."

Mr. Comptroller. "I think he that first moved this question, exceedingly forgot himself, and exceedingly detracted from her maj.; who, I know, out of her abundant love and grace to this house, hath taken such speedy course, as hath been delivered by my fellow-counsellor. With that affection she embraceth this house that in more familiar than princely sort, it hath pleased her to say, recommend me to the house with thanks for their promise and care for their common good."

Mr. Speaker said, "My heart is not able to conceive, nor my tongue to utter the joy I conceived of her maj.'s gracious and especial care for our good. Wherefore as God himself said, 'Gloriam meam alteri non dabo,' so may her maj. say, in that she herself will be the only and speedy agent for performance of our most humble and most wished desires. Wherefore let us not doubt but, as she hath been, so she still will be, our most gracious sovereign and natural nursing-mother unto us. Whose days the Almighty God prolong to all our comforts." All said Amen.

Nov. 27. Mr. Secretary declared, "That according to the direction of this house, her maj. hath been informed of the exceeding and inestimable joy and comfort, which this house hath received by a message, lately published, sent from her highness by Mr. Speaker: and hath been likewise moved to signify her highness's pleasure touching the determination of this house, in appointing Mr. Speaker, with some selected company of the same, to render the most humble and dutiful thanks of this whole house for the said message; and her gracious Answer was, 'That her maj. being acquainted with the said desires of this house, did vouchsafe that Mr. Speaker with 40, 50, or 100 of this house, such as should thereunto be appointed, should have access unto her maj. for the same purpose, upon Monday next, and should be all welcome.'—Whereupon were appointed the knights for all the shires, lord Howard, lord Clinton, all knights, members of this house, and several others.—Mr. Comptroller added, that the queen had commanded him to tell the house, "That the reason of her limitation of having a convenient number was, that the place whereunto we should come, was not big enough to receive us all."

The Speaker's Speech.] Nov. 30th, in the afternoon, the Speaker with about 140 of the commons met at the great chamber before the council room; when all being admitted into the said room, the queen sitting under a canopy at the upper end of it; the Speaker, after three low reverences made, spake as follows:

"Most sacred and more than most gracious Sovereign, We your faithful, loyal and obedient subjects and commons here present, vouchsafed of your especial goodness (to our unspeakable comfort) access to your sacred presence, do in all duty and humbleness, come to present that which no words can express, most humble and thankful acknowledgment of your most gracious message, and most bounden and humble thanks for your maj.'s most abundant goodness extended and performed to us. We cannot say, most gracious sovereign, we have called and been heard, we have complained and have been helped; though in all duty and thankfulness we acknowledge, your sacred ears are ever open, and ever bowed down to hear us, and your blessed hands ever stretched out to relieve us; we acknowledge (sacred sovereign) in all duty and thankfulness we acknowledge, that before we call, your preventing grace and all-deserving goodness doth watch over us for our good; more ready to give than we can desire, much less deserve. That attribute which is most proper unto God, to perform all he promiseth, appertaineth also unto you our most gracious sovereign queen of all truth, of all constancy, of all goodness, never wearied in doing good unto us; (the deeds themselves do speak) most careful to provide all good things for us; most gracious, most tender to remove all grievances from us, which all your princely actions have ever shewed, and even now your most gracious published proclamation, of your own only meer motion and special grace for the good of all your people, doth witness to us. We come not, sacred sovereign, one of ten to render thanks, and the rest to go away unthankful; but all of us in all duty and thankfulness, do throw down ourselves at the feet of your maj. do praise God and bless your maj. Neither do we present our thanks in words of any outward thing, which can be no sufficient retribution for so great goodness; but, in all duty and thankfulness, prostrate at your feet, we present our most loyal and thankful hearts, even the last drop of blood in our hearts, and the last spirit of breath in our nostrils, to be poured out, to be breathed up for your safety."—Then after three low reverences made, he with the rest kneeled down, and her maj. began thus to answer herself, viz.

The Queen's Answer.] "Mr. Speaker, we have heard your declaration, and perceive your care of our state, by falling into the consideration of a grateful acknowledgment of such benefits as you have received; and that your coming is to present thanks unto us, which I accept with no less joy than your loves can have desire to offer such a present. I do assure you, that there is no prince that loveth his subjects better, or whose love can counter-vail our love; there is no jewel, be it of never so rich a price, which I prefer before this jewel, I mean your love; for I do more esteem it than any treasure or riches; for that we know how to prize, but love and thanks I count inestimable. And though God hath raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my crown, that I have reigned with your loves. This makes me that I do not so much rejoice, that God hath made me to be a queen, as to be a queen over so thankful a people. Therefore I have cause to wish nothing more than to content the subject, and that is a duty which I owe. Neither do I desire to live longer days, than that I may see your prosperity, and that is my only desire. And as I am that person that still, yet under God, hath delivered you; so I trust, by the Almighty power of God, that I still shall be his instrument to preserve you from envy, peril, dishonour, shame, tyranny and oppression, partly by means of your intended helps, which we take very acceptably, because it manifesteth the largeness of your loves, and loyalties unto your sovereign. Of myself I must say this, I never was any greedy, scraping grasper, nor a strait fast-holding prince, nor yet a waster; my heart was never set on worldly goods, but only for my subjects good. What you do bestow on me, I will not hoard it up, but receive it to bestow on you again. Yea, mine own properties I count yours, to be expended for your good. Therefore render unto them from me, I beseech you, mr. Speaker, such thanks as you imagine my heart yieldeth, but my tongue cannot express." All this while they kneeled. Whereupon her maj. said, "Mr. Speaker, I would wish you and the rest to stand up, for I shall yet trouble you with longer speech." So they all stood up, and she went on in her speech. "Mr. Speaker, you give me thanks, but I doubt me, I have more cause to thank you all, than you me; and I charge you to thank them of the house of commons from me: for had I not received a knowledge from you, I might have fallen into the lap of an error, only for lack of true information. Since I was queen, yet never did I put my pen to any grant, but that upon pretext and semblance made unto me, that it was both good and beneficial to the subjects in general, though a private profit to some of my ancient servants who had deserved well: but the contrary being found by experience, I am exceeding beholding to such subjects as would move the same at first. And I am not so simple to suppose, but that there be some of the lower house whom these grievances never touched; and for them I think they speak out of zeal to their countries, and not out of spleen or malevolent affection, as being parties grieved; and I take it exceeding grateful from them, because it gives us to know that no respects or interests had moved them, other than the minds they bear to suffer no diminution of our honour, and our subjects love unto us. The zeal of which affection, tending to ease my people and knit their hearts unto me. I embrace with a princely care; far above all earthly treasure I esteem my people's love, more than which I desire not to merit. That my grants should be grievous to my people, and oppressions to be privileged under colour of our patents, our kingly dignity shall not suffer it; yea, when I heard it, I could give no rest to my thoughts until I had reformed it. Shall they think to escape unpunished, that have thus oppressed you, and have been respectless of their duty, and regardless of our honour? No. Mr. Speaker, I assure you, it is more for conscience-sake, than for any glory or increase of love, that I desire these errors, troubles, vexations and oppressions done by these varlets and lewd persons, not worthy the name of subjects, should not escape without condign punishment. But I perceive they dealt with me like physicians, who ministering a drug make it more acceptable by giving it a good aromatical savour, or when they give pills do gild them all over. I have ever used to set the last judgment day before mine eyes, and so to rule as I shall be judged to answer before a higher judge. To whose judgment seat I do appeal, that never thought was cherished in my heart that tended not to my people's good. And now if my kingly bounty hath been abused, and my grants turned to the hurt of my people, contrary to my will and meaning; or if any in authority under me, have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their culps and offences to my charge; and though there were danger in repealing our grants, yet what danger would not I rather incur for your good, than I would suffer them still to continue? I know the title of a king is a glorious title; but assure yourself, that the shining glory of princely authority hath not so dazled the eyes of our understanding, but that we well know and remember, that we also are to yield an account of our actions before the great judge. To be a king and wear a crown is more glorious to them that see it, than it is pleasure to them that bear it. For myself, I was never so much enticed with the glorious name of a king, or royal authority of a queen, as delighted that God hath made me his instrument to maintain his truth and glory, and to defend this kingdom (as I said) from peril, dishonour, tyranny and oppression. There will never queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country, or care to my subjects, and that will sooner, with willingness, yield and venture her life for your good and safety than myself. And though you have had, and may have, many princes more mighty and wise, sitting in this seat, yet you never had, or shall have, any that will be more careful and loving. Should I ascribe any thing to myself and my sexly weakness, I were not worthy to live then, and of all most unworthy of the mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me a heart which never yet feared foreign or home enemies. I speak it to give God the praise as a testimony before you, and not to attribute any thing unto myself; for I, O Lord, what am I, whom practices and perils past should not fear! O what can I do (these she spake with a great emphasis) that I should speak for any glory! God forbid. This, mr. Speaker, I pray you, deliver unto the house, to whom heartily recommend me. And so I commit you all to your best fortunes, and further councils. And I pray you, mr. Comptroller, mr. Secretary, and you of my council, that before these gentlemen depart into their countries, you bring them all to kiss my hand."

Great Increase of Subsidies.] Dec. 5, the Bill for granting four entire Subsidies and eight 15ths and 10ths was read a 3d time; passed upon the question, without any opposition; and concluded in the Lords on the 15th. Upon these Subsidies, which were monstrous things in those days; we cannot avoid giving a note, which sir Symonds D'Ewes makes on this occasion. "Nota, That whereas in the parl.

which was begun and holden at Westminster, 35 Eliz. 1592, the knights, citizens and burghesses of the House of Commons were not drawn without much and long dispute, both amongst themselves and with the Lords, to yield unto the Grant of 3 Subsidies and six 15ths and 10ths (being a greater gift than had ever before been given unto her maj.) and that the same was then also assented unto in respect of the great dangers newly threatened unto her maj. from Rome and Spain; with caution and promise, nevertheless, that it should not be drawn into precedent for future times; yet in the next parl. which ensued in 39 Eliz. 1597, although none of the said imminent dangers, which had been feared in the abovementioned 35th year of her maj.'s reign; had to that time come into any real execution, the House of Commons was, notwithstanding, again drawn to yield unto the same proportion of 3 Subsidies and six 15ths and 10ths, to be paid also unto her maj. within a shorter time: and now, lastly, in this present parl, 43 and 44 Eliz. 1601, the said House was drawn, in respect chiefly of the troubles of Ireland, where the Spaniard had set footing, to present unto her highness the extraordinary and great gift of 4 Subsidies and eight 15ths and 10ths."

Debate on a Bill against profane Cursing and Swearing.] A bill against usual and profane Cursing and Swearing, having been twice read in this house, and ordered to be engrossed, Mr. Glascock stood up and said, "Man is made of two parts, a soul and a body; and there are two governments, the one imperial, the other sacerdotal; the 1st belonging to the Commonwealth, the 2d to the Church. Swearing is a thing moral, and toucheth the soul, and therefore fitter to be spoken of in a pulpit than in parl. If the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob hath sworn, his plague shall not depart from the house of the Swearers, why should we not seek to repress this vice, which brings a plague, which breeds mortality, that breeds destruction, desolation, and the utter ruin of the common-wealth? If he forbids us to swear, and we fear not his commandments, think you a pain of 10s. as here set down, will make us refrain this iniquity? It is as hard for this penalty to restrain this sin, as for religion to spring out of the common law and to take effect. Moses, when he saw God, could but see his back parts only, and no man ever saw more. Why, these Swearers swear by all his parts, so perfectly, as though they had seen him all over. Philip, king of France, made a law that the Swearer should be drowned; another law was made, that a certain sum should be presently paid as soon as he had sworn, or else the Swearer to lose his head. We use so much lenity in our laws, that we had as good make no law, for we give a penalty, and to be taken upon conviction before a justice of peace; here is wise stuff. First mark what a justice of peace is, and we shall easily find a gap in our law. A justice of peace is a living creature, that for half a dozen of chickens, will dispense with a whole dozen of penal statutes. We search and ingross; they retail. These be the basket-justices, of whom the tale may be verified of a justice, that I know, to whom one of his poor neighbours coming, said, 'Sir, I am very highly rated in the Subsidy-book, I beseech you to help me.' To whom he answered, 'I know thee not.' 'Not me sir,' quoth the country-man? 'Why your worship had my teem, and my oxen such a day, and I have ever been at your worship's service;' 'have you so,' quoth the justice, 'I never remembered I had any such matter, no not a sheep's-tail.' So unless you offer sacrifice to the idol-justices, of sheep and oxen, they know you not. If a warrant come from the lords of the council to levy 100 men, he will levy 200; and what with chopping in and crossing out, he will gain 100l. by the bargain. Nay, if he be to send out a warrant, upon a man's request, to have any fetched in upon suspicion of felony, or the like; he will write the warrant himself, and you must put 2s. in his pocket as his clerk's fee, (when God knows he keeps but 2 or 3 hinds) for his better maintenance. Why we have had here 5 bills; of Swearing, going to Church, Good-Ale, Drunkenness and . . . this is as good to them as if you had given them a Subsidy and two 15ths. Only in that point I mislike the bill, for the rest I could wish it good passage."

Sir Francis Hastings said, "That such justices were well worthy to be locked up in an ambery. But he wished that all might not be censured for one evil, who though he neglected both the care of conscience and country which he should love, yet, doubtless, many did not so; as being touched in conscience to remember that our long peace should make us careful to please him in doing of justice, that had preserved us, and was the author of our peace, God himself." And thereupon the bill was ingrossed.

Debate on a Bill for resorting to Church.] A bill for the more diligent Resort to Church upon Sundays, was read a 2nd time, when

Mr. Roger Owen spoke to this effect: "That he misliked the bill for two respects; the one for the penalty, the other in respect of the party punishing, that is, the justice. For the first, the penalty is 12d. It is well known that the poorest recusant in England ought, as well as the rich, to pay his 20l. and for want of lands and goods, his body is liable; and therefore we shall doubly punish him, which is against law. For the other, touching the justice, I think it too great a trouble, and they are ever loaden with a number of penal statutes, yea, a whole alphabet, as appears by Hussey in the time of Henry VII. And this is a matter so obvious, that a justice of peace's house will be like a quarter-sessions, with the multitude of these complaints. I think also it is an infringement of Magna Charta, for that gives trial 'per pares,' but this by two witnesses before a justice of the peace. And by this statute, if a justice of the peace come into the quarter-sessions, and say it is a good oath, this is as good as an indictment: therefore for my part, away with the bill."

Sir Francis Hastings. "I never, in my life, heard justices of the peace taxed before in this sort: for ought I know, justices of peace be men of quality, honesty, experience and justice. I would ask the gent. that last spake, but two questions; the 1st, If he would have any penalty at all inflicted? The 2nd, If in the first statute, or in this, an easier way for the levying of this 12d. can be? If he deny the first, I know his scope; if the 2nd, no man but himself will deny it. And to speak so in both, is neither gravely, religiously nor rightly spoken. And therefore for God, the queen, and our country's sake, I beseech a commitment."

Sir Carew Reynolds. "The sabbath is ordained for four causes; 1st, to meditate on the omnipotency of God; 2ndly, to assemble us together to give thanks; 3rdly, that we might be the better enabled to follow our own affairs; 4thly, that we might hallow that day and sanctify the same. King James IV. of Scotland, in the year 1512, and king James VI. in the year 1579, did erect and ratify a law, that whosoever kept either fair or market upon the sabbath, his moveables should presently be given to the poor. Men gathering of sticks were stoned to death, because that was thought to be a kind of prophanation of the sabbath. I doubt not but great reformation will come if this bill pass: to the better effecting whereof, I humbly pray, that if there be imperfections in it, it may be committed."

Sir George Moore. "For the gent. that last spake, and so much inveighed against justices, it may be it proceeds out of the corruption of his heart; howsoever, I mean not to search it, or answer him; only I turn him to Solomon, and mean to answer him with silence. Without going to Church, and doing christian duties, we cannot be religious, and by religion we learn both our duty to God and to the queen. In doing our duty to God, we shall be better enabled to do our duty to our prince. And the Word biddeth us, that we should give to God that which is due to God 'et Cæsari quæ sunt Cæsaris.' Amongst many laws which we have, we have none for constraint of God's service: I say, none, though one was made in primo of this queen, because that law is no law which takes no force; for 'executio legis vita legis.' Then let us not give such cause of comfort to our adversaries, that having drawn a bill in question for the service of our God, we should stand so much in questioning the same. Once a month coming to church excuseth us from danger of the law, but not from the commandment of God, who saith, 'Thou shalt sanctify the Sabbath day, that is, every Sabbath. This bill ties the subject to so much and no more, which being agreeable with the law of God, and the rule of policy, I see no reason why we should stand so strictly in giving it a commitment."

Mr. Bond. "I wish the Sabbath sanctified according to the precise rules of God's commandment, but I wish that st. Augustin's rule may be observed in the manner, 'non jubendo, sed docendo, magis monendo quam minando.' I like not that power should be given to the justices of peace; for who almost are not grieved at the luxuriant authority of justices of peace? By the statute of 1 Edw. III. they must be good men, and lawful, no maintainers of evil, but moderate in execution of laws; for magistrates be men, and men have always attending on them two ministers, 'libidia et iracundia;' men of this nature do subjugate the free-born subject. Clerks can do much, children more, and wives most. It is dangerous therefore to give authority in so dangerous a thing as this is, which I hold worth your second thoughts, 'quæ solent esse prudentiores.' Her maj. during all the time of her reign, hath been clement, gracious, meek, and merciful, yea, chusing rather 'delinquere,' I know not how to term it, in lenity and not in cruelty. But, by this statute, there is a constraint to come to Divine Service, and for neglect all must pay. 'Plectentur achiivi:' the poor commonalty, whose strength and quietness is the strength and quietness of us all, he only shall be punished, he vexed. For will any think that a justice of peace will contest with as good a man as himself? No, this age is too wise. I leave it to this house, whether it stand with policy, when four Subsidies and eight 15ths be now granted, to bring the poorer sort into greater fear by these and such like laws, 'Malus custos diuturnitatis metus.' And in the gracious speech, which her maj. lately delivered unto us, she used this, that she desired to be beloved of her subjects. It was a wise speech of a wise prince, for an historian saith, 'Timor excitat in vindictam.' Therefore, mr. Speaker, I mislike the bill in that point touching justices, and also touching taxation. I will only say thus much with Panutius in the Nicene council, 'Absit quod tam grave jugum fratribus nostris imponamus.'"

Mr. Comptroller, said, "I am sorry, after 43 years under her maj.'s happy government, that we shall now dispute to commit a bill of this nature. And I would that any voice durst be so bold or desperate as to cry, 'Away with this bill.' The old statute gives the penalty; this new, only speedier means to levy it. I much marvel that men will, or dare, accuse justices of peace, ministers to her maj. without whom the commonwealth cannot be. If this boldness go on, they will accuse judges, and lastly, the seat of justice itself. That all justices should be thus generally accused, this is meer barbarism indeed. When her maj. shall have understanding hereof, it will be no content unto her, and a scandal unto us all."

Mr. Glascock. "In that I am taxed to tax justices of peace, I am to pray the house to give me leave to make an apology for myself."

Mr. Speaker, I will not deny that I spake, and protest it in my conscience, I spake only of the inferior sort of justices, commonly called basket-justices; against these I will not speak what I spake last, but other matter in other terms. They be like the wise men of Chaldee, that could never give judgment till they saw the entrails of beasts. Our statutes penal, be like the beast born in the morning, at his full growth at noon, and dead at night: So these statutes quick in execution, are like a wonder for nine days; so long after, they be at height; but by the end of the year, they are carried dead in a basket to the justice's house."

Mr. Speaker. "Mr. Glascock, you speak from the matter and purpose, and this that you have spoken you must justify."

Mr. Martin. "I am rather willing to speak, in that I would willingly have an end of this matter. I think we all agree upon the substance, that it is fit the sabbath should be sanctified. The other matter, which is the impediment, I know it is a grief, but I leave it as matter more fit to be decided at a committee than here. And therefore, for the honour of the queen and of her govt. I wish it may be committed without further argument."

Sir Robert Wroth. "I think the office of justice of peace is too good a calling for him that exclaims against it, and I think he will never have the honour to have it. It were good they were named, and that he told who they were; otherwise honest men will be loth to serve the queen, when they shall be slandered without proof. Therefore I would he might answer it at the bar."

Mr. Johnson. "This bill is an excellent bill; and I have observed that all the speeches yet spoken, have been interlarded with other matter. The gent. now protesteth he spake of basket-justices; I appeal to the whole house, whether his definition were not general, viz. 'A justice of peace is a kind of living creature, that for half a dozen of chickens will dispense with a dozen of penal statutes.' I think it is well known that the hon. that sit about the Chair, and all the rest of her maj.'s privy council, have and do hold the same place, and this toucheth them as much inferior justices. And therefore I humbly pray he may answer it at the bar, and that it may not be passed over with silence."—But all said, No, No.

Mr. Hide. "Every man agrees this bill hath good matter, and we all agree and consent to the substance, though dissent to the form; some have more wit, and some have more understanding than others. If they of meaner capacity and judgment spake impertinently, let us not in a spleen straight cry, 'Away with the bill,' but let us give it the same favour we give to bills of far inferior nature, that is a commitment."—Accordingly the bill was committed.

Complaint against Pirates from Dunkirk, &c. Dec. 3rd, Mr. Dannet, member for Yarmouth, got up and said:—"May it please you, mr. Speaker, the duty I owe to my sovereign and country makes me bold to crave your patience to hear me. The matter that I speak of is twofold, the 1st concerneth the honour of the queen; the 2nd the safety of our country; two very high points for me to handle, and require a more eloquent discourse than I am able to make. I will use no circumstance, or with superfluous matter abuse the time which is very precious, but to the matter. I have been of the parl. 5 or 6 times, and I have always observed by this house (and I would willingly be resolved by the honourable about the Chair) that all the wars of her maj. are wars offensive, and I do not hear the contrary: how then comes it that such a number of her maj.'s subjects be spoiled, robbed, beaten, wounded, themselves taken, used with such extreme torture, racked, carried away, imprisoned, ransomed, fined, and some executed; and all this time no wars? But, give me leave, for these ten years, I am sure, the subjects of this land, on the sea-coast, have undergone these tyrannies, and by whom? Even by two base towns, Dunkirk and Newport. Dunkirk began with two ships, and are now encreased to almost 20. They are at home at supper, and the next day here with us. I must needs confess the great charge that I know the lord-admiral is at continually by lying ready to take these pirates. Send to take them, they straight fly home: if our ships return they are straight here again. I dare boldly say it, they have done England more hurt since they began, than all France, either in the time of Hen. VIII. Edw. VI. or queen Mary. If it be so that these two base towns shall so affront the power of this land, I see no reason why they should be suffered: for it is a great dishonour both unto the queen and unto the kingdom. I have heard many say, that the navies are the walls of the kingdom; but we suffer our ships still to be destroyed, to be burnt, and to be sunk before our faces. We may compare our seamen to sheep feeding upon a fair mountain, in the midst whereof stands a little grove full of wolves: why, mr. Speaker, we are so plagued with them, that they be so bold, as now and then to take our harvest-men tardy, by ambuscadoes. I speak with grief, and it was reported unto me by a Scottish man, that duke Albert and the Infanta should plainly publish, that they would pull down so many of the walls of England, that they would easily make an entry. And it had been better for sea-coast men to have given the queen an hundred Subsidies, that they had been long since suppressed. My humble motion is, That it would please the house to enter into consideration of these things, for the honour, good, and safety, both of the queen and of the kingdom."

Mr. Peake. "I must needs shew unto this house (upon so good an occasion offered) how grievously the town of Sandwich, for which I serve, is vexed and almost undone; insomuch, as in that town there is neither owner, master, or mariner, that hath not felt it. Her maj. is continually at charge, but what ensueth or cometh of it, I never yet knew. If in the county of Kent at Shooter's-hill, Gadd's-hill, Barham-down, &c. there should many and offer robberies be committed, and the justices look not to it, this were but an ill part. Every day men come home, their goods and all they have taken away, yea their very apparel; and if the ships might also be carried away, they would do it. This should be amended and looked into. We had need to cherish this subject; I think him to be the best and most necessary member of the commonwealth, I mean the navigator."

Mr. Secretary Cecil. "My speech shall only tend to advance the motion of the gent. that spake first in this point. If we would have remedy, we are to consider two things; 1st, That it will be a matter of charge; and 2ndly, That there must be a distribution thereof. For the 1st, I leave it to you; for the 2nd, it is out of my element. Withal I must excuse them that have authority to remedy this; for unless you would have a continual charge unto her maj. by having ships lying betwixt us and Dunkirk, it is impossible but that at some times these robberies will be committed. I could very well agree to bring this motion to some head, being a matter, in mine opinion, very considerable in a committee." And all said, Ay, ay, ay.

Mr. Dannet. "I would only move the house that some masters of ships and seamen might be sent for to attend at the committee."—Whereupon it was ordered to be considered of and referred to committees, viz. all the privy council being members of this house, the queen's learned council being of this house, sir Walter Raleigh, the burgesses for ports and sea-faring towns, and others.

Further Debate on the Bill for resorting to Church.] Dec. 12th, the bill for coming to Church on Sundays was read a 3rd time; and another debate arose upon it.

Mr. Bond. "This bill as it is now ingrossed, much differeth from the first which was here presented, which I the better like of. Notwithstanding, in my opinion, the bill is altogether needless, and divers reasons move me to think it both inconvenient and unnecessary. Every evil in a state is not to be met with in a law; and as it is in natural, so it is in politic bodies, that sometimes the remedy is worse than the disease. And therefore particular laws against particular offences induce novelty, and in novelty contempt. If this bill passeth, there will be two imputations happen to the state, which wisdom wills us both to foresee and shun: the 1st an infamy to our ministers, that our adversaries may say, This is the fruit of your labour to have preached away your audience out of the church: the 2d no less, but rather a greater imputation upon our abps. and other ecclesiastical governors, that they be either remiss in their authority, or else that their prerogative hath not so much power as a twelvepenny fine. And, doubtless, these imputations cannot be avoided, if we give the Jesuits such head, scope and comfort, as they, in their writings, greedily apprehend. I do, mr. Speaker, conceive great difference betwixt 1 Eliz. when time was, and this law of 44 Eliz. as now it is. Then the people were newly taken from massing and superstition: now they are planted in truth, and rooted in religion. The light did then scarce appear unto them, which now shineth with glorious beams upon our teachers and ecclesiastical judges. Suppose that a neglecter of church service comes to the sessions there to be examined, alledging an excuse; many businesses so concern the doer not to be known, that to speak truth would be a wound unto his conscience; and to say his business, was a meer mockery; and to say an untruth, an apparent danger. If this law may stand for a law, methinks I foresee what breach of charity will happen. Say there be 40 in a town absent, the churchwarden presents some and not others: it will be objected unto him, Wherefore should I be presented and not he? Why, my wife, my son, my servant, my friend, not his? &c. Will not this be a great breach to unity and peace? just prosecution will be infinitely cumbersome, and partial connivance subject to quarrel. Notwithstanding this statute, we leave power to the ecclesiastical judge, whose course is to proceed to excommunication, and so an 'excommunicato capiendo' must be had. This is as great a charge as the indictment in the statute 1 Eliz. In this statute a witness or two must be brought to the sessions, he must be presented to the grand jury, and so indicted; this will cost 5s. a noble or 10s. which is as much as the charge in the first statute. So because this bill is scandalous to the clergy, scandalous to the state, repugnant to charity and 'crambe recocta;' I humbly pray it may be rejected."

Sir Francis Hastings. "I shall speak upon great disadvantage; I perceive this member of our house hath taken studied pains to disturb the passage of this bill. To which I shall not so well answer, because I cannot so well carry away the particulars of this politic, but not religious discourse. If it be religion to be obedient at pleasure; if I could be zealous to-day, and cold to-morrow, I could subscribe to all that he hath said. We cannot do a more acceptable thing to God, or a more dutiful service to the state, than bring men to fear God. Religion and policy may well stand together: but as that policy is most detestable which hath not religion to warrant it, so is that religion most happy which hath policy to back and maintain it. I know the Jesuits and priests be out of square, and be at a jarr amongst themselves: I pray God it be not to make a breach among us, who be yet in unity. Wit well applied is a profitable thing; but ill applied, dangerous, in whomsoever doth abuse it. There is no man of sense and religion, but thinketh that he is far from religion," pointing at mr. Bond, "that spoke last. First, he said, it would be an imputation to our ministers. That speech was both absurd in judgment, and slanderous in uttering; as though by the ministers of the Word we were loth to hear of our sins, or reconcile ourselves to God. The 2d, that it was an imputation on abps. bps. &c. I am so far from blaming their govt. that I renounce that position. I am very sorry that the strength of their authority stretcheth not so far as I could wish it in this point. But methinks this law should rather be a credit to the ministry, that now we having gone to Church these 43 years ourselves, are so fervent in religion, that we desire also that others may do the like. I beseech you, give me leave to wipe off a grievance, which, it seems, the gent. that last spake imputeth unto me. He hath made a protestation that he is no papist: I appeal to you all if I said he was. And I say he is no puritan, if he be not a papist; for if ever there be a puritan in England, it is a papist."

Dr. Bennet shewed, "That there were 1300, nay 1500 recusants in Yorkshire, which he vouched, upon his credit, were presented both in the ecclesiastical court, and before the council at York."

Sir Robert Wroth shewed, "That he had a proviso ready ingrossed, the substance whereof was, "That if any man came 8 times a year to the Church, and said the usual divine service twice every Sunday and holiday in his house, with his whole family, that should be a sufficient dispensation." This was utterly disliked: yet divers, which were desirous to overthrow the bill, went forth with the proviso, because they would have it joined with the bill to overthrow it. Whereupon the house was divided, and upon division it appeared thus; Ayes 126, Noes 85. So the proviso passed. Then it was put to the question for the bill, but then divers reasons were shewed, Mr. Bond's two reasons of prejudice to ministers and the clergy, and the danger by breach of charity; that the information was a thing contrary to Magna Charta; that there might be a conviction without inquiry.

Sir Walter Raleigh shewed, "That all the Church-Wardens of every shire must come to the assizes to give information to the grand-jury: say then there be 120 parishes in a shire, there must now come extraordinary 240 church-wardens: and say that but two in a parish offend in a quarter of a year, that makes 480 persons with the offenders to appear; what great multitudes this will bring together, what quarrelling and danger may happen, besides giving authority to a mean church-warden, how prejudicial this may be, &c. with divers other reasons against it. As also some ambiguities and equivocations therein; the proviso newly added being a plain toleration from coming to Church; and that the parson could not present or constrain any if they said service at home."

So it was put to the question, the Ayes went forth and were 105, and the Noes within 106; but then the Ayes said they had mr. Speaker's, which would make it even. And then it grew to a question, whether he had a voice. Sir

Edw. Hobby, who was of the Aye side, said, "That when her maj. had given us leave to chuse our Speaker, she gave us leave to chuse one out of our own number, and not a stranger, a citizen of London and a member; and therefore he hath a voice." To which it was answered by sir Walter Raleigh, and confirmed by the Speaker himself, "That he was foreclosed of his voice by taking that place, which it hath pleased them to impose upon him; and that he was to be indifferent for both parties: and withal shewed, that, by order of the house, the bill was lost."

Mr. Bowyer said, "I think it not lost, for there hath been foul and great abuse offered in this matter. A gent. that would willingly go forth according to his conscience, was pulled back: though I much reverence my Masters of the Temple, and am bound to our Benchers of the Middle-Temple, yet if it will please the house, and you, mr. Speaker, to command me to name him, I will." The greater voice said No; yet mr. sec. Cecil willed him to name him, and he said, "It was Mr. Dale of the Middle-Temple."

Sir Walter Raleigh. "Why, if it please you, it is a small matter to pull one by the sleeve, for so I have done myself oftentimes."—And great loud speech and stir there was in the house.

Mr. Comptroller, after silence, said, "It is a most intolerable disorder. I think the offence is a heinous offence, both against God and this assembly. For the 1st, in that every man is to go according to his conscience, and not by compulsion; and for the other gent. sir Walter Raleigh, that said he had often done the like, I think he may be ashamed of it; for large is his conscience, if in a matter of so great consequence he will be drawn either forwards or backwards by the sleeve; and I think it so heinous, that he deserves to answer it at the bar" (meaning mr. Dale, but because sir Walter Raleigh was last named, it was taken to be meant of him.)

Mr. Secretary Cecil. "I am sorry to see this disorder, and little do you know how for disorder this parl. is taxed, I am sorry I cannot say slandered. I had hoped as this parl. began gravely and with judgment, so we should have ended modestly, and, at least, with discretion. I protest I have a libel in my pocket against the proceedings of this parl. The offence which the gent. that last spake, spoke of, I confess is great and punishable; and this I wish may be inflicted on him, that he, whose voice may be drawn either forwards or backwards by the sleeve, like a dog in a string, may be no more of this house; and I wish for his credit's sake he would not. But that it should be so great to be called to the bar, I see no reason; neither do I know why any in this house should speak so imperiously, as to have a gent. of his place and quality," pointing to sir Walter Raleigh, "called to the bar, I see no reason for it: for the matter itself, the Noes were 106, and the Ayes 105, the Speaker hath no voice; and though I am sorry to say it, yet I must needs confess, lost it is, and farewell it."—And so the house rose confusedly.

Debate on a Bill relating to Soldiers, &c.]

Dec. 16. a bill concerning Captains, Soldiers, and Mariners, was read the 2nd time; and, by reason of the generality of the bill, it was much excepted against by sir W. Raleigh, and others.

Mr. Glascock said, "Mr. Speaker, I have something touching this bill to deliver to the house, in discharge of my conscience. And I do humbly and heartily pray you all, to hear me patiently and quietly, without interruption. I have been observed, mr. Speaker, to be an enemy to justices of the peace, and to have spoken irreverently, and much against them: for my own part, I mind now to make my last speech for this parl. and this protestation withal: that I never used any irreverent language towards those, whose honesty joined with their authority, and make themselves famous, under the title of upright justices. My speech was never uttered against them, but against two sorts of justices, that have authority at the commission of musters; (for all within the county are authorized generally by the word justices) by whom I would be loth to be yoked, or commanded. The first is, the uncircumcised justice of peace; the other, the adulterating justice of peace. The uncircumcised justice is he, who from base stock and lineage, by his wealth, is gotten to be within the commission. And I call him uncircumcised, because he hath not cut off the foreskin of his offences; and so by his virtue, wiped away the blot or stain of baseness in his birth and lineage.—The adulterating justice is he, that is a gentleman born, virtuous, discreet, and wise; yet poor and needy. And so only for his virtues and qualities, put into the commission. This man, I hold unfit to be a justice, though I think him to be a good member in the commonwealth. Because I hold this for a ground infallible; that no poor man ought to be in authority; my reason is this, he will so bribe you, and extort you, that the sweet scent of riches and gain, takes away and confoundeth the true taste of justice and equity. For the scripture saith, 'Munera excœtant oculos justorum;' and justice is never imprisoned and suppressed, but by bribery. And such kind of ministers I speak of. And I call him an adulterating justice; because look how many bribes he taketh, so many bastards he begets to the commonwealth.—Then let us see, whence these justices do come, and how they be made. It cannot be denied, but all justices are made by the lord keeper; then he is in fault, and none else. For my own opinion, I have ever held him to be a man both honourable, grave and wise; so just, that never was the meanest subject so wronged that he ever complained. Therefore, his justice cannot be taxed. Aye, but his care may, for he only maketh them. No, I may more easily excuse him, than ourselves; for he maketh none, but such as have certificates com-mandatory from the justices of assize. Why then, they be in fault; for impossible it is, my lord keeper should know the quality and sufficiency of them himself, but only 'per alium,' in trust, as by the justices of assize. No, the gall lies not there; for they neither (by reason they are not always riding one circuit) are well acquainted with the natures of those justices; but when any desireth to be a justice, he getteth a certificate from divers justices of the peace in the country, to the justices of assize, certifying them of their sufficiency and ability. And they again make their certificate (believing the former) to the lord keeper, who at the next assizes, puts them into commission. And thus is the lord keeper abused, and the justices of assize abused, and the country troubled with a corrupt justice, put in authority.—The cause comes only from the justices themselves. And who be they? Even all of you here present, or most of us. My suit, therefore is, that you will abstain from such commendations, and hold your hands from writing iniquity, and doing so sinful a deed, as to commend an unworthy person, and not to commend a worthy and deserving subject. And I think this a position both true and public, that it is as great a sin to add to the unworthy, as to detract from the worthy. And, mr. Speaker, if these men may be excepted out of the bill, I will not only be ready to go, but to run forth to have so good a law established." Then

Mr. Townshend shewed, "That in too much generality, there never wanted error. And so in this bill, being too general, namely, all from the age of 18 to 60, must appear at musters, and may be prest; no exception of any, and therefore no profession exempted. It is not unknown unto you, that by profession, I am a lawyer, and therefore unfit to be a professor of the art of war. Therefore, I pray, that it would please the house, if they would commit the bill, to commit it to be returned on the last day of the next parl.; or else, that, as a worthy gent. (serj. Heale) the last parl. in a bill of this nature moved, to have an exception or proviso for all serjeants; it would please you to admit of a proviso for all lawyers."—At which the house laughed heartily; and the bill was dropped.

Sir Francis Hastings's Speech for reforming Abuses.] The next day the Speaker having taken notice, that the parl. was likely to end next Saturday, sir Francis Hastings stood up and said, "Mr. Speaker, because I see the house at so good leisure, I will be bold to remember some matters passed this parl. and deliver my opinion, with desire of reformation: I mean not to tax any man.—Divers speeches have been used concerning justices of the peace, so slanderous and defamatory; with so unwonted epithets, with such slanderous definitions; a testimony of levity for the one, and scant sound judgment for the other.—And therefore, I do humbly pray the hon. here present, that those justices which serve religiously, dutifully, and carefully, may be countenanced.

—The church and commonwealth are two twins, which laugh and live together. Long have we joyed in her maj.'s happy govt. and long may we. We have two strong enemies, Rome and Spain; from thence all our rebellions have proceeded, and, by treasons hatched there, the sacred life of our sweet sovereign hath been sought and endangered. The boldness of the Jesuits, and Seminaries, is greatly increased, and they be very diligent to pervert; which their often and ordinary published pamphlets, to every man's view, well testifieth, and apparently sheweth the perverseness of their spirits, and corruptness of their hearts. And the multitude being perverted, what danger this may breed to the state, and our sovereign queen, judge you. For my part, I am, and will be ready to lay my life at her feet, to do her service; we had need to have special care of them, for themselves do brag they have forty thousand true hearted Catholics (for so they call them) in England; besides, their retinue, poor Catholics and Neuters, and I know not what. It is therefore fit, we look to this dangerous case, and not to think ourselves secure, because we find no harm: for it is a true position, that security, without Providence, is most dangerous. I conclude only with this desire, that those who have supreme authority, will look that those who have inferior govt. may do faithfully; and that we may be kept in obedience."

The Speaker's Speech to the Queen at the Close of the Session.] Dec. 19th, the Queen, with divers lords spiritual and temporal, being set in the upper house in their parl. robes, between 2 and 3 in the afternoon, the Commons had notice thereof, and thereupon repaired thither with John Croke, esq. recorder of London, their Speaker, who being placed at the rail, or bar, at the lower end of the said upper house, after he had made three reverences to her maj. sitting under a rich cloth of state, spake to this effect following:—"That laws were not at first made with humane pen, but by divine ordinance; that politic laws were made according to the evil conditions of men, and that all laws serve not for all times, no more than one medicine for all diseases; if he were asked, what were the first and chiefest thing to be considered, he would say, Religion. So religion is all in all, for religion breeds devotion; devotion breeds zeal and piety to God, which breedeth obedience and duty to the prince, and obedience of the laws, which breedeth faithfulness and honesty and love; three necessary and only things, to be wished and observed in a well-governed commonwealth. And that her maj. by planting true religion, had laid such a foundation upon which all those virtues were so planted and builded, that they could not easily be rooted up and extirpated. And therefore he did acknowledge that we will praise God and her maj. for it. And then he descended to speak of governments and laws of nations, among and above all which, he principally preferred the laws of this land, which he said were so many and so wise, that there was almost no offence but was met with in a law. Notwithstanding her maj. being desirous, for the good of her land, to call a parliament for redress of some old laws, and making some new, her dutiful and loving subjects having considered of them, have made some new, and amended some old, which they humbly desire may be made laws by her most royal assent which giveth life unto them. And so after thanks given for the pardon, by which we dread your justice and admire your mercy, and a prayer unto her maj. that she would accept, as the testimonies of our love and duty offered unto her, with a free heart and willing spirit, 4 entire Subsidies and eight 15ths and 10ths, to be collected of our lands and livelihoods; and having craved pardon for his offence, if either he had forgotten himself in word or action, he ended."

The Lord Keeper's Answer.] The Lord Keeper answered thus in effect. "First, as touching her maj.'s proceedings in the laws for her royal assent, that should be as God should direct her sacred spirit. 2dly, for your presentation of four subsidies and eight 15ths and 10ths; 3dly, your humble thankfulness for the pardon, for them and yourself; I will deliver her maj.'s commandment with what brevity I may, that I be not tedious to my most gracious sovereign. 1st, She saith, touching your proceeding in the matter of her prerogative, that she is persuaded subjects did never more dutifully; and that she understood you did but obiter touch her prerogative, and no otherwise but by humble petition; and therefore, that thanks that a prince may give to her subjects, she willingly yieldeth: but she now well perceiveth, that private respects are privately masqued under public pretence. 2dly, Touching the presentation of your subsidy, she specially regardeth two things, both the persons and the manner; for the 1st, she fell into commendations of the commonalty; for the 2d, the manner, which was speedy, not by persuasion or persuasive inducements, but freely out of duty with great contentment. In the thing which ye have granted, her maj. greatly commendeth your confidence and judgment; and though it be not proportionable to her occasions, yet she most thankfully receiveth the same as a loving and thankful prince; and that no prince was ever more unwilling to exact or receive any thing from the subject than she, our most gracious sovereign; for we all know she never was a greedy grasper nor strait-handed keeper; and therefore she commanded me to say, that you have done (and so she taketh it) dutifully, plentifully, and thankfully. For yourself, mr. Speaker, her maj. commanded me to say, that you have proceeded with such wisdom and discretion, that it is much to your commendations; and that none before you hath deserved more." And so he ended, after an admonition given to the justices of the peace, "That they would not deserve the epithets of prolling justices, justices of quarrels, who counted champerty good chevesance, sinning justices who do suck and consume the wealth and good of the commonwealth; and also against those who lie (if not all the year, yet) at least three quarters of the year in this city of London."—After all this, and the queen's royal assent given to 19 public and 10 private Acts, the lord keeper, by her maj.'s command, dissolved this parliament.

Death of the Queen.] We have now done with the last parl. of Queen Elizabeth, which she survived only about two years, dying in a good old age, at her manor of Richmond, March 24th, 1603, in the 44th year of her reign.

JAMES I.

After the death of Elizabeth, James VI. of Scotland succeeded to the English crown. The new king made his progress from one capital to the other with all convenient expedition; and, on the 25th of July, st. James's day, 1603, this king and his queen, Anne of Denmark, were crowned at Westminster, with great solemnity. To lessen the joy that might then be felt by both the Scotch and English nations on this happy union, a dreadful plague broke out in London this year, which, in a short space, carried off, from that city and its confines, above 30,000 people. This infectious distemper prevented the king and council from calling a parl. so soon as it was usual on a new accession; and it was not till the beginning of the next year that the writs were sent out for summoning one to meet at Westminster, on the 19th of March, still in the first year of this reign. But, at the same time, a Proclamation came out, containing some injunctions for electing Members in the house of Commons; of which Proclamation the following is a copy, as it appears in Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xvi. p. 561.

The King's Proclamation for calling a Parl.]

"Wee have before this tyme made known to our subjects uppon dyvers occasions, that we have received so great contentment in their generall conformity and submission to all such courses as might best establish the possession of this crowne, according to the right of our succession, as it would ever nourish in us an earnest desire to shew our selves carefull in all things to preserve their greatest affection and to answer that expectation, which by their joyfull maner of receaving us, Wee perceive they had conceived of our govt. whereof as We well knowe that princes cannot yield more generall, more cleare, or profitable proof to their people, then by redressing abuses, wherewith they fynde their subjects justlie grieved, either in constitution or administration of their laws in beeing, or by seeking to establish newe laws for them, agreeable to the rules of justice, whensoever tyme doth discover any defectes in the former policy, or when accidents in the state of any commonwealth requier newe ordinaunces; so seeyng both these things, which are of soe greate moment in a state, have accustomed to be considered and ordered, as in this, soe in other well governed commonwealthes, by a lawfull assemblie of the three estates of the realme, commonly called the parliament, Wee were desirous to have summoned them long since for that purpose, if the infection, reygning in the citie of London, and other places of our kingdome, would have permitted the concourse of soe great a multitude into one place as that assemblie must necessarilie brynge with it; which great contagion being nowe, by the goodnes of God, abated, and likelie, as We hope, to be shortly quite extinguished in and about the said citie, We have resolved to hold a parl. at our citie of Westminster, as soon as We shall find that the same may be done without the perill aforesaid; in which, as God knows that we have nothing to propound for satisfaction of any private desier or particular profit of our own, but meerly and only to consult and resolve with our loving subjects of all those things which may best establish the publicke good, with the generall safety and tranquility of this realme, on which it had pleased God to multiply soe many blessings; so to the intent that this assemblie of oure parl. being grounded uppon soe syncere an intent on oure parte, may be matched with a like integritie on theirs, and as it is the first in our reigne, so to be founde not only worthy of the high title it beareth to be the highest councill of the kingdome, but also to be a president for hereafter of the true use of parliaments, Wee have bethought our selfe of as many waies and meanes as may be, to prevent those inconveniences, which daylie rise and multiply by the perverting of those auuncient good orders which were devised, by the wisdom of former times, to be observed in calling of parliaments; amongst which, because there is no one poynte of greater consequence than the well chosyng of knightes and burgesses, whoe, as they doe present the bodie of the thirde estate; soe, being eligible by multitude, there are often many unfitt persons appoynted for that service, and where it is soe well knowne to every private man of wit and judgment, much more to Us who have had soe longe experience of kingly govt. how ill effectes doe followe, when such as have to doe in matters of commonwealth shall come to that greate and common councill, with others then publick myndes, sincere, and voide of any factious humor or dependency. Wee doe hereby straightly charge and admonish all persons interested in the choice of knights for the shires, first, that the knights for the county be selected oute of the principall knightes or gentlemen of sufficient hability within that county wherein they are chosen; and for the burgesses that choice be made of men of sufficiency and discretion, without any partiall respects or factious combination, which alwaies breede suspicions that more care is taken to compasse private endes then to provide for making good and wholesome laws for the realme; and because it is noe more possible to drawe sounde councelles and resolutions from inconsiderate or insufficient spirites, then to have a sounde or healthfull bodie composed of weak and imperfect members; wee soe likewise admonyshe all persons to whome it doth apperteyne, that seeyng the dealyng in causes of parl. requires conveniency of years and experience, there may be great heed taken, by all those that will be accompted lovers of their countrie, that both knightes and burgesses may be chosen accordingly, without desier in any particular men to please parents or friends that often speak for their children or kyn, though they be very young, and little liable to discern what laws are fyt to bynde a commonwealth; to the consultation whereof those persons should be selected principallie, of whose gravity and modest conversation men are likest generally to conceive best opynion. Next and above all thinges considering, that one of the mayne pillars of this estate is the preservation of unity in the profession of sincere religion of Almighty God, Wee doe also admonyshe that there be great care taken to avoide the choice of any persons, either noted for their superstitious blyndness one way, or for their turbulent humours other waies, because their disorderly and unquiete spirites will disturbe all the discrete and modest proceeding in that greatest and gravest councill. Further, Wee doe commaunde that an expresse care be had that there be not chosen any persons banqueruptes or outelawed, but men of known good behaviour and sufficient livelihood, and such as are not onely taxed to the payment of subsidies and other like charges, but also have ordinarily paid and satisfied the same, nothing being more absurd in any commonwealth than to permytt those to have free voyces for law making, by whose owne actes they are exempted from the law's protection. Next that all the sheriffes be charged that they doe not direct any precept for electyng and returning of any burgesses to or for any auncient borrough town within their counties, beyng soe utterly ruyned and decayed that there are not sufficient resyantes to make such choice, and of whome lawfull election may be made; also to charge all cities and borowghes, and the inhabitantes of the same, that none of them seale any blankes, referryng or leaving to any other to insert the names of any citizens or burgesses to serve for any such cittie or borowgh, but doe make open and free election according to the lawe, and sett down the names of the persons whom they choose before they seale the certificate:—Furthermore, Wee notifye by these presentes, that all retornes and certificates of knightes citizens and burgesses oughte and are to be brought to the Chauncery, and there to be fyled of record; and if any shall be founde to be made contrarie to this proclamation, the same is to be rejected as unlawfull and insufficient, and the cittie or borowgh to be fyned for the same; and if it be founde that they have commytted any grosse or wilfull default and contempt in their election retorne or certificate, that then their liberties, according to the lawe, are to be seized into oure handes as forfeited; and if any person take upon him the place of a knight, citizen, or burgesse, not being duely elected, retorned, and sworne, according to the laws and statutes in that behalfe provided, and according to the purport, effect, and true meaning of this oure proclamation; then every person soe offending to be fyned and imprisoned for the same.—Wee doe also hereby give warning to the lordes and others that are to serve in this parliament, to have speciall care, as they tender our displeasure, that they admytt none to have the name or countenance of their servaunts and attendantes during the parliament, thereby to be priviledged, saying such questions of priviledges have in tymes past consumed a great part of the tyme appointed for the parliament, whereby the service for the realme hath bene hyndered, and the subjects drawne to great charges and expences by attendyng much longer than otherwise needed. Having at this tyme bene the more carefull to set downe a particular order and forewarnyng for preventing of these severall abuses afore-mentioned, that thereby there may arise, at that publick and solemne meeting, such a comely proportion and laudable sympathie between the honourable, juste, and necessarie lawes that are to be made and established at this parliament, and the commendable discretion, with all other wise and vertuous qualities, meete for such persons as are to be the mombers and assisters of Us in soe honorable, lawfull, and necessarie an action, as may put us and all our good subjects in a suer expectation of a happie issue to followe thereupon; Wee doubt not but these our directions, thus made manifest, shall be duely observed accordyng to the important consequence thereof, and the peryll of oure heavye displeasure to all those that shall offende in the contrarie. Given at our honour of Hampton Court, the 11the day of Januarie. Per ipsum Regem."

March 19th, 1603, which was still within the first year of this reign, the parl. met at Westminster. The King came in a chariot of estate; the prince of Wales, with all the lords spiritual and temporal, according to ancient custom, rode on horse-back from Whitehall to Westminster, in their parliament robes. When the King being seated on the throne, it pleased his maj. in person, to declare the cause of the summons to the two houses, in the following speech:—

The King's Speech to his first Parl.] “ My lords of the higher house, and you knights and burgesses of the lower, It did no sooner please God to lighten his hand, and relent the violence of his devouring angel against the poor people of this city, but as soon did I resolve to call this parl. and that for three chief and principal reasons.—The first whereof is (and which of itself, though there were no more, is not only a sufficient, but a most full and necessary ground and reason for convening of this assembly) the first reason, I say, is, that you who are here presently assembled to represent the body of this whole kingdom, and of all sorts of people within the same, may with your own ears hear, and that I out of my own mouth may deliver unto you, the assurance of my due thankfulness for your so joyful and general applause, to the declaring and receiving me in this seat (which God, by my birth-right, and lineal descent, had, in the fullness of time, provided for me) and that immediately after it pleased God to call your late sovereign, of famous memory, full of days, but fuller of immortal trophies of honour, out of this transitory life. Not that I am able to express by words, or utter by eloquence, the vive image of mine inward thankfulness; but only that out of my own mouth, you may rest assured to expect that measure of thankfulness at my hands, which is according to the infiniteness of your deserts, and to my inclination and ability, for requital of the same. Shall I ever, nay, can I ever be able, or rather so unable in memory, as to forget your unexpected readiness and alacrity, your ever memorable resolution, and your most wonderful conjunction and harmony of your hearts, in declaring and embracing me as your undoubted and lawful king and governor? Or shall it ever be blotted out of my mind, how at my first entry into this kingdom, the people of all sorts rid and ran, nay rather flew to meet me? their eyes flaming nothing but sparkles of affection, their mouths and tongues uttering nothing but sounds of joy; their hands, feet, and all the rest of their members in their gestures, discovering a passionate longing, and earnestness to meet and embrace their new sovereign. “ Quid ergo retribuam? Shall I allow in myself that which I could never bear with in another? No, I must plainly and freely confess here in all your audiences, that I did ever naturally so far mislike a tongue too smooth, and diligent in paying their creditors, with lip-payment and verbal thanks, as I ever suspected that sort of people, meant not to pay their debtors in more substantial sort of coin. And therefore for expressing of my thankfulness, I must resort unto the other two reasons of my convening of this parl. by them in action to utter my thankfulness; both the said reasons having but one ground, which is the deeds whereby all the days of my life, I am, by God's grace, to express my said thankfulness towards you, but divided in this; that in the first of these two, mine actions of thanks are so inseparably conjoined with my person, as they are in a manner become individually annexed to the same. In the other reason, mine actions are such, as I may either do them, or leave them undone, though by God's grace, I hope never to be weary of the doing them.—As to the first it is the blessings which God hath, in my person, bestowed upon you all, wherein I protest, I do more glory at the same for your weal, than for any particular respect of my own reputation or advantage therein. The first then of the blessings which God hath jointly with my person sent unto you, is outward peace; that is, peace abroad with all foreign neighbours: for, I thank God, I may justly say, that never since I was a king, I either received wrong of any other christian prince or state, or did wrong to any; I have ever, I praise God, yet kept peace and amity with all, which hath been so far tied to my person, as at my coming here you are witnesses, I found the state embarked in a great and tedious war, and only by mine arrival here, and by the peace in my person, is now amity kept, where war was before, which is no small blessing to a christian commonwealth; for by peace abroad with their neighbours the towns flourish, the merchants become rich, the trade doth increase, and the people of all sorts in the land enjoy free liberty to exercise themselves in their several vocations, without peril or disturbance. Not that I think this outward peace so unseparably tied to my person, as I dare assuredly promise to myself, and to you, the certain continuance thereof; but thus far I can very well assure you, and, on the word of a king, promise unto you, that I shall never give the first occasion of the breach thereof; neither shall I ever be moved for any particular, or private passion of mind, to interrupt your public peace, except I be forced thereunto, either for reparation of the honour of the kingdom, or else by necessity for the weal and preservation of the same; in which case, a secure and honourable peace. Yet I do hope, by my experience of the by-past blessings of peace, which God hath so long, ever since my birth, bestowed upon me, that he will not be weary to continue the same, nor repent him of his grace towards me; transferring that sentence of king David's upon his by-past victories of war, to mine of peace; that that God who preserved me from the devouring jaws of the bear, and of the lion, and delivered them into my hand, shall now also grant me victory over that uncircumcised Philistine.—But although outward peace be a great blessing, yet it is as far inferior to peace within, as civil wars are more cruel and unnatural than wars abroad. And therefore the second great blessing that God hath, with my person, sent unto you, is peace within, and that in a double form: first, by my descent lineally out of the loins of Henry VII. is reunited and confirmed in me the union of the two princely roses of the two houses of Lancaster and York, whereof that king, of happy memory was the first uniter, as he was also the first ground-layer of the other peace (the lamentable and miserable events, by the civil and bloody dissension betwixt these two houses was so great, and so late, as it need not be renewed unto your memories) which as it was first settled and united in him, so it is now reunited and confirmed in me; being justly and lineally descended, not only of that happy conjunction, but of both the branches thereof in many times before. But the union of these two princely houses is nothing comparable to the union of two ancient and famous kingdoms, which is the other inward peace annexed to my person.—And here I must crave your patience for a little space, to give me leave to discourse more particularly of the benefits that do arise of that union which is made in my blood, being a matter that belongeth most properly to me to speak of, as the head, wherein that great body is united. And first, if we were to look no higher than to natural and physical reasons, we may easily be persuaded of the great benefits that by that union do redound to the whole island; for if twenty thousand men be a strong army, is not the double thereof, forty thousand, a double the stronger army? If a baron enricheth himself with double as many lands as he had before, is he not double the greater? Nature teacheth us, that mountains are made of moles; and that at first, kingdoms being divided, and every particular town, or little country (as tyrants or usurpers could obtain the possession) a signory apart, many of these little kingdoms are now in process of time, by the ordinance of God, joined into great monarchies, whereby they are become powerful within themselves, to defend themselves from all outward invasions, and their head and governor thereby enabled to redeem them from foreign assaults, and punish private transgressions within. Do we do not yet remember that this kingdom was divided into seven little kingdoms, besides Wales? And is it not now the stronger by their union? And hath not the union of Wales to England added a greater strength thereto? Which, though it was a great principality, was nothing comparable in greatness and power to the ancient and famous kingdom of Scotland. But what shall we stick upon any natural appearance, when it is manifest, that God, by his Almighty Providence, hath pre-ordained it so to be? Hath not God first united these two kingdoms, both in language and religion, and similitude of manners? Yea, hath he not made us all in one island, compassed with one sea, and of itself, by nature, so indivisible, as almost those that were borderers themselves on the late borders, cannot distinguish, nor know, or discern their own limits? These two countries being separated neither by sea nor great river, mountain nor other strength of nature, but only by little small brooks, or demolished little walls, so as rather they were divided in apprehension, than in effect; and now in the end and fulness of time united, the right and title of both in my person, alike lineally descended of both the crowns, whereby it is now become in a little world with itself, being intrenched and fortified round about with a natural, and yet admirable, strong pond or ditch, whereby all the former fears of this nation are now quite cut off: the other part of the island being ever before now, not only the place of landing to all strangers that were to make invasion here, but likewise moved by the enemies of this state, by untimely incursions, to make enforced diversion from their conquests, for defending themselves at home, and keeping sure their back-door, as then it was called, which was the greatest hindrance and lett my predecessors of this nation ever got, in disturbing them from their many famous and glorious conquests abroad: 'What God hath conjoined then, let no man separate.' I am the husband, and all the whole island is my lawful wife; I am the head, and it is my body; I am the shepherd, and it is my flock: I hope, therefore, no man will be so unreasonable as to think that I, that am a christian king under the gospel, should be a polygamist, and husband to two wives; that I being the head, should have a divided and monstrous body; or that being the shepherd of so fair a flock (whose fold hath no wall to fence it but the four seas) should have my flock parted in two. But as I am assured, that no honest subject, of whatsoever degree, within my whole dominions, is less glad of this joyful union than I am; so may the frivolous objection of any that would be hinderers of this work (which God hath in my person already established) be easily answered; which can be none, except such as are either blinded with ignorance, or else transported with malice, being unable to live in a well-governed commonwealth, and only delighting to fish in troubled waters: for if they would stand upon their reputation, and privileges of any of the kingdoms; I pray you, were not both of the kingdoms monarchies from the beginning? And, consequently, could ever the body be counted without the head, which was ever unseparably joined thereunto? So that as the honour and privileges of any of the kingdoms could not be divided from their sovereign; so are they now confounded and joined in my person, who am equal and alike kindly head to both. When this kingdom of England was divided into so many petty kingdoms (as I told you before) one of them eat up another, till they were all united into one. And yet can Wiltshire or Devonshire, which were of the West-Saxons (although their kingdom of longest durance, and did, by conquest, overcome divers of the rest of the little kingdoms) make claim to priority of place or honour before Sussex, Essex, or other shires, which were conquered by them? And have we not the like experience in the kingdom of France, being composed of divers duchies, and one after another conquered by the sword? For even as little brooks lose their names by running and falling into great rivers, and the very name and memory of great rivers swallowed up in the ocean: so by the conjunction of divers little kingdoms into one, are all these private differences and questions swallowed up. And since the success was happy of the Saxon kingdoms, conquered by the spear of Bellona; now much greater reason have we to expect a happy issue of this greater union, which is only fastened and bound up by the wedding-ring of Astrea? And as God hath made Scotland (the one half of this island) to enjoy my birth, and the first and most imperfect half of my life; and you here to enjoy the perfect and last half thereof: so can I not think that any would be so injurious to me, no not in their thoughts and wishes, as to cut asunder the one half of me from the other. But in this matter I have far enough insisted, resting assured, that in your hearts and minds you all applaud this my discourse.—Now although these blessings (before rehearsed) of inward and outward peace be great; yet seeing that in all good things a great part of their goodness and estimation is lost, if they have not appearance of perpetuity or long continuance: so hath it pleased Almighty God to accompany my person also with that favour, having healthful and hopeful issue of my body (whereof some are here present) for continuance and propagation of that undoubted right which is in my person; under whom I doubt not but it will please God to prosper and continue for many years this union, and all other blessings of inward and outward peace which I have brought with me. But neither peace outward, nor peace inward, nor any other blessing that can follow thereupon, nor appearance of the perpetuity thereof, by propagation in posterity, are but weak pillars and rotten reeds to lean unto, if God doth not strengthen, and, by the staff of his blessing, make them durable; for in vain doth the watchman watch the city, if the Lord be not the principal defence thereof; in vain doth the builder build the house, if God give not the success; and in vain (as Paul saith) doth Paul plant and Apollos water, if God give not the increase; for all wordly blessings are but like swift passing shadows, fading flowers, or chaff blown before the wind, if by the profession of true religion, and works according thereunto, God be not moved to maintain and settle the thrones of princes. And, although that since mine entry into this kingdom, I have, both by meeting with divers of the ecclesiastical estate, and likewise by divers proclamations clearly declared by mind in points of religion; yet do I not think it amiss, in this so solemn an audience, to take occasion to discover somewhat of the secrets of my heart in that matter. For I shall never (with God's grace) be ashamed to make public profession thereof upon all occasions, lest God should be ashamed of me before men and angels; especially lest at this time men might presume further, upon the misknowledge of my meaning, to trouble this parliament of ours than were convenient. At my first coming, although I found but one religion, and that which by myself is professed, publicly allowed, and by the law maintained; yet found I another sort of religion, besides a private sect, lurking within the bowels of this nation. The first is the true religion, which by me is professed, and by law is established: the 2nd is, the falsely called Catholics, but truly Papists: the 3rd, which I call a sect rather than a religion, is the Puritans and Novelists; who do not so far differ from us in points of religion, as in their confused form of policy and parity; being ever discontented with the present government, and impatient to suffer any superiority, which maketh their sects insufferable in any well-governed commonwealth. But as for my course towards them, I remit it to my proclamations made upon that subject.—And now for the Papists, I must put a difference betwixt mine own private profession of mine own salvation, and my politic government of the realm for the weal and quietness thereof. As for mine own profession, you have me your head now amongst you of the same religion that the body is of. As I am no stranger to you in blood, no more am I a stranger to you in faith, or in the matters concerning the house of God. And although this my profession be according to mine education, wherein (I thank God) I sucked the milk of God's truth with the milk of my nurse; yet do I here protest unto you, that I would never for such a conceit of constancy, or other prejudicate opinion, have so firmly kept my first profession, if I had not found it agreeable to all reason, and to the rule of my conscience. But I was never violent nor unreasonable in my profession: I acknowledge the Roman church to be our mother church, although defiled with some infirmities and corruptions, as the Jews were when they crucified Christ: and as I am none enemy to the life of a sick man, because I would have his body purged of ill humours; no more am I enemy to their church because I would have them reform their errors, not wishing the down-throwing of the temple, but that it might be purged and cleansed from corruption; otherwise, how can they wish us to enter, if their house be not first made clean? But as I would be loather to dispense in the least point of mine own conscience for any wordly respect, than the foolishhest Precisian of them all; so would I be as sorry to strait the politic government of the bodies and minds of all my subjects to my private opinions: nay, my mind was ever so free from persecution, or thralling of my subjects in matters of conscience, as I hope that those of that profession within this kingdom have a proof since my coming, that I was so far from increasing their burdens with Rehoboam, as I have, so much as either time, occasion, or law could permit, lightened them. And even now at this time, have I been careful to revise and consider deeply upon the laws made against them, that some overture may be porponed to the present parl. for clearing these laws, by reason (which is the soul of the law) in case they have been, in times past, further or more rigorously extended by judges than the meaning of the law was, or might tend to the hurt as well of the innocent as of guilty persons. And as to the persons of my subjects which are of that profession, I must divide them into two ranks, clerics and laics; for the part of the laics, certainly I ever thought them far more excusable than the other sort; because that sort of religion containeth such an ignorant, doubtful, and implicit kind of faith in the laics grounded upon their church, as except they generally believe whatsoever their teachers please to affirm, they cannot be thought guilty of these particular points of heresies and corruptions which their teachers do so wilfully profess. And again, I must subdivide the same laics into two ranks; that is, either quiet and well-minded men, peaceable subjects, who, either being old, have retained their first drunken-in liquor, upon a certain shamefacedness to be thought curious or changeable; or, being young men, through evil education, have never been nursed or brought up, but upon such venom in place of wholesome nutriment; and that sort of people, I would be sorry to punish their bodies for the error of their minds, the reformation whereof must only come of God, and the true spirit. But the other rank of laics, who, either through curiosity, affectation of novelty, or discontentment in their private humours, have changed their coats, only to be factious stirrers of sedition, and perturbors of the commonwealth; their backwardness in their religion giveth a ground to me the magistrate, to take the better heed to their proceedings, and to correct their obstinacy. But for the part of the clerics, I must directly say and affirm, that as long as they maintain one special point of their doctrine, and another point of their practice, they are no way sufferable to remain in this kingdom. Their point of doctrine is that arrogant and ambitious supremacy of their head, the Pope; whereby he not only claims to be spiritual head of all Christians, but also to have an imperial civil power over all kings and emperors; dethroning and decrowning princes with his foot, as pleaseth him, and dispensing and disposing of all kingdoms and empires at his appetite. The other point which they observe in continual practice, is the assassinations and murders of kings; thinking it no sin, but rather a matter of salvation, to do all acts of rebellion and hostility against their natural sovereign lord, if he be once cursed, his subjects discharged of their fidelity, and his kingdom given a prey by that three-crowned monarch, or rather monster, their head. And in this point I have no occasion to speak further here, saving that I could wish from my heart, that it would please God to make me one of the members of such a general Christian union in religion, as laying wilfulness aside on both hands, we might meet in the midst, which is the center and perfection of all things. For if they would leave, and be ashamed of such new and gross corruptions of theirs, as themselves cannot maintain, nor deny to be worthy of reformation; I would, for mine own part, be content to meet them in the mid-way, so that all novelties might be renounced on either side. For as my faith is the true ancient catholic and apostolic faith, grounded upon the scriptures and express word of God; so will I ever yield all reverence to antiquity in the points of ecclesiastical policy; and by that means shall I ever, with God's grace, keep myself from ever being an heretic in faith, or schismatic in matters of Policy. But of one thing would I have the Papists of this land to be admonished, that they presume not so much upon my lenity (because I would be loth to be thought a persecutor) as thereupon, to think it lawful for them daily to increase their number and strength in this kingdom; whereby, if not in my time, at least in the time of my posterity, they might be in hope to erect their religion again. No; let them assure themselves, that, as I am a friend to their persons, if they be good subjects; so am I an avowed enemy, and do denounce mortal war to their errors; and, that as I would be sorry to be driven by their ill behaviour from the protection and conservation of their bodies and lives; so will I never cease, as far I can, to tread down their errors and wrong opinions. For I could not permit the increase and growing of their religion, without first betraying of myself and mine own conscience: secondly, this whole isle, as well the part I am come from, as the part I remain in, in betraying their liberties, and reducing them to the former slavish yoke, which both had cast off before I came amongst them: and, thirdly, the liberty of the crown in my posterity, which I should leave again in slavery, having found it left free to me by my predecessors. And therefore, would I wish all good subjects that are deceived with that corruption; first, if they find any beginning of instinction in themselves of knowledge and love to the truth, to foster the same by all lawful means, and to beware of quenching the spirit that worketh within them; and if they can find as yet no motion tending that way, to be studious to read and confer with learned men; and to use all such means as may further their resolution, assuring themselves, that as long as they are disconformable in religion from us, they cannot be but half my subjects; be able to do but half service, and I to want the best half of them, which is their souls. And here have I occasion to speak to you my lords the bishops; for as you, my lord of Durham, said very learnedly to day in your sermon, 'correction without instruction, is but a tyranny;' so ought you, and all the clergy under you, to be more careful, vigilant, and diligent than you have been, to win souls to God, as well by your exemplary life, as doctrine. And since you see how careful they are, sparing neither labour, pains, nor extreme peril of their persons to divert (the devil is so busy a bishop), ye should be the more careful and wakeful in your charges. Follow the rule prescribed you by st. Paul, 'be careful so exhort and to instruct in season and out of season;' and where you have been any way sluggish before, now waken yourselves up again with a new diligence in this point, remitting the success to God, who calling them either at the second, third, tenth or twelfth hour, as they are alike welcome to him, so shall they be to me, his lieutenant here.—The 3rd reason of my convening of you at this time, which containeth such actions of my thankfulness toward you, as I may either do, or leave undone, yet shall, with God's grace, ever press to perform all the days of my life: it consists in these two points, in making of laws at certain times, which is only at such times as this in parliament, or in the careful execution thereof at all other times. As for the making of them, I will thus far faithfully promise unto you, that I will ever prefer the weal of the body, and of the whole commonwealth, in making of good laws and constitutions, to any particular or private ends of mine, thinking ever the wealth and weal of the commonwealth to be my greatest weal and wordly felicity: a point wherein a lawful king doth directly differ from a tyrant. But at this time, I am only thus far to forwarn you in that point, that you beware to seek the making of too many laws, for two especial reasons: first, because, 'in corruptissima republica plurimæ legis;' and the execution of good laws is far more profitable in a commonwealth, than to burden men's memories with the making of too many of them. And next, because the making of too many laws in one parl. will bring in confusion, for lack of leisure wisely to deliberate before you conclude: for the bishop said well to-day, that to deliberation would a large time be given, but to execution a greater promptness was required. As for the execution of good laws, it hath been very wisely and honourably foreseen and ordered by my predecessors in this kingdom, in planting such a number of judges, and all sorts of magistrates in convenient places for the execution of the same: and therefore must I now turn me to you that are judges and magistrates under me, as mine eyes and ears in this case. I can say none otherwise to you then as Ezekias, the good king of Juda, said to their judges, 'Remember that the thrones you sit on are God's, and neither yours nor mine:' and that as you must be answerable to me, so must both you and I be answerable to God, for the due execution of our offices. That place is no place for you to utter your affections in, you must not there hate your foe nor love your friend, fear the offence of the greater party, or pity the misery of the meaner; ye must be blind and not see distinctions of persons, handless, not to receive bribes; but keep that just temper and mid-course in all your proceedings, that like a just balance ye may neither sway to the right nor left hand. Three principal qualities are required in you, knowledge, courage, and sincerity: that you may discern with knowledge, execute with courage, and do both in upright sincerity. And, as for my part, I do vow and protest here in the presence of God, and of this honourable audience, I never shall be weary, nor omit no occasion, wherein I may shew my carefulness of the execution of good laws. And as I wish you that are judges not to be weary in your office in doing of it; so I shall never be weary, with God's grace, to take account of you, which is properly my calling.—And thus having told you the three causes of my convening of this parl. all three tending only to utter my thankfulness, but in divers forms, the first by word, the other two by action; I do confess that when I have done and performed all that in this speech I have promised, 'inutilis servus sum:' inutile, because the meaning of the word 'inutilis' in that place of scripture is understood, that in doing all that service which we can to God, it is but our due, and we do nothing to God but that which we are bound to do. And in like manner, when I have done all that I can for you, I do nothing but that which I am bound to do, and am accountable to God upon the contrary: for I do acknowledge, that the special and greatest point of difference that is betwixt a rightful king and an usurping tyrant is in this; that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant doth think his kingdom and people are only ordained for satisfaction of his desires and unreasonable appetites; the righteous and just king doth, by the contrary, acknowledge himself to be ordained for the procuring of the wealth and prosperity of his people, and that his greatest and principal worldly felicity must consist in their prosperity. If you be rich I cannot be poor; if you be happy I cannot but be fortunate; and I protest that your welfare shall ever be my greatest care and contentment: and that I am a servant it is most true, that as I am head and governor of all the people in my dominion who are my natural vassals and subjects, considering them in numbers and distinct ranks; so if we will take the whole people as one body and mass, then as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head; so must a righteous king know himself to be ordained for his people, and not his people for him: for although a king and people be relata, yet can he be no king if he want people and subjects. But there be many people in the world that lack a head, wherefore I will never be ashamed to confess it my principal honour, to be the great servant of the common-wealth, and ever think the prosperity thereof to be my greatest felicity, as I have already said. But as it was the whole body of this kingdom, with an uniform assent and harmony, as I told you in the beginning of my speech, which did so far oblige me in good-will and thankfulness of requital by their alacrity and readiness in declaring and receiving me to that place which God had provided for me, and not any particular persons: (for then it had not been the body) so is my thankfulness due to the whole state. For even as in matter of faults, 'Quod à multis peccatur, impunè peccatur:' even so even in the matter of virtuous and good deeds, what is done by the willing consent and harmony of the whole body, no particular person can justly claim thanks as proper to him for the same. And therefore I must here make a little apology for myself, in that I could not satisfy the particular humours of every person, that looked for some advancement or reward at my hand, since my entry into this kingdom. Three kind of things were craved of me: advancement to honour, preferment to place of credit about my person, and reward in matters of land or profit. If I had bestowed honour upon all, no man could have been advanced to honour. For the degrees of honour do consist in preferring some above their fellows. If every man had the like access to my privy or bed-chamber, then no man could have it, because it cannot contain all. And if I had bestowed lands and rewards upon every man, the fountain of my liberality would be so exhausted and dried, as I would lack means to be liberal to any man. And yet was I not so sparing, but I may, without vaunting, affirm, that I have enlarged my favour in all the three degrees, towards as many and more than ever king of England did in so short a space: no, I rather crave your pardon that I have been so bountiful: for if the means of the crown be wasted, I behoved then to have recourse to you my subjects, and be burdensome to you, which I would be lothest to be of any king alive. For as it is true, that as I have already said, it was a whole body which did deserve so well at my hand, and not every particular person of the people: yet were there some who by reason of their office, credit with the people or otherwise, took occasion both before, and at the time of my coming amongst you, to give proof of their love and affection towards me. Not that I am any way in doubt, that if other of my subjects had been in their places, and had had the like occasion, but they would have uttered the like good effects, (so general and so great were the love and affection of you all towards me:) but yet this having been performed by some special persons, I could not, without unthankfulness, but requite them accordingly. And therefore had I just occasion to advance some in honour, some to places of service about me, and by rewarding to enable some who had deserved well of me, and were not otherwise able to maintain the ranks I thought them capable of; and others, who although they had not particularly deserved before, yet I found them capable and worthy of place of preferment and credit, and not able to sustain those places for which I thought them fit, without my help. Two especial causes moved me to be so open handed; whereof the one was reasonable and honourable: but the other, I will not be ashamed to confess unto you, proceeded of mine own infirmity. That which was just and honourable, was, that being so far beholding to the body of the whole state, I thought I could not refuse to let run some small brooks out of the fountain of my thankfulness to the whole, for refreshing of particular persons that were members of that multitude. The other, which proceeded out of mine own infirmity, was the multitude and importunity of suitors. But although reason come by infusion in a manner, yet experience groweth with time and labour: and therefore do I not doubt, but experience in time coming will both teach the particular subjects of this kingdom, not to be so importune and indiscrete in craving; and me not to be so easily and lightly moved, in granting that which may be harmful to my estate, and consequently to the whole kingdom. And thus having at length declared unto you my mind in all the points, for the which I called this parl.: my conclusion shall only now be to excuse myself, in case you have not found such eloquence in my speech, as peradventure you might have looked for at my hands. I might, if I list, alledge the great weight of my affairs and my continual business and distraction, that I could never have leisure to think upon what I was to speak, before I came to the place where I was to speak: and I might also alledge, that my first sight of this so famous and honourable an assembly, might likewise breed some impediment. But leaving these excuses, I will plainly and freely, in my manner, tell you the true cause of it, which is, that it becometh a king, in my opinion, to use no other eloquence than plainness and sincerity. By plainness I mean, that his speeches should be so clear and void of all ambiguity, that they may not be thrown, nor rent asunder into contrary senses like the old oracles of the Pagan gods. And by sincerity, I understand that uprightness and honesty which ought to be in a king's whole speeches and actions: that as far as a king is in honour erected above any of his subjects, so far should he strive in sincerity to be above them all, and that his tongue should be ever the true messenger of his heart: and this sort of eloquence may you ever assuredly look for at my hands."

The King's Speech being ended, the Lord Chanc. made a short one, according to form and order; and, in the end, signified his maj.'s pleasure to the Commons, that they should go and make choice of a Speaker, and present him to the king on the 22d of the same month. Accordingly, on the said day, sir Edw. Phellips, knt. king's serjeant, was brought up to the bar of the Lords, by several knights and burgesses, as their Speaker, and, with the usual ceremonies, was allowed. The Journals of the Commons, for this, and all the succeeding parliaments, are much more copious and circumstantial than formerly; therefore to take notice of every incident, would be endless. For the first days of this session, they are mostly taken up with regulating Elections, and ascertaining Privileges, &c. which we shall omit; except the famous case of sir Francis Goodwin and sir John Fortescue, which must find a place in these enquiries. When any thing else occurs in these Journals, not taken notice of by the Lords, it shall also find a place. We shall omit the form of the Writ in the Journals and some other ceremonies, and pass on to the speaker's speech to the king, on his being confirmed in that office, which the same authority gives us in these words:

The Speaker's Speech to the King.] "Most renowned, and of all other most worthy to be admired, sovereign: As the supreme and all powerful king of heaven hath created man to govern his works, so did he depute terrestrial kings, in whom his image was, to govern men; but yet so, as still to think, that they themselves are but men: and to that end adorned them with three imperial ensigns of honour; a crown, a sceptre, and a sword; commanding to the crown reverence, to the sceptre obedience, and to the sword fear: wherewith, in his divine distribution of kings and kingdoms, he hath magnified and invested your sacred person, in the imperial throne of this most victorious and happy nation, wherein you now do, and Nestor like, long may, sit; not as a conqueror, by the sword, but as an undoubted inheritor, by the sceptre; not as a step-father, by match or alliance, but as a true tender father, by descent of nature, to whom we your children are truly naturalized in our subjection, and from whom in our loyalty we expect unto us a paternal protection: the ark of government of which kingdom hath ever been steered by the laws of the same; and these distributed to the jurisdiction of several courts of justice; the commanding and imperial court whereof is this your maj.'s great and high court of parl.; by whose power only new laws are to be instituted, imperfect laws reformed, and inconvenient laws abrogated; whose justice therein is such, and so absolute, that no such laws can either be instituted, reformed, or abrogated, but by the unity of the commons agreement, the lords accord, and your maj.'s royal and regal assent; only to your highness's prerogative nullity, by your own disassent to their conclusions, belongeth; for that this court standeth compounded of two powers; the one ordinary, the other absolute: ordinary, in the lords and commons proceedings: but in your highness, absolute, either negatively to frustrate, or affirmatively to confirm; but not to institute. The body of which court or council of estate

consisteth of two houses; the one, the lower house of parl. the members whereof are the knights of shires, and burgesses of towns and corporations; the other, the higher house, framed of the lords spiritual and temporal: the personal attendance of all which particular members your maj. by your prerogative royal, hath now commanded; and accordingly your dutiful and loyal subjects, the knights and burgesses of the lower house, have therein presented themselves, and, answerable to the ancient privilege of that place, and your gracious liberty and favour to them vouchsafed, the better thereby to avoid the inconvenience of parity, the mother of confusion and enemy to unity; have nominated my worthless self their unworthy Speaker; wherein although their affections and loves (the abuses of true opinion and judgment) have in this misguided their former known and approved wisdoms; yet it resteth in your regal power, either to breathe life, or pronounce death to this their yet unwarranted nomination. Give me leave therefore, most prudent and deserving sovereign, to appeal from their misled opinions, by the misguide of their favours, to your approved justice and judgment; and rather therein to blemish my defective self, by laying open my secret imperfections, and thereby endamaging only mine own particular private, than to deceive their hopes (being of me but waking dreams) and wrong the weight of this so great and important public service; which requireth to be managed by the absolute perfection of experience, the mother of prudence; by the profoundness of literature, the father of true judgment; and by the fulness and grace of nature's gifts, which are the beauty and ornament of arts and actions from the virtues of all and every whereof I am so far estranged, that not tasting of Parnassus's springs at all, nor of that honey, left upon the lips of Plato and Pindarus by the bees, birds of the muses; as I remain touched with the error of the contrary, and thereby am disabled to undergo the weight of so heavy a burthen, under which I do already groan, and shall both faint and fail, if not by your justice disburthened, or by your clemency commiserate. I therefore prostrating myself at the foot of your justice-seat, do implore my discharge; not moved thereto by any cold humour to your highness's service (for therein I rather chuse to be cooled by death than by want of will to neglect the same) but only through the frost-bitten defects of mine own imperfections; which if they could be repaired with mind's true zeal to affect that, which my heart desireth, then life breatheth not in that body, who more longeth to employ the same in all duties, that may to your maj. be serviceable, or to your highness acceptable. Notwithstanding, as your devoted subject and servant, I only and wholly subject myself, my state and life, as the true subject of your gracious pleasure; desiring not longer to live, than so to live, that my breath and life may breathe out to your maj. loyalty, faith, and obedience, whereof my life and death shall be my pawn and pledge."—[Here he stopp'd; but being told by the lord chanc. that the king would not excuse him, but confirm the election of the commons; he then proceeded:]—

"Most renowned Sovereign, If a divided mind may frame a well-joined answer, then may I say, too much, more than too justly, may your maj. condemn my wants, but never condemn my want of duty: for, although in this place of employment (now commanded) I ought and do, give precedency to many, yet to none in my will to do you service; for therein my zeal shall ever resemble the fire, hot, and yet trembling; hot, in my desire to discharge the full measure of my duty; but, Pisander like, trembling, in my fear, lest, through my imperfections, I fail in that, which I should perform. My course of life hath not been much conversant in the study of arts, which might make me speak 'scripta vel sculpta,' as Demosthenes wished; nor in the policies of state, of which a subject to his sovereign must speak 'breviter aut suaviter,' but in the profession and practice of the laws, which are 'nervi republicæ et ligamenta,' the bonds and sinews of this kingdom; which yield more fruits of reason, than words, the buds of art, and blossoming terms of eloquence: and therefore to confine myself within the proper element of my profession, and not to aim and snatch at things beyond my reach; be pleased, of all others most renowned sovereign, in few and unfiled words, to entertain with your gracious aspect a comparative resemblance between a body by nature and the body politic of this your maj.'s commonwealth, figured and drawn out of the rules of law; whereof, as the natural body of the one is framed of four principal parts, namely, of a head, of a body, of a life, and of a soul; so is the politic body of the other compounded of like four essential members; as of a head, of a body, of a life, and of a soul: and as, by the disbranching of any one particular from the natural body, the perfection of the whole is dissolved; so, by the dismembring from the politic body of any one of the four politic parts, the glory of the whole is disrooted. This politic head now is (and we all, with one zealous and united devotion, pray, long and long may be) your most honoured and best deserving self; this body politic now is, and still desire to be your loyal and faithful subjects; this politic life now is, and so well deserves to be, your highness's common and positive laws; this politic soul now is, and so of necessity must be, your absolute justice in the true distribution of the same. And as the natural head of the one (although the prince, and directing part of the whole) cannot be supported without his natural body, nor the natural body without his natural life, nor the natural life breathe without the soul; no more can the politic head of the other (although the supreme and commanding part) stand secure without his subjects, being the politic body, nor the politic body without his laws, being his politic life, nor his politic life without his politic soul, being execution.

And as the natural body of the one is subject to the imperfections of nature, and, in best health and fulness, findeth least his danger; so in peace and plenty, is the other subject to enormities of misguide and error; which made good laws spring out of bad manners; for if diseases were not, there needs no medicines; nor use of laws, but for restraint of evils. The natural head's providence protecteth the body from gross diseases, and discreet foresight preventeth afterclaps of danger; so the wisdom, prudence, and good guide of the politic head, is the sovereign preservative against the infectious poison of discord and disorder: and as to each part of the natural body belongeth, divers, several, and divided duties and offices to be performed; so is (or ought to be) every part of the politic body attended on with four particular virtues and properties: as, to the head there belongeth, first, zeal in religion, whereby God may be truly honoured; 2ndly, prudence in constituting laws, whereby the body may be rightly governed; 3rdly, magnanimity, to repel the fury, both of foes and fortunes; 4thly, justice, tempered so with mercy, whereby the well-disposed may not be drawn to presume, nor the rash and negligent delinquent driven to despair: to the body, first, devotion, to pray for the safety of so precious an head; 2ndly, minds and will to obey him in all faithful loyalty; 3rdly, hands and hearts, as brethren in unity, to fight against the common enemy in defence of his royal dignity; 4thly, purses prepared and open to supply the necessary occasions of his sovereignty: to the life, being the law, belongeth, first, to inform you our prince, how us your subjects to command; 2ndly, to direct us your subjects, how you our sovereign to obey; 3rdly, to instruct your highness's magistrates, and officers of justice, with knowledge how to adjudge; 4thly, to teach your ministers of government the mean and manner how to discipline; for ignorance of laws brings error in judgment, and error or corruption in judgment is the very plague of the innocent: the soul, being execution, requireth, first, to preserve the authority of laws from contempt; 2dly, to maintain the power of government in his absolute virtue; 3dly, to protect the oppressed from the tyranny of oppression; 4thly, to correct the oppressors with the sword of judicial censure, that your laws may not be cobwebs to punish little flies, and let the great escape; for lenity and gentleness to such so bad, is nothing else but cruelty to them that are good. A body of these mixtures, thus compounded, is both to the prince and subjects in earth, and all earthly things, 'summum bonum.' For the first four virtues of the head God is honoured, the people governed, enemies are repelled, justice without tyranny, and mercy without remissness distributed. By the second four duties of the body, the head is secured, loyalty performed, royalty defended, sovereignty in wars maintained, and in peace adorned. By the third four properties of the life, being the law, commandments are rightly commanded, obedience is truly yielded, judgments with knowledge are pronounced, executions without error executed. By the last four offices of the soul, being execution, you shall find laws in authority preserved, government in his virtue maintained, the oppressed strongly, yea, graciously protected, and the oppressors sharply and worthily corrected. And if any kingdom and body politic might appropriate the perfection of this so blessed happiness to themselves, it is we, now your maj.'s subjects, in our late deceased sovereign queen, and in you, our liege and living king: for such was the virtue of her princely regiment, that, as living, she lived, of her sex, the wonder of her time; so now dead, she liveth a true mirror to all succeeding ages. For that in her religion she was zealous, without wavering; in her counsels wise, without levity; in her determinings deliberate, without rashness; in her resolutions constant, without mutability; in her justice absolute, without cruelty; in her mercy temperate, without careless remissness; in her choice of magistrates of justice, and officers of attendance, curiously respective, without sudden admission; 1st, trying their deserts by the touchstone of her council's censure; and, 2ndly, approving them in the fire of the worth of their own virtues, and not by the value of their own corrupt-given rewards; misliking snaky ambition, that winds itself into many figures, till it slide into the room which it desires; but ever condemning it as an evil of dangerous consequence, to place worthless men in worthy places; foreknowing, they that want true sufficiency to raise themselves, will make them a ladder of any mischief: 2ndly, as a thing to herself dishonourable, unless with virtue she held the scales, and weighed their deserts in the balance of honour: 3rdly, to her subjects intolerable, to impose, or suffer, in place of justice, a bribing and corrupt magistrate: and lastly, to the government of the estate, she esteemed them the rocks of government's reproach, the quick-sands of true justice, and the whirlpool of the commonwealth's decay; wherein, if in ought misled by the error of information (from which the king of Heaven only, and no king on earth, is free) theirs, and not her's, was the deserved blame of that offence; whose example therein, being dead, if in ought so misguided, liveth to the living a lively admonisher, both to abhor and abandon temporising smoothers, Machavilian politiquers, and corrupt bribing informers, as the venomous poisoners of virtue's clear fountain. By which, and many other her princely governments, we, her people, loved her with our hearts true love; obeyed her with conscience, not by constraint; feared for her, never feared by her; prayed for her with the spirit of faith; and lived to die for her in all constant loyalty. The same love, the same obedience, the same fear, the same faith, and the self-same loyalty, we still retain, and faithfully, constantly, and religiously profess, protest, and present to your most sacred maj.

resolving ourselves, that, as by nature, you both descended from that blessed root of union, under whom, by whom, and from whom, she did, and your maj. now doth, wear and bear the imperial crown and scepter of this thrice blessed monarchy; that, as she did, so your maj. will bud the like or greater fruits of such a Solomon, and so heroic a root; whereof your zeal in religion, your unblemished course of life, your precedence before all other princes in divine and moral literature, your temperance in disposition, your justice in your judgments, your mercy to delinquents, and your approved magnanimity in dangers, these all give us assurance, that we have but exchanged our exquisite queen for an absolute king: and if success of ends may be foreknown by their beginnings, and conclusions approved by the premises, then may I conclude, that never were more blessed in their king, nor king more beloved and happy in his people: for such, and so high, was and is our esteem of your princely deserts, and such, and so great, did and do we value the price of your eminent and unmatched perfections, that without hearts grudging, minds murmuring, or thoughts discontent (some few impostumed persons, now disvomited, excepted) you wear, and long may wear, the imperial crown of this right powerful kingdom; whose people your maj. shall find by profession to be religious, without fantastical curiosity; by nature, to be resolute, without insolency; by subjection, to be loyal and faithful, without treason or treachery; by moderate discipline, to be tractable and obedient, without rebellion; and by law and authority only to seek to right their wrongs, without treacherous revenge, or public hostility; and yet, 'inter pares,' impatient of baseness and servility. 'Jura regalia' they usurp not; but to the crown they do their reverence, to the scepter their obedience, and the imperial sword they only fear; whereby this day, that, to foreign enemies and domestical discontents, was (ill mens' hope, and good mens' fear) to be the day of blood, is now become the day of England's settled peace and joyful safety; and may well be said, this is the day that the Lord hath made, let England rejoice and triumph in it; for that virtue is now no treason, nor no man wisheth the reign of Augustus, nor speaketh of the first times of Tiberius. And although some fiery-spirited detractors very fault-finding, and yet very faulty, have derogated from princes' regiment, from states' govt. from senates' integrity, from judges' justice, from magistrates' discipline, and from commons' obedience; yet foregoing time, and your maj.'s present and future trial, shall approve it a regiment never more renowned, a govt. never more constantly settled, a senate never more justly wise, judges never more judicially just, magistrates never more respectively vigilant, nor commons never more loyally obedient; and although, as men, subject to the imperfections of men, yet from hands' and hearts' corruption, as free from deserving accusation as such traducing earwigs are guilty of condemnation. And had your majesty before your princely arrival, been an eye and an ear-witness to the prudent and provident directions and endeavours of the then council of estate, of the regardful employment of the nobility, of the vigilant circumspection of the officers and ministers of justice, and generally of the loyal conformity and obedience of the commons, all in their several ranks endeavouring and agreeing, with hearts' true united consent, to your highness's instalment; you then would, out of your princely judgment, rather have approved it a free election than a descending right; wherein they expressed their judgments in your undoubted title, manifested their reverend respects to your high and admired virtues, and approved their loyalty to your approved crown and scepter. And although the policies of precedent time did forbear the public declaration of your then future, and now present right; yet was both the head and the body so far from purpose to impeach the same, that confidently I believe, and boldly dare affirm, that neither she nor they ever thought thought or dreamed dream to offer wrong to your succession therein; but as the one was in policy forborn, so in conscience the other was never purposed. And now, since God, to whose only prerogative the inthronizing and dethronizing of kings appertaineth, hath, by the setting of her sun, raised and spread the beams of your glory, and by calling her to his heavenly service hath freed her from her temporal regiment, and hath, out of his divine providence, crowned you with the same crown, blessed you with the same religion, enriched you with the same dominions, and strengthened you with the hearts of the self-same subjects and people; that, as she did, so your maj. will be pleased to protect us in our religion, to favour us in our loyalties, to cherish us in our obedience, and to nourish us in our faithful subjection. And as to her, so to you, we faithfully prostrate and subject ourselves, our state, and lives to be disposed and sacrificed for and in your maj.'s service; religiously praying, that your highness's govt. and our subjection may be to God pleasing; to you, our sovereign, absolute; to enemies and traitors powerful and fearful; and to all true devoted subjects fruitful and comfortable: then shall God be glorified, your maj. renowned, religion advanced, and your state and people secured from Pope's cursings, enemies' oppressions, and traitors' treacheries; whereunto all true English hearts say, Amen. And thus being by the rules of discretion foretold, that to offend your sacred ears with 'multa,' since to satisfy your gracious expectation with 'multum' is denied me, were an error, of errors the most erroneous. Therefore, since I retain not the virtue of the one, give me leave, most magnificent sovereign, to prevent the error of the other; and in these few words be pleased to receive as much as can be conceived, may proceed from a man and mind, truly and wholly devoted to your service; who desireth no longer to breathe, than so to breathe, that his breath may breathe out to your maj. loyalty, faith, and obedience, whereof his life and death shall be his pawn and pledge: who here, upon the knees of my duty, in all humility, do present to your gracious consideration five petitions; the benefit of three whereof are peculiar to mine own particular, the other two to the knights, burgesses, and members of the lower house of parl. The first whereof is, that if, in your gracious eyes, ears, or judgment, during the time of this mine employment and service, I have, do, or shall, through my imperfections (which already appear to your maj. to be too too many) either in manner, form, or matter, neglect that which I ought to have performed, or err in that which I ought not to have done, that your maj. will be pleased, out of your clemency, rather to commiserate the same, than out of your justice therein to correct my unwilling committed errors. Secondly, that if any, by private information, endeavour to possess your sacred ears with matter of blemish or detraction concerning my course of proceeding, that your gracious censure thereof may be suspended, until, by your pleasure, I be called to my trial and your judgment: for that many things may be either miscarried or misconceived in causes of this nature.—Thirdly, that as occasion shall move, I may, by your royal favour, be permitted access to your princely presence, in places and times convenient, for such negotiations, as the duty of my place shall require. Fourthly, *." What followed is omitted in the Journals; but it could be no more than the common form of asking for liberty of speech, &c. which, as usual, was granted.

Affront offered to a Member.] The first thing the Commons went upon, when they were returned to their own house, was, to examine into a complaint, then made, by sir Herbert Crofts, one of their members. It seems this gent. coming up with others to hear the king's speech, in the house of lords, had the door shut upon him; and one Bryan Tashe, a yeoman of the guard, violently repulsed sir Herbert, saying, 'Goodman Burgess you come not here.' This was resented as an affront to the whole house; and it might have proved vexatious, had not one of the officers of state made up the matter; so the house was contented with Tashe's acknowledging and asking pardon for his fault, and receiving a reprimand from the Speaker, on his knees, at the bar for it.

Act for recognising the King's Title.] The first bill that was brought into the Lords bore this title, 'A most joyful and just Recognition of the immediate, lawful, and undoubted Succession, Descent, and Right of the Crown.' In the course of two days it passed the Lords, and was sent down to the Commons, by an extraordinary commission. The Commons were no less eager to pay their compliments to their new king; for March 31, we find this entry in the Lords' Journals. "This day the bill intituled 'An act for a most joyful and just recognition, &c.' was returned to their lordships from the lower house, by the hands of mr. sec. Herbert, accompanied by the most part of the knights and burgesses of the said house, who signified their joyful acceptance of the said bill, and their willingness in expediting it, by giving 3 several readings to the same, as soon as they received it."

A grand Conference between the Two Houses.] March 26. On a motion of the lord Cecil, a Conference was agreed upon to be had with a certain number of the Lower House, concerning the public State of the Nation; and on two things, in particular, Purveyors and Respite of Homage. To which the Commons desired might be added another article concerning the matter of Wards: answer was returned back, by the Lords, "That they liked well the motion for a Conference, touching the last mentioned matter. But, with all, because there were several other things that did concern the public state; of which it was, likewise proper to have conference, before hand, for the better furtherance of the public service; and, in regard, the said matters were of importance, their lordships desire them to increase the number of their committee as they intended to do theirs. A large committee of lords were accordingly appointed, consisting of 9 earls, 1 visc. 6 bps. and 13 barons; who were to be attended by the 2 lord chief justices, 4 judges, mr. serjeant Crook, and mr. attorney-general. The commons deputed about 60 knights and burgesses of their house; and this is all that the Journals of the Lords mention of this matter. But the Journals of the Commons are not so silent; for it was, indeed, a business of importance to the Liberties and Privileges of that House. Rapin, (from Coke) represents this affair as another instance of this king's aiming at absolute power. In order to introduce this matter, we shall give a paragraph from this author's History of England, (v. 2, p. 168) and then subjoin the whole Account, as it stands in the Journals of the Commons at this day. "Immediately after the opening of the parl. the Commons examining, according to custom, the contested Elections, there was a debate in the house about the return of sir Francis Goodwin, and sir John Fortescue, for knight of the shire for the county of Bucks, and upon a full hearing, sir Francis was declared duly elected. Three days after, the Lords sent a message to the Commons, that there might be a conference about Goodwin's election. The Commons surprised at so extraordinary a message, answered, They did not think themselves obliged to give an account of their proceedings, and therefore could not grant the conference required. The Lords replied, the king having been acquainted with what had passed in Goodwin's case, thought himself engaged in honour to have the affair debated again, and had ordered them to confer with the Commons upon it. Whereupon, the Commons, by their Speaker, gave their reasons to the king, why they could not admit of this innovation. But all they could obtain was, that instead of a conference with the Lords, the king commanded them to confer with the judges. This pleased them no more than the other. They set down their reasons in writing, and delivered them at the Council-Chamber, to desire their lordships to intercede for them to the king, not to violate their privileges. The answer was, the king absolutely commanded them to have a conference with the judges. The Commons were extremely surprised at so absolute an order. Meanwhile, fearing to be accused of too easily engaging in a quarrel with the king, they thought it more proper to yield, than stand out, fully bent however to adhere to what had been determined in the case of the contested Election. Certainly the king had engaged in a very nice affair, and probably would not have come off with honour, had he not been disengaged by Goodwin's moderation. Sir Francis chusing to forfeit his right rather than occasion a quarrel between the King and the Commons, desired the house to order the county of Bucks to elect another knight in his stead. The King and Commons equally accepted of this expedient, which prevented them from coming to extremities; but the king found from hence, that no great account was made of the proclamation upon calling the parl. whereby he meant to be master of the elections." Thus far mr. Rapin. This Case of sir Fra. Goodwin was printed, by order of the House of Commons, in 1704, under the direction of Rob. Harley, esq. (afterwards earl of Oxford) then Speaker, on occasion of the famous debate, at that time, upon the Aylesbury Election.

The Case between sir Francis Goodwin and sir John Fortescue, relative to a Return for the County of Buckingham.] The first motion was made on the 22d of March, by sir Wm. Fleetwood, one of the knights returned for the county of Bucks, on the behalf of sir Fra. Goodwin, knt. who, upon the first writ of summons directed to the sheriff of Bucks, was elected the first knt. for that shire: but the return of his election being made, it was refused by the clerk of the crown, quia utlagatus: and because sir John Fortescue, upon a 2d writ, was elected, and entered in that place, his desire was, That this Return might be examined, and sir Fra. Goodwin received as a member of the house. The house gave way to the motion; and for a more deliberate and judicial proceeding in a case of Privilege so important to the house, Ordered, "That the serjeant (the proper officer of the house) should give warning to the clerk of the crown to appear at the bar at 3 o'clock the next morning, and to bring with him all the writs of summons, indentures, and returns of elections for the county of Bucks, made and returned for this parl.; and to give warning also to sir Fra. Goodwin, to attend in person, whom their pleasure was to hear, ore tenus, to deliver the state of his own cause, and the manner and reasons of the proceeding in the election of the knights of the shire for that county."

March 23. Sir George Coppin, clerk of the crown, appeared at the bar accordingly, and produced all the writs of summons, indentures, and returns made of the knights for Buckinghamshire for this parl.; which were severally read by the clerk of the house, and then the clerk of the crown was commanded to retire to the door: and after, sir Fra. Goodwin himself attending to know the pleasure of the house, was called in, to deliver the state of his own cause, ore tenus; wherein he was heard at large, and commanded again to retire until the house had determined what to do. In this mean time the whole Case was at large opened, and argued 'pro et contra,' by sundry learned and grave members of the house; and after much dispute, the Question was agreed upon and made: "Whether sir Fra. Goodwin were lawfully elected and returned one of the knights for Bucks, and ought to be admitted and received as a member of this house?" Upon this Question, it was resolved in the affirmative, 'That he was lawfully elected and returned, and, (de jure), ought to be received.' Hereupon the clerk of the crown was commanded to file the first indenture of return: and order was given, That sir Francis should presently take the oath of supremacy as usual, and his place in the house; which he did accordingly.

March 27. Sir Fra. Bacon, in reporting a conference with the Lords, touching wardship and other things, reported, That a lord touched the Case of sir Fra. Goodwin as a thing he had heard at large, but did not understand it; and therefore desired to know it more particularly from this house. To which answer was made, That they had no warrant from the house to speak of it.—Sir Edw. Coke, his maj.'s attorney-general, and mr. dr. Hone, bring a message from the Lords, expressing with what acceptation their lordships entertained their motion yesterday, not only for the matter, being of very great weight and consequence, but especially for the manner; namely, "That, touching wardship, they would not petition for ease in it as a matter of wrong, but of grief; and pray to be relieved by grace, and not by justice: and their lordships for answer were desirous, and moved at that time to couple in the same petition the matter of grievance, of respite of homage; which his maj. out of his gracious favour and love to his people, had himself taken knowledge of. And as they conceive it to be likely, that the conference may continue between the 2 houses, touching the said matters; as they are very zealous of the furtherance of their purpose, so are they jealous of any impediment that may breed lett or hindrance therein: therefore they desire, for a more clear proceeding and removing of all stumbling-blocks, that the former committees may, in a 2d conference to be had, have authority to treat touching the Case of sir Fra. Goodwin, the kn. for Buckinghamshire, first of all, before any other matter were farther proceeded in." The Answer to this message was, (as usual), "That they would return answer by messengers of their own."—Upon this message it was argued by some, "That in no sort they should give account to the Lords of their proceedings in the house; but that mr. Speaker should from the house be a suitor to his maj. to have access, and as their common mouth give his highness satisfaction by direction from the house: that now the judgment of sir Fra. Goodwin's Case having passed the house, it could not, nor ought not, to be reversed by them. A precedent, an. 27 Eliz. cited; where a bill brought down from the Lords, upon the 1st reading was rejected; the Lords sent messengers to demand a reason of their judgment: it was denied to yield any reason." This argument brought forth this question, which mr. Speaker was ordered by the house presently to make, viz. Whether they should confer with the Lords, touching the Case of sir Fra. Goodwin, the kn. for Buckinghamshire? and resolved, That they should not. It was then considered as fit to return some answer to the message from the Lords; and mr. sec. Herbert, with some other of the committees, were appointed to deliver to their lordships, from the house, "That they did conceive it did not stand in honour and order of the house, to give account of any their proceedings or doings: but if their lordships have any purpose to confer for the residue, that then they will be ready at such time and place, and with such number as their lordships shall think meet." Upon the last message to the lords, the messengers return, "That their lordships would presently send answer by messengers of their own."—Sir Edw. Coke, his maj.'s attorney-gen. dr. Carew, dr. Hone, and mr. Tyndall, delivered from the Lords, "That their lordships taking notice in particular of the return of the sheriff of Bucks; and acquainting his maj. with it, his highness conceived himself engaged and touched in honour that there might be some conference of it between the two houses; and to that end, signified his pleasure unto them, and by them to this house." Upon this Message, so extraordinary and unexpected, the house entered into some consideration what were fit to be done; and it was resolved, "That his maj. might be moved for access the next day. And afterwards they understood his pleasure to be, That they should attend at Whitehall at 8 the next morning. But because the time was then somewhat far spent, they ordered, That the house, with mr. Speaker, should meet at 6 the next morning in the house. Yet afore their rising, they thought fit to name a committee of 29 members, to set down the effect of that which mr. Speaker was to deliver from the house to the king, who were to meet at 4 that afternoon at the parliament-chamber in the Middle-Temple.—Accordingly, March 28. Mr. Speaker, with a great number of the house, assembled at 6 in the morning, with a purpose to treat and resolve what should be delivered to his maj. (being appointed to attend him the same morning at 8) touching the reasons of their proceeding in sir Fra. Goodwin's Case: but because the house was not then thought full enough for a matter of that consequence, they proceeded to the reading of bills. Upon motion touching mr. Speaker's attendance on the king, a committee was named to accompany him, consisting of all the privy-council, being members of the house, and 67 more. Mr. Speaker, together with these committees, were this day, at 8 in the morning, appointed to attend his maj. and to relate the reasons of the proceeding of the house in sir Fra. Goodwin's Case; where, upon answer or reply, such lawyers as be of the committee are to give their assistance.

March 29th. Mr. Speaker related what he had delivered to the king by warrant from the house, touching their proceeding in sir Fras. Goodwin's case, and his maj.'s answer; whereof, because part was afterwards penned by select committees, read in the house, and offered in writing to the king, he had but touched the heads, omitting many circumstances. He said, he first delivered, 1, the Manner and Matter. 2, then such Precedents as had been vouched and stood upon. 3, he opened the body of the law for election. The first writ of summons, dated ult. Jan. before the parl.: the writ issued duly: the liberty was free, by that writ, to choose in 'pleno comitatu': the election was made according to that writ, and the indenture duly returned; and therefore adjudged by the house, That this first election being good, the second was consequently void. For the matter of Utlawry against sir F. Goodwin, there was one prosecuted against him, at the suit of Johnson, 31 Eliz. for 60l. and was laid and proceeded in the Hustings, London. Another, at the suit of one Hacker, for 16l. 39 Eliz. That sir Francis had since been chosen, admitted, and served as a member of this house, in the several parliaments holden 39 and 43 Eliz. That the Utlawry remained in the Hustings, so as the law could not take notice of it; neither was it pleadable. 1 Eliz. one Smith was found utlawed, and privileged by the house. 23 Eliz. one Vaughan utlawed, and, upon the question and division of the house, privileged, being carried with the difference of 6 voices. 35 Eliz. 3 precedents vouched. 39 Hen. VI. [Here the accurate editor of the printed Journals makes this remark, "The words (39 H. 6.) seem to be improperly inserted here, and are, in the book of notes, placed before the citation of Smyth's case, 1 Eliz. and in the margin of the Journal itself against these words is written Quare."] Fitz-Herbert: the case not judged, but opinions delivered. Mr. John Killegree, having 52 utlawries returned against him, was admitted to serve in the house. Sir Wm. Harecourt was found 18 times utlawed, and yet was admitted to serve. The manner of the Election is limited by the statute. The supposed utlawry, 31 Eliz. against sir Francis was no utlawry at all; for wheresoever a man is sued, the proclamation ought to go into the county where the party dwelleth, or else the utlawry is not good. 39 and 43 Eliz. The general pardon is good for utlawries, against all, saving the party at whose suit. 31 Eliz. It was Franciscus Goodwin, gen. 39 Eliz. Franciscus Goodwin, armig. The sheriff is no judge of the utlawry, neither could take notice it was the same man; and therefore could not properly return him utlawed.—That his maj. answered, "He was loth he should be forced to alter his tune; and that he should now change it into matter of grief, by way of contestation." He did sample it to the murmur and contradiction of the people of Israel. He did not attribute the cause of his grief to any purpose in the house to offend him, but only to a mistaking of the law. For matters of fact, he answered them all particularly, That for his part he was indifferent which of them was chosen, sir John or sir Francis: that they could suspect no special affection in him, because this was a counsellor not brought in by himself. That he had no purpose to impeach their privilege; but since they derived all matters of privilege from him, and by his grant, he expected they should not be turned against him. That there was no precedent did suit this case fully; precedents in the times of minors, of tyrants, of women, of simple kings, not to be credited, because for some private ends. By the law this house ought not to meddle with returns, being all made into the chancery, and are to be corrected or reformed by that court only, into which they are returned. An. 35 H. 6. It was the resolution of all the judges, that matter of utlawry was a sufficient cause of dismission of any member out of the house. That the judges have now resolved, That sir F. Goodwin standeth utlawed according to the laws of this land. In conclusion, it was his maj.'s special charge unto us, That, 1, the course already taken should be truly reported. 2, that we should debate the matter, and resolve amongst ourselves. 3, that we should admit of conference with the judges. 4, that we should make report of all the proceedings unto the council." This relation being made, the house did not enter into any further consideration of the matter at that time; but resolved and ordered, That it should be the first matter moved the next morning.

March 30th. It was moved and urged by a member, touching the difference now on foot between the king and the house, "that there is just fear of some great abuse in the late Election. That in his conscience the king hath been much misinformed; and that he had too many misinformers, which he prayed God might be removed or lessened in their number. That now the Case of sir John Fortescue and sir Fs. Goodwin was become the Case of the whole kingdom. That old lawyers forget, and commonly interpret the law according to the time; that by this course the free election of the country is taken away, and none shall be chosen but such as shall please the king and council. Let us therefore, with fortitude, understanding, and sincerity, seek to maintain our privilege; which cannot be taken or construed any contempt in us, but merely a maintenance of our common right, which our ancestors have left us, and is just and fit for us to transfer to our posterity."

Another, for a law to be made, "That never any man outlawed should shew his face here again. The difference, he observed, was some unrespective carriage towards his maj. in this matter: and therefore let our proceeding be dutiful and careful towards him, in advising of some speedy course to give his maj. satisfaction; that is (as he conceived) according to the king's project, first, to advise amongst ourselves, and then to confer with the judges, not as parliament-men, but as counsellors; not as though they were to reverse our errors, but that we might be better informed; not now the case of sir John and sir Francis, but a case of great difference between the king and us, wherein we are deeply to consider the consequence if this pique be bruited in the country, abroad, or beyond the seas. It is fit we let the king see how much we take to heart this matter, sythence our affections have so much appeared in the passing and present expediting of the act of recognition, &c. Concl. That we should tender our humble petition to his maj. for leave to make a law for the banishing of all outlaws hereafter from the parl. and pray that we may hold all our privileges entire."

A 3rd, "That we ought not to contest with the king; that it is fit to have a conference: that by it we shall lose no privilege, but rather gain; for the matters of the conference will be two, satisfaction of the king, and putting in certainty our privilege. All is not yet said that may be said; we are not to dispute with one that is governor of 30 legions. 'Confitendum est ne frustra interrogasset.' Let us deal plainly and freely with the lords, and let them know all the reasons. They are jealous of the honour of a privy-counsellor, we of the Freedom of Election. It is fit great men maintain their prerogative; so is it fit that we maintain our privileges. This is a Court of Record, therefore ought we by all means seek to preserve the honour and dignity of it. If a burgess be chosen for two places, the burgess makes his choice for which he will serve, and a warrant shall be directed from mr. Speaker, in the name of the house, to the clerk of the crown to send forth a writ for a new election for the other place left; which is a direct proof that it is a Court of Power and of Record. We have a clerk and a register; all matters that pass here are entered of record, and preserved. As they stand for the honour of a counsellor, so we for our privileges. It is to be wished, that we had a law to declare our privileges, that we have a court of record and a register. Obj. We (they say) are but half of the body, and the Lords are the parts nearest the head. Ans. Nothing ascends to the head but by the breasts, &c. Concl. That we may pray it may be explained by a law what our privileges are; and that no man outlawed may hereafter be admitted. There must be a judge of the return before we sit; and this is now judged according to the positive laws of the realm by the king, which infringeth not our liberty, since we judge after the court is set, according to discretion. No precedent, That any man was put out of the house for utlawry; therefore it had been fit we should have desired to inform the king that he was misinformed. Let us now leave this particular Case to the king, and consider and resolve of the material questions that will fall out in the debate of it. 1. Whether this court hath power to take notice of returns made before we sit here? 2. Whether men utlawed may be of the house? 3. Whether a man pardoned, having not sued forth a writ of scire facias, may be called in question? 4. Whether the writ were returned the 17th of Feb. or no, upon oath of the sheriff?"

"Some others were strong in opinion, That we ought not to confer nor to commit, saying, That majesty had conferred with justice; yet majesty had left the stopping of the wound to us. We should taint ourselves with 3 great blemishes, if we should alter our judgment, levity, cruelty and cowardice. There be 3 degrees of upright judgment, motion, examination, judgment: all these have passed us. No court can reform their own judgment. Every day a term here. Every act that passeth this house is an act of parl. Shall justice float up and down? Shall he be a member to-day and shall we tear him off to-morrow? If the member be sound it is violence: If the hand tear the rest it is cruelty. No part torn, but it may bleed to the ruin of the whole.—Let sir F. Goodwin stand as he is: duty and courage may stand together; let not the house be inveigled by suggestions. This may be called a 'quo warranto' to seize our liberties. There hath been 3 main objections.

1. The King's Exception. We could shew no precedent in this kind. Ans. The king could shew no such writ before. Our hands were never sought to be closed before, nor we prevented. It opens a gap to thrust us all into the petty-bag. A chancellor may call a parl. of what persons he will by this course. Any suggestion, by any person, may be cause of sending a new writ.

2. Objection by the Lord Chief Justice. By the law we had nothing to do to examine returns. Ans. Judges cannot take notice of private customs or privileges: but we have a privilege which stands with the law. The judges informed the king of the law, but not of the case of privilege. It is true, 35 H. VI. all the judges resolved, that no outlawed man ought to be admitted; but that was controlled by parl. It is the same opinion now; let us controll it as then; we have done no offence to the state: let us therefore be constant in our own judgment.

3. Objec.  Another; The King's pleasure, that we should deliver the reasons of that we have done to be just. If we clear our contempt, we have discharged ourselves. The king's-bench cannot reverse their judgment the same term; therefore not the parl. Let us send a message to the Lords, that we are ready so to do, as we do not undo this house.

Others; 'Non coronabitur qui non legitime certaverit.' Not to be termed a difference between his maj. and the commons. 'Rogamus auguste, non pugnamus.' The question is not of matter of privilege, but of judgment. Let us attend them as lords of the council, and not as of parl. We do no ways contest or contend with his maj. The king is no way bound in honour. If writs go forth unduly, they may be controlled without impeachment to the king's honour. It is the act of his inferior officers. It is now come to this question, Whether the chancery or parl. ought to have authority? Quest. Whether we ought to satisfy the king in his commandment? The king's message was, That we should consider within ourselves, and resolve of ourselves; then no need to confer with the judges: if we cannot, then it is fit to be resolved by the judges. The judges have judged, and we have judged; what need then of conference? Let there be no spark of that grace taken from us, which we have had already from his maj. Let our reasons be put into articles, and delivered in all humbleness unto him.

Upon the conclusion of this debate in this manner, the house proceeded to question; and the first was, 1. Q. Whether the house was resolved in the matter? And the question was answered by general voice, That the whole house was resolved. 2. Q. Whether the reasons of their proceeding shall be set down in writing? And it was resolved, That they shall, and ordered further, That a committee should be named for that purpose, and appointed first to set them down in writing, and to bring them to the house, there to be published, and to receive their allowance.—A committee was instantly named, consisting of mr. Recorder of London, mr. Solicitor, mr. Attorney of the Wards, all the serjeants at law, and 37 members more, to meet this afternoon, at 2, in the exchequer chamber. The authority given unto them by the house, was this: "The house being resolved, upon the question, That the reasons of their precedent resolution, touching the return, admittance and retaining of sir F. Goodwin as a member of this house, should be set down in writing; these committees were specially appointed to perform that service, and have warrant from the house to send for any officer, to view and search any record, or other thing of that kind, which may help their knowledge or memory in this particular service: and having deliberately by general consent set down all such reasons, they are to bring them in writing into the house, there to be read and approved, as shall be thought fit.

April 2. It was moved, That committees might be named to take the examination of the sheriff of Buckinghamshire, who was by former order sent for, and now come. And a committee were named and appointed to take his examination presently.—Sir Charles Cornwallis moved in excuse of sir Fras. Goodwin's absence from the house, and prayeth, That they would as well in their own judgment pardon it, as witness and affirm his care and modesty, upon all occasions, to the king, in that he hath forborn, during all the time of this question, to come into the house.

The Examination of the Sheriff having been presently taken by the committees, was returned in this form.—"Interr. 1. Why he removed the county from Aylesbury to Brickhill? He saith, it was by reason of the plague being at Aylesbury, the county being the 25th of Jan. at which time three were dead of the plague there. This was the only motive of removing his county.—"Interr. 2. Whether he were present at the first Election? He was present, and was as faithful to wish this second place to sir Frans. Goodwin, as the first to sir John Fortescue; sent sir F. Goodwin word, before the election, he should not need to bring any freeholders, for the election he thought would be without scruple for them both; first to sir John, second to sir Francis. About 8 o'clock he came to Brickhill; was then told by sir George Throckmorton, and others, that the first voice would be given for sir Francis; he answered, He hoped it would not be so, and desired every gent. to deal with his freeholders. After 8 went to the election, a great number there being children, never at the county. After the writ read, he first intimated the points of the proclamation; then jointly propounded sir John Fortescue and sir F. Goodwin. The freeholders cried first, 'A Goodwin! a Goodwin!' Every justice of peace on the bench said, 'A Fortescue! a Fortescue!' and came down from the bench before they named any for a second place, and desired the freeholders to name sir John Fortescue for the first. Sir F. Goodwin being in a chamber near, was sent for by the sheriff and justices; and he came down and earnestly perswaded with the freeholders, saying, 'sir John was his good friend, had been his father's, and that they would not do sir John that injury: notwithstanding the freeholders would not desist, but all cried, 'A Goodwin! a Goodwin!' some crying, 'A Fortescue!' to the number of 60 or thereabouts, the other for sir F. Goodwin, being about 200 or 300; and sir Francis, to his thinking, dealt very plainly and earnestly in this matter for sir John Fortescue; for that sir Francis did so earnestly protest it unto him.—"Interr. 3. Who laboured him to make the return so long before the day of the parl.? He being here in London, mr. attorney general, the 2d of March, at his chamber in the Inner Temple, delivered him two cap. utlagat. against sir Francis Goodwin; and before he made his return, he went and advised with mr. attorney about his return, who penned it, and so it was done by his direction: and the return being written, upon Friday after the king's coming through London, near about my lord chancellor's gate, in the presence of sir John Fortescue, he delivered the writ to sir George Coppin: and at this time (it being about 4 in the afternoon) and before they parted, sir John Fortescue delivered him the second writ sealed; sir John Fortescue, sir George Coppin, and himself, being not above an hour together at that time, and never had but this new writ of parl. to him delivered.—Subscribed, Francis Cheyne.—This was returned by the Committee to the hands of the clerk, but not at all read in the house.

Mr. Speaker remembereth the matter of conference with the judges, and offereth to repeat and put again the Questions that were formerly made; being before uncertainly and imperfectly left (as he said) in the case of Buckinghamshire, viz. 1. Whether the house were resolved in the matter? 2. Whether they should confer with the judges? And at length induced the house to entertain the latter question; and, being made, was carried by general voice in the negative, 'No conference.'—Upon this passage, it was urged for a rôle, That a Question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again; but must stand as a judgment of the house.—It was thought fit that mr. Speaker should attend the committee for penning the reasons in sir Francis Goodwin's Case, not by commandment, but voluntary of himself.

April 3. The Reasons of the Proceeding of the House in sir Francis Goodwin's Case, penned by the committee, were, according to former order, brought in by mr. Francis Moore, and read by the clerk, directed in form of a Petition:—

"To the King's most excellent Majesty. The humble Answer of the Commons House of Parliament to his Majesty's Objections in sir Francis Goodwin's Case."

"Most gracious, our dear and dread sovereign, relation being made to us by our Speaker, of your maj.'s royal clemency and patience in hearing us, and of your princely prudence in discerning; shewing affectionate desire rather to receive satisfaction to clear us, than cause to pardon us: we do in all humbleness render our most bounden thanks for the same: protesting, by the bond of our allegiance, That we never had thought to offend your maj.; at whose feet we shall ever lie prostrate, with loyal hearts, to sacrifice ourselves and all we have for your maj.'s service: and in this particular, we could find no quiet in our minds, that would suffer us to entertain other thoughts, until we had addressed our answer to your most excellent maj.; for which, nevertheless, we have presumed of the longer time, in respect we have prepared some precedents, requiring search, to yield your maj. better satisfaction."—There were objected against us by your maj. and your rev. judges, 4 things, to impeach our proceedings, in receiving Francis Goodwin, knt. into our house.

Objection 1. The first, That we assume to ourselves power of examining of the elections and returns of knights and burgesses which belongeth to your maj.'s Chancery, and not to us: for that all returns of writs were examinable in the courts wherein they are returnable; and the parliament writs being returnable into the chancery, the returns of them must needs be there examined and not with us.

Our humble Answer is, That, until the 7th of Hen. IV. all parliament writs were returnable into the parl.; as appeareth by many precedents of record ready to be shewed, and consequently the returns there examinable: in which year a statute was made, That thenceforth every parliament writ, containing the day and place where the parl. shall be holden, should have this clause, viz. "Et Electionem tuam in pleno comitatu factam distincte & aperte sub sigillo tuo & sigillis eorum, qui electioni illi interfuerint, nobis in Cancellariam nostram ad diem & locum in brevi content' certifies indilate."—By this, although the form of the writ be somewhat altered, yet the power of the parl. to examine and determine of elections, remaineth; for so the statute hath been always expounded ever sithence, by use to this day: and for that purpose, both the clerk of the crown hath always used to [attend] all the parliament time, upon the Commons House, with the writs and returns; and also the Commons in the beginning of every parl. have ever used to appoint special committees, all the parliament time, for examining controversies concerning elections and returns of knights and burgesses: during which time, the writs and indentures remain with the clerk of the crown; and after the parl. ended, and not before, are delivered to the clerk of the Petty-Bag in Chancery, to be kept there; which is warranted by Reason and Precedents: reason; for that it is fit that the returns should be in that place examined, where the appearance and service of the writ is appointed. The appearance and service is in parl. therefore the return examinable in parl.—Precedents: one in the 29th Eliz. where, after one writ awarded into Norfolk for the choice of knights, and election made and returned, a second was, before the parliament-day, awarded by the lord chancellor, and thereupon another election and return made; and the Commons being attended with both writs and returns by the clerk of the crown, examined the cause, allowed the first, and rejected the second. So 23 Eliz. a burgess was returned dead, and a new chosen, and returned by a new writ: the party returned dead appeared; the Commons, notwithstanding the sheriff's return, admitted the first chosen, and rejected the second. Also, the said 23d year, a burgess chosen for Hull was returned lunatic, and a new chosen upon a second writ: the first claimed his place; the Commons examined the cause, and finding the return of lunacy to be true, they refused him; but if it had been false, they would have received him.—43 Eliz. the sheriff of Rutlandshire returned himself elected; the Commons finding that he was not eligible by law, sent a warrant to the Chancery for a new writ to chuse anew.—48 Eliz. also a burgess was chosen burgess for two boroughs; the Commons, after he had made election on which he would serve for, sent warrant to the Chancery for a writ to chuse a new for the other borough: of which kind of precedents there are many other, wherewith we spare to trouble your maj. All which together, viz. use, reason and precedents, do concur to prove the Chancery to be a place appointed to receive the returns, as to keep them for the parl. but not to judge of them; and the inconvenience might be great, if the Chancery might, upon suggestions or sheriffs returns, send writs for new elections, and those not subject to examination in parl.: for so, when fit men were chosen by the counties and boroughs, the lord chancellor, or the sheriffs, might displace them, and send out new writs, until some were chosen to their liking; a thing dangerous in precedents for the time to come, howsoever we rest securely from it at this present by the now lord chancellor's integrity.

Object. 2. That we dealt in the cause with too much precipitation, not seemly for a council of gravity, and without respect to your most excellent maj. our sovereign, who had directed the writ to be made; and being but half a body, and no Court of Record alone, refused Conference with the Lords, the other half, notwithstanding they prayed it of us.

Our humble Answer is, to the Precipitation, That we entered into this cause, as in other parl. of like cases hath been accustomed; calling to us the clerk of the crown, and viewing both the writs, and both the returns; which in cases of  and motions, though not of bills (requiring 3 readings), hath been warrant by continual usage amongst us: and thereupon, well finding that the latter writ was awarded and sealed before the Chancery was repossessed of the former, which the clerk of the crown, and the sheriff of the county, did both testify, and well held to be a clear fault in law, proceeded to sentence with the less respect of the latter election. For our lack of respect to your maj. we confess, with grief of our hearts, we are right sorry it shall be so conceived; protesting, That it was no way made known unto us before that time, that your maj. had taken to yourself any special notice, or directed any course in that cause, other than the ordinary awarding writs by your highness's officers in that behalf; but if we had known as much (as some will have) by your maj.'s royal mouth, we would not, without your maj.'s privity, have proceeded in that manner. And further, it may please your maj. to give us leave to inform you, That in the Examination of the Cause, the sheriff avouched unto us, That Goodwin agreed to yield the first place of the two knights to sir John Fortescue, and in his own person, at the time of election, with extraordinary earnestness, entreated the electors it might so be, and caused the indentures to be made up to that purpose; but the electors utterly refused to seal them. Concerning our refusing Conference with the Lords, there was none desired until after our sentence passed; and then we thought, That in a matter private to our own house, which, by rules of order, might not be by us revoked, we might, without any imputation, refuse to confer. Yet, understanding by their lordships, that your maj. had been informed against us, we made haste (as in all duty we were bound) to lay open to your maj. our good and gracious sovereign, the whole manner of our proceeding; not doubting, though we were but part of a body, as to make new laws, yet for any matter of priviledges of our house, we are, and ever have been, a court of ourselves, of sufficient power to discern and determine without their lordships, as their lordships have used always to do for theirs without us.

Object. 3. That we have, by our sentence of receiving Goodwin, admitted that Outlaws may be Makers of Laws; which is contrary to all Laws.

Our humble Answer is, that notwithstanding the precedents which we truly delivered, of admitting and retaining outlaws in personal actions in the Commons House, and none remitted for that cause; yet we received so great satisfaction, delivered from your royal maj.'s own mouth, with such excellent strength and light of reason, more than before, in that point, we heard or did conceive, as we forthwith prepared an act to pass our house, That all outlaws henceforth shall stand disabled to serve in parl.; but as concerning Goodwin's particular, it could not appear unto us, having thoroughly examined all parts of the proceedings against him, That he stood an outlaw, by the laws of England, at the time of the election made of him by the county; and that for two causes: the 1st is, that where the party outlawed ought to be 5 times proclaimed to appear in the sheriff's county court; and then not appearing, ought to be adjudged outlawed by the judgment of the coroners of the county; there appeareth no record made in the Hustings of London, that Goodwin was five times proclaimed, or that the coroners gave judgment of outlawry against him: but a clerk lately come to that office hath now, many years after the time, and since this election, made entries, interlined with a new hand, that he was outlawed; to which new entries we could give no credit, for that the parties, at whose suit Goodwin was sued, have testified in their writings of release, That they never proceeded further than to take out the writ of Exigent for an outlawry; and being then paid their money, desisted there; by which we find, that Goodwin was not 5 times proclaimed, nor adjudged outlawed, being a thing usual in London to spare that proclamation and judgment, if the party call not upon it; and no record being made for made years together that either of them was done. The 2nd cause was, for that the writ of Exigent, by which the sheriff was commanded to proclaim him 5 times, was never lawfully returned, nor certified by certiorari; without which we take it that Goodwin stood not disabled as an outlaw. —To this, adding the two general pardons by parl. which had cleared the outlawry in truth and substance (if any were;) and that Goodwin could not apply the pardons by scire facias, for that no record nor return was extant of the outlawry, whereupon he might ground a scire facias, we were of opinion, and so your maj.'s most rev. judges would have been, if they had known thus much, That Goodwin stood not disabled by outlawry to be elected or serve in parl.; but when we consider further, That the course taken against Goodwin for drawing him into this outlawry, of purpose to disable him to serve in this place, whereto the county had freely elected him, was unusual; we could not, with the reputation of our places, serving as a council of gravity, in allowance or continuance of that course, censure him to be rejected as an outlaw: the particulars of which were these, viz.—Two exigents awarded;  the other 7 years past to the Hustings in London: no entry made of 5 proclamations; nor of any judgment of the coroners; nor any return of the exigents made or endorsed; the party plaintiff satisfied, the pretended outlawries being but upon meane process; and as to your maj.'s duties and contempts pardoned now since Goodwin was elected knight, the exigent now sought out since the election procured to be returned in the name of the sheriffs that then were, and are long since dead, and new entry made of the 5 proclamations and coroner's judgment; and now a return made of that old exigent, which could be of no use, but only for a purpose to disable him for that place. Upon all which we could do no less, in true discretion, than certify the election made secundum aquum et bonum.

Object. 4. That we proceeded to examine the truth of the fact of Outlawry, and gave our Sentence upon that; whereas we ought to have been bound by the Sheriff's Return of the Outlawry from further examining, Whether the party were outlawed or not?

Our humble Answer is, That the precedents cited before, in our answer to the first Objection, do prove the use of the Commons House to examine veritatem facti, in Elections and Returns, and have not been tied peremptorily to allow the return; as, if a knight or burgess be untruly returned dead, or lunatic, yet when he appeareth to the house to be living and sound, they have, contrary to the return, received him into the house, preferring the truth manifest before the return. By which discreet proceeding there is avoided that great inconvenience abovementioned, of giving liberty to sheriffs, by untrue returns, to make and remove whom they list, to and from the parliament service, how meet soever the parties be in the judgment of the county or borough that elected them.—Thus, in all humility, we have presented to your most excellent maj. the grounds and reasons of our late action, led with no affections, but guided by truth, warranted in our consciences, imitating precedents, maintaining our ancient priviledges, honouring your excellent maj. in all your services; to which in all loyalty and devotion we bind us and ours for ever, praying daily, on the knees of our hearts, to the majesty of the Almighty, that your maj. and your posterity may in all felicity reign over us and ours to the end of the world."

These reasons set down and published to the House, mr. secretary Herbert was sent with message to the Lords, that the house had resolved of their Answer to his maj. in sir Fs. Goodwin's Case, and had set it down in writing, and that it should be sent to their lordships before 4 in the afternoon; who immediately returned their lordships' answer, That they would be ready at that time in the Council Chamber at Whitehall, with 30 of the lords, to receive what then should be delivered. Then were named threescore to attend the delivery of the said reasons at the time and place aforesaid.—The same day, in the afternoon, the house entering seriously into consultation what course was to be held with the Lords; as also falling into more length of disputation, touching the bill of Merchants, than were expected, sent 5 members as messengers to the Lords, to excuse their long tarrying. And about 5 o'clock, the committee appointed did attend to deliver the Reasons aforesaid, at the Council Chamber, according to appointment and order of both houses; and they were delivered by sir Francis Bacon, one of the committees, with desire, That their lordships would be mediators in behalf of the house, for his maj.'s satisfaction.

April 4. Sir Francis Bacon having the day before delivered to the Lords, in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, according to the direction of the house, the Reasons in writing, penned by the committee, touching sir Francis Goodwin's case, made Report of what passed at the time of the said delivery: first, that though the committees employed were a number specially deputed and selected; yet that the lords admitted all burgesses without distinction; that they offered it with testimony of their own speed and care in the business, so as they said no one thing had precedency, but only the bill of recognition; that they had such respect to the weight of it, as they had not committed it to any frailty of memory or verbal relation, but put it into writing for more permanent memory of their duty and respect to his maj.'s grace and favour: That in conclusion they prayed their Lordships, sithence they had nearer access, they would co-operate with them for the king's satisfaction; and so delivered the writing to the hands of the lord chancellor, who, receiving it, demanded, Whether they should send it to the king, or first peruse it? To which was answered, That since it was the king's pleasure they should concur, they desired their lordships would first peruse it. The lord Cecil demanded, Whether they had warrant to amplify, explain, or debate any doubt or question made upon the reading? To which it was said, They had no warrant. And so the writing was read, and no more done at that time.

April 5. Mr. Speaker, by a private commandment, attended the king this morning at 8, and there staid till 10. Mr. Speaker excused his absence, by reason he was commanded to attend his maj.; and brought message from his maj. to this effect. "That the king had received a parchment from the house. Whether it were an absolute resolution, or reason to give him satisfaction, he knew not: he thought it was rather intended for his satisfaction. His maj. protested, by that love he bare to the house as his loving and loyal subjects, and by the faith he did ever owe to God, he had as great a desire to maintain their privileges, as ever any prince had, or as themselves. He had seen and considered of the manner and the matter: he had heard his Judges and his Council; and that he was now distracted in judgment. Therefore, for his further satisfaction, he desired, and commanded, as an absolute king, that there might be a conference between the house and the judges; and that for that purpose there might be a select committee of grave and learned persons out of the house: That his Council might be present, not as umpires to determine, but to report indifferently on both sides." Upon this unexpected message there grew some amazement and silence. But at last one stood up and said, The prince's command is like a thunder-bolt; his command upon our allegiance like the roaring of a lion. To his command there is no contradiction; but how, or in what manner we should now proceed to perform obedience, that will be the question. Another answered, Let us petition to his maj. that he will be pleased to be present, to hear, moderate, and judge the Case himself. Whereupon Mr. Speaker proceeded to this question. Q. Whether to confer with the Judges in the presence of the king and council? Which was resolved in the affirmative. And a select committee presently named for the conference, consisting of 21 lawyers, and 16 other members. These committees were selected and appointed to confer with the Judges of the law, touching the reasons of proceeding in sir Fra. Goodwin's Case set down in writing, and delivered to his maj. in the presence of the lords of his maj.'s council, according to his highness's pleasure signified by Mr. Speaker this day to the house. It was further resolved and ordered by the house, upon the motion to that end by Mr. Laurence Hyde, That the aforesaid committees should insist upon the fortification, and explaining of the Reasons and Answers delivered unto his maj.; and not proceed to any other argument or answer, what occasion soever moved in the time of that debate.

April 11. The House being met according to adjournment, sir Fra. Bacon was expected, and called, to make a Report of the late conference with the judges in the presence of his maj. and the lords of the council: but he made excuse, saying, he was not warranted to make any report; and 'tantum permissum, quantum commissum:' nevertheless, upon a question, he was over-ruled to make a Report; and a motion thereupon made, That the committees might first assemble in the Court of Wards, and confer amongst themselves, and then the Report to be made.

Sir Fra. Bacon, after the meeting of the committees in the Court of Wards, reported what had passed in conference in the presence of his maj. and his council. "The king said, he would be president himself. This attendance renewed the remembrance of the last, when we departed with such admiration. It was the voice of God in man: the good spirit of God in the mouth of man. I do not say, the voice of God, and not of man. I am not one of Herod's flatterers. A curse fell upon him that said it. A curse on him that suffered it. We might say as was said to Solomon, We are glad, O king, that we give account to you, because you discern what is spoken. We let pass no moment of time, until we had resolved and set down an Answer in writing, which we now had ready. That sithence we received a message from his maj. by Mr. Speaker, of two parts. 1. The one paternal. 2. The other royal. 1. That we were as dear unto him as the safety of his person, or the preservation of his posterity. 2. Royal; that we should confer with his judges, and that in the presence of himself and his council. That we did more now to king James than ever was done since the Conquest, in giving account of our judgments. That we had no intent in all our proceedings, to encounter his maj. or to impeach his honour or prerogative. This was spoken by way of preamble by him you employed. How to report his maj.'s speeches he knew [not] the eloquence of a king was unimitable. The king addressed himself to him as deputed by the House, and said he would make 3 parts of what he had to say. The cause of the meeting was to draw to an end the difference in sir Fra. Goodwin's Case. If they required his absence, he was ready; because he feared he might be thought interested, and so breed an inequality on their part. He said, That he would not hold his prerogative or honour, or receive any thing of any or all his subjects. This was his magnanimity. That he would confirm and ratify all just privileges. This his bounty and amity. As a king royally: as king James, sweetly and kindly out of his good nature. One point was, Whether we were a Court of Record, and had power to judge of returns. As our court had power, so had the Chancery; and that the court that first had passed their judgment should not be controuled. Upon a surmise, and upon the sheriffs return, there grew a difference. That there be two powers. One permanent: the other, transitory. That the Chancery was a confidenciary court to the use of the parl. during the time. Whatsoever the sheriff inserts beyond the authority of his mandate, a nugation. The parliaments of England not to be bound by a sheriff's return. That our privileges were not in question. That it was private jealousies without any kernel or substance. He granted it was a Court of Record, and a judge of returns. He moved, That neither sir John Fortescue, nor sir Fra. Goodwin might have place. Sir John losing place, his maj. did meet us half way. That when there did arise a schism in the church between a pope and an anti-pope, there could be no end of the difference until they were both put down."

Upon this Report a motion was made, "That it might be done by way of warrant; and therein to be inserted, That it was done at the request of the king: and was further said, (as anciently it hath been said) that we lose more at a parl. than we gain at a battle, That the authority of the committee was only to fortify what was agreed on by the house for answer, and that they had no authority to consent." It was further moved, by another, "That we should proceed to take away our dissention, and to preserve our liberties; and said, "That in this we had exceeded our commission; and that we had drawn upon us a note of inconstancy and levity." But the acclamation of the house, was, That it was a testimony of our duty, and no levity. So as the Question was presently made: Whether sir John Fortescue and sir Fra. Goodwin shall both be secluded, and a warrant for a new writ directed. And upon the question, resolved, That a writ should issue for a new choice, and a warrant directed accordingly. A motion made, That thanks should be presented by mr. Speaker to his maj. for his presence and direction in this matter; and thereupon ordered, That his maj.'s pleasure should be known by sir Roger Aston for their attendance accordingly.

Because it had been conceived by some, that sir Fra. Goodwin being the member specially interested, it were fit he should give testimony of his liking and obedience in this course; being dealt withal to that end, he writ his letter to mr. Speaker; which, before this Question made, for better satisfaction of the house, was read in these words: "Sir, I am heartily sorry to have been the least occasion either of question between his maj. and that hon. house, or of interruption to those worthy and weighty causes, which by this time, in all likelihood, had been in very good furtherance: wherefore understanding very credibly, that it pleased his maj. when the committees last attended him, to take course with them for a 3d writ and election for the knightship of the county of Buckingham; I am so far from giving any impediment thereunto, that contrarywise, I humbly desire his maj.'s direction in that behalf to be accomplished and performed. So praying you, according to such opportunity as will be ministered, to give furtherance thereunto, I take my leave, and rest yours, most assured to be commanded, Fra. Goodwin. West. this 11th of April, 1604." Directed to the right worshipful sir Edw. Phillips, knt. speaker of the honourable court of Parliament.

April 12. A motion was made, That mr. Speaker, in behalf of the house, should pray access to his maj. and present their humble thanks for his gracious presence and direction, upon the hearing of sir Fra. Goodwin's Cause; which was assented unto: and sir Roger Aston was presently appointed to know his maj.'s pleasure; which he did accordingly; and returned, That his maj. was willing to give them access in the Gallery at Whitehall, at 2 in the afternoon, the same day. Thereupon a committee was named to attend mr. Speaker to the king, with a general warrant to all others that should be pleased to accompany them. The committee, specially named, were, all the privy council of the house, and 38 members more.

April 13. Mr. Speaker returned to the house the effect of his Message of Thanks, delivered in the name of the house to the king; as also of his maj.'s answer, viz. "That he related to his highness the humble and dutiful acceptation of what his maj. had done, together with the humble thanks of the house for his zealous and paternal delivery of his grace unto us, by his own mouth: what wonder they conceived in his judgment, what joy in his grace, what comfort they had in his justice, what approbation they made of his prudence, and what obedience they yielded to his power and pleasure. That his direction gave all men satisfaction. That they were determined to pursue the course he had prescribed. That now they were become suitors, he would be pleased to receive a representation of the humble thanks and service of the house." His maj. answered, "That upon this 2d access, he was forced to reiterate what he had said before. That this Question was unhappily cast upon him, for he carried as great a respect to our privileges as ever any prince did; he was no ground-searcher; he was of the mind that our privileges was his strength: that he thought the ground of our proceeding, was our not understanding that he had intermeddled before we had decided; that he thought also we had no wilful purpose to derogate any thing from him, for our answer was a grave, dutiful, and obedient answer. But as the devil had unhappily cast this question between them, so he saw God had turned it to two good ends and purposes. 1. One, that he knew and had approved our loyalty. 2. Another, that he had so good an occasion to make testimony of his bounty and grace. That as we came to give him thanks, so did he redouble his thanks to us. That he had rather be a king of such subjects, than to be a king of many kingdoms." The 2d part of his speech directed to the lords and us. "That this parl. was not like to be long. That we would treat of such matters, as most concerned the commonwealth; and the last, of any thing that concerned himself. Three main businesses in our hands: 1. The union. 2. Sundry public and commonwealth-bills. 3. Matter of Religion, and Reformation of ecclesiastical discipline. For the Union, that it might be now prepared, and prosecuted the next session. That Union, which with the loss of much blood could never be brought to pass, as now it is. That the better to bring it to pass, we should be in affections united. That we should first with all care proceed in such laws as might concern the general good. That all heresies and schisms might be rooted out, and care taken to plant and settle God's true religion and discipline in the Church. That his wish above all things, was at his death to leave, 1. One worship to God. One kingdom entirely governed. One uniformity in laws. Lastly, that his occasions were infinite, and much beyond those of his predecessors; and therefore that in this 1st parl. we would not take from him that which we had yielded to others. That in his affections he was no way inferior to others, nor in his desire to ease us."

Then the warrant for a new Election of a knight for Bucks, was read and allowed in this form: "Whereas the right hon. sir John Fortescue, knt. chanc. of his maj.'s duchy of Lancaster, and sir Fra. Goodwin, knt. have been severally elected and returned knights of the shire for the county of Bucks, to serve in this present parl.: upon deliberate consultation, and for some special causes moving the Commons house of parl.: it is this day ordered and required by the said house, that a writ be forthwith awarded for a new Election of another knight for the said shire; and this shall be your warrant."* Directed, "To my very loving friend, sir Geo. Coppin, knt. clerk of the crown in his maj.'s high court of Chancery."—Having thus given the whole of this important case, we shall now go on with the proceedings of the Lords in this parl.

Act against Witchcraft.] April 2. A bill

was brought into that house, entitled, "An act concerning Conjurat[i]on, Witchcraft, and Dealing with evil Spirits. On the 2d reading, the bill was referred to a large committee, in which were included 12 bps. This bill passed into a law; and by it was enacted, "That if any persons shall use, practise, or exercise any invocation or conjuration of any wicked or evil spirit; or shall consult, covenant with, entertain, employ, or feed, any such spirit, &c. the first offence to be imprisonment for a year, and standing in the pillory once a quarter; the next to be death."

A Conference proposed, relating to an Union between England and Scotland.]—April 14, the Lord Chancellor made a motion, That as in the king's speech, both in the beginning of the parl. and since upon resort of divers lords and commons to him at court, his maj. had recommended it to them to proceed in such matters, in this his first parl. as are of greatest importance to the state; and especially in that particular of an Union between the kingdoms of England and Scotland. He moved that some Proposition might be made to the lower house for a Conference about this affair. This proposal was agreed to by both houses, and a large committee of Lords were appointed, who were to meet the committee of the Commons that afternoon. What was done at this first Conference is not entered in the Journals; but we are told, that on the 16th, a message was sent to the Lords, and delivered by mr. Secretary Herbert and others of the commons, "That the committee of that house had reported to the rest the Proposition made to them by the Lords, as from his maj. about the affair of an Union. That the whole house, judging this matter to be a cause of very great importance and consequence; it ought to be proceeded in with great caution and deliberation. They therefore thought it necessary not to proceed in the Conference, till every man of their house had considered of and delivered his opinion about it. And they had appointed a day to enter upon that debate, till which time they desired their lordships to hold them excused for farther Conference."

April 21. The lord Cecil produced a paper, containing a Draught, or Form, devised by the king himself, for the accomplishment of this great work. The paper was read to the house, but not offered as a bill, only as a short draught or memorial, on which a bill might be afterwards agreed on. We are not told what the substance of this proposal from the king was; nor do we meet with any more about this matter in the Lords' Journals till the 30th. At which time the Lords sent to desire another Conference with the lower house, and promised them that they would inform themselves, by the opinion of the Judges, concerning the name and appellation of GREAT BRITAIN, and acquaint their committees therewith: that afternoon being appointed by both houses for the Conference, in the outward chamber of the Parliament's presence, the Lords began again to deliberate on what points were necessary to propose at the meeting. When the lord chancellor started the following particulars, which were agreed to by the whole house. 1. "To acquaint the Commons that the judges had given it as their opinions, that the name cannot be altered now, without prejudice to the state. Therefore, rebus sic stantibus, that point was at an end. 2. That the Lords did desire to have mutual Conference with them, on the other point; which was, concerning the commission, according to his maj.'s proposal. 3. To be moved unto them for the nomination of commissioners this parl. to treat of those matters. 4. The same committees of both houses may be selected and appointed for the framing of a bill touching this great affair."

There is no account in the Lords' Journals relating to any farther proceedings about this matter, except that a bill was brought in, and passed into a law, for appointing English commissioners to treat with a select number of Scotch on this grand concern between the two nations. But the Journals of the Commons are much more copious; in which house the affair was argued, for several days together. The clerks have taken hints of the arguments on both sides, for and against this Union, which are entered in the proceedings of that house. Several of these are so short as not to be understood; and the whole dispute, since it ended in little or nothing, is too prolix and tedious for our purpose. We shall content ourselves with giving the King's own System for the Union, not inserted in the Lords' Journals; and a Copy of the king's Original Letter to this house, on this affair, in its own peculiar orthography: which shews that he spelt his English according to the Scotch pronunciation of it at that time.

"THE KING'S PROPOSALS FOR AN UNION.

"This Proposition which now I make concerning the Union, so far as now I craved to be assented unto at this parl. is no further but a particular explanation of a part of my speech I used to the whole parl. about the matter of the Union; which being twice repeated by me in the parliament-house, and then after printed, and publicly set out to the view of all the world, was (as I am informed) so well accepted and applauded by all, as I made the less doubt to make this particular proposition in * * own time hereafter. The substance of the thing, which now I crave to be done, consisteth only in two points: 1. That by a bill, or act, framed in this parl. it may be infused in all the people's hearts, that, as it is already set down in the recognition of [my] just possession of the crowns of both the famous, ancient, and honourable nations of England and Scotland, dwelling within [one] isle, and only compassed by the ocean, are now, by the great blessing of God, and to the perpetual weal of both the nations, [united] under one allegiance, and loyal subjection, in me and in my person, to my person and my posterity for ever: and that thereby, that which accreaseth to me and mine, and to the weal and strength of the subjects of both countries, may be rightly conceived, and [clearly] understood, by all men. The 2nd point is, That although it be not my meaning, neither at [this] time, nor never hereafter, to alter or innovate the fundamental laws, privileges, and good customs of this kingdom, whereby only the king's princely authority is conserved, and the people's (both in general and particular) security of their lands, living, and privileges, is maintained unto them: yet, that it is fit and convenient, for the nourishing and increasing of the mutual use among [the] members, and two halves, as it were, of the body, that all sorts, particular, temporal, or indifferent, manners, or statutes and [customs] may be agreed upon, and welled in one, as they are all one body, under [one] head: and therefore, that commissioners may be appointed by the parl. authorized to confer and consult with such Scottish commissioners, as shall be selected to meet with them, for the making of the frame to this effect, to be propounded to the next two parliaments of England and Scotland; that thereby, and by the happy conclusion in the two next parliaments, not only all questions, and unhappy rubs, which may hereafter, at any time, be unluckily cast in, may then be decided, and put to a quiet end; but all other means may also then be used, for increasing the mutual love, quenching all sparks of old debates, and conforming them among themselves to that uniformity of manners and customs, which God, by his providence, in apparent sight of all the world, hath begun, and by the finishing whereof the true meaning of that acknowledgment in my recognition may be performed and accomplished.—As for the bill, which to this effect I did frame, it would never have proceeded of me, to have so far overweened myself of the laws and customs here, as to have straightly thereby prescribed to the parl. what words they should precisely use in that purpose; but being humbly requested by Francis Bacon (then mouth of that part of the house, which came to me) that, for the supply of his memory, I would shortly set down the substance of that part of my speech, then publicly uttered to the lower house, I was contented to indict it to him as it hath been often read in your open audience: but I am so far from being wedded to any opinions of mine, in the form thereof, as whatsoever words may be found, by the parl. by their committees, or the judges of the land (whose opinions I will ever reverence and honour in their own elements) which are contained within my last project, which may be found to be contrary or derogatory to the provisos or explanations of my meaning therein set down, I am heartily well contented, that, by the advice of the same judges, they may be cleared, guarded by cautions, changed, innovated, or utterly scraped out, as may best agree with the substance of my meaning, and eschew any inherent contradiction, which may be least lurking within the said bill, or act of parl. to be made: and especially, because I hear greatest doubts and questions of law made, that the assuming the word and title of Bretany, by act of parl. before the accomplishment of these particulars, may imply any secret or [tacit] derogation to the rest of the particular conditions included in [the] same bill; although my inserting of the particular name now, was only for the better furtherance of the grounds, which are before rehearsed; yet am I so far from allowing or permitting any tacit contradiction, or obscurity, in that matter, which I by [all] means press to have so clear and evident, as I will not only [if], the truth be upon that side, be content of the omission of [the] name, for this time, but think, and ever esteem, that I have great cause to thank and account well of the learned judges, and other wise men whosoever, that by these means will preserve me from being the cause for making an implicit contradiction to mine own meaning to be contained within M^e own law; which could not be willingly done by me, without spot to my honour, pretending one thing, and purposing another; and to the great harm of the subjects of both the realms: but this to be so understood, that if, on the other side [there], be the doubts, cast in by the curious carping of some, wresting and misinterpreting the law against the true meaning [thereof]; that then, and in that case, as I am bound in honour * * to my formerly set-down words, so all my good and loyal subjects, of both the houses, will concur in assisting me [not] to be overruled by wilfulness, where I cannot be convinced by reason."

"A letter from his majesty to the house, in the matter of the Union, written with his own Hand, delivered by sir Roger Aston to mr. Speaker, read publicly at the Board by sir Thos. Lake, standing by the Clerk, as one best acquainted with the King's Hand and Phrase. The Letter followeth in these words §:—

"Ye see, with what cleernes and sinceritie I have behaved myself in this carande, even through all the progresse thair of, thoch, I will not saye, too littel regairdit by you, but I may justlie saye, not so uillinglie embraced by you, as the northines of the matter doth uell deserve. I proteste to God, the fruites thair of will chiefly tende to youre owen uell, prosperitie, and increase of strenth and greatnes: nothing can staye you from harkening unto it, but jalousie and distruste, ather of me the propounder, or of the matter by me propounditt: if of me, then doe ye both me and youre selfis an infinite uronge, my conscience bearing me recorde, that I ever deserved the contrarie at youre handis; but if youre distruste be of the matter itself, then distruste ye nothing but youre owin uisdomes or honesties: for as I have gevin over urangling upon uordis with you, so crave I no conclusion to be taken at this tyme heirin, but only a commission, that it maye be disputid, considerid upon, and reportid unto you; and then will ye be youre owin cookes, to dresse it as ye liste: so that (as I have allreaddie said) since the conclusion thair of can never be without youre owin asseintis; if ye be trew to youre selfis, no man can deceave you in it. Let not youre selfis thairfore be transported with the curiositie of a few giddie headis; for it is in you nou to make the choice, ather, by yielding to the Providence of God, and embracing that, quhiche he hath castin in youre mouthis, to procure the prosperitie and increase of greatnes to me and myne, you and youre; and, by the auayetaking of that partitionuall, quhiche allreaddie, by Goddis Providence, in my bloode is rent asunder, to establishe my throne, and youre boddie politike, in a perpetuall and flourishing peace; or ellis, contemning Goddis benefites, so freely ofred unto us, to spitte and blaspheme in his face, by praefering uarre to peace, trouble to quyetnes, hatred to love, ueaknes to greatnes, and division to union; to sowe the seidis of discorde to all oure posterities; to dishonoure youre king; to make both me and you a proverbe of reproche in the mouthis of all straingeris, and all ennemies to this nation, and envyers of my greatnes; and oure next labour to be, to take up new guarisons for the bordouris, and to make new fortifications thaire. 'Sed meliora spero.' I hoape, that God, in this choice, and free uill of youris, will not suffer you, with olde Adame, to choose the worst, and so to procure the defacing of this earthlie Paradise; but, by the contrarie, that he shall inspyre you so, as, with the seconde Adame, ye shall produce peace; and so beutifie this oure earthlie kingdome heereuith, as it may represente, and be an arles-pennie unto us, of that æternal peace in that spirituall kingdome, quhiche is prepared for the perpetuall residence of all his chosen children."

Notwithstanding these remonstrances from the king, this affair went on but heavily in both houses; for though this parl. at the king's desire, went upon the business and brought it to some forwardness, yet it is easy to see that the matter was treated very coolly throughout this session; and, in the end, it was left to Commissioners, to manage it by themselves. The act for appointing these Commissioners is not printed in the public statutes; and we are obliged to mr. Wilson, the writer of this king's Life, for the English Commissioners Names, and some account of their power in concluding the business. The Commissioners for England were the lord chancellor Ellesmere, the earls of Dorset, Nottingham, Southampton, Pembroke and Northampton; the bishops of London, Durham

For the Commons were Tho. lord Clinton, Rob. lord Buckhurst, sir Francis Hastings, sir John Stanhope, sir John Herbert, sir George Carew, sir Tho. Strickland, sir Edw. Stafford, sir Henry Nevil of Berkshire, sir Rd. Buckley, sir Henry Billingsley, sir Daniel Dun, sir Edw. Hobby, sir John Savile, sir Rob. Wroth, sir Tho. Chaloner, sir Rob. Mounsel, sir Tho. Ridgeway, sir Tho. Holcroft, sir Tho. Hesketh, sir Francis Bacon, sir Lawrence Tanfield, sir Henry Hobart, sir Henry Withington, sir Ralph Gray, sir Tho. Lake, knights; John Bennet, LL.D. Robert Askwith, Tho. James and Henry Chapman, citizens and merchants. These, or any 8 of the said Lords, and 20 of the said Commons, shall have power to assemble, meet, treat and consult, with certain select commissioners to be named and authorised by the parl. of Scotland, concerning such matters, causes and things, as they, in their wisdoms, shall deem convenient and necessary for the honour of the king, and common good of both kingdoms.

Notwithstanding all this parade, the Commissioners on both sides no sooner met, than they found the matter impracticable; for the Scotch, though we had taken their king, absolutely refused to be governed by any of our laws.

A Conference appointed for Reformation of Ecclesiastical Matters.] April 18th, Mr. Secretary Herbert brought a message to the Lords from the Commons to this effect: "That whereas their Speaker had signified to the whole house his maj.'s pleasure that a conference should be had, with certain of the lords the bishops, concerning a Reformation of certain Matters and Rights of the Church, of which some complaints had been made; and for a better correspondence to be held betwixt the clergy and laity for the future: the Commons were willing to have such a conference with some select number of the bps.; but so, to confer with them as Lords of the Higher House of parl. and not in such condition and quality as they are of the Convocation House." To which Message the Lords said they would return an answer the next day, or, as soon as they conveniently might.—Accordingly on the morrow an answer was returned by the Lords, that they approved of a conference, and had nominated 30, or thereabouts, of their house, a committee for that purpose. This committee consisted of all the great ministers of state, 7 earls, 11 barons, and 14 bps. The commons appointed 60 of their house to attend the Lords; but the king judging that this great number from both houses, would rather perplex than conciliate the conference, sent a message to desire them to constitute sub-committees to treat about these Church Affairs. On which the Lords named only 9 of the former number, and the Commons 20; which were to meet, on the 21st of May, in the Council Chamber of the Court, to settle this business.—The Lords Journals leave us short as to what was done, or agreed on, at this Conference between the two houses; but those of the Commons give us certain Articles or Instructions, on which their committee was to treat with that of the other house. The Articles were as follow:—

Articles to be debated on.] "1. Inprimis. That the Articles only concerning the Doctrine of Faith, and of the Sacraments, whereunto the ministers ought to subscribe, by the statute of the 13th Eliz. may be explained, perfected, and established by parl.; and that no contrary doctrine may be taught within this realm; and that all masters of household may be compelled to subscribe unto the same Articles, as well as the ministers.—2. Item, That from henceforth none other be admitted to be Ministers of the Word and Sacraments, than such as are, at the time of their admittance, Bachelors of Art, or of an higher degree in schools; having testimony from the university, or college, whereof he was, of his ability to preach, and of his good life; or else such, as are approved, and allowed to be sufficient to preach, and instruct the people, and to be of good life, by some testimonial of 6 preachers of the county, where the party dwelleth.—3. Item. That from henceforth no dispensation or toleration shall be allowed to any, to have or retain two, or more benefices, with cure of souls, or to be non-resident; and that such as now have double benefices, or be non-resident, shall give sufficient allowance yearly to maintain a preacher in their absence; and that, for this purpose, the incumbent shall be allotted to make his residency in one of his parsonages, to the intent, that in the other church a certain and constant minister may be maintained and kept.—4. Also it is thought meet, where the living of the vicar, or curate, is under 20l. by the year, that, for the better maintenance of the vicar, or curate (being a preacher) there may be some increase made of his living, as shall be thought convenient.—5. Also it is humbly desired, that the Lords would confer with us, touching a Petition to be preferred to the king's maj. that, by his gracious favour, such order be taken, that no minister be forced to subscribe, otherwise than to the Articles concerning only the Doctrine of Faith and Sacraments, whereunto by the said statute, made in the 13th Eliz. they are appointed to subscribe.—6. Also to confer with the Lords, that such faithful ministers, as dutifully carry themselves in their functions and callings, teaching the people diligently, may not be deprived, suspended, silenced, or imprisoned, for not using of the Cross in Baptism, or the surplice, which turneth to the punishment of the people.—Touching Ecclesiastical Courts, there is a Bill drawn by the Committees, ready to be preferred to the House.

A Petition for Dispensing in Matters indifferent.] June 13th. Sir Fs. Hastings made a Report to the Commons of what their sub-committee had done, who were appointed to search precedents, touching intermeddling with Ecclesiastical matters. Several precedents and laws were produced: as, also, the form of a Petition for a Dispensation, with some Ministers, in Matters indifferent, &c.) which Petition follows in these words:—

“To the king's most excellent majesty. Most dread sovereign: forasmuch as your maj. out of your princely favour, hath vouchsafed to signify your gracious pleasure, that we should enter into consultation of things that concern the establishment of true Religion in this land, thereby, as by many other ways, making evident demonstration of your maj.'s most religious affection and princely wisdom in the direction of these causes; we have thought it expedient, rather by this our humble Petition, to recommend to your maj.'s godly consideration certain matters of grievance, resting in your royal power and princely zeal either to abrogate or moderate, than to take the public discussing of the same unto ourselves; to the end (if it so seem good to your highness) we may, from the sacred fountain of your maj.'s most royal and religious heart, wholly and only derive such convenient remedy and relief therein, as to your princely wisdom shall seem most meet. The matters of grievance (that we be not troublesome to your maj.) are these: the pressing the Use of certain Rites and Ceremonies in this Church; as the Cross in Baptism, the wearing of the Surplice in ordinary parish churches, and the Subscription required of the Ministers, further than is commanded by the laws of the realm; things which, by long experience, have been found to be the occasions of such difference, trouble, and contention in this church, as thereby divers profitable and painful ministers, not in contempt of authority, or desire of novelty, as they sincerely profess, and we are verily persuaded, but upon conscience towards God refusing the same, some of good desert have been deprived, others of good expectation withheld from entering into the ministry, and way given to the ignorant and unable men, to the great prejudice of the free course and fruitful success of the Gospel, to the dangerous advantage of the common adversaries of true religion, and to the great grief and discomfort of many of your maj.'s most faithful and loyal subjects. In tender compassion whereof, may it please your excellent maj. of your zeal towards the Gospel, to vouchsafe some gracious, princely, and favourable consideration of the burden of these grievances, under which this Church hath of long time groaned; in doing whereof, we are verily persuaded, your maj. shall much more easily accomplish your religious intendments; the one of settling the peace of this Church, the other of planting a learned and faithful Ministry through this realm; also your maj. shall greatly comfort the hearts of many grave and learned Ministers, give much contentment to your highness's most loving subjects, purchase to your royal person great increase of honour, and gain to Almighty God his most due and deserved glory: Who ever keep your sacred maj. under the wings of his most mighty and blessed protection. Mercurii, 13 Junii, 1604.”

This Petition was much opposed by several members, and defended by others; but, in the end, it was dropped, as we suppose, for we hear no more of it. What the result of all these Conferences produced, is uncertain; but it is probable they laid the groundwork of four Acts which passed this session, the titles of which are given in the Catalogue of the Acts in the Lords' Journals, but are none of them, except the first, mentioned in the printed statutes. Their titles are these; and conclude all we shall say of this matter. 1. ‘An Act for avoiding multiplicity of Leases, made by abps. and bps. of such lands and possessions as belong to their several sees.’ By this act the crown itself was disabled from receiving any Conveyances of abps. and bps. estates. 2. ‘An Act against scandalous and unworthy Ministers.’ 3. ‘An Act for disburthening of Clergymen of all such Affairs as may hinder them in their divine Callings and Cures.’ 4. ‘An Act for the better discovery and suppressing of Simony, and other corrupt procuring of Ecclesiastical dignities, titles, jurisdictions, offices, places, and promotions.’

Conference about Wards, Respite of Homage, &c.] May 19th. Sir Edwin Sandys and others were sent from the Lower House to the Lords, and delivered a message from the Commons to this effect: “That whereas a motion had been made by that house, in the beginning of this parl. for a Conference with their lordships about the business of Wards; which received some impediment in the proceeding, at that time, by reason of other business: they were now desirous to make Petition to the king, in which they desired their lordships' concurrence, that he will be pleased to give them audience concerning that matter, and to make some proposal to his maj. of an offer in lieu of the said Wardships. And whereas, at the same time, their lordships moved to have Conference concerning Respite of Homage, which they thought proceeded from the lords out of favour and good respect towards them; they desired also, to address the king to give them a hearing, not only of this matter, but of the other branches growing from the same root; such as Tenures in Capite, Licence of Alienation, Premier Seizins, and such like; concerning all which particulars they did hope to make it appear to his maj. by the course they meant to propound to him, that he should not receive loss or prejudice, but rather convenience and advantage.” To which Message the Lords took time to return an answer to the 21st.—On which day, on a motion of the lord chancellor, an answer was returned to the Commons, “That their lordships had made choice of 30 of their house for a Conference; and that they desire the Commons to appoint a competent number of their body to meet them. Also, that their committee should come sufficiently prepared and authorized to deliver and make known to them the grounds and reasons which they design to propose to his maj. concerning these particulars.”

What was done or said at this Conference is not handed down to us; but a remarkable Entry is made in the Journal of the Lords for that day, in these words: “26 Maii predict. Report made by the lord chancellor of that which passed in the Conference with the Lower House, concerning the matter of Wards and Respite of Homage; and a repetition thereof also by the lord Cecil. The conclusion whereof was, That the Lords did, by way of advice, move and wish them to forbear any further dealing therein, or to offer any further Petition for it to the king; both for divers considerations in the matter itself, and in respect of this time of his maj.’s first parl. which they thought to be inconvenient and unseasonable for it.” Thus this business dropped for this time.

The Commons complain of a Book in Favour of the Union.] May 26, complaint was made to the Lords by a message delivered by sir Edw. Hobby and others from the Lower House, concerning a certain Book, which of late, as they said, fell into their hands, intitled, . “By the publishing of which Book, (tending to make division and strife, they conceive wrong and dishonour done both to the Lower House and the Lords themselves. That the secrets of that house should be discovered touching such matters as had been by them debated, heard and allowed by the Lords, approved by the Judges of the realm, and assented to by his maj. which fault, they said, if any one of their house had committed, they protested they would have inflicted exemplary punishment upon him. But because they supposed that it was the work of some in the Upper House, they desired Conference with the Lords, to consider what course may be taken in it.” The Lords returned for Answer, “That when they had perused the Book, which, as yet most of them had not done, and had considered how it may touch the honour of either house, they will shew themselves as tender and sensible of it as the Commons; and will let them soon know their opinion concerning it.”—The title of this Book is left blank in the Lords Journals, but whether by design or negligence is uncertain; nor are we better assisted by those of the Commons. However, the sequel will inform us, both who the author of it was, and the nature of the subject which gave the offence. Two stationers, called Field and Chard, concerned in the printing and publishing the Book, were sent for, and brought before the House of Lords by the serjeant at arms. These men confessed the publication, and that the Bishop of Bristol was the Author of it. This put the House to a stand, what punishment to inflict upon the stationers; when so great a man, and one of their own body, was the principal aggressor. They were ordered to attend the House, however, ‘in die ad diem,’ for some time; in the mean while the Commons, in a Conference, pushed the thing warmly against the bp; and the Lords, after some deliberation amongst themselves, what satisfaction to give to the other House about this matter, did all agree in opinion that it might best be done, if the said bp. would voluntarily acknowledge himself to have committed an error, and that he was sorry for the same. We are told that the bp. at last, consented to make this acknowledgement, which he read in the House in form, as follows:—

The Bp. of Bristol, the Author, asks pardon for it.] “1. I confess I have erred in presuming to deliver a private sentence, in a matter so dealt in by the high court of parl. 2. I am sorry for it. 3. If it was to do again I would not do it. 4. I protest it was done out of ignorance, and not out of malice, towards either of the houses of parl. or any particular member of the same; but only to declare my affection to the intended Union, which I doubt not but all your lordships do allow of.”

Some days after, the Commons sent a message to the Lords, wherein they acknowledged their lordships’ honourable proceeding in this matter; but, at the same time, for their better satisfaction, they desired that a copy of the bp.’s Declaration of his error, &c. might be given them; that it might be recorded also in the Journals of that House; and that the Book might be suppressed. The Lords took time to consider of this message; and afterwards, in another Conference, about this and other matters, the Commons had the satisfaction they desired, and so the affair was ended.

Act for Tonnage and Poundage.] June 14, was sent up by the Commons, a bill for a Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage. It was read a 2nd time in the Lords on the 18th, when the Lord Treasurer stood up, and acquainted the Lords, “That having perused and considered of the said bill, he found some omission or imperfection in the same, proper to be reformed for his maj.’s benefit and service. He therefore moved, that a Conference might be had with the other house about it.” This was unanimously agreed to, and a message sent to the Commons, wherein the Lords expressed themselves, “That they would not have the Lower House think it proceeded from any coldness in affection or duty, on their parts, to desire a conference with them on the amendment of the said bill.” Answer was returned, that the Commons agreed to a Conference; on which two committees were appointed for that purpose. And, on another motion, the Lords agreed, that in the Conference, the committee for the Commons might be desired to propound to that house their lordships’ earnest request and expectation, that some means might be by them considered of, for a relief or subsidy to be farther granted to his maj. to supply his present necessities.

sonment of one of their own Members. Sir Thomas Shirley, member for Steyning, had been committed prisoner to the fleet, soon after his return, and before the parl. met, on an execution. The House sent their serjeant at arms to demand the prisoner; which was refused by the warden. On this, he was sent for himself to the house, where he still persisted in denying to release the prisoner; and was committed to the Tower for the contempt. On the 9th of May, a strong debate arose in the house, what they should do to release their brother, some arguing that the house could not, by law, secure the warden from an escape of his prisoner. But the Recorder of London said, "That this was not a time to treat about matters of law; but how to deliver sir Tho. Shirley. He moved that six of the house might be selected and sent to the Fleet, with the serjeant and his mace to attend them; there to require the delivery of sir Tho. Shirley: and, if it was denied, to press to his chamber, and, providing for the safety of the prison and prisoners, to free him by force and bring him away with them to the house."—This motion was put to the question, and, the house dividing, there were 176 for it, and 153 against the motion; on which it was resolved to send, with direction and authority, as before. But the Speaker putting the house in mind, that all those, so sent to enter the prison in that manner, were by law subject to an action upon the case; it was thought meet to stop this proceeding.—Many projects were formed in the house for several days together, for the delivery of the prisoner, but to no purpose; when the warden was again ordered to be brought before them; and being told of the greatness of his contempt, and terrified with further punishment if he would not yield, he still refused to deliver his prisoner to them. On this, another debate arose, and, having come to a resolution, the warden was called in again, when he, still persisting in his obstinacy, was told by the Speaker, "That, as he did increase his contempt, so the house thought fit to increase his punishment; and that their judgment was now, he should be committed to the prison, called Little-Ease, within the Tower."

The next day, the lieut. of the Tower sent a letter to the Speaker, importing, That he had talked with the warden, his prisoner; and that he now seemed to have some feeling of his error and obstinacy; and that if the house would send two of their members, which he named, to satisfy him in the point of his security, he would be content to deliver up his prisoner to their serjeant, when they would please to send for him. But the house would not consent to this; and after many more arguments and debates, the day after they came to a resolution, to send another warrant of Habeas Corpus to release their member; and that the warden should be brought from the Tower to the door of the Fleet, and there to have it served upon him by the serjeant, and then to be returned to his dungeon of Little-Ease again. The Form of all these warrants are in the Journals; but there is a mem. added to this last, "That mr. Vice-Chamberlain was privately instructed to go to the king, and humbly desire that he would be pleased to command the Warden, on his allegiance, to deliver up sir Thomas; not as petitioned for by the house, but as if himself thought it fit out of his own gracious judgment."

It is probable this last method prevailed; for we find that sir Thomas was delivered up, by a petition sent to the house from the warden, in his strait durance, and praying to be released from it. However, the house thought fit to continue him in confinement some time longer; when, at last, being ordered to be brought to the bar, on his knees, "He confessed his error and presumption, and professed that he was unfeignedly sorry that he had so offended that honourable house." On which the Speaker, by direction of the house, pronounced his pardon and discharged him, paying the ordinary fees.

June 20. The Form of Apology and Satisfaction to be delivered to his maj. penned and agreed by a former select committee, was reported, and presented into the house, by sir Tho. Ridgeway, one of the committee. This very curious paper is not entered in the Journals, nor is it to be found in the Parliamentary or Constitutional History, but is preserved at length in Petyt's *Jus Parliamentaria, and is highly deserving of a place in this work. It is as follows:

Apology of the House of Commons, made to the King, touching their Privileges.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty;
from the House of Commons assembled in Parliament.

"Most gracious Sovereign, We cannot but with much joy and thankfulness of mind acknowledge your maj.'s great graciousness, in declaring lately unto us, by the mouth of our Speaker, That you rested now satisfied with our doings. Which satisfaction notwithstanding, though most desired and dear unto us, yet proceeding merely from your maj.'s most gracious disposition, and not from any justification which on our behalf hath been made; we found this joy intermingled with no small grief; and could not, dread sovereign, in our dutiful love to your maj. and in our ardent desire of the continuance of your favour towards us, but tender in humble sort this farther satisfaction, being careful to stand right, not only in the eye of your maj.'s grace, but also (and that much more) in the balance of your princely judgment; on which all assuredness of love and grace is founded. Into which course of proceedings we have not been rashly carried by vain humour of curiosity, of contradiction, of presumption, or of love of our own devices or doings, unworthy affections in a council of parl. and more unworthy in subjects towards their lord and sovereign; but, as the Searcher and Judge of all hearts doth know, for these and for no other undue ends in the world; to increase and nourish your maj.'s gracious affection towards your loyal and most loving people, to assure and knit all your subjects' hearts most firmly to your maj. to take away all cause of jealousy on either part, and diffidence for times ensuing, and to prevent and control all sinister reports, which might be unreasonably spread either at home or abroad with prejudice to your maj. or the good state of your kingdom. With these minds, dread sovereign, your commons of England, represented in us their knights, citizens, and burgesses, do come with this humble declaration to your highness, and in great affiance of your most gracious disposition, that your maj. with benignity of mind correspondent to our dutifulness, will be pleased to peruse it. We know, and with great thankfulness to God acknowledge, that he hath given us a king of such understanding and wisdom as is rare to find in any prince in the world. Howbeit, seeing no human wisdom, how great soever, can pierce into the particularities of the rights and customs of people, or of the sayings and doings of particular persons, but by tract of experience and faithful report of such as know them (which it hath pleased your maj.'s princely mouth to deliver) what grief, what anguish of mind hath it been unto us at some time, in presence to hear, and so in other things to find and feel by effect your gracious maj. (to the extreme prejudice of all your subjects of England, and in particular of this house of the commons thereof) so greatly wronged by misinformation, as well touching the estate of the one as the privileges of the other, and their several proceedings during this parl.; which misinformations, though apparent in themselves, and to your subjects most injurious, yet have we, in some humble and dutiful respect, rather hitherto complained of amongst ourselves, than presumed to discover and oppose against your majesty."

"But now, no other help or redress appearing, and finding those mis-informations to have been the first, yea, the chief and almost the sole cause of all the discontentful and troublesome proceedings so much blamed in this parl.; and that they might be again the cause of like or greater discontents and troubles hereafter (which the Almighty Lord forbid) we have been constrained, as well in duty to your royal maj. whom with faithful hearts we serve, as to our dear native country, for which we serve in this parl. to break our silence, and freely to disclose unto your maj. the truth of such matters concerning your subjects the commons, as hitherto by misinformation hath been suppressed or perverted: wherein that we may more plainly proceed, (which next unto truth we affect in this discourse) we shall reduce these misinformations to three principal heads; 1st. Touching the cause of the joyful receiving of your maj. into this your kingdom. 2dly, Concerning the Rights and Liberties of your subjects of England, and the Privileges of this House. 3dly, Touching the several Actions and Speeches passed in the House, it has been told us to our faces by some of no small place (and the same spoken also in the presence of your maj.) 'That on the 24th of March was a twelvemonth,* we stood in so great fear, that we would have given half we were worth for the security wherein we now stand.' Whereby some misunderstanders of things might perhaps conjecture, that fear of our own misery had more prevailed with us in the duty which on that day was performed, than love of your maj.'s virtues, and hope of your goodness towards us. We contrarywise most truly protest the contrary, that we stood not at that time, nor of many a day before, in any doubt or fear at all. We all professing true Religion by law established (being by manifold degrees the greater, the stronger, and more respective part of this your maj.'s realm) standing clear in our consciences touching your maj.'s right, were both resolute, with our lives and all other our abilities, to have maintained the same against all the world, and vigilant also in all parts to have suppressed such tumults, as, but in regard of our poor united minds and readiness, by the male-contented and turbulent might have been attempted. But the true cause of our extraordinary great cheerfulness and joy in performing that day's duty, was the great and extraordinary love which we bear towards your maj.'s most royal and renowned person, and a longing thirst to enjoy the happy fruits of your maj.'s most wise, religious, just, virtuous, and gracious heart. Whereof not rumour, but your maj.'s own writings, had given us a strong and undoubted assurance. For from hence, dread sovereign, a general hope was raised in the minds of all your people, that under your maj.'s reign religion, peace, justice, and all virtue should renew again and flourish. That the better sort should be cherished, the bad reformed or repressed, and some moderate ease should be given us of those burdens and sore oppressions, under which the whole land did groan.

"This hope being so generally and so firmly settled in the minds of all your most loyal and most loving people, recounting what great alienation of men's hearts the defeating of great hopes doth usually breed, we could not in duty, as well unto your maj. as to our country, cities, and boroughs, (who hath sent us hither not ignorant or uninstructed of their griefs, of their desires, and hopes) but, according to the ancient use and liberty of parliaments, present our several humble Petitions to your maj. of different nature: some for Right and some for Grace, to the easing and relieving of us of some just burdens, and of other some unjust oppressions, wherein what due care, and what respect we have had, that your maj.'s honour and profit should be enjoyed with the content and satisfaction of your people, shall afterwards in their several due places appear. Now concerning the ancient Rights of the subjects of this realm, chiefly consisting in the Privileges of this House of parl. the misinformation openly delivered to your maj. hath been in three things: 1st. That we held not Privileges of Right, but of Grace only, renewed every parl. by way of donature upon petition, and so to be limited. 2dly, That we are no Court of Record, nor yet a Court that can command view of Records; but that our Proceedings here are only to acts and memorials, and that the attendance with the records is courtesy, not duty. 3dly, and lastly, That the examination of the return of writs for knights and burgesses is without our compass, and due to the chancery.

“Against which assertions (most gracious sovereign) tending directly and apparently to the utter overthrow of the very fundamental Privileges of our House, and therein of the Rights and Liberties of the whole Commons of your realm of England, which they and their Ancestors from time immemorable have undoubtedly enjoyed under your maj.'s most noble progenitors; we the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons assembled in parl. and in the name of the whole commons of the realm of England, with uniform consent for ourselves and our posterity, do expressly protest, as being derogatory in the highest degree to the true dignity, liberty, and authority of your maj.'s high court of parl. and consequently to the rights of all your maj.'s said subjects, and the whole body of this your kingdom; and desire that this our protestation may be recorded to all posterity. And contrarywise with all humble and due respect to your maj. our sovereign lord and head, against those misinformations we most truly avouch; 1st. That our Privileges and Liberties are our Right and due inheritance, no less than our very Lands and Goods. 2dly. That they cannot be withheld from us, denied, or impaired, but with apparent wrong to the whole state of the realm. 3dly. And that our making of request, in the entrance of parl. to enjoy our Privilege, is an act only of manners, and doth weaken our right, no more than our suing to the king for our lands by petition; which form, though new and more decent than the old by precept, yet the subject's right is no less now than of old. 4thly. We avouch also, that our House is a Court of Record, and so ever esteemed. 5thly. That there is not the highest standing court in this land that ought to enter into competency either for dignity or authority with this high court of parl. which with your maj.'s royal assent gives laws to other courts, but from other courts receives neither laws nor orders. 6thly, and lastly, We avouch that the House of Commons is the sole proper judge of Return of all such Writs, and of the Election of all such Members as belong unto it, without which the freedom of election were not entire. And that the chancery, though a standing court under your maj. be to send out those writs, and receive the returns, and to preserve them, yet the same is done only for the use of the parl. Over which neither the chancery, nor any other court, ever had, or ought to have any manner of jurisdiction.

“From these misinformed positions (most gracious sovereign) the greatest part of our troubles, distrusts, and jealousies have risen; having apparently found, that in the first parl. of the happy reign of your maj. the Privileges of our House, and therein the Liberties and Stability of the whole Kingdom, have been more universally and dangerously impugned than ever (as we suppose) since the beginnings of parliaments.—Besides that in regard of her^s sex and age which we had great cause to tender, and much more upon care to avoid all trouble, which by wicked practice might have been drawn to impeach the quiet of your maj.'s right in the succession, those actions were then passed over, which we hoped, in succeeding times of freer access to your highness of renowned grace and justice, to redress, restore, and rectify.—Whereas contrarywise in this parl. which your maj. in great grace (as we nothing doubt) intended to be a precedent for all parliaments that should succeed, clean contrary to your maj.'s so gracious desire; by reason of these misinformations, not Privileges, but the whole Freedom of the Parliament and Realm have from time to time, upon all occasions, been mainly hewed at us.—First, the Freedom of Persons in our Election hath been impeached. Secondly, the Freedom of our Speech prejudiced by often reproofs. Thirdly, particular persons noted with taunt and disgrace, who have spoken their consciences in matters proposed to the house, but with all due respect and reverence to your majesty.—Whereby we have been in the end subject to so extream contempt, as a gaoler durst so obstinately withstand the decrees of our house; some of the higher clergy to write a book against us, even sitting the parliament; the inferior clergy to inveigh against us in pulpits, yea to publish their protestations, tending to the impeachment of our most ancient and undoubted rights in treating of matters for the peace and good order of the church.”

“What cause we your poor Commons have to watch over our privileges, is manifest in itself to all men. The prerogatives of Princes may easily, and do daily grow. The Privileges of the Subject are for the most part at an everlasting stand. They may be by good providence and care preserved, but being once lost are not recovered but with much disquiet.—If good kings were immortal as well as kingdoms, to strive so for privilege were but vanity perhaps and folly; but seeing the same God who in his great mercy hath given us a wise king and religious, doth also sometimes permit hypocrites and tyrants in his displeasure, and for the sins of the people; from hence hath the desire of rights, liberties, and privileges, both for nobles and commons, had its just original; by which an harmonical and stable state is framed; each member under the head enjoying that right, and performing that duty, which for the honour of the head and happiness of the whole is requisite.—Thus much touching the Wrong done to your maj. by misinformation touching our privileges.

“ The last kind of misinformation made to your maj. hath been touching the actions and speeches of particular persons used in the house. Which imputation notwithstanding, seeing it reacheth the whole house in general, who neither ought, neither have at any time suffered any speech touching your maj. other than respective, dutiful, and as become loyal subjects of a king so gracious; and forasmuch as it is very clear unto us by the effect, that divers things spoken in the house, have been perverted and very untruly reported to your maj.; if it might seem so fit in your maj.’s wisdom, and were seemingly for us to crave, we should be most glad, if, for our better justification, and for your further satisfaction, which we principally desire, the accusers and the accused might be confronted.

“ And now (most gracious sovereign) these necessary grounds of our causes and defences being truly laid, and presented sincerely to your maj.’s grace and wisdom, the justification of such particulars, wherein your highness seemed doubtful of our dutiful carriage (though not so much for the matter, as for the manner of our proceedings) we trust will be plain; and to expedite which particulars, we find them to have been of three different natures:—The 1st sort, concerning the Dignity and Privileges of our house. The 2nd, the good Estate of the Realm and Church. The 3rd, was for Ease of certain Grievances and Oppressions.—In the 1st rank there were five particulars. 1. The matter of the Gentleman Usher. 2. Of the Yeomen of the Guard. 3. Of the Election of the Knights of Buckinghamshire. 4. Of sir Thomas Shirley’s Deliverance. 5. And of the bp. of Bristol’s Pamphlet.—The 2nd head had two particulars, the Union and Matters of Religion.—The 3rd head had three, the Bill of Assarts;* and Matters of Purveyors; and the Petition for Wardships.—Of each of these we must say somewhat to give your maj. satisfaction, and that with all brevity, to shun tediousness and trouble.

“ The Gentleman Usher’s fault in depriving, by his unaccustomed neglect, a great part of our house from hearing your maj.’s speech the first day of parl. we could not, in the grief of being frustrate of our so longing and just desire to hear your maj.’s voice and renowned wisdom, but complain of in decent sort among ourselves, and further we proceeded not. Your maj.’s extraordinary great grace and favour, in rehearsing the day ensuing your former admirable speech, did give us content with abundance of increase of joy.—The Yeoman of the Guard’s* words were very opprobrious; and howsoever they might have been not unfitly applied to the peasants of France, or boores of Germany, yet could they not be other than very reproachful and injurious to the great dignities and honour of the commons of this realm, who contain not only the citizens, burgesses, and yeomanry, but also the whole inferior nobility of the kingdom, knights, esquires, and gentlemen, many of which are come immediately out of the most noble families, and some other of their worth advanced to the high honour of your maj.’s privy council, and otherwise have been imployed in very honourable service; in sum, the sole persons of the higher nobility excepted, they contain the whole power and flower of your kingdom; first, with their bodies, your wars; secondly, with their purses, your treasures are upheld and supplied; thirdly, their hearts are the strength and stability of your royal seat.—All these, amounting to many millions of people, are representatively present in us of the house of commons. The wrong done to us doth redound upon the whole land, and will be so construed. We could not therefore do less in our duties to the realm, than to advertise such a delinquent of the unseemliness of his fault, neither could we yet do more in duty to your maj. than upon his acknowledgement thereof so freely to remit it.

“ The Rights of the Liberties of the Commons of England consisteth chiefly in these three things: 1st, that the shires, cities, and boroughs of England, by representation to be present, have free choice of such persons as they shall put in trust to represent them:—2ndly, that the persons chosen during the time of the Parl. as also of their access and recess, be free from restraint, arrest, and imprisonment:—3rdly, that in Parl. they may speak freely their consciences without check and controulment, doing the same with due reverence to the sovereign court of parl. that is to your maj. and both the houses, who all in this case make but one politick body, whereof your highness is the head.—These three several branches of the antient inheritance of our Liberty, were in three matters ensuing apparently injured. The Freedom of Election in the Case of sir Francis Goodwin. The Freedom of the Persons elected, in sir Thomas Shirley's imprisonment. The Freedom of our Speech, as by divers other reproofs, so also in some sort by the bp. of Bristow's invective.

* Assart (as it is here properly to be understood) signifies where the subject within the limits and bounds of the king’s forests, stubs the ground, making it fit for tillage, without the king’s licence.”

* Brian Tashe, the yeoman of the guard, keeping one of the doors of the upper house, repulsed several members of the lower house, and shut the door upon them, with these uncivil and contemptible terms, “ Goodmen burgesses, you come not here.”—Journ. Dom. Com.—See p. 996.

"For the Matter of sir F. Goodwin (see p. 998) the knight chosen for Buckinghamshire, we were and still are of a clear opinion, that the Freedom of Election was in that action extremely injured; that by the same right it might be at all times in a lord chancellor's power to reverse, defeat, to evert and substitute all the elections and persons elected over all the realm. Neither thought we that the * Judges' opinion, which yet in due place we greatly reverence, being delivered what the common law was, which extends only to inferior and standing courts, ought to bring any prejudice to this high court of parl. whose power being above the law is not founded on the common law, but have their Rights and Privileges peculiar to themselves. For the manner of our proceeding, which your maj. seemed to blame, in that the second writ going out in your maj.'s name, we presumed to censure it, without first craving access to acquaint your highness with our reasons therein, we trust our defence shall appear just and reasonable. It is the form of the court of chancery, as of divers other courts, that writs going out in your maj.'s name are returned also as to your maj. in that court from whence they issue. Howbeit therefore no man ever repaireth to your maj.'s person, but proceeds according to law, notwithstanding the writ. This being the universal custom of this kingdom, it was not, nor could be admitted into our conceits, that the difference was between your maj. and us (for God forbid that between so gracious a sovereign, and so dutiful and loving subjects, any difference should arise;) but it always was and still is conceived, that the controversy was between the court of chancery and our court: an usual controversy between courts about their pre-eminences and privileges; and that the question was, whether the Chancery, or our House of the Commons, were judge of the members returned for it. Wherein, though we suppose the wrong done to be most apparent, and extremely prejudicial for the rights and liberties of this realm; yet such and so great was our willingness to please your maj. as to yield to a middle course proposed by your highness, preserving only our privileges by voluntary cessions of the lawful right. And this course, as it were, of deceiving of ourselves, and yielding in our apparent right, wheresoever we could but invent such ways of escape as that the precedent might not be hurtful, we have held, dread sovereign, more than once this parl. upon desire to avoid that, which in your maj. by misinformation, whereof we have had cause always to stand in doubt, might be distasteful or not approveable: so dear hath your maj.'s gracious favour been unto us.

* In the memorable case of Thorp, which happened 31 Hen. VI. the Judges being asked their opinions by the Lords, answered in these words: 'It hath not been used before time, nor becomes it us, to determine matters concerning the high court of parl. which is so high and mighty in its nature, that it is judge of the law, and makes that to be law which is not law, and that to be no law which is; and the determination of its privileges belongs to the Lords in parl. and not to the Justices.' See p. 392.

"In the delivery of sir Thomas Shirley (see p. 1028) our proceedings were long; our defence of them shall be brief. We had to do with a man, the warden of the Fleet, so intractable, and of so resolved obstinacy, as that nothing we could do, no, not your maj.'s royal word for confirmation thereof, could satisfy him for his own security. This was the cause of the length of that business; our privileges were so shaken before, and so extremely vilified, as that we held it not fit, in so unreasonable a time, and against so mean a subject, to seek our right by any other course of law, or by any strength than by our own.

"The bishop of Bristow's Book (see p. 1027) was injurious and grievous to us, being written expressly with contempt of the parl. and of both the houses in the highest degree; undertaking to deface the reasons proposed by the commons, approved by the hon. lords, confirmed by the judges, and finally by your royal maj. not disassented to. And to increase the wrong, with strange untruths he had perverted those reasons in their main drift and scope, pretending that they were devised to impugn the Union itself. Whereas both by their title and by themselves it was clear and evident, that they were only used against alteration of name, and that not simply, but before the union of both realms in substance were perfected. This book being thus written and published to the world, containing moreover sundry slanderous passages, and tending to murmurs, distraction, and sedition; we could not do less against the writer thereof, than to complain of the injury to the lords of the higher house, whereof he had now attained to be a member. These wrongs were to the dignity of our house and privileges.

"Touching the causes appertaining to State and Church, true it is, we were long in treating and debating the matter of Union. The propositions were new; the importance great; the consequence far reaching, and not discoverable but by long disputes; our numbers also are large, and each hath liberty to speak. But the doubts and difficulties once cleared or removed, how far we are from opposing to the just desires of your maj. as some evil-disposed minds would perhaps insinuate, who live by division, and prosper by disgrace of other men, the great expedition, alacrity, and unanimity, which was used and shewed in passing the bill, may sufficiently testify. For matter of Religion, it will appear by examination of truth and right, that your maj. should be misinformed, if any man should deliver, that the kings of England have any absolute power in themselves, either to alter religion (which God defend should be in the power of any mortal man whatsoever) or to make any laws concerning the same, otherwise than as in temporal causes, by consent of parl. We have and shall at all times by our oaths acknowledge, that your maj. is sovereign lord and supreme governor in both. Touching our own desires and proceedings therein, they have not been a little misconceived and misreported. We have not come in any Puritan or Brownish spirit to introduce their party, or to work the subversion of the State ecclesiastical, as now it standeth: Things so far and so clearly from our meaning, as that with uniform consent in the beginning of this parl. we committed to the Tower a man, who out of that humour, in a petition exhibited to our house, had slandered the bishops. But according to the tenor of your maj.'s writ of summons directed to the counties from whence we came, and according to the ancient and long continued use of Parliaments, as by many records from time to time appeareth, we come with another spirit, even with the spirit of peace. We disputed not of matters of faith and doctrine; our desire was peace only; and our devise of unity, how this lamentable and long lasting dissension amongst the ministers, from which both atheism, sects, and all ill life have received such encouragement and so dangerous increase, might at length, before help come too late, be extinguished. And for the ways of this peace, we are not at all addicted to our own inventions, but ready to embrace any fit way that may be offered; neither desire we so much, that any man in regard of weakness of conscience may be exempted after parl. from obedience unto laws established, as that in this parl. such laws may be enacted, as by the relinquishment of some few ceremonies of small importance, or by any way better, a perpetual uniformity may be enjoyed and observed. Our desire hath also been, to reform certain abuses crept into the ecclesiastical state, even as into the temporal: And lastly, that the land might be furnished with a learned, religious, and godly ministry: For the maintenance of whom we would have granted no small contributions, if in these, as we trust just and religious desires, we had found that correspondency from others which was expected. These minds and hearts we in secret present to that sovereign lord who gave them, and in public profess to your gracious maj. who we trust will so esteem them.

"There remains the Matters of Oppression or Grievance in the bill of Assarts. Your maj.'s council was heard, namely, your solicitor and sir Fra. Bacon. It was also desired by the house, that other of your council would have been present. We knew that our passing the bill could not bind your maj.: howbeit, for sundry equitable considerations (as to us they seemed) we thought good to give so much passage to the bill, in hope your maj. might either be pleased to remit in some sort unto this equity that right, which the rigour of law had given, or otherwise intreated by this kind of solicitation, to let them fall into your maj.'s hands full of piety and mercy, and not into the jaws of devouring promoters. And this do we understand to be your gracious intent, wherewith we rest joyfully content and satisfied. The grievance was not unjust in rigour of law, and was particular; but a general, extreme, unjust, and crying oppression is in cart-takers and purveyors, who have rummaged and ransacked since your maj.'s coming in, far more than under any of your royal progenitors: there hath been no prince since Henry III. except queen Eliz. who hath not made some one law or other, to repress or limit them: they have no prescription, no custom to plead. For there hath not been any parl. wherein complaint hath not been made, and claim of our rights, which doth interrupt prescription. We have not in this present parl. sought any thing against them but execution of those laws, which are in force already. We demand but that justice, which our princes are sworn neither to deny, delay, nor sell. That we sought into the accounts of your maj.'s expence, was not our presumption, but upon motion from the lords of your maj.'s council, and after from your officers of your highness's household; and that, upon a demand of a perpetual yearly revenue, in lieu of the taking away of those oppressions, unto which composition neither know we well how to yield, being only for justice and due right, which is unsaleable: neither yet durst we impose it by law upon the people, without first acquainting them, and having their consents unto it. But if your maj. might be pleased, in your gracious favour, to treat of composition with us for some grievance, which is by law and just; how ready we should be to take that occasion and colour to supply your maj.'s desire, concerning these also, which we hold for unjust, should appear, we nothing doubt, to your maj.'s full satisfaction.

"And therefore we come, lastly, to the matter of Wards, and such other burthens (for so we acknowledge them) as to the Tenures of Capite and Knights service are incident: we cannot forget (for how were it possible?) how your maj. in a former most gracious speech in your gallery at Whitehall, advised us, for unjust burthens to proceed against them by bill: but for such as were just, if we desired any ease, that we should come to yourself, by way of petition, with tender of such countervailing composition in profit, as for the supporting of your royal estate was requisite. According unto which your maj.'s most favourable grant and direction, we prepared a petition to your most excellent maj. for leave to treat with your highness touching a perpetual composition, to be raised by yearly revenue out of the lands of your subjects, for Wardships and other burthens depending upon them, or springing with them; wherein we first entered into this dutiful consideration, that this prerogative of the crown, which we desire to compound for, was matter of mere profit, and not of any honour at all or princely dignity: for it could not then, neither yet can by any means, sink into our understandings, that these economical matters of education and marrying of children, which are common also to subjects, should bring any renown or reputation to a potent monarch, whose honour is settled on a higher and stronger foundation: faithful and loving subjects, valiant soldiers, an hon. nobility, wise counsellors, a learned and religious clergy, and a contented and a happy people, are the true honour of a king: and contrarywise, that it would be an exceeding great honour, and of memorable renown to your maj. with all posterity, and in present an assured bond of the hearts of all your people, to remit unto them this burthen, under which our children are born.

“This Prerogative then appearing to be a mere matter of great profit, we entered into a 2d degree of consideration, with how great grievance and damage of the subject, to the decay of many houses, and disabling of them to serve their prince and country; with how great mischief also, by occasion of many forced and ill-suited marriages; and lastly, with how great contempt and reproach of our nation in foreign countries; how small a commodity now was raised to the crown in respect of that, which with great love and joy and thankfulness, for the restitution of this original right in disposing of our children, we would be content and glad to assure unto your maj. We fell also from hence into a 3d degree of consideration, that it might be, that in regard that the original of these wardships was, serving of the king in his wars against Scotland, which cause we hope now to be at an everlasting end; and in regard moreover of that general hope, which at your maj.’s first entry, by the whole land was embraced (a thing known unto all men) that they should be now for ever eased of this burthen; your maj. out of your most noble and gracious disposition, and desire to overcome our expectation with your goodness, may be pleased to accept the offer of a perpetual and certain revenue, not only proportionable to the uttermost benefit that any of your progenitors ever reaped thereby, but also with such an overplus and large addition, as in great part to supply your maj.’s other occasions, that our ease might breed you plenty with their humble minds. With these dutiful respects, we intended to crave access unto your maj. But that ever it was said in our house by any man, that it was a slavery under your maj. more than under our former princes, hath come from an untrue and calumnious report: our sayings have always been, that this burthen was just; that the remitting thereof must come from your maj.’s grace; and that the denying our suit was no wrong.

“And thus, most gracious sovereign, with dutiful minds and sincere hearts towards your maj. have we truly disclosed our secret intents, and delivered our outward actions in all these so much traduced and blamed matters: and from henceforward shall remain in great affiance, that your maj. resteth satisfied, both in your grace and in your judgment, which above all worldly things we desire to effect, before the dissolving of this parl. where in so long time, with so much pains and endurance of so great sorrow, scarce any thing hath been done for their good and content, who sent us hither; and whom we left full of hope and joyful expectation.

“There remaineth, dread sovereign, yet one part of our duty at this present, which faithfulness of heart, not presumption, doth press: we stand not in place to speak or do things pleasing. Our care is, and must be, to confirm the love, and tye the hearts of your subjects, the commons, most firmly to your maj. Herein lieth the means of our well deserving of both: there was never prince entered with greater love, with greater joy and applause of all his people. This love, this joy, let it flourish in their hearts for ever. Let no suspicion have access to their fearful thoughts, that their privileges, which they think by your maj. should be protected, should now by sinister informations or counsel be violated or impaired: or that those, which with dutiful respects to your majesty, speak freely for the right and good of their country, shall be oppressed or disgraced. Let your maj. be pleased to receive public information from your commons in parl. as to the civil estate and government; for private informations pass often by practice: the voice of the people, in the things of their knowledge, is said to be as the voice of God. And if your maj. shall vouchsafe, at your best pleasure and leisure, to enter into your gracious consideration of our petition for the ease of these burthens, under which your whole people have of long time mourned, hoping for relief by your maj.; then may you be assured to be possessed of their hearts; and, if of their hearts, of all they can do or have. And so we, your maj.’s most humble and loyal subjects, whose ancestors have with great loyalty, readiness and joyfulness, served your famous progenitors, kings and queens of this realm, shall with like loyalty and joy, both we and our posterity, serve your maj. and your most royal issue for ever, with our lives, lands, and goods, and all other our abilities: and by all means endeavour to procure your maj. honour, with all plenty, tranquillity, content, joy and felicity.”

Lord Montague opposes the Bill against Jesuits, &c.] June 25. Another remarkable occurrence happened, of still greater moment. A bill had been brought into the House of Lords this session, intituled, ‘an Act for the due execution of the statutes against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, Recusants, &c.’ On the 3rd reading of which bill, the lord visc. Montague stood up, and made a speech against it; in which he declared, "That he did not only dissent from the bill, but, by way of apology for all sorts of Recusants, undertook the defence of their Religion, and inveighed against the whole state of that religion now established in this realm. He endeavoured to prove the great antiquity of their's, and the novelty of this; saying, that we had been misled to forsake the Religion of our Fathers, and to follow some light persons, of late times sprung up, that were of unsound doctrine, &c. evil life, or to that effect: he thereupon made most earnest request and entreaty to the Lords, that they would have a favourable consideration of the said Recusants, whom the bill did concern, and not to give it passage against them."*

The Journals proceed to tell us, that when some of the bps. had answered to the several points of this speech, relating to the established Religion, the lord chancellor interposed, by making a motion, declaring to the Lords, "That he doubted whether it might stand with the good order of that house, and with his duty, that such a speech should be suffered in the house as the lord Montague had made. In presuming, under pretence of speaking to a bill, to inveigh and speak generally against the whole State of Religion then established: by speaking directly to, and maintaining the tenets of, the Popish religion, so much derogating as it doth from the king's supreme authority and govt. He therefore desired the house to consider, whether the suffering of such a speech would stand with the duty of allegiance they owed to his maj." On this a debate arose; but all the lords that spoke agreed in opinion, that it was a very offensive speech, and not to be suffered to pass without some censure, animadversion, or punishment; except the lord Burleigh, who said, "He thought the best and fittest punishment would be, to let him pass unregarded and unpunished. Because he supposed that the lord Montague did affect a glory in it; and would be glad to get the more reputation amongst the Papists, both at home and abroad, if he should be censured or punished in any sort for their cause." In conclusion, it was thought meet that some order should be taken for the censuring the said lord for his presumptuous speech; but the determination thereof was deferred until the next sitting. After which, the bill being put to the question, it was passed by a great majority.

Lord Montague committed to the Fleet.] June 26. This affair was again renewed, and a recital of the lord Montague's speech made; on which it was ordered, by all the lords spiritual and temporal, that the said lord should be committed prisoner to the Fleet. And the warden of that prison was immediately sent for to take him into custody. But he did not continue long a prisoner; for, on the 30th, the Lords being informed that the said lord Montague was sorry for his offence, and that he had given cause for their displeasure; begging to be released from his confinement and take his place in the House: it was ordered, "that he should be discharged from the Fleet, and return to his own house, there to remain till Monday next, when he was to repair to the House of Lords, and by his own mouth declare his dislike of his speech, and give satisfaction to the Lords for the same." Accordingly, on the 2nd of July he was brought to the bar, and there he told the house, "How far it was, and ever should be, from him to do any thing out of any ill disposition or meaning to offend them; rendering unto their lordships most humble thanks, for their no less favourable construction of his intention, than for their most honourable and present releasement of him; with protestation of his most humble and dutiful zeal towards his maj. and also of his most loving and devoted affection towards all their lordships."

The King's Letter, declining any farther Subsidy at this Time.] June 26, another remarkable Letter from the King, written with his own hand, but corrected as to the spelling, was sent to the Commons; the intent of which was to signify his pleasure, in relation to a farther Grant of a Subsidy. The Letter is as follows:—"Having been informed, that within the space of these eight or ten days past, there hath been divers times speeches made in the Lower House of our Commons, for a Subsidy to be at this time granted unto us; we have thought it convenient, that ye should, in our name, acquaint the house with the sincere truth of our meaning in that matter; to the end that they, being at a point in that question, may with the greater expedition, conclude such special things, as are necessary to be done before the ending of this longsome session of parl.—It is true, that ever before, and a certain space after the sitting down of this parl. we were constantly resolved, neither to think, nor, in case it had been offered unto us, any ways to have accepted a Subsidy at this time; for as in our first speech to this whole parl. we declared, how unwilling we should ever be to be a burden to our people; so thought we it an unfit time, at our first parl. after our so happy and peaceably entry into this kingdom, with so great and general an applause, for having a Subsidy raised upon them, notwithstanding of our present great necessity; and that thorough the occasion of divers great expences, whereunto we were driven at our first entry here: but after the assembling of this parl. we were so often dealt with and informed by divers members of that house, that were otherwise strangers to our affairs, that it was a thing both honourable and reasonable, that a Subsidy should be granted unto us; that both our necessity required it, and the people in their love were ready to offer it unto us; that it was ever the form of all kings of England, to have a Subsidy given them at the very first assembling of their first parl.; that as it was honourable for us to receive it (being an earnest-penny of the people's love toward us) so would it be a thing nothing prejudicial nor hurtful for them to yield unto; and that there was enow in that house, that were striving amongst themselves who should be the first propounder thereof; as at the last we were moved to be contented, that some should prove the house's mind in it; only in this point were we careful, that, in case it were propounded, and put to a question, it should receive no public refusal; which could not but be dishonourable unto us, especially in the sight of all the strangers that are now here. But having now, with time, more narrowly examined both the custom in the like cases, at the first parliaments of our predecessors here, as likewise, that the last term's payment of the old great Subsidy is not yet come, so as a double burden shall appear to be laid upon the people, and yet our commodity never a hair the nearer; we have hereupon concluded with ourself, to resort to our former determination: and therefore it is our express will, that ye shall, in our name, signify to our said House of Commons, that we desire them, at this time, not to meddle any further with that question; assuring them, in the word of a king, that we will be so far from taking it unkindly, their not offering it unto us at this first session of this our first parl. as by the contrary we will only interpret it to proceed from the care they have, that our people should not have any occasion of distaste of us offered unto them at this time, for the reasons above-mentioned; assuring ourself, that the said house will, in their own time, be careful to see our state supplied, by such means, as may be most convenient for our weal, and least hurtful to our subjects; wherein we remit ourselves to their discreet considerations, in the due time.—James R."

After the reading of this Letter, a motion was made, "That the King's Letter should be recorded in their house, for an everlasting memory of his maj.'s grace.—That all the knights of shires may take a copy of it and publish it; in their countries. And, that mr. Speaker, at the end of this session, should present thanks to his maj. in the name of the whole house, for his grace expressed in that letter."

Grant of Tonnage and Poundage.] This letter was, probably, the occasion of sending up another bill from the Commons, intituled, "An Act for the assigning certain sums of money, for the defraying of the Charges of the King's Household. This bill soon passed into a law; as did also the former, for a Grant of Tonnage and Poundage, without any amendments; because the lord treasurer informed the house that the Judges being asked their opinions, about his points of exception to the said bill, they had resolved, that notwithstanding those exceptions, the bill might pass, as it then stood, without inconvenience or prejudice to his

maj. The Tonnage granted this session was 3s. on every tun of Wine imported; but on a tun of sweet Wines 6s. and 1s. on every awm of Rhenish. The Poundage was 1s. on every 20s. worth of goods or merchandise, imported and exported, excepting woollen manufactures; and tin and pewter were to pay 2s. A denisen was to pay for every sack of wool 33s. 4d. and for every 240 woollfells the same; and for every last of hides and backs 3l. 6s. 8d.—See Statutes at Large, cap. 33.—These were all the supplies granted to the king this session and all that were asked by the ministry at this time.

The Speaker's Speech at the Close of the Session.] July 7th, the king came to the House of Lords, and, being seated on the throne, the Commons and their Speaker were sent for; who, on presenting the bills, made the following Speech to his maj.—"History, most high and mighty sovereign, is truly approved to be the Treasure of Times past, the Light of Truth, the Memory of Life, the Guide and Image of Man's present Estate, Pattern of the Things to come, and the true Work-mistress of Experience, the Mother of Knowledge; for therein, as in a crystal, there is not only presented unto our views the virtues, but the vices; the perfections, but the defects; the good, but the evil; the lives, but the death, of all precedent governors and government, which held the reins of this imperial regiment: where, although the same hath ever been managed with one idea, or form of govt. namely, by the Laws' direction, by King's rule, by Senates' advice, and by Magistrates' discipline; yet hath the same budded fruits of several kinds of sense, moving from the use or abuse of Laws' direction, from the virtue or error of King's rule, from the good or evil of Senates' advice, or from the justice or injustice of Magistrates' discipline: for as good govt. is the guide-mistress of human happiness, and tutor-ess of public commodity: so is ill govt. the devouring tyrant of subjects' bliss, and the venomous poisoner of commonwealth well-doing."

THE LAWS.

"The Laws, whereby the ark of this government hath been ever steered, are of three kinds; the 1st, the Common Law, grounded or drawn from the Law of God, the Law of Reason, and the Law of Nature, not mutable; the 2nd, the positive Law, founded, changed, and altered by and through the occasions and policies of times; the 3rd, Customs and Usages, practised and allowed with time's approbation, without known beginnings; wherein although we differ from the laws of other states' government, yet have the authors thereof imitated the approved excellency of Plato and Aristotle, framing their laws according to the capacity, nature, disposition, and humour of the place and people; by the level of whose line this state hath been commanded, governed, supported, and maintained these  years, not inferior, but in equal balance, with any confining regiment whatsoever; and have, by the touchstone of true experience, approved to be to the king his sceptre, to the senate the oracle of counsel, to the judge the rule of justice, to the magistrate the guide of discipline, to the subject the school-mistress of obedience, to the multitude the preventor of ignorance, the standard-bearer of sedition, and, generally to all, the bond, that tieth men to civil and orderly course of life. Finally, laws are only dials of true direction; direction the weapons of govt.; govt. the armour of peace; and peace, the true perfection of all worldly happiness: but contrarywise, no laws, no direction; no direction, no govt.; no govt. no peace; no peace, utter destruction; for, 'sine imperio,' neither house, neither city, neither nation, neither mankind, nor the nature of things, 'nec ipse mundus stare potest.' And yet the good or ill, both of laws, and of each worldly thing, consisteth in the use or abuse of the same; as, if well used, it yieldeth the sweet of his true property; but, if abused, that sweet is turned to sour; or, if not used, loseth his virtue: as, amongst earthly things, food hath his precedency; for, being well used, it maintaineth and supporteth the life and nature of man; but abusedly taken, by surfeit destroyeth the body; or if not used, remaineth fruitless; so the laws, if well disposed, are the stern, that wieldeth the ark of civil govt.; but perverted, become the instruments of destruction; or not executed, become 'corpus sine anima;' and therefore are to receive either life, or death, by the good or ill of the king's rule, the senates advice, and the magistrates discipline. As concerning the bliss or bane of kings govt. which in itself, and of itself, representeth a divine maj. it consisteth in two general parts; the one, example, the other, command: for as, from below, we receive either light or darkness from above, so doth the subject from the prince's example receive either his virtue, or his vice; and experience approveth, that the estate of commonwealths changeth with the alteration of princes precedent. And therefore the errors of princes are not hurtful in themselves, as are their erroneous examples; whereby their people become infected: for it hath, and ever will be approved true, that subjects, by imitation of their princes example, for the most part become like unto themselves; for the excellent splendor of the king's virtue doth not only incite all subjects to behold them, but exceeding admiration and imitation to love them, and, by loving, to observe them. And therefore the virtue of Vespasianus' example wrought more effectual good amongst his people, than his laws: for 'obsequium in principes et æmulandi amor,' are, of all other, most excellent tratives to the good or ill of subjects course of life; and therefore the more curiously and respective ought they to be in their acts and actions, as the leading stars of the people's direction. The other resteth in his absolute power of command: for although the law may direct, the senate advise, and the magistrate execute; yet to determine and command is proper to the king himself: and therefore his commands ought to be religious, for he therein becometh the president of many millions of souls; they ought to be just, for he sitteth in the judgment seat of the absolute king of justice; they ought to be tempered with mercy, for he representeth the divine image of mercy; they ought to be mild, for he is the father and the subjects his children; they ought to be preservative, and not devouring, for he is the shepherd, and they the flock; they ought rather to prevent the cause of offence, than punish the offender, for one is much more honourable than the other; they ought to be warranted by law, for both by office and oath he is bound to his law; they ought to proceed from reason, for thereby he is revered as a God amongst men; they ought to be prudent, for that makes him deified with fame and renown. Lyncurgus never commanded ought to be done, that himself would not do; which made him honoured, revered, and obeyed; but Sylla commanding sobriety, temperance, and frugality, himself practising the contrary, was both contemned and scorned: and therefore the king ought to patronize his command by his actions. Themistocles demanded, whether he were a good poet, that in singing would transgress the true rules of musick? Being answered, No; replied, no more is that king, that commands without his law. Theopompus being asked, why Lacedemon did so flourish; answered, because their king knew how to command: and commandments, justly commanded, exact performance; but things, unduly required, do breed mislike, and sometimes enforce refusal. Claudian therefore concludeth, 'Peragat tranquilla potestas, quod violenta nequie; mandataque fortius urget imperiosa quies;' and more gracious is the name of piety, than of power. To conclude, princes, by the perfection of their examples, and by the virtue of their just commands, become to God acceptable, to the world renowned, to their people beloved, to all men with reverence admired, and in the end with glory immortalized: but if their commands be unjust, unmerciful, cruel, devouring, lawless, unreasonable, and imprudent, he loseth the glorious title of a good king, and becometh eternized with the deathless fame of an hellish tyrant; which all good kings ought to eschew, as the devouring devil of their fame, renown, and eternity.—The third place in the commonwealth hath the senate: for no king can, with his diligence and only wisdom, equally govern the whole estate; for it is rather the virtue of God, than man, effectually to know all things appertaining to government: and therefore, as it is necessary for a prince to see with his own eyes, to hear with his own ears, and to direct by the dial of his own judgment; so is it requisite for a prince to have many eyes, many ears, many tongues, many hands, many feet, and many wits, to see, to hear, to dispatch, to inform, and advise, for, in, and concerning the public state, as preparatives to his commanding judgment, and preservatives against the common evil. Romulus therefore refused to undergo the burden of government alone, but chose unto himself a hundred senators. Trajanus called his senate his father; for as the father doth foretel his son of the good or ill that may befall him, so ought the senate to admonish the king of things profitable, and unprofitable, to him and the state. The senate therefore ought to know the law, the liberties, the customs, the use, and discipline, wherewith the state is governed; they ought not only to know the means, whereby the state may be beautified, amplified, and preserved, but also how the same may be weakened, impeached, or subverted; they ought also to know, what is the majesty, prerogative, greatness, and jurisdiction of a king, and what is the due right and liberty of subjects; for they are the mean, and judges between force and fear, liberty and servitude, the king and his people. A counsellor ought therefore to be temperate, not passionate in his affections; moderate, not transported with appetites; mortified by years, not inveigled by youth; grave in his behaviour, not light in his condition; justly wise in his advice, not crafty in his counsel; virtuous in his conversation, not vicious in his disposition: a counsellor thus complete, is to the king a watchful tower, to the law a graceful ornament, to government an absolute guide, and to the people a beloved oracle; but if he be passionate in his affections, transported in his appetites, inveigled by his youth, light in his condition, crafty in his counsel, and vicious in his disposition; then becometh he to the king a regardless and watchless tower, to the law a disgraceful blemish, to the government a blind dissolute guide, and to the people a contemned fabulous deceiver.—The next and immediate subsequent place in the commonwealth hath the magistrate; for in vain is the laws direction, the king's command, and the senate's advice, if not by the magistrate's discipline executed: for laws, command, and advice receive not their authority, when they are enacted, given, or advised, but when they are executed; not when they are enacted, but when they are observed; and therefore the commonwealth doth put upon the magistrate the person of severity, to execute the laws direction, prince's command, and the senate's advice. The Roman magistrate therefore said, my mother hath brought me into the world of mild and gentle disposition, 'Sed respublica me severum fecit:' for laws are delivered to the magistrates, as a sword, to cut off the reins of licentious liberty; but if the magistrate keep it sheathed or rusty, is there any that will dread the correction of so sheathed or rusty a weapon? 2ndly, laws are ordained as rules or lines of men's lives; but if the magistrate, through fear or pity, shall bend them to and fro, is there any man that will regard so leaden a rule? 3rdly, laws are established as walls, or forts, or defence against disorder; but if the magistrate shall suffer them to melt with favour, or rend asunder with corruption, will not all men contemn such walls of wax, or forts of cobwebs? The memory of Nerva his example approveth it; who, through too tender a conceit of pity, was noted oversparing in punishment of the people's insolencies; but in the end, his city thereby grew into such contempt, both of his person and government, that of him it was said, That better it were for all good men to live under the government of Domitian, under whom nothing was lawful, than under Nerva, where all things were lawful. And therefore the magistrate ought to be 'sciens, justus, et fortis'; first, to know what he is to execute; 2ndly, to be just in his execution; and 3rdly, not to fear the face of any, in that he ought to execute; for he is the living law, and the law of the dumb magistrate: and nothing is more pernicious in the commonwealth, than an ignorant, unjust, and timorous magistrate. To conclude, as the end of the sailor's endeavour is good passage, the physician's travel, health, the captain's labour, victory; so the well disciplining of the people ought to be the magistrate's true endeavour; which if he regardfully perform, then becometh he a good pilot, a provident physician, a victorious captain, and a just well-deserving magistrate; but if he be ignorant, remiss, timorous, unjust, or corrupt; then is he to the life of the law a deathful murderer, to the soul of the king's justice a betraying teacher, to the virtue of senates advice a deceiving evil, and to the body of the commonwealth a devouring wolf.—A people, by the direction of such laws, by the grace, wisdom, and justice of such a king, by the advice of such a senate, and by the discipline of such magistrates, governed, if not then loyal and obedient, are rather the whelps of wolves, than sons of men; rather monsters of nature, than creatures of reason; nay, more devils in condition, than professors of religion: from the corruption of which error your majesty shall ever approve us to be as free, as virtue is from vice. And though, during the time of these our parliament counsels, we have, through the warrant of our long continued privilege, your gracious approbation thereof, your patience in hearing, your wisdom in discerning, your justice in adjudging, and your clemency in relieving, presumed of you, as of our king, but more of you, as of our good king, nay most of all of you, as a most absolute good man, to propound, dispute, assent, and dissent, freely; to implore your royal protection of our long-continued liberties, your gracious relieving of our burdens (not by authority imposed, but by the corruption of base officers extorted) and your discerning consideration of our feared dangers; wherein although we have proceeded without flattery or cowardice (the one never being a true counsellor, nor the other a good subject) yet hath the same been without hearts or minds thought, either to distaste your gracious pleasure, or to detract ought, that in right, honour, or prerogative, yourself in your great wisdom should affect as good: for your glory is, and must be, our honour, your greatness our protection, your abundance our riches, your safety our security, your content our joy; otherwise were we worthily unworthy of the blessings of the religion, of the peace, of the safety, of the grace, and, generally, of all the fruits of happiness, which by you, from you, and under you, we do, and hope ever to possess. And as out of your princely grace you pleased (to our exceeding hearts comfort) to say, that you more joyed to be king of such subjects, than to be king over many kingdoms; so do we, with true zeal and faith, protest more to joy in being the subjects of such a king, than in the freedom of any liberty, which we shall ever with our hearts life blood endeavour to approve against all opposers and opposition: and as God let him endure the torment of ever dying death, that otherwise shall in mind conceit, or in heart consent; so let him live hatefully to God and man, that shall endeavour, or occasion in the least, to impeach and violate so royal and loyal a conjunction between a head so absolutely peerless, and a body so faithfully loyal. And although your maj. more seeking to enrich your treasure with the hearts and minds of us your subjects, than with the money and treasure of our purses, have lately, out of your abundant grace, prevented our concluding to present you with a Subsidy of crowns and coin, being but a blossom of the fruitful ever-bearing tree of our abundant love, loyalty, and duty (which we sooner shall leave to live, than leave unperformed) yet give us leave, (of all other most worthy to be beloved sovereign) not only to present you with our humble and dutiful thanks, but also to present you with five Subsidies, of far more precious price and worth: 1. The first consisting of many millions of affectionated hearts to love you; 2. Of number of loyal minds to obey you; 3. Of as many zealous spirits to pray for you; 4. Of as equal proportioned hands to fight for you; 5. And with the treasure of the whole kingdom to supply you; which the world shall both feel and know, when, where, and against whom whatsoever, your maj. shall be pleased to dispose and command us. This we profess, protest, and present, neither out of servile fear, nor base flattery, both hateful to a king so absolute, wise, magnanimous, and gracious; but out of our endless loves, duties, and loyalties, whereunto death only, and nought else but death, shall be of force to give end."

There is no speech of the king, or the lord chancellor, entered, for this time, in either Journal; and no more is said in the Lords' than that the lord chancellor, by the king's command, prorogued this parl. to the 7th of Feb. next ensuing.

Notwithstanding the great affair of the Union was still obstructed, though the king

laboured hard to bring it about; yet, by the advice of his council, he was this year proclaimed King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, that the names of England and Scotland might from henceforth be extinct. Scottish coins were made current, and the arms of both kingdoms quartered on all standards, military and civil, throughout both the nations. Peace was also proclaimed here between England and Spain, on the 5th of August, 1604.

The Gunpowder Plot discovered.] Feb. 7, 1605. Parl. met, according to prorogation, and were prorogued by commission, to the 3rd of Oct. At which time they were again prorogued, in the same manner, to the 5th of Nov. following, and on that day to the 9th of the said month. During which last-mentioned periods was discovered the deepest and blackest Plot that ever was laid against king and kingdom. The reader will presently comprehend, that the infamous Gunpowder Plot is here meant; the account of which is so amply given by all our English Historians. In the Journals of the Commons, Nov. 5, we find this entry. "This last night the Upper House of parl. was searched by sir Thomas Knevet; and one Johnston, servant to mr. Thomas Percy, was there apprehended, who had placed 36 barrells of gunpowder in the vault under the house, with a purpose to blow up the king and the whole company, when they should there assemble. Afterwards, divers other gentlemen were discovered to be of the Plot."

The Lords' Journals tell us, "That on the 9th of Nov. the house being met, and the king seated on the throne, the Lord Chancellor opened the session with giving some account of what had passed between the commissioners of England and Scotland, at their late meeting, according to an act made for that purpose last session of parl. Afterwards, he presented to his maj. and the house two Copies of the Tripartite Writings agreed on, one of which was delivered openly to the clerk of parl. to be kept in his custody till a farther proceeding in that business. He then made a Relation of the most wicked and horrible Treason ever heard of, intended against his maj. and the whole state; which was purposed to have been put in execution on Tuesday, the 5th inst. the first day of this session, holden by prorogation." The lord chancellor having ended, the King began to tell the house, that he came there, at this time, (contrary to the custom of any of his predecessors, at the beginning of any session of parl. holden by prorogation) on purpose to receive the Writing, which had just then been delivered in; that no stop might be put to that proceeding. Afterwards his maj. made an ample declaration to both houses, of the late most horrible Treason, in the following Speech from the Throne*:

* This Speech is taken from a book entitled, 'A Discourse of the Manner of the Discovery of this late intended Treason, joined

The King's Speech upon that Occasion.] "My lords spiritual and temporal, and you the knights and burgesses of this parl.; it was far from my thoughts, till very lately before my coming to this place, that this subject should have been ministered unto me, whereupon I am now to speak. But now it so falleth out, that whereas, in the preceding session of this parl. the principal occasion of my speech was, to thank and congratulate all you of this house, and in you all the whole commonwealth (as being the representative body of the state) for your so willing, and loving, receiving and embracing of me in that place, which God and nature, by descent of blood, had in his own time provided for me: so now my subject is, to speak of a far greater thanksgiving than before I gave to you, being to a far greater person, which is to God, for the great and miraculous delivery he hath at this time granted to me, and to you all, and consequently to the whole body of this estate. I must therefore begin with this old and most approved sentence in divinity, 'Misericordia Dei supra omnia opera ejus.' For Almighty God did not furnish so great matter to his glory by the creation of this great world as he did by the redemption of the same. Neither did his generation of the little world, in our old and first Adam, so much set forth the praises of God in his justice and mercy, as did our regeneration in the last and second Adam. And now I must crave a little pardon of you (that since kings are in the word of God itself called gods, as being his lieutenants and vicegerents on earth, and so adorned and furnished with some sparkles of the divinity;) to compare some of the works of God, the great king, towards the whole and general world, to some of his works towards me, and this little world of my dominions, compassed and severed by the sea from the rest of the earth. For as God, for the just punishment of the first great sins in the original world, when the sons of God went in unto the daughters of men, and the cup of their iniquities of all sorts was filled, and heaped up to the full, did, by a general deluge and overflowing of waters, baptize the world to a general destruction, but not to general purgation: (only excepted Noah and his family, who did repent and believe the threatenings of God's judgment;) so now, when the world shall wax old as a garment, and that all the impieties and sins that can be devised against both the first and second table, have, and shall be committed to the full measure; God is to punish the world the second time by fire, to the general destruction and not purgation thereof. And, as it was done in the former to Noah and his family by the waters, so shall all we that believe be likewise purged, and not destroyed by fire. In the like sort, I say, I may justly compare these two great and fearful doomsdays, wherewith God threatened to destroy me, and all you of this little world that have interest in me. For although I confess, as all mankind, so chiefly kings, as being in the higher places, like the high trees, or stayest mountains, and steepest rocks, are most subject to the daily tempests of innumerable dangers; and I, amongst all other kings, have ever been subject unto them, not only ever since my birth, but even, as I may justly say, before my birth, and while I was yet in my mother's belly; yet have I been exposed to two more special and greater dangers than all the rest. The first of them, in the kingdom where I was born, and passed the first part of my life; and the last of them here, which is the greatest. In the former I should have been baptized in blood, and in my destruction, not only the kingdom wherein I then was, but ye also by your future interest, should have tasted of my ruin. Yet it pleased God to deliver me, as it were, from the very brink of death, from the point of the dagger, and so purge me by my thankful acknowledgment of so great a benefit. But in this which did so lately fall out, and which destruction was prepared not for me alone, but for you all that are here present, and wherein no rank, age, or sex should have been spared: this was not a crying sin of blood as the former; but it may well be called a roaring, nay, a thundering sin of fire and brimstone, from the which God hath so miraculously delivered us all. What can I speak of this, I know not: nay, rather what can I not speak of it? And therefore I must for horror say with the poet; 'vox faucibus hæret.' In this great and horrible attempt, whereof the like was never either heard or read, I observe three wonderful, or rather miraculous events. 1st, in the cruelty of the plot itself; wherein cannot be enough admired the horrible and fearful cruelty of their device, which was not only for the destruction of my person, nor of my wife and posterity only, but of the whole body of the state in general; wherein should neither have been spared, or distinction made, of young nor of old, of great nor of small, of man nor of woman: the whole nobility; the whole reverend clergy, bishops, and most part of the good preachers; the most part of the knights and gentry; yea, and if that any in this society were favourers of their profession, they should all have gone one way: the whole judges of the land, with most of the lawyers and the whole clerks; and as the wretch himself that is in the Tower doth confess, it was purposely devised by them, and concluded to be done in this house: that where the cruel laws (as they say) were made against their religion, both place and persons should all be destroyed and blown up at once. And then consider therewithal the cruel sort of that practice: for by three different sorts in general may mankind be put to death. The 1st, by other men, and reasonable creatures, which is least cruel; for then both defence of men against men may be expected; and likewise who knoweth what pity God may stir up in the hearts of the actors at the very instant? Besides the many ways and means whereby men may escape in such a present fury. And the 2nd way more cruel than that, is by animal and unreasonable creatures: for as they have less pity than men, so it is a greater horror, and more unnatural for men to deal with them; but yet with them both resistance may avail, and also some pity may be had, as was in the lions, in whose den Daniel was thrown; or that thankful lion that had the Roman slave in his mercy. But the 3rd, the most cruel and unmerciful of all, is the destruction by insensible and inanimate things; and amongst them all, the most cruel are the two elements of water and fire; and of those two the fire most raging and merciless. 2ndly, how wonderful it is when you shall think upon the small, or rather no ground, whereupon the practisers were enticed to invent this tragedy. For if these conspirators had only been bankrupt persons, or discontented upon occasion of any disgrace done unto them; this might have seemed to have been but a work of revenge. But for my own part, as I scarcely ever knew any of them; so cannot they alledge so much as a pretended cause of grief: and the wretch himself, in bands, doth confess, that there was no cause moving him or them, but meerly and only religion. And specially, that christian men, at least so called, Englishmen, born within the country, and one of the specials of them, my sworn servant in an hon. place, should practice the destruction of their king, his posterity, their country and all; wherein their following obstinacy is so joined to their former malice, as the fellow himself that is in hand, cannot be moved to discover any signs or notes of repentance; except this, that he doth yet stand to avow, that he repents only for not being able to perform his intent. 3rdly, The discovery hereof is not a little wonderful, which would be thought the more miraculous by you all, if you were as well acquainted with my natural disposition, as those are who be near about me. For as I ever did hold suspicion to be the sickness of a tyrant; so was I so far upon the other extremity, as I rather contemned all advertisements, or apprehensions of practices. And yet now, at this time, was I so far contrary to myself, as when the letter was shewed to me by my secretary, wherein a general, obscure advertisement was given of some dangerous blow at this time; I did upon the instant interpret and apprehend some dark phrases therein, contrary to the ordinary grammar-construction of them, (and in another sort than I am sure any divine, or lawyer in any university would have taken them) to be meant by this horrible form of blowing us up all by powder; and thereupon ordered that search to be made, whereby the matter was discovered, and the man apprehended; whereas if I had apprehended or interpreted it to any other sort of danger, no worldly provision or prevention could have made us escape our utter destruction! and in that case, there was a wonderful providence of God, that when the party himself was taken, he was but new come out of his house from working, having his fire-work for kindling ready in his pocket; wherewith, as he confesseth, if he had been taken but immediately before, when he was in the house, he was resolved to have blown up himself with his takers. One thing, for my own part have I cause to thank God in; that if God, for our sins, had suffered their wicked intents to have prevailed, it should never have been spoken nor written in ages succeeding, that I had died ingloriously in an ale-house, a stews, or such vile place; but mine end should have been with the most honourable and best company, and in that most honourable and fittest place for a king to be in, for doing the turns most proper to his office: and the more have we all cause to thank and magnify God for this his merciful delivery. And specially I for my part, that he hath given me yet once leave, whatsoever should come of me hereafter, to assemble you in this honourable place; and here in this place, where our general destruction should have been, to magnify and praise him for our general delivery; that I may justly now say of mine enemies and yours, as David doth often say in the Psalms, 'Inciderunt in foveam, quam fecerunt.' And since Scipio an Ethnick, led by the light of nature, that day when he was accused by the tribunes of the people of Rome, for mispending and wasting in his Punic wars the city's treasure, even upon the sudden brake out with that diversion of them from that matter, calling them to remembrance how that day was the day of the year, wherein God hath given them so great a victory against Hannibal; and therefore it was fitter for them all, leaving other matters to run to the temple to praise God for that so great delivery, which the people did all follow with one applause: how much more cause have we, that are christians, to bestow this time in this place for thanksgiving to God for his great mercy, though we had had no other errand of assembling here at this time; wherein if I have spoken more like a divine, than would seem to belong to this place, the matter itself must plead for mine excuse: for being here come to thank God for a divine work of his mercy; how can I speak of this deliverance of us from so hellish a practice, so well, as in language of divinity, which is the direct opposite to so damnable an intention? And therefore may I justly end this purpose, as I did begin it with this sentence, The mercy of God is above all his works. It resteth now, that I should inform you what is to be done hereafter, upon the occasion of this horrible and strange accident. As for your part, that are my faithful and loving subjects of all degrees, I know that your hearts are so burnt up with zeal in this errand, and your tongues so ready to utter your dutiful affections, and your hands and feet so bent to concur in the execution thereof, (for which as I need not to spur you, so can I not but praise you for the same) as it may very well be possible, that the zeal of your hearts shall make some of you in your speeches, rashly to blame such as may be innocent of this attempt. But upon the other part I wish you to consider, that I would be sorry that any being innocent of this practice, either domestical or foreign, should receive blame or harm for the same. For although it cannot be denied, that it was the only blind superstition of their errors in religion, that led them to this desperate device, yet doth it not follow, that all professing that Romish religion were guilty of the same. For as it is true, that no other sect of heretics, not excepting Turk, Jew, nor Pagan, no not even those of Calicute who adore the devil, did ever maintain by the grounds of their religion, that it was lawful, or rather meritorious (as the Romish catholics call it) to murder princes or people for quarrel of religion. And although particular men of all professions of religion have been some thieves, some murderers, some traitors; yet ever when they came to their end and just punishment, they confessed their fault to be in their nature, and not in their profession: (these Romish catholics only excepted) yet it is true on the other side, that many honest men blinded, peradventure, with some opinions of popery, as if they be not found in the questions of the real presence, or in the number of the sacraments, or some such school question; yet do they either not know, or at least, not believe all the true grounds of popery, which is indeed, the mystery of iniquity. And therefore do we justly confess, that many papists, especially our fore-fathers, laying their only trust upon Christ and his merits at their last breath, may be, and oftentimes are saved; detesting in that point, and thinking the cruelty of puritans worthy of fire, that will admit no salvation to any papist. I therefore thus do conclude this point; that as upon the one part many honest men, seduced with some errors of popery, may yet remain good and faithful subjects: so upon the other part, none of those that truly know and believe the whole grounds, and school conclusions of their doctrine, can ever prove either good christians, or faithful subjects. And for the part of foreign princes and states, I may so much the more acquit them and their ministers, of their knowledge and consent to any such villainy; as I may justly say, that in that point I better know all christian kings by myself, that no king nor prince of honour will ever abase himself so much, as to think a good thought of so base and dishonourable a treachery: wishing you therefore, that as God hath given me an happy peace and amity, with all other christian princes my neighbours; (as was even now very gravely told you by my lord chanc.) that so you will reverently judge and speak of them in this case. And for my part I would wish with those ancient philosophers, that there were a chrystal window in my breast, wherein all my people might see the secretest thoughts of my heart; for then might you all see no alteration in my mind for this accident, further than in those two points. The 1st, caution and weariness in govt. to discover and search out the mysteries of this wickedness as far as may be: the other, after due trial, severity of punishment upon those that may be found guilty of so detestable and unheard-of villainy. And now in this matter, if I have troubled your ears with an abrupt speech, undigested in any good method or order; you have to consider that an abrupt, and unadvised speech doth best become the relation of so abrupt and unorderedly an accident. And although I have ordained proroguing of this parl. until after Christmas, upon two necessary respects: whereof the first is, that neither I nor my council can have leisure, at this time, both to take order, for the apprehension and trial of these conspirators, and also to wait upon the daily affairs of the parl. as the council must do: and the other reason is, the necessity, at this time, of divers of your presences in your shires that have charges or commandments there. For as these wretches thought to have blown up in a manner the whole world of this island; every man being now come up here, either for public causes of parl. or else for their own private causes in law, or otherwise: so these rebels that now wander through the country, could never have gotten so fit a time of safety in their passage, or whatsoever unlawful actions, as now when the country by the foresaid occasion is in a manner left desolate, and waste unto them. Besides that, it may be that I shall desire you at your next session, to take upon you the judgment of this crime: for as so extraordinary a fact deserves extraordinary judgment: so can there not I think (following even their own rule) be a fitter judgment for them, than they should be measured with the same measure wherewith they thought to measure us; and that the same place and persons, whom they thought to destroy, should be the just avengers of their so unnatural a parricide: yet not knowing that I will have occasion to meet with you, myself, in this place, at the beginning of the next session of this parl.; (because if it had not been for delivering of the articles agreed upon by the commissioners of the union, which was thought most convenient to be done in my presence, where both head and members of the parl. were met together, my presence had not otherwise been requisite here at this time) I have therefore thought good for conclusion of this meeting, to discourse to you somewhat anent the true nature and definition of a parl.; which I will remit to your memories, till your next sitting down, that you may then make use of it as occasion shall be ministered. For albeit, it be true, that at the first session of my first parl. which was not long after mine entry into this kingdom; it could not become me to inform you of any thing belonging to law or state here; (for all knowledge must either be infused or acquired, and seeing the former sort thereof is now, with prophesie, ceased in the world; it could not be possible for me, at my first entry here, before experience had taught it me, to be able to understand the particular mysteries of this state) yet now that I have reigned almost three years amongst you, and have been careful to observe those things that belong to the office of a king; albeit, that time be but a short time for experience in others; yet in a king may be thought a reasonable long time, especially in me, who although I be but in a manner a new king here, yet have been long acquainted with the office of a king in such another kingdom, as doth nearest of all others agree with the laws and customs of this state. Remitting to your consideration, to judge of that which hath been concluded by the commissioners of the union, wherein I am at this time to signify unto you, that as I can bear witness to the foresaid commissioners, that they have not agreed nor concluded therein any thing, wherein they have not foreseen as well the weal and commodity of the one country, as of the other; so can they all bear me record, that I was so far from pressing them to agree to any thing, which might bring with it any prejudice to this people; as by the contrary I did ever admonish them, never to conclude upon any such union, as might carry hurt or grudge with it to either of the said nations: for the leaving of any such thing, could not but be the greatest hindrance that might be to such an action, which God by the laws of nature had provided to be in his own time, and hath now in effect perfected in my person; to which purpose my lord chancellor hath better spoken, than I am able to relate.—And as to the nature of this high court of parl. it is nothing else but the king's great council; which the king doth assemble either upon occasion of interpreting, or abrogating old laws, or making of new, according as ill manners shall deserve, or for the public punishment of notorious evil-doers, or the praise and reward of the virtuous and well-deservers; wherein these four things are to be considered: 1st, whereof this court is composed: 2ndly, what matters are proper for it: 3rdly, to what end it is ordained. And 4thly, what are the means and ways whereby this end should be brought to pass.—As for the thing itself, it is composed of a head and a body: the head is the king, the body are the members of the parl. This body again is subdivided into two parts; the upper and lower house: the upper compounded partly of nobility, temporal men, who are heretable counsellors to the high court of parl. by the honour of their creation and lands: and partly of bps. spiritual men, who are likewise by the virtue of their place and dignity counsellors, life-renters, or 'ad vitam' of this court. The other house is composed of knights of the shire; and gentry, and burgesses for the towns. But because the number would be infinite for all the gentlemen and burgesses to be present at every parl. therefore a certain number is selected and chosen out of that great body, serving only for that parl. where their persons are the representation of that body.—Now the matters whereof they are to treat ought therefore to be general, and rather of such matters as cannot well be performed without the assembling of that general body; and no more of these generals neither, than necessity shall require: for as 'in corruptissima republica sunt plurimæ leges:' so doth the life and strength of the law consist not in heaping up infinite and confused numbers of laws, but in the right interpretation and good execution of good and wholesome laws. If this be so then, neither is this a place on the one side, for every rash and harebrained fellow to propone new laws of his own invention: nay rather could I wish these busy heads to remember that law of the Lacedemonians, that whosoever came to propone a new law to the people, behoved publicly to present himself with a rope about his neck, that in case the law were not allowed, he should be hanged therewith. So wary should men be of proponing novelties, but most of all not to propone any bitter or seditious laws, which can produce nothing but grudges and discontentment between the prince and his people: nor yet is it on the other side, a convenient place for private men under the colour of general laws, to propone nothing but their own particular gain, either to the hurt of their private neighbours, or to the hurt of the whole state in general; which many times, under fair and pleasing titles, are smoothly passed over, and so by stealth procured, without consideration that the private meaning of them tendeth to nothing but either to the wreck of a particular party, or else under colour of public benefit to pill the poor people, and serve as it were for a general impost upon them for filling the purses of some private persons.—And so the end for which the parl. is ordained, being only for the advancement of God's glory, and the establishment and wealth of the king and his people: it is no place then for particular men to utter there their private conceits, nor for satisfaction of their curiosities, and least of all to make shew of their eloquence by tyning the time with long studied and eloquent orations. No, the reverence of God, their king, and their country being well settled in their hearts, will make them ashamed of such toys; and remember that they are there as sworn counsellors to their king, to give their best advice for the furtherance of his service, and the flourishing weal of his estate.—And lastly, if you will rightly consider the means and ways how to bring all your labours to a good end; you must remember, that you are here assembled by your lawful king to give him your best advices, in the matters proposed by him unto you, being of that nature, which I have already told, wherein you are gravely to deliberate, and, upon your consciences, plainly to determine how far those things propounded do agree with the weal, both of your king and of your country, whose weals cannot be separated. And as for myself, the world shall ever bear me witness, that I never shall propound any thing unto you, which shall not as well tend to the weal publick, as to any benefit for me: so shall I ever oppose myself to that, which may not tend to the good of the commonwealth, for the which I am ordained, as I have often said. And as you are to give your advice in such things as shall by your king be proposed: so is it on your part your duties to propound any thing that you can, after mature deliberation, judge to be needful, either for those ends already spoken of, or otherwise for the discovery of any latent evil in the kingdom, which peradventure may not have come to the king's ear. If this then ought to be your grave manner of proceeding in this place, men should be ashamed to make shew of the quickness of their wits here, either in taunting, scoffing, or detracting the prince or state in any point, or yet in breaking jests upon their fellows, for which the ordinaries or alehouses are fitter places, than this honourable and high court of parl. In conclusion then, since you are to break up, for the reasons I have already told you, I wish such of you as have any charges in your countries, to hasten you home for the repressing of the insolencies of these rebels, and apprehension of their persons; wherein as I heartily pray to the Almighty for your prosperous success, so do I not doubt, but we shall shortly hear the good news of the same; and that you shall have an happy return, and meeting here to all our comforts."—[Here the lord chancellor spake touching the proroguing of the parl. And having done, his maj. rose again and said,]—"Since it pleased God to grant me two such notable deliverers upon one day of the week, which was Tuesday, and likewise one day of the month, which was the fifth; thereby to teach me, that as it was the same devil that still persecuted me; so it was the same God that still mightily delivered me: I thought it therefore not amiss, that the one and twentieth day of Jan. which falls to be upon Tuesday, should be the day of meeting of this next session of parl. hoping and assuring myself, that the same God, who hath now granted me and you all so gracious and notable a delivery, shall prosper all our affairs at that next session, and bring them to an happy conclusion. And now I consider God hath well provided it that the ending of this parl. hath been so long continued; for as for my own part, I never had any other intention, but only to seek so far my weal and prosperity, as might conjunctly stand with the flourishing state of the whole commonwealth, as I have often told you: so on the other part I confess, if I had been in your places at the beginning of this parl. (which was so soon after mine entry into this kingdom, wherein ye could not possibly have so perfect a knowledge of mine inclination, as experience since hath taught you) I could not but have suspected, and misinterpreted divers things; in the trying whereof, now I hope, by your experience of my behaviour and form of govt, you are well enough cleared, and resolved."

It seems as if the parl. met, at this time, only to have the foregoing Declarations made to them, by the king and the lord chancellor; for they were instantly prorogued to the 2nd of Jan. following; and from thence to the 21st of the same month. On which last mentioned day, the Lords being met, a motion was made by the archbishop of Canterbury (Richard Bancroft,) "That a Committee might be appointed to consider the laws already in force, that tend to the preservation of Religion, his Majesty, the State and Commonwealth. What defects are in the execution of them, or what new laws may be thought needful." This motion being seconded by the bp. of London, Rd. Vaughan, followed by Cecil earl of Salisbury, a Committee was immediately appointed for that purpose.

Proceedings relative to the Popish Plot. The Lord Chancellor gave direction to the clerk of parl. to take special notice of the names of such Lords as should fail in their appearance this session; having no license from his maj. for their absence. This was done, no doubt, because some of the peers were then suspected to be concerned in the late Plot; and some were taken up for it afterwards, as will appear in the sequel.—A Bill was also read a first time, 'For preserving and restoring to the Crown the true and ancient Royalties appertaining to the same.' In the Commons, we find, that the business of the Popish Plot was the first thing, also, that they went upon. Jan. 21st sir George Moore made a motion, out of a deep sense of the late Conspiracy; "the like whereof, he said, never came upon the stage of the world."—Other broken hints of this speech are thus entered.—"No hour too soon for such a motion. Encouragement to papists, impunity and delay.—'Homines qui ex fraude, fallacia, mendaciis, consistere videbantur.—Tantumne religio potuit suadere malorum?'—To enter into consideration, what course may be fittest to settle the safety of the king, and prevent the danger of papistical practices."—This speech was seconded by sir Fra. Hastings; he spoke of three duties: to God, and the king, to God and ourselves. Offered four others to consideration: the Plot, the Carriage of the Plot, the Discovery, and the Deliverance.—Plot, popish, dangerous, and desperate.—Afterwards, the Solicitor General said, That a word, in time, was like apples of gold furnished with pictures of silver. That these state-monks had got a new divinity. It was lawful for them to lie, to dissemble before a magistrate, to kill an heretick.—The result of all was, "That a large Committee was appointed to consider of some course, for the timely and severe proceeding against Jesuits, Seminaries, and all other Popish Agents and Practisers; and for the preventing and suppressing all their Plots and Practices."

To go through each days proceedings in both

Journals, would be too tedious. We shall therefore only cull out of them the most remarkable instances, and which are sufficiently historical for our purpose. The Popish Plot was the thing most at heart; and this parl. laboured to fix some indelible mark of their resentment on such an infamous intention. Several conspirators had now been taken, some others were killed in endeavouring to make their escape; and we are told by Wilson, the writer of this reign, (though it is not mentioned in the Journals) that the earl of Northumberland, Henry lord Mordaunt, and Edward lord Stourton, three popish lords, being suspected to have knowledge of this conspiracy, were all committed to the Tower. One great cause of the suspicion, was, their not coming to parl. according to summons; but, nothing more being proved against them, after some imprisonment, the two barons were redeemed, by fine in the Star-Chamber; but the earl continued a prisoner there for many years after.

These were all the noblemen that were suspected; as for the inferior sort, they were tried and condemned at common law: but before their execution was awarded, the parl. thinking the ordinary punishment too light for the offence, the Lords appointed a Committee to consider what punishments extraordinary were fit to be ordained for these offenders. They had made some progress in this matter, when the abp. of Canterbury, the first of the said committee, though it was an affair of blood, reported to the house, "That having asked the opinion of the lord chief justice of England in that matter; and being informed by him that the execution of the said traitors might not conveniently be deferred, the committee had forborne any further proceeding therein."

The Commons were no less anxious: for on the 24th of Jan. sir Thomas Holcroft put the house in mind, "That Richard II. built a wooden house, and there the king and parl. sat when offenders were judged. This tended to have the miners, in the late Plot, tried in the same manner; which, he said, was not without precedent; and therefore desired that the king might be petitioned about it."—Sir R. Wingfield moved for "a form of punishment equal to the greatness of the fact. He said, the Scripture had examples of extraordinary punishments for extraordinary offences. And moved, That a short act might be made for the punishment of the miners; and some extraordinary punishment set down in it. But no petition to the king about it, for he was so compounded of mercy and pity, that he will deny it."—Sir Robert Higham argued against these motions; and said, "That the common law should have its proceeding first, and then this court might add a confirmation of it."—Mr. Fuller, on the same side, moved, "That all the house might be present and hear the arraignment; and that, afterwards, a law might be made for the punishment, the judgment being respited."—The Speaker said, "That those who were already dead were to be attainted by the house, and evidence against them given at the bar; for the rest a confirmation of the attainders was sufficient."—Mr. Wiseman moved, That the house might be present at the trials, and places provided for them; and that judgment should be respited; afterwards, they might think of a judgment in the house, their consciences being informed by the hearing.—Mr. Solicitor was against petitioning for stay of judgment; and observed, "That there was no precedent when one commission and court had heard allegations, that another should interpose themselves to stop judgment."—Lastly, sir Rob. Litton told the house, "That the interest the parl. had in this affair, made them no competent judges of it."—Upon the whole, the question was put, Whether to petition the king that judgment might be stayed after trial? It was resolved in the negative.

However, to do something in the matter, the Commons framed, read, and passed a bill, and sent it up to the Lords, on the 25th of Jan. entitled, 'An Act for appointing a Thanksgiving to Almighty God, every year, on the 5th of Nov.' The messengers which brought this bill up to the Lords told them, "That the whole body of the Commons, having entered into consideration of the great blessing of God, in the happy preservation of his maj. and the state, from the late most dangerous Treason, intended to have been attempted by the instigation of jesuits, seminaries, and Romish priests; had framed and passed the said bill, in their house, as the first-fruits of their labours in this session of parl.; which they did very earnestly recommend to their lordships." The Lords returned the compliment, by reading and passing the bill in three days, without ever going into a committee upon it. And this act stands the first in the printed Statutes of this session.

Both Houses passed another bill for the 'Attainder of the Offenders in the late Treason.' The Lords next proceeded to consider the motion made by the abp. of Canterbury, on the first day of this session, concerning the laws already in force against Papists, &c. And accordingly we find, that Feb. 1st, he made a Report to the House of what had been done in that committee: and then presented a short note, containing the heads of the said laws now in being.—The next day, the Lords being informed that the Commons were upon a bill to the same purpose, and that they were ready to bring it up to their house, they sent a message to them, to desire a Conference. This proposal was accepted of, and several meetings of the committees of both houses were had about it; the result of all was, the passing two new acts, one entitled 'An Act for discovering and repressing of Popish Recusants;' and the other called, 'An Act to prevent and avoid Dangers which may grow by Popish Recusants.'

Bill relating to Purveyance.] We have some notice given us in the Lords' Journals of a Supply to be granted this session; by a message sent from the Commons to the Lords, on the 12th of Feb. importing, "That they had received signification, with much joy, by their Speaker, of his maj.'s gracious acceptance of their humble offer, in matter of Subsidies; and withal that his maj. is well pleased that consideration may be had of the grievances arising by Purveyance. They therefore proposed a Conference, by committees of both houses, to consider of these two weighty articles." This request was assented to by the Lords, and a time appointed for the Conference; but we hear no more of the Supply till near the end of this session. The other business concerning the King's Purveyors was an ancient branch of the royal prerogative, and therefore was to be tenderly dealt with. Many conferences were held about it, between the two houses; at last a bill was passed by the Commons, and sent up, intitled 'An Act for the better execution of sundry statutes touching Purveyors and Cart-Takers.' On the 2nd reading of which by the Lords, it was committed; but, on a motion of the lord treasurer, it was agreed, by that house, "That the Judges and the king's learned council, who were ordered to attend the committee, should consider before-hand of the said bill of Purveyors, for the better information of their lordships at the meeting of the committee." April 10th, the abp. of Canterbury reported from thence, that the Attorney General had made it appear to the Committee, that the bill was very defective and inconvenient; whereupon it was agreed to proceed no farther therein.—But we find that the Commons were not willing to let the matter drop so easily; for before the session was ended, they had prepared a new bill, to the same purpose as the former, which passed their house, and was sent up to the Lords. Upon this a long debate ensued; and the question being put, Whether the said second bill might, by order of the house, be admitted, the former having been rejected? It was carried in the negative; and a memorandum was entered, by order of the Lords, as a general direction for the future.

Proceedings on the Supply.] February 10th. The business of a Supply was moved for in the Commons, by sir Thomas Ridgeway; the broken hints of whose speech, in their Journals, may be thus connected. "He dwelt upon the blessings they enjoyed under the present govt.; and yet the king had been at great charge to sustain it: for, though we have 'pacem externam et internam;' yet the funeral of the late queen, the entrance of his present maj. into this kingdom, with that of the queen and prince, all at different times; the entertainment of foreign ambassadors; the mass of treasure which had been exhausted in Ireland; her maj.'s lying-in; the great charge of the household; with the largesses or rewards, which had been bestowed on particular persons, of both nations, had much impoverished

the king's treasury.* The commonwealth was obliged to lighten this burden; as Moses said, 'How can he alone bear their strifes and incumbrances, &c.' Lastly, he added, that whatever the offer was from his subjects, the king would say 'sufficit' to it; and therefore moved, that a Committee might be immediately appointed to draw up a bill for a Supply." This motion was seconded by sir Maurice Berkley; and, afterwards by sir Edw. Montague, who began with urging two duties: fear God and honour the King. That we owe him love, reverence, obedience, and thankfulness for his truth and justice. That the freedom of the gift ought to be equal to the greatness of the givers; and that it should be speedy and chearful. Lastly, his motion was for two Subsidies and four 15ths; two of which were to be paid at Easter, and a Subsidy at Michaelmas. Mr. Bond began with enumerating the many benefits they reaped by his maj.'s reign. That of a weak, feeble and breathless state, it was become the most opulent, rich and mighty empire of any in Christendom. That we owed 'animam deo, corpus regi,' who was 'non Subsidium tantum sed Præsidium,' in time of peace. That they ought to fill the king's coffers first, and make him 'fidus depositarius.' Sir Wm. Stroud, sir Hen. Poole, and sir Nath. Bacon, spoke for a Supply; the last urged that some considerations ought to be had in the 15ths; fewer of these and more Subsidies granted, because Subsidies were less in value than formerly. Sir Fra. Hastings said, "That they ought to offer love for love. Therefore he was for two Subsidies and four 15ths. 'Amor civium regi inexpugnabile munimentum.' That peace was not hereditary; and we ought to provide beforehand. The strength of the king's hands was the hearts of his people. 'Ad omnem eventum,' to give; and that 'qui cito dat, bis dat.'" There are more short hints of arguments used for granting a Supply, by several other members; in which there were only two, sir Geo. Moore, and sir Edwin Sandys, that were for moderating the first proposal. The former said, "That 'citra et ultra,' there were bounds in all things: 'Malus miles qui imperatorem suum gemens sequitur.'" The other, urged this adage, "largire de te, fili; give of your own, son; the poverty of the land ought to be considered, and as much eased as may be." Upon the whole a grand Committee was resolved on, and appointed to consider of a bill for a Supply, and whether it should be for two Subsidies and four 15ths, or not.

Feb. 11. The Speaker informed the house,

* The different sums of these expences are thus given us in the Commons' Journals, viz. the late queen's debts, 400,000l.; the king, queen, and prince's entrance, 10,000l.; the late queen's funeral, 20,000l.; coronation of the king and queen, 20,000l.; gifts to ambassadors, &c. 40,000l.; expences in Ireland for four years, per annum, 350,000l.

"That he had been sent for to the king, who told him that he had been made acquainted with the proceeding of the house in regard to the Supply; and takes more joy in the manner, than if the value of ten times as much had fallen unto him by any other accident. That the king had three causes for his acceptance of it. 1. Because it is done out of love, and without demand. 2. For the concurrence in speech, and votes amongst them: 'in eodem sensu;' alike thanks for both. A dismay to the opposites. 3. For, that it was done in a more speedy manner than ever heretofore. That he would charge and change the property of his own estate; and would expose his person to danger for their good. That no man was more sensible of it, either in that house or in the commonwealth; and, lastly, desired that a committee might be named to make demands and propositions." But of more of this in the sequel.

The King's Message relating to Abuses in Excommunication.] Some Ecclesiastical Affairs happened in this session deserving our notice. April 1, the abp. of Canterbury acquainted the Lords, "That his maj. had given him direction to let them understand he was informed of great Abuses concerning Excommunication, granted by Ecclesiastical Officers, very often upon trivial matters. And though contempts generally, of great or less quality, be punishable by the laws of the realm, according to their several natures; yet, considering Excommunication is the greatest censure that can be given, his maj. holds the same unfit to be used but in great matters. Therefore, although his maj. doth desire that the said jurisdiction ecclesiastical may be maintained and upholden, in all respects, as is fit; yet, to remedy this inconvenience, it was his maj.'s desire that a bill might be framed for that purpose." The House immediately ordered that some of the judges, and learned civilians, should attend the abp. to consider of a project for drawing a bill concerning the said matter of Excommunication.

The Commons propose a farther Reformation in Ecclesiastical Matters.] April 5. A message was sent from the Commons to the Lords, to desire a conference with them touching Ecclesiastical Matters. The Answer was, "That although the Lords were willing to grant their request, yet, for that their proposition was very general, they desired to know the particulars of it, that they might be the better prepared for the conference." On which the Commons returned Answer, "That the Causes whereon they desired Conference were four, viz. 1. The Silencing of Ministers. 2. The Multiplicity of Ecclesiastical Commissions. 3. The Manners of Citations. And, 4. The Point of Excommunication." Hereupon, a great debate arising, whether they should agree to such a conference, or not? The farther resolution therein was deferred till the next day.

April 8th. An Answer was sent to the Commons, importing, "That the Lords, having deliberately considered of the Commons Message about a conference on the four Ecclesiastical points they sent them, had agreed to the same and appointed a committee accordingly." Answer was immediately returned from the Lower House, "That they gave most hearty thanks to their lordships, for having, with such alacrity, signified their consent for this conference; and that they would most readily join with them, and impart the grievances occurring in these Ecclesiastical Matters. But that they cannot give a meeting, either of this day or the next; because they had appointed other special business on those days, for his maj.'s service, which was to go upon the bill of Subsidy, and a Call of their House. Whereupon the 14th of April was appointed for that purpose."

The same day that the former Resolution was taken, the Lord Chancellor delivered a message from the king to this effect; "That his maj. having received knowledge of the discreet and respectful proceedings of their lordships, concerning the conference required by the other house, touching Matters Ecclesiastical, had commanded him to signify to them his most gracious acceptance of the same. With thanks and acknowledgment of his love and good will, to all the lords in general, for their regard to his Prerogative. And therein, as well those who were willing to yield to the conference, as those that were against it. For that his maj. did observe on either part, arguments of equal love and duty towards him, for the preservation of the said Prerogative; of which he would ever retain a grateful remembrance."

The business of the Conference between both houses was now proceeded in. Accordingly, on the 17th of April, the abp. acquainted the house that several bps. had been chosen to manage that conference; of whom, 1. Touching the Silencing of Ministers, was to be spoken to by himself. 2. Concerning the Multiplicity of Commissions, by the bishops of Winchester and Exeter. 3. Touching Citations, by the bishops of Bath and Wells, Carlisle and Ely. 4. And Excommunication, by the bishops of St. David's and Hereford. Liberty was also reserved for the abp. to speak to any points as he thought fit, as well as to that allotted to him. Whereupon, the house came to a Resolution that some answer should be made to the Commons as that day, but it was not intended or expected that they should be informed whether the Lords would join or not join in a Petition with the Lower House; but only that the bps. should speak to the four points, and leave the other, of Petition, to be determined by the whole house, with reserve, still of reply to any of the points aforesaid. We are left in the dark as to what was done or said at these Conferences, which were several; only, that the bps. who were managers, made their Report to the house, that they had debated the four points; and the whole result was, that a bill was brought in and passed into a law, touching a Restraint of Excommunications in Ecclesiastical Courts. This had been proposed by the abp. of Canterbury to the Lords, at the king's desire, as before taken notice of: but as to the other three points of Reformation, on which the Commons had desired a Conference, nothing was done about them.

April 12th. A bill for granting of three entire Subsidies and six 15ths, was read a first time by the Commons. It laid a good while after this; and, in the mean time, all manner of Grievances was diligently sought for to be first redressed; insomuch that the king said, 'They had sent an oyes through the nation to find them.' On the third reading, May 9th, a debate arose, begun by sir Anthony Cope, Whether the list of Grievances ought not to be first read? And a capitulation with the king about them. A special order was also entered, That the Subsidy-bill should not go up till the Grievances were ready to be presented to the king. Much dispute, say the Journals, was, whether a question should be made for the reading of the Subsidy-bill; but thought to be without precedent, and a very tender question; therefore forbore; and, the house being at last satisfied in respect to the prior order, the bill was read a third time and passed. On the 15th, it was sent up to the Lords by mr. secretary Herbert, attended by every member of the house, not one man left but the Speaker, clerk, and serjeant. A thing, adds the Journal, never seen before. The bill was quickly dispatched in the Lords, being passed there, as is before mentioned, in two days.

The Union resumed.] The business of the Union betwixt the two kingdoms was again resumed in this session. The Lords, by their committee, had several conferences with the Commons about it. It was first of all debated whether it should be deferred till next session. At last a bill was framed and brought in, intituled, 'an Act declaratory, explaining a branch of an Act made in the first session of this parl. called, 'an Act for certain commissioners of the realm of England to treat with the commissioners of Scotland, for the weal of both kingdoms;' which passed both houses, but to as little purpose as the former. There were above 100 bills brought into both houses.

Debate on the Subsidy.] May 15. A bill was sent up from the Commons for a Grant of three entire Subsidies and six 15ths from the Temporality; at the same time was returned as passed, another bill for a confirmation of four Subsidies of 4s. in the pound from the Clergy. The former bill passed the Lords in two days; but moved very heavily through the Commons. The reader may call to mind the first proposal was only for two Subsidies and four 15ths; but, on the 25th of March, the Speaker (after delivering a Message from the King, how kindly he took that offer, looking upon it as a great argument of their love to him) made a motion, Whether any more should be given? And it was resolved in the affirmative. The Speaker told the house, "That his maj. bid them call to mind, that in the late queen's time many great aids were given; and that she was never driven to break her word but once. That he had lately several loans freely made him, for which he stands engaged; and therefore desired that the money might be paid in such time that his promise may be kept." On this, a long debate ensued. The courtiers argued that the king's Debts were to the value of 500,000l. a pressing debt; and that the whole sum of their former gift amounted to no more than 400,000l. That the first payments of the Subsidies ought to be quick, in order to answer the necessities of the state. 'Necessarium beneficium, lente datum, simile est pani lapidoso.' Not to lose the thanks of their gift by the difference of a few months in the payment. That 3 or 400 horse cost maintaining as much as three or four Subsidies come to; reckoning each horse 30l. and each horseman 40s. With more to the same purpose. The arguments used against granting so much were but few; one said, There was never an example of two Subsidies in time of peace. To which it was answered, That these were Subsidies of war, for the late Queen's Debts were for war; therefore what was granted now was for war. Upon the whole, the house divided on the times of payment, and it was carried by 121 against 113, for the first three payments to be made in two years.

The Speaker's Speech and King's Answer on presenting the Subsidy-Bill.] May 27. The king came to the House of Lords, in the afternoon, when the Speaker of the Commons, attended by that whole house, came up to the bar; and, on presenting the Money-Bills, he made a speech to the king to this effect; for there are only these short items of it to be found in the Journals. First, "he bestowed great praises and commendations on his maj. with thanks to God for the happiness the state enjoyed by giving them so gracious a king. He also returned thanks to his maj. for all his gracious benefits, and particularly for his last act for a free and general pardon. Withal making his humble request to the king, that he would be pleased to give his royal assent to the acts ready for that purpose. Also, that he would pardon them, and himself, in any thing they had unwillingly and unwittingly offended." The King made Answer himself, by some short compliments on their proceedings in this session; and said, "He had no exceptions to any of the bills but one. And, as a special mark of grace and favour, would pass them all, though it was a matter, in former times, very unusual to do it. Only he gave them admonition about one act, for a Restitution in blood of one Rowland Merrick; that they never should proceed in parl. with any such like act of restitution, till the same was first signed by the king, and that then it ought to begin in the Higher House; of which his maj. desired them to make a memorial.—After this, the lord chancellor, by command, in another short speech, prorogued this parl. to the 18th Nov. following.

Nov. 18. The parliament met again; nothing material happening to the State in the interval. The session was opened by a Speech from the King, which is preserved in the Journals of the Commons, being thus introduced:—"After some Speech used by the lord chancellor, touching the king's presence, at that time, being not usual:—the Manner of the Loan expected to be repaid:—the Matter of Grievances presented by the Commons in the preceeding session of parl.: his highness began to speak to this effect:"

"A Jove principium: about this time 12 month were we, that be now here assembled, assembled also in this place, to give thanks unto God for the great deliverance, not of myself, but of you all, and of all the body of the state, from that treason, which was most terribly intended against us all; for which we are bound for ever to be thankful to God." And then proceeded, and said: "That all propositions, made in parl. were made in two sorts; either by the king to his subjects, or by the subjects to the king. That in the last sessions were propositions of both sorts; both concerning Matters of Government of the Commonwealth proceeding from the King, and Matters of Grievance of the Commonwealth, which proceeded from the subjects: and that himself would not be accounted one of those kings; that would prefer any propositions of his own before the peoples just complaints; nor one of those, that would not reform any ancient grievances, before he would propose any new consultations. For the Grievances themselves, he said, they were collected with more industry, than lawful or dutiful diligence; yet the form, wherein they were penned and wherewith they were presented, was so full of discretion and moderation, that he was loth his answer should smell of the spirit of Roboam.—But for the Matters of Grievance, they were such, as, if they were unlawful, ought to be reformed; or, if they were lawful, and yet unlawfully used, and abused in execution, the abuse was to be reformed; or, if they were doubtful in law, were fit to be referred to trial and judgment: which order and distinction he had observed in all his Answers and Resolutions to every one of the several Grievances. Whereupon he observed, that it was not convenient for a parl. to present any, but apparent, publick, and just causes of grief; though his own nature and mind were ever prepared to relieve any private complaint of any private man, that might appear to be just.—But there is in parl. (as there is in all multitudes) diversities of spirits, as there was amongst the very apostles themselves; and that some of them were more popular, than profitable, either for that council, or for the commonwealth; and that there were some Tribunes of the people, whose mouths could not be stopped, either from the matters of the Puritans, or of the purveyance. But for himself, he would never make a separation of the Peoples Will and the Will of the King, and as for them, that would make any seisure or rupture, either of the Church, or of the Commonwealth, and therein were such schismaticks, he ever esteemed schismaticks and hereticks subject to the same curse.—But for his part, he wondered, how the Grievance of the purveyance should extend so far as the Borders; and professed, that all his study and care had continually been, to abolish this Grievance of Purveyance. Then he said, he would make one admonition unto the Lower House; viz. That they ought to enter into a double consideration of themselves: one, as they were subjects in general; another, as they were specially called to be counsellors of the kingdom; and that the thought of the one must not make them forget the consideration of the other. That the parl. was not so perpetual, but that they, being subjects, were subject to an account, as kings themselves were; who, though they be exempt from any censure, or correction, upon the earth, yet, after the expiration of their reigns and their lives must yield an account to the eternal King: and therefore admonished them, to beware, that they were not like Icarus, the son of Dædalus; that soared so near the sun with his wings of wax, that his wax melted, and his wings failed, and down he fell: and therefore he would conclude, with Neptune in Virgil, 'Sed motos præstat componere fluctus;' and wished, that they would know him, and observe him; and if that any such plebeian tribunes should incur any offence, or commit any such error, they would correct them for it; and judge themselves (as St. Paul saith) that they be not judged; and that the whole body receive not a wound by one ill member thereof.—But the greatest and weightiest matter of all is this matter of the Union; wherein (he said) the goodness of the matter must supply his want of premeditation; for that, which he should say, must proceed out of some inspiration because he had so small a time of respiration, to consider it; but that gold did not need to be guilded, nor precious stones any ornament. He purposed no more, but to represent an idea of the inception and perfection of all he required in this Matter of Union; wherein he would first answer all Objections, that, by men of humorous or malicious minds, were opposed against this Union: 2ndly, he would shew the Motive of his Desire: 3rdly, the principal Heads of his Desire: and lastly, the End and Effect, the fruit and benefit of this Union.—The first Objection is, that there is no necessity of an Union and that therefore it is but superfluous: whereunto he answered, and confessed, there is no necessity to make an Union, for it is already made; but to knit and bind it, that it do not break into flaws and into cracks, as a contract is necessary unto marriage: and that this Union was necessary, not 'ad esse,' but 'ad bene esse;' not to the very essence, but the firm continuance of this union and marriage of both these kingdoms; whereof the creation or constitution was not now required, but rather a declaration and confirmation. The 2nd Objection is a scornful objection; that it is not so rich, or so wealthy, or so potent a kingdom; but that the people are more impotent, and more poor: whereunto (though it were such an objection, as were more fit to be answered 'fustibus quam rationibus') he would answer them, that it was not his purpose to deprive England of it's laws, nor of goods, nor of lands; but to lay Scotland subject to the laws; and that, if they were determined, that the poor people of England; or the poor or barren countries of England, should be no part of England; then perhaps there were some cause he should be better content, that Scotland should stand still divided and distinguished from England: but if Wales were admitted to be parcel of England; if the Borders, which are now naturally the middle part of the land; if all the barren parts of England were received as parcels thereof; he knew no cause, why Scotland, which was not so barren or poor, as some parts of them, should not as well be admitted to an Union with England: and if the greatness of England be so great, what decrease can it sustain by such a participation? or if Scotland be poor, what other cause is there thereof, but the want of this Union and participation with England? And when was there ever any king, or kingdom, to whom this principle of 'amplianda dominia' was not acceptable and honourable? But some (said he) are so suspicious, that they dare not trust the present times, nor the present king, with this Union; that this king is a partial king: he had his birth there; education there; all his acquaintance, familiarity, and conversation, during the first part of his age, hath been there; and therefore it cannot be, but there must be partiality in this king: wherein (he said) he would pardon them the double wrong they did both to him and themselves. For himself, he did profess, that so miraculous an applause, as he received by the general voice of all this nation, at his first entrance, had prevailed as much, and had as great a part of his heart, as the place of his birth; and that, as education was 'altera natura,' so his residence and continuance here was 'altera educatio;' and that there was no reason to suspect, that either any erection of that nation, or any suppression of this, should be endangered by this Union: therefore, 'qui habet aures, audiat;' let them that have ears, hear, and know, that there can no servitude nor diminution, but augmentation and freedom, be brought by this Union to this nation.—For the Motive of his Desire, he acknowledged his affection to Scotland, wherein he had his birth and education, and wherein he led the first part of his age; and if he should be unthankful to that kingdom, wherein he had spent the first part, what might they expect of him in this kingdom, wherein he should spend the second and last part of his age: and that therefore he did so equally esteem these two kingdoms, betwixt which he was so equally divided, as two brothers, and as if they had equal parts of his affections; and did desire, they should be united and subjected both to one rule and to one law. His 2nd motive was, that he knew himself to be mortal, as other men are; and that after him there could never be any so equally and so amply affected to them both. His 3rd Motive was this, that if this proposition should be disappointed of its due success, being known, as it was, so publickly to so many nations, and the eye of all the world in expectation of the event; if it failed, it would be imputed either to his folly to propose it, or to the obstinacy of his people, not to approve it. For the three Heads of his Desire, he protested, he wished himself no longer alive, but dead, if his desires were not directed to the commonwealth of both kingdoms; which might appear to all such, as did kindly and naturally examine and try the reasons of his desire, and did not prefer the fear of future apprehensions before present truths: and his desire was no more, but of the same effect, which of himself he had power to accomplish, without the parl.; not that they should perform it, but that they should concur with him to the perfection of it.—For the three Heads, they were but these: the 1st, every man would acknowledge, that there was now no cause of hostility or war; and therefore no cause but that all laws and ordinances of hostility might be extinguished. The 2nd was that which every man must acknowledge to be commodious, and that which all nations in amity and peace, though foreign, and subject to several dominions, did admit and embrace, freedom of commerce and traffick. The 3rd is but that his subjects may be adjudged to be his subjects; and that those that were born his subjects, before he was king of England, may have this benefit, to be esteemed his subjects, now he is king: and since there is no cause to account them aliens, but because they were born under his dominions, before he was king here; now that he is king, may be privileged, as those that are born under him, being their king. As for Scotland itself (whereof was once made an objection) it is content to embrace this Union. And therefore now let that, which hath been sought so much, and so long, and so often by blood, and fire, and by the sword, now it is brought and wrought by the hand of God, be embraced and received with an Hallelujah; and let it be as Wales was, and as all the Hepharchy was, united to England, as the principal; and let all at last be compounded and united into one kingdom. And since the crown and the sceptre, justice, and law, and all, is resident and reposed here; there can be no fear to this nation, but that they shall for ever continue continual friends, and shall ever acknowledge one Church and one King: and be joined in a perpetual marriage, for the peace and prosperity of both nations, and for the honour of their king. And so concluded, that sithence Union was the very essence of divinity, and the staff of all states; was the bond of marriage, the strength of families, the increase of kingdoms, and the kiss of enemies; let us all embrace it, that we may all enjoy it. And as the last session made provision of the state, and the regiment, and the policy of this kingdom; let this, though the labour be fashious and troublesome, provide for the amplitude and the Union of both Kingdoms, to the glory of God, and the honour of the King."

Proceedings on the Union, in Pursuance of the King's Speech.] The Affair of the Union being thus warmly pressed by the king; it was pursued with great vigour in both houses, throughout the whole of this session. The Lords began with it on the 2nd day of their meeting; when, an Instrument for the Union, ready drawn up, by the Commissioners of both Kingdoms, was produced by the lord chancellor, and read; who, also, moved that the said Instrument might be sent down to the other house: which was done accordingly; with this Message, "That the said Instrument had been read in their house; but, because it concerned both houses, it was sent down to be read there in like manner; to the end that they might be well informed of the contents before any further proceedings were made."

The Commons did not return an Answer till 3 days after; when they acquainted their lordships, "That the Instrument for the Union had been read, also, in their house, and several copies taken of it; and that they now returned it back to the Lords for such further proceedings as they should think fit." On this the Lords sent another message to them, importing some commendations for the Commons perusing and taking copies of the said Instrument; and desiring that another conference might be held by the commissioners of both houses. The Commons having returned a satisfactory Answer to this last message, the Lords chose 40 of their body for a committee, who were appointed to meet with 80 of the other house, on the 25th of Nov. to treat about this grand affair.

Nov. 21. The Instrument for the Union was read in the Commons, and is entered, at length, in their Journals; but is too tedious to be recited. And, we the rather omit it, because the springs and motions of this grand machine are more succinctly described in the Lords Journals; which, for brevity's sake, we shall, chiefly follow, in the proceedings of the session.

Two days after the first conference, the Commons sent a message to the Lords, "Commending the honourable usage which the lords commissioners had given to their committee at the conference. That the proposition had been considered of by their house; and since they held this matter to be very great and weighty, so much, as to concern the conjunction of two kingdoms, which had been long, heretofore, in enmity; they intended to settle the dispute in 4 Points, which they took to be the substance of the Instrument for the Union. These Points were, 1. Hostile Laws. 2. Border Laws.

3. Naturalization. 4. Commerce.—The first two, they said were matters best fitting their lordships knowledge, and properer for the higher house to discuss; being affairs, more especially, of policy and state. The other two they will take upon themselves to manage, as things appertaining to the whole body of the realm, and therefore fitter for the lower house of parliament.

The Answer returned by the Lords to this last Message of the Commons, on the day after, was to this effect; "That their Lordships, having considered of their Message, did signify to that house, that they thought the beginning and end of their joint committees, in this Union affair, was to inculcate and perfect an uniformity in consultation and debate at their conferences about it, and which occasioned their lordships to desire a meeting. But, as yet, they found it had produced nothing but a Message; in which, as their lordships expectations were not answered, considering with what plainness and freedom they had proceeded, so they think it improper to receive any Propositions from them, before such points were jointly settled between them by whom they were to be handled. For 1st, they said, every member had an equality of interest, in every particular, rightly considered: 2ndly, their lordships conceived it a kind of diminution in capacity of the lower house, to think that any thing is too great for them, or too little for the lords: especially, in what concerns every member of either house, in his person, in his blood and fortune. Nevertheless, although the Lords still remain disposed as before, both for love and order, to desire that mutual satisfaction which conferences commonly work in minds well affected; yet, if the Commons, upon second thoughts, do still mislike of conference, their lordships, to lose no time, are resolved to proceed in their own way without them, and leave the Commons to follow their course by themselves."—To this Message the Commons returned an Answer; importing, "That they were sorry their lordships had mistaken their meaning, and imagined they had refused conference, or had a purpose or meaning to prescribe and limit the proceedings of that house. They desired their lordships to know, that they had no such intention of either diminishing the liberty or capacity of their own house, or what is more, the dignity of the house of lords. But that their meaning was only, to offer that motion of digesting and ordering of the 4 principal Points, as they conceived, in the Instrument of the Union; that their lordships might, if they pleased, undertake two of them. But now, that they understood their lordships mind, by the last Message, they desire to let them know, that they are willing to enter into consideration of the whole body of the Instrument, and debate the several matters therein contained amongst themselves, that they may be better prepared for a conference, which they will then be ready to attend; and desire their lordships concurrence with them." Answer was immediately returned, that the Lords are well satisfied with the course the Commons had now prescribed, and desire they would proceed in it, as they themselves intended, with expedition.

The Lords went next upon regulating their own committee as to their manner of speaking in the debate at the Conference. They relaxed some Rules and Orders used in the House; as the Order for speaking but once to a bill, at one time of reading, &c.; and left it open to any lord to speak and deliver his mind upon any point as often as he saw occasion. It was also agreed, that all the Judges, or such of them as are daily present in the house, shall attend the Lords at their Conference, from time to time, to give their opinions in any point of law. These preliminaries being settled, the Conference between the committees of both houses, on the matter of Union, began; but no clear account of it can be met with in the Journals of either House. However, we find it continued till Dec. 18th, when the Lords sent a Message to the Commons, signifying, "That it was his maj.'s pleasure, that both houses should adjourn to the 10th of Feb. ensuing." The lord chancellor made a short Speech to the Lords, "That it was his maj.'s express command to all the Lords, to appear and attend duly at the next meeting. And, whereas several of them had been absent this session, by licence from his maj. either on account of sickness or business, his meaning was, that they should give their attendance as soon as ever their business was dispatched, or their health recovered."

The Journal of the Commons ends this short session in this manner: "Die Jovis 18 Decembris 1606. Sir John Crook and mr. dr. Hone bring this Message from the Lords, That his maj. considering the great travel of the knights, citizens, and burgesses, committees employed in matter of the Union; and that the solemn feast of Christmas approaching, it were fit that the gentlemen repaired into their several countries, to solace themselves, comfort their neighbours, and perform other duties in their several places: therefore his highness hath signified his pleasure to be, that this session should be adjourned. And because this business might be no hindrance to the common justice of the realm, in the term-time, his maj.'s pleasure was to adjourn it until the 10th of Feb. following, being within 3 days of the end of the term."—"Upon this Message mr. Speaker adjourned the Court according to his maj.'s said pleasure."—Nota: "A Session adjourned, upon a message from the Lords signifying his maj.'s pleasure."—Nota: "The intermission of adjournment (still continued one and the same session) was one whole month and 23 days."

Feb. 10. The parl. met again, and the same admonition for strict attendance was given to the Lords, by the chancellor, as he had it in command from the king. On the 14th, the Lords sent a message to the Commons to acquaint them, "That they had entered into consideration of those things, which had already passed in Conference, concerning the Union. That the two points, relating to Hostile Laws and Commerce, have been handled but not perfected. That the 3rd point, touching Naturalization, remained wholly to be treated of: which, being done, both houses might better consider what further course may be taken for framing and proceeding in bills fit for the purpose. And therefore the Lords desire a new Conference on this occasion." Answer was immediately returned by the Commons, that they agreed thereto; but, as the Point of Naturalization was not yet touched upon, they were not ready to treat about it; and therefore desire the Lords to give them farther time. On the 22nd of Feb. the Lords received another message from them, importing, "That they were ready to speak to one part of the Point of Naturalization, which was, of such of the Scotch nation as had been born since his maj. came to the crown. Accordingly, Feb. 24th was appointed by the Lords to begin the Conference, and all the Judges were ordered to attend it."

Dispute between the Two Houses concerning the Naturalization of the Scotch.—On the first day of this second Conference, the Judges being required to give their opinion concerning this last-mentioned Point of Naturalization, 11 out of 12 of them declared, "That such of the Scotch, as have been or shall be born in Scotland, since his maj.'s coming to the crown, were not Aliens; but are inheritable in this realm by the law, as it now stands in force, as native English." Several Reports were made in the Lords, concerning this Conference, and divers Messages sent between the two houses about it; but none of them of any great signification, until March 8, when a Message was sent from the Commons, in writing, in answer to one the Lords had sent the day before, in the same manner, to prevent mistakes; importing, "That whereas the Message from their Lordships was for a further conference on Naturalization in general; the Commons understanding it to mean Naturalization of the 'ante-nati' and 'post-nati,' and of the convenience of it, with such limitations and restraints as might be fit for both; they will enter into consideration of it in such sense as they conceive it, and will prepare themselves for conference as soon as possible." To this the Lords instantly replied, "That their Message to the Commons was to confer on Naturalization in general; of which, what exposition or interpretation they shall make, the Lords do leave to their own judgment and conceits. That their lordships are ready now to confer with them on the general Point; and withal, the Lords do move them and expect that the Commons will be expeditious in the matter."

Affairs now began to grow a little warm between the two houses. The Commons sent another Message to the Lords, the day after the last mentioned, to this effect: "That they had entered into consideration of the Lords Reply to their last Answer; and do perceive that the construction and understanding of the message is left to their own judgments. Wherein, if their lordships are to treat again of the post-nati, in what sort they stand in law, the messenger (sir Edw. Hobby) said, he was commanded to tell them, that they all knew the Commons opinion and inclination in that Point; and, since that time, they had not seen, heard, nor understood any thing, to the contrary, that might seem to make them alter their opinion. If, of the ante-nati and Convenience of Naturalization, they hold it to be a matter of state; and so it is fitter to have a beginning in the Upper House, who are better acquainted with these affairs. Yet, notwithstanding, if the Lords were disposed to deal freely with them, give light and lay open themselves, and make known in what sort they mean to proceed, they will be ready to attend the service." The Commons messengers were ordered to withdraw; and shortly after the Lords returned an Answer, by messengers of their own, to this import. "That as the strength of both houses consisted in nothing more, than the preservation of the right and privilege justly and properly belonging to either; so, in that respect, the Lords are very tender in suffering any thing to pass unanswered whercof there may arise the least misunderstanding. Therefore, although some words, delivered by the gentleman appointed to speak for the lower house, gave some offence; yet all their lordships did conceive they were only a lapsus lingue in his own person, to which any man may be subject: but, being spoken at that time, and by a person qualified as their mouth, the Lords did not think it safe for them to conceal it from the Commons; for if it had been otherwise taken than the gentleman's private action, they must have used that freedom which is necessary from one friend to another, in telling them that they will never acknowledge any man, that sitteth in the lower house, to have the right and title of a baron of parl. Though some private gentlemen, that sit as burgesses for Cinque-Ports; may have such an appellation where they reside; no more could they admit the term of the Commons Court of Parliament; because their whole house, without the Lords, can make no court of judicature. But now, as to the matter itself, having said enough of the mistake, the Lords added they were very sorry to find so much reservation towards those that meant to use so much freedom; their lordships being so well persuaded of the Commons good affections to the general cause as they were; and are willing still to offer conference, in general terms, even on that particular title of Naturalization. Therefore, they thought fit for the present, once again to declare thus much unto them, that they have not had amongst themselves any particular deliberation, either in point of law or conveniency, about this Naturalizing Affair; because they did intend to meet the Commons, free from any obligation by any voice or opinion, upon any single branch of it, before they had in some measure conferred of the whole; according to the first institution of the Conference, as being the only way to come to a good and speedy end. And, as their messenger used a phrase of their resolution to attend the service, the Lords declared unto them, that they understand that expression, as a promise to confer as well as to hear what may be said of the matter; lest, when the Lords expect a conference, an audience only may be offered. In which conference there can be no difficulty, seeing they come to debate and argue without conclusion; and no man's thought can be so great a stranger as not to debate the matter, in some degree or other. To which intent, their lordships would be ready to meet the Commons, if they so like it, at the usual place, on the 7th of March, at 2 in the afternoon."

It may be supposed the Commons sent a more complying Answer to this last Message of the Lords, (though there is nothing entered in the Journals of March 5th but this, viz. "Message from the Lower House by Mr. Martin and others:") for the Conference did begin on the 7th, as the Lords desired. It was agreed at this meeting, by the whole, that, to prevent confusion, the number of the committee of each house should be lessened from 40 Lords to 20, and from 80 Commoners to 40. Accordingly, we find that the Lords reduced theirs to the abp. of Canterbury and 6 other bps. the lord chancellor and lord treasurer, 5 earls and 6 barons. These sub-committees, it was supposed, were likely to bring matters sooner to a conclusion than the larger; but it did not answer the intention. For, though they had several meetings, on many different days, yet nothing was done that tended any way towards an agreement. On the contrary, we find that, on the 27th of March, the Lords sent another complaining Message to the Commons, importing, "That their Committee had strangely prevaricated with them; for that though their lordships came with full power and purpose to deliver their opinions openly, yet the unexpected reservation of the Commons in hearing and not speaking to the matter, had taken away the life of the intended conference: especially considering that, instead of a free and open debate between them, their lordships had met with such a distinction, as did in effect close up all and cross directly the purpose for which they were sent. And yet, out of their desire that the work may not suffer interruption, by any mistakings or too exact formalities; the whole house, upon the Report of their Committee to them, have resolved to make this farther Proposition: That if the Commons would send a Committee, authorised both to hear their Propositions and Reasons for some difference between the post-nati and the ante-nati, in point of conveniency only, without regard to any thing that hath or may be said in point of law; and to debate thereupon, by way of argument only, as their deputies should find occasion, without concluding them or binding the Commons by any thing spoken at that time: why then, the Lords said, to requite such free and ingenuous manner of conference, which they had ever desired, they were ready to meet the other committee again; and open themselves, by way of Proposition and Argument, in all those Points left untreated of." Answer, "That the Commons would send one, by some of their own house, as soon as conveniently they may."

But we cannot find that any Answer was ever sent from the Commons to the Lords, on this last Message, nor did the committees meet again to confer on this matter. However, the Commons did not wholly slight this grand affair; but, in order to give some satisfaction to the king, a bill was brought in, and passed that house, intituled, 'an act for the utter Abolition of all Memory of Hostility, and the Dependants thereof between England and Scotland, and for the repressing the occasion of Discords and Disorders for the time to come.' This Bill was sent up to the Lords on the 6th of June; it was read in that house a 2nd time, and committed on the 8th: the next day the said committee reported, "That they had gone through the bill; but finding some causes of doubt in it, which they desired to be cleared, they moved, that another conference might be had, by committees of both houses, that afternoon." Answer returned, "That the Commons will attend their lordships, to the number of 100 of their house." This second conference was more effectual than the former. Some additions and amendments were added, by consent of both houses, to the bill: June the 30th it was passed by the Lords, and this act stands the first in our Statute-Books amongst the printed statutes of this year.

Debate in the Commons on the Point of Naturalization.] We have now gone through the proceedings of the parl. on this affair of the Union, in what the Journals of the Lords will instruct us about it. But the Journals of the Commons are much more circumstantial in the debates of their members on this grand article, which we shall draw out as concisely as the nature of the thing will admit. Besides inserting the Instrument at full length, agreed on, signed, and sealed by 39 English, and 28 Scottish commissioners, certain Notes or Memorandums were read, containing the groundwork of their proceedings in this affair in the last session. These we shall omit, and content ourselves with giving the substance of each particular member's arguments for and against this great question.

Feb. 14th. Mr. Fuller first began the dispute against a general Naturalization; he argued, "That God had made people fit for every country; some for a cold, some for a hot climate; and those several countries he hath adapted to their several natures and qualities. All grounds are not fit for one kind of grain; but some for oats, some for wheat, &c. Suppose one man is owner of two pastures, with one hedge to divide them; the one pasture bare, the other fertile and good. A wise owner will not quite pull down the hedge, but make gates to let the cattle in and out at pleasure; otherwise they will rush in in multitudes, and much against their will return. That the Union was no more than as two arms of one body. But before they be admitted, it is proper to consider what place and room we have for them. Look into the Universities, there you will find many of our own, very worthy men, not preferred. In London, see what the bill of Innates doth provide for; and remember what was opened to the house on the reading of that bill. Amongst the merchants, though they labour, toil, and provide all they can, yet they have had no fruits, no success these 3 years. Our English merchants adventure; they go to sea with great vessels, freighted at a great charge; the other with little vessels at a small charge. The Scotch carry their wares in other countries up and down in packs; and by these means have taken away all the trade from Dieppe already. Our traders are too many already, and there are impositions upon the English from which the Scotch are discharged. The navy of Scotland is so weak, as to be in misericordiam to every mean force. He added, that the care of a sovereign prince is, that his subjects live under him, 'honestè, tutè, pacificè, et jucundè.' That country is miserable, where the great men are exceeding rich, the poor men exceeding poor; and no mean, no proportion, between both. Tenants of two manors; whereof the one hath woods, fisheries, liberties, common of estovers, &c. The other a bare common, without profit; only a little turf, or the like. The owner maketh a grant, that the tenants of this shall be participants of the profits, &c. of the former. This beareth some shew of equity, but is plain wrong, and the grant void. The king cannot make a single village in one, to be parcel of another county. He cannot make a parcel of one kingdom parcel of another, being distinct kingdoms. Law is the happiness of our govt. Commissions are of absolute power, and occasion absolute wrong. The king can do what he may do by his legal power. In the 13th of Hen. IV. an office of measuring cloth was granted, with a fee imposed; but it was found unjust, and adjudged void. So it was in sir Edw. Darcey's Case, for sealing of cards. The king's oath, by Magna Charta, is not to act against law. A Protection granted by the king for 3 years was not good; for one he may. If king Philip of Spain had had a son by queen Mary, he would have been king of Spain, Sicily, &c. was it proper to naturalize those subjects? It cannot be good to mingle two swarms of bees under one hive on the sudden. When the Jews were in captivity, and were moved to mirth and sing songs, they could not forget Jerusalem; 'Let their right hand forget their left, &c.' And when Abraham and Lot were brethren, Abraham said, 'Go thou to the right hand, and I will go to the left, &c.' So they divided, and either took that part which was fittest for him."

This speech was followed by Mr. Wentworth and Mr. Moore; the main points of whose arguments were, That England and Scotland were 'una et alia respublica'; Scotland, 'aliena respublica.' They acknowledge no crown, no king, no sovereignty, but Scotland; we none but that of England. No alteration being made by the king's coming hither. Remembered, that the king said in a speech, reported from him to the house, this session, "I would be loth to live to see the king of Scotland do wrong to the king of England." The king is seized, 'in jure coronæ, Scotiæ, et in jure coronæ, Angliæ.' If there be two regalities, how one kingship? Ireland was subdued by conquest by Hen. II. and they have ever since been natural born subjects. If we think the law to be one way, not to declare it another. Lastly, if we naturalize them, it is necessary to have many cautions; cautions for ecclesiastical promotions; cautions for our lands and for our trades. All these to be well considered of by a committee. On the other side,

Sir Francis Bacon, Solicitor General, spoke as follows: "It may please you, mr. Speaker, preface I will use none, but put myself upon your good opinion, to which I have been accustomed beyond my deservings; neither will I hold you in suspence what way I will choose, but now at the first declare myself, that I mean to counsel the house to naturalize this nation: wherein, nevertheless, I have a request to make unto you, which is of more efficacy to the purpose I have in hand than all that I shall say afterwards. And it is the same request which Demosthenes did more than once, in great causes of estate, make to the people of Athens, that when they took into their hands the balls, whereby to give their voices, according as the manner of them was, they would raise their thoughts, and lay aside those considerations which their private vocations and degrees might minister and represent unto them, and would take upon them cogitations and minds agreeable to the dignity and honour of the estate. For, mr. Speaker, as it was aptly and sharply said by Alexander to Parmenio, when upon their recital of the great offers which Darius made, Parmenio said unto him, 'I would accept these offers, were I as Alexander:' he turned it upon him again, 'So would I (saith he) were I as Parmenio.' So in this cause, if an honest English merchant, I do not single out that state in disgrace, for this island ever held it honourable, but only for an instance of a private profession, if an English merchant, should say, "Surely I would proceed no farther in the union, were I as the king;" it might be reasonably answered, "No more would the king, were he as an English merchant." And the like may be said of a gentleman in the country, be he never so worthy or sufficient; or of a lawyer, be he never so wise or learned; or of any other particular condition of men in this kingdom: for certainly, mr. Speaker, if a man shall be only or chiefly sensible of those respects which his particular vocation and degree shall suggest and infuse into his brain, and not enter into true and worthy considerations of estates, he shall never be able aright to give counsel, or take counsel in this matter. So that if this request be granted, I account the cause obtained. But to proceed to the matter itself: all consultations do rest upon questions comparative; for when a question is 'de vero,' it is simple, for there is but one truth; but when a question is 'de bono,' it is for the most part comparative; for there be differing degrees of good and evil, and the best of the good is to be preferred and chosen, and the worst of the evil is to be declined and avoided; and therefore in questions of this nature you may not look for answer proper to every inconvenience alledged; for somewhat that cannot be especially answered may, nevertheless, be encountered and over-weighed by matter of greater moment, and therefore the matter which I shall set forth unto you will naturally receive the distribution of three parts. First, an answer to those inconveniences which have been alledged to ensue, if we should give way to this naturalization; which, I suppose, you will not find to be so great as they have been made; but that much dross is put into the balance to help to make weight. Secondly, an encounter against the remainder of these inconveniences which cannot properly be answered, by much greater inconveniences, which we shall incur if we do not proceed to this naturalization. Thirdly, an encounter likewise, but of another nature, that is, by the gain and benefit which we shall draw and purchase to ourselves by proceeding to this naturalization. And yet, to avoid confusion, which ever followeth upon two much generality, it is necessary for me, before I proceed to persuasion, to use some distribution of the points or parts of naturalization, which certainly can be no better, or none other, than the ancient distinction of 'jus civitatis, jus suffragii vel tribus, et jus petitionis sive honoris:' for all ability and capacity is either of private interest of 'meum et tuum,' or of public service; and the public consisteth chiefly either in voice, or in office. Now it is the first of these, mr. Speaker, that I will only handle at this time and in this place, and refer the other two for a committee, because they receive more distinction and restriction. To come therefore to the inconveniences alledged on the other part, the first of them is, that there may ensue of this naturalization a surcharge of people upon this realm of England which is supposed already to have the full charge and content; and therefore there cannot be an admission of the adoptive without a diminution of the fortunes and conditions of those that are native subjects of this realm. A grave objection, mr. Speaker, and dutiful; for it proceeds not of any unkindness to the Scottish nation, but of natural fastness to ourselves; for that answer of the virgins, 'ne forte non sufficiat vobis et nobis,' proceeded not out of any envy or malign humour, but out of providence, and the original charity which begins with ourselves. And I must confess, mr. Speaker, that as the gentleman said, when Abraham and Lot, in regard of the greatness of their families, grew pent and straitened, it is true, that, though they were brethren, they grew to difference, and to those words, 'Vade tu ad dexteram, et ego ad sinistram, &c.' But, certainly, I should never have brought that example on that side; for we see what followed of it, how that this separation 'ad dexteram et ad sinistram' caused the miserable captivity of the one brother, and the dangerous, though prosperous war of the other, for his rescue and recovery. But to this objection, mr. Speaker, being so weighty and so principal, I mean to give three several answers, every one of them being, to my understanding, by itself sufficient. The first is, that this opinion of the number of the Scottish nation, that should be likely to plant themselves here amongst us, will be found to be a thing rather in conceit than in event; for, mr. Speaker, you shall find those plausible similitudes, of a tree that will thrive the better if it be removed into the more fruitful soil; and of sheep or cattle, that if they find a gap or passage open will leave the more barren pasture, and get into the more rich and plentiful, to be but arguments merely superficial, and to have no sound resemblance with the transplanting or transferring of families; for the tree, we know, by nature, as soon as it is set in the better ground, can fasten upon it, and take nutriment from it; and a sheep, as soon as he gets into the better pasture, what should let him to graze and feed? But there belongeth more, I take it, to a family or particular person, that shall remove from one nation to another: for if, mr. Speaker, they have not stock, means, acquaintance, and custom, habitation, trades, countenance, and the like, I hope you doubt not but they will starve in the midst of the rich pasture, and are far enough off from grazing at their pleasure: and therefore in this point, which is conjectural, experience is the best guide; for the time past is a pattern of the time to come. I think no man doubteth, mr. Speaker, but his maj.'s first coming in was the greatest spring-tide for the confluence and entrance of that nation. Now I would fain understand, in these 4 years space, and in the fulness and strength of the current and tide, how many families of the Scotsmen are planted in the cities, boroughs, and towns of this kingdom; for I do assure myself, that, more than some persons of quality about his maj.'s person here at the court, and in London, and some other inferior persons, that have a dependence upon them, the return and certificate, if such a survey should be made, would be of a number extremely small: I report me to all your private knowledges of the places where you inhabit. Now, mr. Speaker, as I said, 'Si in ligno virida ita fit, quid fiet in arido?' I am sure there will be no more such spring tides. But you will tell me of a multitude of families of the Scottish nation in Polonia; and if they multiply in a country so far off, how much more here at hand? For that, mr. Speaker, you must impute it of necessity to some special accident of time and place that draws them thither: for you see plainly before your eyes, that in Germany, which is much nearer, and in France, where they are invited with privileges, and with this very privilege of naturalization, yet no such number can be found; so as it cannot either be nearness of place, or privilege of person, that is the cause. But shall I tell you, mr. Speaker, what I think? Of all the places in the world, near or far off, they will never take that course of life in this kingdom, which they content themselves with in Poland; for we see it to be the nature of all men that they will rather discover poverty abroad, than at home. There is never a gentleman that hath over-reached himself in expence, and thereby must abate his countenance, but he will rather travel, and do it abroad than at home: and we know well they have good high stomachs, and have ever stood in some terms and emulation with us: and therefore they will never live here, except they can live in good fashion. So as I assure you, mr. Speaker, I am of opinion that the fear which we now have to admit them, will have like success as that contention had between the nobility and people of Rome for the admitting of a plebeian consul; which whilst it was in passage was very vehement, and mightily stood upon, and when the people had obtained it, they never made any plebeian consul, not in sixty years after: and so will this be for many years, as I am persuaded, rather a matter in opinion and reputation, than in use or effect. And this is the first answer that I give to this main inconvenience pretended, of surcharge of people. The second answer which I give to this objection, is this: I must have leave to doubt, mr. Speaker, that this realm of England is not yet peopled to the full; for certain it is, that the territories of France, Italy, Flanders, and some parts of Germany, do in equal space of ground bear and contain a far greater quantity of people, if they were mustered by the poll; neither can I see, that this kingdom is so much inferior unto those foreign parts in fruitfulness, as it is in population; which makes me conceive we have not our full charge. Besides, I do see manifestly among us the badges and tokens rather of scarceness, than of press of people, as drowned grounds, commons, wastes, and the like, which is a plain demonstration, that howsoever there may be an over-swelling throng and press of people here about London, which is most in our eye, yet the body of the kingdom is but thin sown with people: and whosoever shall compare the ruins and decays of ancient towns in this realm, with the erections and augmentations of new, cannot but judge that this realm hath been far better peopled in former times; it may be, in the heptarchy, or otherwise: for generally the rule holdeth, the smaller the state, the greater the population, 'pro rata.' And whether this be true or no, we need not seek farther, than to call to our remembrance how many of us serve here in this place for desolate and decayed boroughs. Again, mr. Speaker, whosoever looketh into the principles of estate, must hold that it is the mediterrane countries and not the maritime, which need to fear surcharge of the people; for all sea provinces, and especially islands, have another element besides the earth and soil, for their sustentation. For what an infinite number of people are, and may be, sustained by fishing, carriage by sea, and merchandising? Wherein again I do discover, that we are not at all pinched by multitude of people; for if we were, it were not possible that we should relinquish and resign such an infinite benefit of fishing to the Flemings, as it is well known we do. And therefore I see, that we have wastes by sea, as well as by land; which still is an infallible argument that our industry is not awakened to seek maintenance by any over great press or charge of people. And lastly, mr. Speaker, there was never any kingdom in the ages of the world had, I think, so fair and happy a means to issue and discharge the multitude of their people, if it were too great, as this kingdom hath, in regard of that desolate and wasted kingdom of Ireland; which being a country blessed with almost all the dowries of nature, as rivers, havens, woods, quarries, good soil, and temperate climate, and now at last under his maj. blessed also with obedience, doth, as it were, continually call unto us for our colonies and plantations. And so I conclude my 2d answer to this pretended inconvenience, of surcharge of people. The 3d answer, mr. Speaker, which I give, is this: I demand what is the worst effect that can follow of surcharge of people? Look into all stories, and you shall find it none other than some honourable war for the enlargement of their borders, which find themselves pent, upon foreign parts; which inconvenience, in a valorous and warlike nation, I know not whether I should term an inconvenience or no; for the saying is most true, though in another sense, 'omne solum forti patria.' It was spoken indeed of the patience of an exiled man, but it is no less true of the valour of a warlike nation. And certainly, mr. Speaker, I hope I may speak it without offence, that if we did hold ourselves worthy, whensoever just cause should be given, either to recover our ancient rights, or to redress our late wrongs, or to attain the honour of our ancestors, or to enlarge the patrimony of our posterity, we should never in this manner forget considerations of amplitude and greatness, and fall at variance about profit and reckonings; fitter a great deal for private persons than for parliaments and kingdoms. And thus, mr. Speaker, I leave this first objection to such satisfaction as you have heard. The 2d objection is, that the fundamental laws of both these kingdoms of England and Scotland are yet divers and several; nay more, that it is declared by the instrument, that they shall so continue, and that there is no intent in his maj. to make innovation in them: and therefore that it should not be seasonable to proceed to this naturalization, whereby to endow them with our rights and privileges, except they should likewise receive and submit themselves to our laws; and this objection likewise, mr. Speaker, I allow to be a weighty objection, and worthy to be well answered and discussed. The answer which I shall offer is this; it is true, for my own part, mr. Speaker, that I wish the Scottish nation governed by our laws; for I hold our laws with some reducement worthy to govern, and it were the world: but this is that which I say, and I desire therein your attention, that according to true reason of estate, naturalization is in order first and precedent to union of laws; in degree a less matter than union of laws; and in nature separable, not inseparable from union of laws; for naturalization doth but take out the marks of a foreigner, but union of laws make them entirely as ourselves. Naturalization taketh away separation; but union of laws doth take away distinction. Do we not see, mr. Speaker, that in the administration of the world under the great monarch God himself, that his laws are diverse; one law in spirits, another in bodies; one law in regions celestial, another in elementary; and yet the creatures are all one mass or lump, without any vacuum or separation? Do we not likewise see in the state of the church, that amongst people of all languages and lineages there is one communion of saints, and that we are all fellow-citizens and naturalized of the heavenly Jerusalem; and yet nevertheless divers and several ecclesiastical laws, policies, and hierarchies, according to the speech of that worthy father, 'In veste varietas sit, scissura non sit?' And therefore certainly, mr. Speaker, the bond of law is the more special and private bond, and the bond of naturalization the more common and general; for the laws are rather 'figura reipublicæ' than 'forma,' and rather bonds of perfection than bonds of entireness: and therefore we see in the experience of our own govt. that in the kingdom of Ireland, all our statute laws, since Poyning's law, are not in force; and yet we deny them not the benefit of naturalization. In Jersey and Guernsey and the isle of Man, our common laws are not in force, and yet they have the benefit of naturalization; neither need any man doubt but that our laws and customs must in small time gather and win upon theirs; for here is the seat of the kingdom, whence come the supreme directions of estate: here is the king's person and example, of which the verse saith, 'Regis ad exemplum totus componitur orbis.' And therefore it is not possible, although not by solemn and formal act of estates, yet by the secret operation of no long time, but they will come under the yoke of our laws, and so 'dulcis tractus pari jugo.' And this is the answer I give to the 2d objection. The 3d objection is, some inequality in the fortunes of these two nations, England and Scotland, by the commixture whereof there may ensue advantage to them and loss to us. Wherein, mr. Speaker, it is well that this difference or disparity consisteth but in the external goods of fortune: for indeed it must be confessed, that for the goods of the mind and the body, they are 'alteri nos,' other ourselves; for to do them but right, we know in their capacity and understanding they are a people ingenious, in labour industrious, in courage valiant, in body hard, active, and comely. More might be said, but in commending them we do but in effect commend ourselves: for they are of one piece and continent with us; and the truth is, we are participant both of their virtues and vices. For if they have been noted to be a people not so tractable in govt. we cannot, without flattering ourselves, free ourselves altogether from that fault, being a thing indeed incident to all martial people; as we see it evident by the example of the Romans and others; even like unto fierce horses, that though they be of better service than others, yet are they harder to guide and manage. But for this objection, mr. Speaker, I propose to answer it, not by authority of Scriptures, which saith, 'Beatus est dare quam accipere,' but by an authority framed and derived from the judgment of ourselves and our ancestors in the same case as to this point. For, mr. Speaker, in all the line of our kings none used to carry greater commendation than his maj.'s noble progenitor king Edward the first of that name; and amongst his other commendations, both of war and policy, none is more celebrated than his purpose and enterprise for the conquest of Scotland, as not bending his designs to glorious conquests abroad, but to solid strength at home; which, nevertheless, if it had succeeded well, could not but have brought in all those inconveniences of the commixture of a more opulent kingdom with a less, that are now alledged. For it is not the yoke, either of our laws or arms, that can alter the nature of the climate or the nature of the soil; neither is it the manner of the commixture that can alter the matter of the commixture: and therefore, mr. Speaker, if it were good for us then, it is good for us now, and not to be prized the less because we paid not so dear for it. But a more full answer to this objection I refer over to that which will come after,

to be spoken touching surety and greatness. The 4th objection, mr. Speaker, is not properly an objection, but rather a pre-occupation of an objection of the other side; for it may be said, and very materially, whereabouts do we contend? The benefit of Naturalization is by the law, in as many as have been or shall be born since his maj.'s coming to the crown, already settled and invested. There is no more then but to bring the 'ante-nati' into the degree of the 'post-nati,' that men grown that have well deserved, may be in no worse case than children which have not deserved, and elder brothers in no worse case than younger brothers; so as we stand upon 'quid-dam,' not 'quantum,' being but a little difference of time of one generation from another. To this, mr. Speaker, it is said by some, that the law is not so, but that the 'post-nati' are aliens as the rest. A point that I mean not much to argue, both because it hath been well spoken to by the gentlemen that spoke last before me; and because I do desire in this case and in this place to speak rather of convenience than of law; only this I will say, that that opinion seems to me contrary to reason of law, contrary to form of pleading in law, and contrary to authority and experience of law. For reason of law, when I meditate of it, methinks the wisdom of the common laws of England well observed, is admirable in the distribution of the benefit and protection of the laws, according to the several conditions of persons, in an excellent proportion. The degrees are four, but bipartite, two of aliens and two of subjects. The first degree is of an alien born under a king or estate that is an enemy. If such an one come into this kingdom without safe conduct, it is at his peril; the law giveth him no protection, neither for body, lands, nor goods; so as if he be slain there is no remedy by any appeal at the party's suit, although his wife were an English woman: marry at the king's suit, the case may be otherwise in regard of the offence to the peace. The second degree is of an alien that is born under the faith and allegiance of a king or state that is a friend. Unto such a person the law doth impart a greater benefit and protection, that is, concerning things personal, transitory, and moveable, as goods and chattels, contracts, and the like, but not concerning freehold and inheritance. And the reason is, because he may be an enemy, though he be not; for the state under the obedience of which he is, may enter into quarrel and hostility; and therefore, as the law liath but a transitory assurance of him, so it rewards him but with transitory benefits. The third degree is of a subject, who having been an alien, is by charter made denizen. To such an one the law doth impart yet a more ample benefit; for it gives him power to purchase freehold and inheritance to his own use, and likewise enables the children born after his denization to inherit. But yet nevertheless he cannot make title nor convey pedigree from any ancestor paramount; for the law thinks not good to make him in the same degree with a subject born, because he was once an alien, and so might have been an enemy: and 'nemo subito fingitur,' men's affections cannot be so settled by any benefit, as when from their nativity they are inbred and inherent. And the fourth degree, which is the perfect degree, is of such a person as neither is enemy, nor could have been enemy in time past, nor can be enemy in time to come; and therefore the law gives unto him the full benefit of Naturalization. Now, mr. Speaker, if these be the true steps and paces of the law, no man can deny but whosoever is born under the king's obedience never could 'in aliquo puncto temporis' be an enemy, a rebel he might be, but no enemy; and therefore in reason of law is naturalized. Nay, contrariwise, he is bound 'jure nativitatis' to defend this kingdom of England against all invaders or rebels; and therefore, as he is obliged to the protection of arms, and that perpetually and universally, so he is to have the perpetual and universal benefit and protection of laws, which is Naturalization. For form of pleading, it is true that hath been said, that if a man would plead another to be an alien, he must not only set forth negatively and privately, that he was born out of the obedience of our sovereign lord the king, but affirmatively, under the obedience of a foreign king or state in particular, which can never be done in this case. As for authority, I will not press it; you know all what hath been published by the king's proclamation. And for experience of law, we see it in the subjects of Ireland, in the subjects of Guernsey and Jersey, parcels of the duchy of Normandy; in the subjects of Calais, when it was English, which was parcel of the crown of France. But as I said, I am not willing to enter into an argument of law, but to hold myself to point of conveniency, so as for my part I hold all 'post-nati' naturalized 'ipso jure;' but yet I am far from opinion, that it should be a thing superfluous to have it done by parl.; chiefly in respect of that true principle of estate, 'principum actiones præcipue ad famam sunt componendæ.' It will lift up a sign to all the world of our love towards them, and good agreement with them. And these are, mr. Speaker, the material objections which have been made on the other side, whereunto you have heard my answers; weigh them in your wisdoms, and so I conclude that general part. Now, mr. Speaker, according as I promised, I must fill the other balance, in expressing unto you the inconveniences which we shall incur, if we shall not proceed to this Naturalization; wherein that inconvenience, which of all others, and alone by itself, if there were none other, doth exceedingly move me, and may move you, is a position of estate, collected out of the records of time, which is this: that wheresoever several kingdoms or estates have been united in sovereignty, if that union hath not been fortified and bound in with a farther union, and

namely, that which is now in question, of Naturalization, this hath followed, that at one time or other they have broken again, being upon all occasions apt to revolt and relapse to the former separation. Of this assertion, the first example which I will set before you, is of that memorable union which was between the Romans and the Latins, which continued from the battle at the lake of Regilla, for many years, unto the consulships. At what time there began, about this very point of Naturalization, that war which was called 'bellum sociale,' being the most bloody and pernicious war that ever the Roman state endured; wherein, after a number of battles and infinite sieges and surprises of towns, the Romans in the end prevailed and mastered the Latins; but as soon as ever they had the honour of the war, looking back into what perdition and confusion they were near to have been brought, they presently naturalized them all. You speak of a Naturalization in Blood; there was a naturalization indeed in blood. Let me set before you again the example of Sparta, and the rest of Peloponnesus their associates. The state of Sparta was a nice and jealous state in this point of imparting Naturalization to their confederates. But what was the issue of it? After they had held them in a kind of society and amity for divers years, upon the first occasion given, which was no more than the surprise of the castle of Thebes, by certain desperate conspirators in the habit of maskers, there ensued immediately a general revolt and defection of their associates; which was the ruin of their state never afterwards to be recovered. Of latter times let me lead your consideration to behold the like events in the kingdom of Arragon; which kingdom was united with Castile and the rest of Spain in the persons of Ferdinando and Isabella, and so continued many years; but yet so as it stood a kingdom severed and divided from the rest of the body of Spain in privileges, and directly in this point of Naturalization, or capacity of inheritance. What came of this? Thus much, that now of fresh memory, not past twelve years since, only upon the voice of a condemned man out of the grate of a prison towards the street, that cried 'fueros,' which is as much as, liberties or privileges, there was raised a dangerous rebellion, which was suppressed with great difficulty with an army royal. After which victory nevertheless, to shun farther inconvenience, their privileges were disannulled, and they were incorporated with the rest of Spain. Upon so small a spark, notwithstanding so long a continuance, were they ready to break and sever again. The like may be said of the states of Florence and Pisa, which city of Pisa being united unto Florence, but not endowed with the benefit of Naturalization, upon the first light of foreign assistance, by the expedition of Charles VIII. of France into Italy, did revolt; though it be since again reunited and incorporated. The same effect we see in the most barbarous government, which shews it the rather to be an effect of nature; for it was thought a fit policy by the council of Constantinople to retain the three provinces of Transylvania, Wallachia, and Moldavia, which were as the very nurses of Constantinople, in respect of their provisions, to the end they might be the less wasted, only under Waywoods as vassals and homagers, and not under Bashaws, as provinces of the Turkish empire; which policy we see by late experience proved unfortunate, as appeared by the revolt of the same three provinces, under the arms and conduct of Sigismond, prince of Transylvania, a leader very famous for a time; which revolt is not yet fully recovered. Whereas we seldom or never hear of revolts of provinces incorporated with the Turkish empire. On the other part, mr. Speaker, because it is true what the logicians say, 'opposita juxta se posita magis elucescunt;' let us take a view, and we shall find that wheresoever kingdoms and states have been united, and that union corroborated by the bond of mutual Naturalization, you shall never observe them afterwards, upon any occasion of trouble or otherwise, to break and sever again: as we see most evidently before our eyes, in divers provinces of France, that is to say, Guienne, Provence, Normandy, Britain, which notwithstanding the infinite infesting troubles of that kingdom, never offered to break again. We see the like effect in all the kingdoms of Spain, which are mutually naturalized, as Leon, Castile, Valentia, Andalusia, Granada, and the rest, except Arragon, which held the contrary course, and therefore had the contrary success, as was said, and Portugal, of which there is not yet sufficient trial. And, lastly, we see the like effect in our own nation, which never rent asunder after it was once united; so as we now scarce know whether the heptarchy were a true story or a fable. And therefore, mr. Speaker, when I revolve with myself these examples and others, so lively expressing the necessity of a Naturalization to avoid a relapse into a separation; and do hear so many arguments and scruples made on the other side; it makes me think on the old bishop, which, upon a public disputation of certain Christian divines with some learned men of the heathen, did extremely press to be heard; and they were loth to suffer him, because they knew he was unlearned, though otherwise an holy and well-meaning man; but at last, with much ado, he got to be heard; and when he came to speak, instead of using argument, he did only say over his belief; but did it with such assurance and constancy, as it did strike the minds of those that heard him more than any argument had done. And so, mr. Speaker, against all these witty and subtle arguments, I say, that I do believe, and I would be sorry to be found a prophet in it, that except we proceed with this Naturalization, though perhaps not in his maj.'s time, who hath such interest in both nations, yet in the time of his descendants these realms will be in continual danger to divide and break again. Now if any man be of that careless mind, 'maneant nostros ea cura nepotes;' or of that hard mind, to leave things to be tried by the sharpest sword: sure I am, he is not of st. Paul's opinion, who affirmeth, that whosoever useth not a foresight and provision for his family, is worse than an unbeliever; much more if we shall not use foresight for these two kingdoms, that comprehend in them so many families, but leave things open to the peril of future divisions. And thus have I expressed unto you that inconvenience, which, of all others, sinketh deepest with me as the most weighty: neither do there want other inconveniences, mr. Speaker, the effects and influence whereof I fear will not be adjourned to so long a day as this that I have spoken of: for I leave it to your wisdoms to consider whether you do not think, in case, by the denial of this Naturalization, any pique or alienation, or unkindness, I do not say should be, but should be thought to be, or noised to be between these two nations, whether it will not quicken and excite all the envious and malicious humours, wheresoever, which are now covered, against us, either foreign or at home; and so open the way to practices and other engines and machinations, to the disturbance of this state? As for that other inconvenience of his maj.'s engagement into this action, it is too binding and pressing to be spoken of, and may do better a great deal in your minds than in my mouth, or in the mouth of any man else; because, as I say, it doth press our liberty too far. And therefore, mr. Speaker, I come now to the third general part of my division, concerning the benefits which we shall purchase by this knitting of the knot surer and straiter between these two kingdoms, by the communicating of Naturalization: the benefits may appear to be two, the one surety, the other greatness. Touching surety, mr. Speaker, it was well said by Titus Quintius the Roman, touching the state of Peloponnesus, that the tortoise is safe within her shell, 'testudo intra tegumen tuta est;' but if there be any parts that lie open, they endanger all the rest. We know well, that although the state at this time be in a happy peace, yet for the time past, the more ancient enemy to this kingdom hath been the French, and the more late the Spaniard; and both these had as it were their several postern gates, whereby they might have approach and entrance to annoy us. France had Scotland, and Spain had Ireland; for these were the two accesses which did comfort and encourage both these enemies to assail and trouble us. We see that of Scotland is cut off by the union of these two kingdoms, if that it shall be now made constant and permanent; that of Ireland is cut off likewise by the convenient situation of the north of Scotland towards the north of Ireland, where the sore was: which we see, being suddenly closed, hath continued closed by means of this salve; so that as now there are no parts of this state exposed to danger to be a temptation to the ambition of foreigners, but their approaches and avenues are taken away: for I do little doubt but those foreigners which had so little success when they had those advantages, will have much less comfort now that they be taken from them: and so much for surety. For greatness, mr. Speaker, I think a man may speak it soberly and without bravery, that this kingdom of England, having Scotland united, Ireland reduced, the sea provinces of the Low Countries contracted, and shipping maintained, is one of the greatest monarchies, in forces truly esteemed, that hath been in the world. For certainly the kingdoms here on earth have a resemblance with the kingdom of heaven, which our Saviour compareth, not to any great kernel or nut, but to a very small grain, yet such an one as is apt to grow and spread; and such do I take to be the constitution of this kingdom; if indeed we shall refer our counsels to greatness and power, and not quench them too much with the consideration of utility and wealth. For mr. Speaker, was it not, think you, a true answer that Solon of Greece made to the rich king Cræsus of Lydia, when she shewed unto him a great quantity of gold that he had gathered together, in ostentation of his greatness and might? But Solon said to him, contrary to his expectation, "Why, sir, if another come that hath better iron than you, he will be lord of all your gold." Neither is the authority of Machiavel to be despised, who scorneth that proverb of state, taken first from a speech of Mucianus, that moneys are the sinews of wars; and saith, "there are no true sinews of wars, but the very sinews of the arms of valiant men." Nay more, mr. Speaker, whosoever shall look into the seminaries and beginnings of the monarchies of the world, he shall find them founded in poverty. Persia, a country barren and poor, in respect of the Medes, whom they subdued. Macedon, a kingdom ignoble and mercenary until the time of Philip the son of Amyntas. Rome had poor and pastoral beginnings. The Turks, a band of Sarmatian Scythes, that in a vagabond manner made incursion upon that part of Asia, which is yet called Turcomania; out of which, after much variety of fortune, sprung the Ottoman family, now the terror of the world. So, we know, the Goths, Vandals, Alans, Huns, Lombards, Normans, and the rest of the northern people, in one age of the world made their descent or expedition upon the Roman empire, and came not, as rovers, to carry away prey, and be gone again; but planted themselves in a number of rich and fruitful provinces, where not only their generations, but their names remain to this day; witness Lombardy, Catalonia, a name compounded of Goth and Alan, Andalusia, a name corrupted from Vandalitia, Hungaria, Normandy, and others. Nay, the fortune of the Swisses of late years, which are bred in a barren and mountainous country, is not to be forgotten;

who first ruined the duke of Burgundy, the same who had almost ruined the kingdom of France, what time, after the battle near Granson, the rich jewel of Burgundy, prized at many thousands, was sold for a few pence by a common Swiss, that knew no more what a jewel meant than did Asop's cock. And again, the same nation in revenge of a scorn, was the ruin of the French king's affairs in Italy, Lewis XII. For that king, when he was pressed somewhat rudely by an agent of the Switzers to raise their pensions, brake into words of choler: "What," said he, "will these villains of the mountains put a tax upon me?" Which words lost him his duchy of Milan, and chased him out of Italy. All which examples, mr. Speaker, do well prove Solon's opinion of the authority and mastery that iron hath over gold. And therefore, if I shall speak unto you mine own heart, methinks we should a little disdain that the nation of Spain, which howsoever of late it hath grown to rule, yet of ancient time served many ages; first under Carthage, then under Rome, after under Saracens, Goths, and others, should of late years take unto themselves that spirit as to dream of a monarchy in the west, according to that device, 'Video solem orientem in occidente,' only because they have ravished from some wild and unarmed people mines and store of gold; and on the other side that this island of Britain, seated and manned as it is, and that hath, I make no question, the best iron in the world, that is, the best soldiers in the world, shall think of nothing but reckonings and audits, and 'meum et tuum,' and I cannot tell what. Mr. Speaker, I have, I take it, gone through the parts which I propounded to myself, wherein if any man shall think that I have sung a placebo, for mine own particular, I would have him know that I am not so unseen in the world, but that I discern it were much alike for my private fortune to rest a tacebo, as to sing a placebo in this business: but I have spoken out of the fountain of my heart. 'Credidi propter quod locutus sum.' I believed, therefore I spake. So as my duty is performed: the judgment is yours; God direct it for the best."

Sir Chris. Piggott reflects on the Scots—committed to the Tower—and expelled.] These were all, or most of the arguments, used on both sides, in this day's debate; and we shall take notice of no more, being sufficient to shew the temper of both court and country party, in the house, on the subject of the Union. We cannot, however, avoid giving the Case of one member who was punished, by his brethren, for letting his tongue run too far in invective against the Scottish nation, in one of the days of debate. This was sir Christ. Piggott, one of the knights for the county of Bucks,* who, on the 13th of Feb. when some Memorandums about the Union were offered to be read, and a dispute arose, whether all at once or separately, this knight, with a loud voice, and not standing up with his hat off, as the order is, pressed to have them read generally, concurring in this with the opinion of several others. "But the house," say the Commons' Journals, "observing his manner of sitting and calling, for order's sake, urged him to stand up and speak, if he was desirous to make known his opinion. Upon which he arose, and pretending, at first, to deliver some reasons why he pressed the reading of the Remembrances, generally; he, afterwards, entered into a byematter of invective against the Scots and Scottish nation; using many words of scandal and obloquy, ill-beseeming such an audience, and not pertinent to the matter in hand. As, 'let us not join murderers, thieves, and the roguish Scots with the well-deserving Scots. As much difference between them as between a judge and a thief. He would speak his conscience without flattery of any creature whatsoever. They have not suffered above two kings to die in their beds, these 200 years. Our king hath hardly escaped them; they have attempted him. Now he is come from amongst them, let us free him from such attempts hereafter, &c.' The house, we are informed, were amazed at this speech that they stood staring at one another, and took no notice of it for that time, but let it pass without tax or censure. It was not till the 16th of Feb. that the house bethought themselves of this insolent Speech; when the words of offence contained in it, were particularly recited. But this seems to have been spurred up by a Message from the king, who said, "he did much mislike and tax the neglect of the house; in that the speech was not interrupted in the instant, and the party committed before it became public, and to his highness's ear." In excuse of this, it was answered, "That 'leves loquuntur curæ, ingentes stupunt;' and that it seemed to fall within that case, wherein Solomon's counsel was, 'not to give an answer;' but that the dislike appeared, evidently, by the 'mœstum silentium,' which then was found in the house. It was then moved, That sir Christopher might be sent for, which was immediately done by the serjeant, with his mace.—After the Serjeant was gone for the Offender, many motions and questions ensued upon it. The prisoner being set to the bar, laboured to explain the words uttered by him; and to clear himself from malice and disloyalty. Which the house did not much regard; but, being commanded out, they debated what punishment they should fix upon him. The Tower was first named, and also a dismissal from his place in the house. Much dispute arose about this last affair; at length being agreed, the offender was called in again, and kneeling, the Speaker pronounced this judgment upon him, viz. "That since his offence was so apparently heinous, the house did not hold it fit that any particulars should be named, or to give a reason for their judgment; but their order was, That he should be carried to the prison of the Tower, there to remain during the pleasure of the house; That he should be dismissed from his place of knight of the shire for Bucks, and a writ issued out for a new choice." Accordingly his warrant for commitment, and a new writ, were made out, the form of both which are entered in the Journals.

After the prisoner had remained some time in the Tower, he sent a letter to a relation of his, a member of the same house, complaining of his ill state of health, occasioned by his confinement; and begged of him to intercede with the Commons for his release. Much dispute arose, about the manner of his enlargement, and whether they ought to acquaint the king with it; much fear was had about their privileges, because he was committed by an express order of the house. At last, the Speaker undertook this matter with the king; and the next day reported this Message from his maj. about it. "That he had taken notice of the Motion and Petition, made in the house, for the releasement of sir Christ. Piggott, and said, "That out of an ill cause there might grow a good effect, That the speech was very rash, and unadvised at the first, and that the silence of the house might have bred some ill conceit; but his maj. is far from opinion, that it received allowance from any member in the house, interpreting always, that the cause of their forbearance was, lest it might be any interruption to the business in hand. But since, he is more absolutely satisfied with their carriage: 1. In that they have not charged him with particulars, but have put the words in oblivion. 2. That they have proceeded against him to the height of justice. 3. That they have not been willing to proceed with his enlargement, until he might take notice of it. That, as in the last session, he had taken true heart's content, in the manner of granting the Subsidy, and for that did think them well-deserving his thanks; so, in this unhappy business, it pleaseth him so well, that he again returns them thanks for it. For the motion, as at the first, he conceived, they proceeded to his punishment with great judgment; so will he not now assume to himself any power, but leave it to the same judgment for mercy; and, if they think good, wisheth he may be freed from the prison, and dispose himself in some fitter place for his health."—After this was heard, a motion ensued, That sir Christopher might be restored to his place in the House again, which was not assented to; but it was presently ordered, that he should be enlarged; and a warrant was directed to the lieut. of the Tower for that purpose.

During these contests in the Lower House, the king took all possible pains, by Messages, &c. to keep them together and make them uniform. Many of the members had slipped into the country, or neglected the service, as disliking the business they were upon. A call of the house was therefore ordered; but before that took place, the king called both houses before him, to Whitehall, March 31, in order to reconcile their differences, and spoke to them as follows:—

The King's Speech to both Houses for hastening the Union.] “My lords of the higher house, and you knights and burgesses of the lower house: All men, at the beginning of a feast, bring forth good wine first, and after worse: this was the saying of the governor of the feast at Cana in Galilee, where Christ wrought his first miracle, by changing water into wine; but in this case now, whereof I am to speak unto you, I must follow that governor's rule, and not Christ's example, in giving you the worst and sourest wine last. For all the time of this long session of the parl. you have been so fed and cloyed (specially you of the Lower House) with such banquets, and choice of delicate speeches, and your ears so seasoned with the sweetness of long precatory orations, as this my speech, now in the breaking-up of this assembly, cannot but appear unto your taste as the worst wine, proposed at the end of the banquet; since I am only to deliver now unto you matter, without curious form; substance, without ceremony; truth, in all sincerity. Yet, considering the person that speaketh, the parties to whom I speak, the matter whereof I mean to speak, it fits better to utter matter rather than words; in regard of the greatness of my place, who am to speak to you; the gravity of you the auditory, which is the high court of parl. the weight of the matter, which concerns the security and establishment of this whole empire and little world. Studied orations, and much eloquence upon little matter, is fit for the Universities; where not the subject that is spoken of, but the trial of his wit that speaketh, is most commendable; but, on the contrary, in all great councils of parliaments, fewest words, with most matter, do become best; where the dispatch of the great errands in hand, and not the praise of the person, is most to be looked unto; like the garment of a chaste woman, who is only set forth by her natural beauty, which is properly her own; other deckings are but ensigns of an harlot, that flies with borrowed feathers. And besides the conveniency, I am forced hereunto by necessity, my place calling me to action, and not leaving me to the liberty of contemplation; having always my thoughts busied with the public care of you all; where every one of you, having but himself and his own private to think of, are at more leisure to make studied speeches. And therefore the matter, which I deliver you confusedly, as in a sack, I leave it to you, when you are in your chambers, and have better leisure than I can have, to rank them in order, every one in their own place. Thus much by way of Preface; but I proceed to the Matter: whereof I might say, with st. Paul, I could speak in as many tongues as you all; but I had rather speak three words to edification, than talk a day without understanding. In vain (saith the psalmist) doth the builder build the house, or the watchman watch the city, unless the Lord give his blessing thereunto: and, in the New Testament, st. Paul saith, that he may plant, Apollos may water; but it is God only that must give the increase. This I speak, because of the long time, which hath been spent about the Treaty of the Union. For myself, I protest unto you all, when I first propounded the Union, I then thought there could have been no more question of it, than of your declaration and acknowledgment of my right unto this crown; and that, as two twins, they would have grown up together. The error was my mistaking; I knew mine own end, but not others' fears. But now, finding many crosses, long disputations, strange questions, and nothing done, I must needs think it proceeds, either of mistaking of the errand, or else from some jealousy of me the propounder, that you so add delay unto delay; searching out, as it were, the very bowels of curiosity, and conclude nothing. Neither can I condemn you, for being yet in some jealousy of my intention in this matter; having not yet had so great experience of my behaviour and inclination, in these few years past, as you may peradventure have in a longer time hereafter; and not having occasion to consult daily with myself, and hear mine own opinion in all those particulars which are debated among you. But here, I pray you now, mistake me not at the first, when as I seem to find fault with your delays and curiosity, as if I would have you to resolve, in an hour's time, that which will take a month's advisement; for you all know, that rex est lex loquens; and you have oft heard me say, that the king's will and intention, being the speaking law, ought to be lucē clarius; and I hope you of the Lower House have the proof of this my clearness, by a bill sent you down from the Upper House within these few days, or rather few hours; wherein may very well appear unto you the care I have, to put my subjects in a good security of their possessions for all posterities to come. And therefore, that you may clearly understand my meaning in that point, I do freely confess, you had reason to advise at leisure upon so great a cause; for great matters do ever require great deliberation, before they be well concluded. ‘Deliberandum est diu, quod statuendum est semel’. Consultations must proceed lento pede; but the execution of a sentence upon the resolution would be speedy. If you will go on, it matters not, though you go with leaden feet, so you make still some progress, and that there be no lett, nor needless delay; and do not ‘nodum in scilicet po querere.’ I am ever for the medium in every thing. Between foolish rashness, and extreme length, there is a middle way. Search all that is reasonable; but omit that, which is idle, curious, and unnecessary; otherwise there can never be a resolution or end in any good work. And now from the General I will descend to the Particulars; and will, only for the ease of your memories, divide the matter, that I am to speak of, into four Heads; by opening unto you, 1st, what I crave; 2ndly, in what Manner I desire it; 3dly, what Commodities will ensue to both the kingdoms by it; 4thly, what the supposed Inconveniency may be that gives Impediments thereunto.— For the first, what I crave; I protest before God, who knows my heart, and to you my people, before whom it were a shame to lye, that I claim nothing, but with acknowledgment of my bond to you; that, as ye owe to me subjection and obedience, so my sovereignty obligeth me to yield, to your love, government and protection: neither did I ever wish any happiness to myself, which was not conjoined with the happiness of my people. I desire a perfect Union of Laws and Persons, and such a Naturalizing, as may make one body of both kingdoms, under me your king; that I, and my posterity (if it so please God) may rule over you to the world's end; such an Union, as was of the Scots and Picts in Scotland, and of the Heptarchy here in England. And for Scotland, I avow such an Union, as if you had got it by conquest; but such a conquest, as may be cemented by love, the only sure bond of subjection or friendship: that as there is over both but unus rex; so there may be in both but unus rex, et una lex: for no more possible is it for one king to govern two countries contiguous, the one a greater, the other a less; a richer, and a poorer; the greater drawing, like an adamant, the lesser to the commodities thereof; than for one head to govern two bodies, or one man to be husband of two wives; whereof Christ himself said, 'Ab Initio non fuit sic.'—But in the general Union you must observe two things; for I will discover my thoughts plainly unto you: I study clearness, not eloquence; and therefore, with the old philosopher, I would heartily wish, my breast were a transparent glass, for you all to see through, that you might look into my heart, and then would you be satisfied of my meaning. For when I speak of a perfect Union, I mean not confusion of all things: you must not take from Scotland those particular privileges, that may stand as well with this Union, as in England many particular Customs, in particular shires (as the Customs of Kent, and the royalties of the county palatine of Chester) do with the Common Law of the kingdom: for every particular shire almost, and much more every country, have some particular Customs, that are, as it were, naturally most fit for that people: but I mean of such a general Union of laws, as may reduce the whole island; that, as they live already under one monarch, so they may all be governed by one law: for I must needs confess, by that little experience I have had since my coming hither, and I think I am able to prove it, that the grounds of the Common law of England are the best of any law in the world, either civil or municipal, and the fittest for this people. But as every law would be clear, and full; so the obscurity in some points of this our written law, and want of fulness in others, the variation of cases, and men's curiosity, breeding every day new questions, hath enforced the judges to judge, in many cases here, by cases and precedents; wherein, I hope, lawyers themselves will not deny, but that there must be a great uncertainty; and I am sure all the rest of you, that are gentlemen of other professions, were long ago weary of it, if you could have had it amended: for where there is variety, and uncertainty, although a just judge may do rightly, yet an ill judge may take advantage to do wrong; and then are all honest men, that succeed him, tied, in a manner, to his unjust and partial conclusions. Wherefore leave not the law to the pleasure of the judge, but let your laws be looked into: for I desire not the abolishing of the laws, but only the clearing and the sweeping of the rust of them; and that by parl. our laws might be cleared, and made known to all the subjects. Yea rather, it were less hurt, that all the approved Cases were set down, and allowed by parl. for standing laws in all time to come: for although some of them, peradventure, may be unjust, as set down by corrupt judges; yet better it is to have a certain law, with some spots in it, nor live under such an uncertain and arbitrary law; since, as the proverb is, 'it is less harm to suffer an inconvenience, than a mischief.' And now may you have fair occasions of amending and polishing your laws, when Scotland is to be united with you under them: for who can blame Scotland, to say, If you will take away our own laws, I pray you give us a better and clearer in place thereof. But this is not possible to be done, without a fit preparation. He that buildeth a ship, must first provide the timber; and, as Christ himself said, 'No man will build an house, but he will first provide the materials; nor a wise king will not make war against another, without he first make provision of money:' and all great works must have their preparation; and that was my end, in causing the instrument of the Union to be made. Union is a marriage: would he not be thought absurd, that, furthering of a marriage between two friends of his, would make his first motion to have the two parties be laid in bed together, and perform the other turns of marriage? Must there not precede the mutual sight and acquaintance of the parties one with another; the conditions of the contract, and jointure, to be talked of, and agreed upon, by their friends; and such other things, as in order ought to go before the ending of such a work? The Union is an eternal agreement and reconciliation of many long, bloody wars, that have been between these two ancient kingdoms. It is the readiest way to agree a private quarrel between two, to bring them, at the first, to shake hands, and, as it were, kiss other, and lie under one roof, or rather in one bed together, before that first the ground of their quarrel be com-

inured upon, their minds mitigated, their affections prepared, and all other circumstances first used, that ought to be used, to proceed to such a final agreement. Every honest man desireth a perfect Union; but they that say so, and admit no preparation thereto, have mel in ore, fel in corde. If after your so long talk of Union, in all this long session of parliament rise, without agreeing upon any particular; what will the neighbour princes judge, whose eyes are all fixed upon the conclusion of this action, but that the king is refused in his desire; whereby the nation should be taxed, and the king disgraced? And what an ill preparation is it for the minds of Scotland toward the Union, when they shall hear, that ill is spoken of their whole nation; but nothing is done nor advanced in the matter of the Union itself? But this, I am glad, was but the fault of one; and one is no number: yet have your neighbours of Scotland this advantage of you, that none of them hath spoken ill of you (nor shall, as long as I am king) in parl. or any such public place of judicature. Consider therefore well, if the minds of Scotland had not need to be well prepared, to persuade their mutual consent, seeing you here have all the great advantage by the Union: is not here the personal residence of the king; his whole Court and Family? Is not here the Seat of Justice, and the Fountain of Government; Must they not be subjected to the laws of England, and so, with time, become but as Cumberland, and Northumberland, and those other remote and northern shires? You are to be the husband, they the wife; you conquerors, they as conquered; though not by the sword, but by the sweet and sure bond of love: besides that they, as other northern countries, will be seldom seen and saluted by their king; and that, as it were, but in a posting or hunting journey. How little Cause then they may have of such a change of so ancient a monarchy into the case of private shires, judge rightly herein; and, that you may be the more upright judges, suppose yourselves the patients, of whom such sentence should be given. But what preparation is it which I crave? Only such, as, by the entrance, may shew something is done, yet more is intended. There is a conceit entertained, and a double jealousy possesseth many, wherein I am mis-judged; 1st, that this Union will be the crisis to the overthrow of England, and setting up of Scotland: England will be then overwhelmed by the swarming of the Scots, who, if the Union were affected, would reign, and rule all. The 2d is my profuse liberality to the Scottishmen, more than the English; and that, with this Union, all things shall be given to them, and you turned out of all: to you shall be left the sweat, and labour; to them shall be given the fruit, and sweet: and that my forbearance is but till this Union may be gained. How agreeable this is to the truth, judge you; and that, not by my word, but by my actions. Do I crave the Union, without exceptions? Do I not offer to bind myself, and to reserve to you, as in the Instrument, all places of Judicature? Do I intend any thing, which standeth not with the equal good of both nations? I could then have done it, and not spoken of it; for all men of understanding must agree, that I might dispose, without assent of parl. offices of judicature, and others, both ecclesiastical and temporal: but herein I did voluntarily offer, by my letters from Royston to the commissioners, to bind my prerogative. Some think, that I will draw the Scottish nation hither; talking idly of transporting of trees out of a barren ground into a better; and of lean cattle out of bad pasture into a more fertile soil. Can any man displant you, unless you will? Or can any man think, that Scotland is so strong, to pull you out of your houses? Or do you not think, I know England hath more people; Scotland more waste ground; so that there is rounth in Scotland, rather to plant your idle people, that swarm in London streets, and other towns, and disburthen you of them, than to bring more unto you? and in cases of justice, if I be partial to either side, let my own mouth condemn me, as unworthy to be your king. I appeal to yourselves, if in favour or justice I have been partial: nay, my intention was ever, you should then have most cause to praise my discretion, when you saw I had most power. If hitherto I have done nothing to your prejudice, much less mean I hereafter. If when I might have done it, without any breach of promise; think so of me, that much less I will do it, when a law is to restrain me. I owe no more to the Scottishmen than to the English: I was born there, and sworn here; and now reign over both. Such particular persons of the Scottish nation, as might claim any extraordinary merit at my hands, I have already reasonably rewarded; and I can assure you, that there is none left, for whom I mean extraordinary to strain myself, further than in such ordinary benefit, as I may equally bestow, without mine own great hurt, upon any subject, or either nation; in which case, no king's hands can ever be fully closed. To both I owe justice, and protection; which, with God's grace, I shall ever equally balance. For my liberality, I have told you of it heretofore: my three first years were to [them] as a Christmas: I could not then be miserable. Should I have been oversparing to them, they might have thought, Joseph had forgotten his Brethren; or that the king had been drunk with his new kingdom. But Suits go not so cheap, as they were wont; neither are there so many fees taken in the Hamper and Petty-Bag, for the Great-Seal, as hath been; and if I did respect the English, when I came first, of whom I was received with joy, and came as in a hunting journey; what might the Scottish have justly said, if I had not, in some measure, dealt bountifully with them, that so long had served me, so far adventured themselves with me, and been so faithful to me? I have given you now four years proof, since my coming; and what I might have done more, to have raised the Scottish nation, you all know; and the longer I live, the less cause have I to be acquainted with them, and so the less hope of extraordinary favour towards them: for, since my coming from them, I do not already know the one half of them by face; most of the youth being now risen up to be men, who were but children, when I was there; and more are born since my coming thence. Now, for my lands, and revenues of my crown, which you may think I have diminished; they are not yet so far diminished, but that I think no prince in Christendom hath fairer possessions to his Crown, than yet I have; and, in token of my care to preserve the same to my posterity for ever, the entail of my Lands to the Crown hath been long ago offered unto you; and that it is not yet done, is not my fault, as you know. My Treasurer here knoweth my care, and hath already, in part, declared it; and if I did not hope to treble my revenue more than I have impaired it, I should never rest quietly in my bed. But, notwithstanding my coming to the crown with that extraordinary applause, which you all know, and that I had two nations to be the objects of my liberality, which never any prince had here before; will you compare my gifts, out of mine inheritance, with some princes here, that had only this nation to respect; and whose whole time of reign was little longer than mine hath been already; it will be found, that their gifts have far surpassed mine, albeit, as I have already said, they had nothing so great cause of using their liberality. 2ndly, for the Manner of the Union, presently desired, it standeth in three parts: the 1st, taking away of hostile Laws: for since there can be no wars betwixt you, is it not reason, hostile Laws should cease? For, 'deficiente causa, deficit effectus.' The king of England now cannot have Wars with the king of Scotland; therefore this fails of itself. The 2d is, Community of Commerce. I am no stranger unto you; for you all know, I came from the loins of your ancient kings. They of Scotland be my subjects as you are; but how can I be natural liege lord to you both, and you strangers one to the other? Shall they, which be of one allegiance with you, be no better respected of you, nor freer amongst you, than Frenchmen and Spaniards? Since I am sovereign over you both, as subjects to one king, it must needs follow, that you converse and have commerce together. There is a rumour of some ill dealings, that should be used by the commissioners, merchants of Scotland. They be here in England, and shall remain till your next meeting, and abide trial, to prove themselves, either honest men, or knaves. 3rdly, for the third point, of Naturalization; all you agree, that they are no aliens, and yet will not allow them to be natural. What kind of prerogative will you make? But for the 'post-nati,' your own lawyers and judges, at my first coming to this crown, informed me, there was a difference between the 'ante' and the 'post-nati' of each kingdom; which caused me to publish a proclamation, that the 'post-nati' were naturalized 'ipso facto' by the Accession to this crown. I do not deny, but judges may err, as men; and therefore I do not press you here to swear to all their reasons: I only urge, at this time, the conveniency for both kingdoms; neither pressing you to judge, nor to be judged: but remember also, it is as possible, and likely, your own lawyers may err, as the Judges. Therefore, as I wish you to proceed here in so far as may tend to the weal of both nations; so would I have you, on the other part, to beware to disgrace, either my proclamation, or the Judges; who, when the parl. is done, have power to try your lands and lives; for so you may disgrace both your king and your laws: for the doing of any act, that may procure less reverence to the Judges, cannot but breed a looseness in the govt. and a disgrace to the whole nation. The reason, that most moves me, for ought I have yet heard, that there cannot but be a difference between the 'ante-nati' and the 'post-nati,' and that in the favour of the last, is, that they must be nearer unto you, being born under the present govt. and common allegiance. But in point of conveniency, there is no question, but the 'post-nati' are more to be respected; for if you would have a perfect and perpetual Union, that cannot be in the 'ante-nati,' who are but few in comparison of those, that shall be in all ages succeeding, and cannot live long; but in the 'post-nati' shall the Union be continued, and live ever, age after age; which, wanting a difference, cannot but leave a perpetual mark of separation in the work of the Union: as also that argument of jealousy will be so far removed in the case of the 'post-nati,' which are to reap the benefit in all succeeding ages, as, by the contrary, there will then arise Pharaohs, which never knew Joseph; the kings, my successors, who, being born and bred here, can never have more occasion of acquaintance with the Scottish nation in general, than any other English king, that was before my time. Be not therefore abused with the flattering speeches of such, as would have the 'ante-nati' preferred; alledging their merit in my service, and such other reasons, which indeed are but sophisms: For my rewarding, out of my liberality, of any particular men, hath nothing adoe with the general act of the Union which must not regard the deserts of private persons, but the general weal and conjoining of the nations. Besides that, the actual Naturalizing, which is the only point that is in your hands, is already granted to by yourselves to the most part of such particular persons as can have any use of it here; and if any other well-deserving men were to sue for it hereafter, I doubt not but there would never be question moved among you, for the granting of it. And therefore it is most evident, that such discoursers have 'mél in ore, fel in corde,' as I said before; carrying an outward appearance of love to the Union, but indeed a contrary resolution in their hearts. As for Limitations, and Respectations, such as shall by me be agreed upon to be reasonable and necessary, after you have fully debated upon them; you may assure yourselves, I will with indifferency grant what is requisite, without partial respect of Scotland. I am, as I have often said, born and sworn king over both kingdoms: only thus far let me intreat you, in debating the point at your next meeting, that ye be as ready to resolve doubts as to move them, and to be satisfied when doubts are cleared. And as for the Commodities, that come by the Union of these kingdoms, they are great and evident; peace, plenty, love, free intercourse, and common society of two great nations. All foreign kings, that have sent their ambassadors to congratulate with me, since my coming, have saluted me as monarch of the whole isle, and with much more respect of my greatness than if I were king alone of one of these realms: and with what comfort do yourselves behold Irish, Scottish, Welch, and English, divers in nation, yet all walking as subjects and servants with in my court, and all living under the allegiance of your king; besides the honour and lustre that the increase of gallant men in the court, of divers nations, carries in the eyes of all strangers that repair hither? Those confining places, which [were] the borders of the two kingdoms; where heretofore much blood was shed, and many of your ancestors lost their lives; yea, that lay waste and desolate, and were habitations but for runagates; are now become the navel or umbilick of both kingdoms, planted and peopled with civility and riches: their churches begin to be planted; their doors stand now open; they fear neither robbing nor spoiling; and where there was nothing before heard nor seen in those parts but bloodshed, oppressions, complaints, and outcries, they now live every man peaceably under his own fig-tree; and all their former cries and complaints turned only into prayers to God for their king, under whom they enjoy such ease and happy quietness. The Marches, beyond and on this side Tweed, are as fruitful and as peaceable as most parts of England. If, after all this, there shall be a scissure, what inconvenience will follow, judge you. And as for the Inconveniences that are feared on England's part, it is alledged, that the Scots are a populous nation; they shall be harboured in our nest; they shall be planted and flourish in our good soil; they shall eat our commons bare, and make us lean. These are foolish and idle surmises. That, which you possess, they are not to enjoy; by law they cannot, nor by my partiality they shall not: for, set apart conscience and honour (which if I should set apart indeed, I had rather wish myself to be set apart, and out of all being) can any man conclude, either out of common reason or good policy, that I will prefer those which perhaps I shall never see, or but by post, for a month, before those with whom I must always dwell? Can they conquer or overcome you with swarms of people, as the Gothes and the Vandals did Italy? Surely the world knows, they are nothing so populous as you are; and although they have had the honour and good fortune never to be conquered; yet were they ever but upon the defensive part, and may in a part thank their hills and inaccessible passages, that preserved them from an utter overthrow, at the hands of all that pretended to conquer them. Or are they so very poor and miserable in their own habitations, that necessity should force them all to make incursions among you? And for my part, when I have two nations under my govt. can you imagine, I will respect the lesser, and neglect the greater? Would I not think it a less evil and hazard to me, that the plague were at Northampton, or Berwick, than at London, so near Westminster, the seat of my habitation, and of my wife and children? Will not a man be more careful to quench the fire taken in his nearest neighbour's house, than if a whole town were a-fire afar from him? You know that I am careful to preserve the woods and game throughout all England, nay, through all the isle; yet none of you doubts, but that I would be more offended with any disorder in the forest of Waltham, for stealing of a stag there, which lieth as it were under my nose, and in a manner joineth with my garden, than with cutting of timber, or stealing of a deer, in any forest of the north parts of Yorkshire, or the bishoprick. Think you, that I will prefer them that be absent, less powerful, and farther off, to do me good or hurt, before you, with whom my security and living must be, and where I desire to plant my posterity? If I might, by any such favours, raise myself to a greatness, it might be probable: all I cannot draw; and to lose a whole state here, to please a few there, were madness. I need speak no more of this with protestations: speak but of a wit, it is not likely; and to doubt of my intention in this, were more than devilish. For mine own part, I offer more than I receive; and conveniency I prefer before law, in this point. For three parts, wherein I might hurt this nation, by partiality to the Scots, you know, do absolutely lie in my hands and power: for either in Disposition of Rents, or whatsoever benefit, or in the preferring of them to any dignity or office, civil or ecclesiastical, or in calling them to the parl.; it doth all fully and only lie within the compass of my prerogative; which are the parts wherein the Scottishmen can receive either benefit or preferment by the Union; and wherein, for the care I have of this people, I am content to bind myself with some reasonable restrictions. As for the fourth part, the Naturalizing, which only lieth in your hands; it is the point wherein they receive least benefit of any: for in that they can obtain nothing but what they buy by their purse, or acquire by the self-same means that you do. And as for the point of Naturalizing, which is the point thought so fit, and so precisely belonging to parl.; not to speak of the Common Law, wherein as yet I can profess no great knowledge, but in the Civil Law, wherein I am a little better versed, and which, in the point of conjunction of nations, should bear a great sway, it being the Law of Nations; I will maintain two principles in it, which no learned and grave civilian will deny; as being clearly to be proved, both out of the text itself, in many places, and also out of the best approved doctors and interpreters of that law: the one, that it is a special point of the king's own prerogative, to make aliens citizens, and 'donare civitate:' the other, that in any case, wherein the law is thought not to be cleared (as some of yourselves do doubt, that in this case of the 'post-nati' the law of England doth not clearly determine) then in such a question, wherein no positive law is resolute, 'rex est iudex;' for he is 'rex loquens,' and is to supply the law, where the law wants: and if many famous histories be to be believed, they give the example for maintaining of this law in the persons of the kings of England and France especially, whose special prerogative they alledge it to be. But this I speak only as knowing what belongeth to a king; although in this case I press no further than that which may agree with your loves, and stand with the weal and conveniency of both nations. And whereas some may think this Union will bring prejudice to some towns and corporations within England; it may be, a merchant or two of Bristol or Yarmouth may have an hundred pounds less in his pack; but if the empire gain, and become the greater, it is no matter. You see one corporation is ever against another; and no private company can be set up but with some loss to another. Fourth: for the supposed Inconveniences rising from Scotland, they are three: 1st, that there is an evil affection in the Scottish nation to the Union: next, the Union is incompatible between two such nations: 3rdly, that the gain is small, or none: if this be so, to what end do we talk of an Union?—For proof of the 1st point, there is alledged an aversness in the Scottish nation, expressed in the Instrument, both in the preface and body of their act: in the preface, where they declare, that they will remain an absolute and free monarchy; and in the body of the act, where they make an exception of the ancient fundamental laws of that kingdom.—And 1st, for the general, of their aversness. All the main current in your Lower House ran this whole session of parl. with that opinion, that Scotland was so greedy of this Union, and apprehended, that they should receive so much benefit by it, as they cared not for the strictness of any conditions, so they might attain to the substance; and yet you now say, they are backwards, and averse from the Union. This is a direct contradiction 'in adjecto:' for how can they both be beggars and backwards, in one and the self-same thing, at the same time?—But, for Answer to the Particulars, it is an old school point, 'ejus est explicare, cujus est condere:' you cannot interpret their laws, nor they yours: I, that made them, with their assent, can best expound them.—And 1st, I confess, that the English parliaments are so long, and the Scottish so short, that a mean between them would do well: for the shortness of their continuing together was the cause of their hasty mistaking, by setting these words, of exception of fundamental laws, in the body of the act; which they only did, in pressing to imitate, word by word, the English Instrument, wherein the same words be contained in your Preface. And as to their meaning and interpretation of that word; I will not only deliver it unto you, out of mine own conceit, but as it was delivered unto me by the lawyers of Scotland, both counsellors, and other lawyers, who were at the making thereof in Scotland, and were commissioners here for performance of the same.—Their meaning in the word, of fundamental Laws, you shall perceive more fully hereafter, when I handle the Objection of the Difference of the Laws; for they intend thereby only those laws, whereby confusion is avoided, and their kings descent maintained, and the heritage of the succession and monarchy, which hath been a kingdom, to which I descent, 300 years before Christ; not meaning it, as you do, of their Common Law; for they have none, but that which is called 'jus regis:' and their desire of continuing a free monarchy, was only meant, that all such particular privileges (whereof I spake before) should not be so confounded, as, for want either of magistrate, law, or order, they might fall into such a confusion, as to become like a naked province, without law or liberty, under this kingdom. I hope you mean not, I should set garrisons over them, as the Spaniards do over Sicily and Naples; or govern them by commissioners, which are seldom found succeedingly all wise and honest men. This I must say for Scotland, and may truly vaunt it; here I sit, and govern it with my pen; I write, and it is done; and by a clerk of the council I govern Scotland now, which others could not do, by the sword. And for their aversness in their heart against the Union; it is true indeed, I protest, they did never crave this Union of me, nor sought it, either in private, or the state by letters, nor ever once did any thing of that nation press me forward, or wish me to accelerate that business; but on the other part, they offered always to obey me, when it should come to them; and all honest men, that desire my greatness, have been thus minded, for the personal reverence and regard they bear unto your person, and any of my reasonable and just desires. I know there are many bigots amongst them, I mean a number of seditious and discontented particular persons, as must be in all commonwealths, that where they dare, may peradventure talk lewdly enough; but no Scottishman ever spake dishonourably of England in parl. For here must I note unto you the difference of the two parliaments in these two kingdoms: for there they must not speak, without the chancellor's leave: and if any man do propound or utter any seditious or uncomely speeches, he is straight interrupted and silenced by the chancellor's authority; whereas here, the liberty for any man to speak what he list, and as long as he list, was the only cause he was not interrupted.—It hath been objected, that there is an antipathy of the Laws and Customs of these two nations. It is much mistaken; for Scotland hath no Common Law, as here; but the law they have, is of three sorts:—All the Law of Scotland for Tenures, Wards and Liveries, Signiories, and Lands, are drawn out of the chancery of England; and for matters of Equity, and in many things else, differs from you, but in certain terms. James I. bred here in England, brought the laws thither, in a written hand.—The 2nd is Statute Laws, which be their acts of parl.; wherein they have power, as you, to make and alter laws; and those may be looked into by you; for I hope you shall be no more strangers to that nation: and the principal work of this Union will be to reconcile the statute laws of both kingdoms.—The 3rd is the Civil Law. James V. brought it out of France, by establishing the sessions there, according to the form of the Court of Parliament of France, which he had seen in the time of his being there; who occupy there the place of civil judges, in all matters of plea or controversy; yet not to govern absolutely by the Civil Law, as in France. For if a man plead, that the law of the nation is otherwise, it is a bar to the Civil; and a good chancellor, or president, will oftentimes repel, and put to silence and argument, that the lawyers bring out of the Civil Law, where they have a clear solution in their own law: so as the Civil Law, in Scotland, is admitted in no other cases, but to supply such cases, wherein the Municipal Law is defective. Then may you see, it is not so hard a matter, as is thought, to reduce that country to be united with you under this law; nor yet have any old common law of their own, but such as, in effect, is borrowed from yours. And for their Statute Laws in parl. you may alter and change them, as often as occasion shall require, as you do here. It hath likewise been objected, as another Impediment, that, in the parl. of Scotland, the king hath not a negative voice, but must pass all the laws agreed on by the lords and commons. Of this I can best resolve you; for I am the eldest parliament man in Scotland, and have sat in more parliaments than any of my predecessors. I can assure you, that the Form of Parliament there is nothing inclined to popularity. About a 20 days, or such a time, before the parl. proclamation is made throughout the kingdom, to deliver into the king's Clerk of Register (whom you here call the Master of the Rolls) all bills to be exhibited that session, before a certain day. Then are they brought unto the king, and perused, and considered by him; and only such, as I allow of, are put into the chancellor's hands, to be propounded to the parl. and none others: and if any man in parl. speak of any other matter, than is in this Form first allowed by me; the chancellor tells him, there is no such bill allowed by the king. Besides, when they have passed them for laws, they are presented unto me, and, with my sceptre put into my hand by the chancellor, I must say, I ratify and approve all things done in this present parl. and if there be any thing, that I dislike, they rase it out before. If this may be called a negative voice, then I have one, I am sure, in that parl. The last Impediment is the French Liberties; which are thought so great, as, except the Scots forsake France, England cannot be united to them. If the Scottish nation would be so unwilling to leave them, as is said, it would not lie in their hands; for the League was never made between the people, as is mistaken, but betwixt the princes only, and their crowns. The beginning was by a Message from a king of France (Charlemagne, I take it; but I cannot certainly remember) unto a king of Scotland, for a League Defensive and Offensive, between us and them, against England; France being at that time in wars with England. The like, at that time, was then desired by England against France; who also sent their ambassadors to Scotland. At the first, the disputation was long maintained in favour of England; that they being our nearest neighbours, joined in one continent, and a strong and powerful nation, it was more fit, for the weal and security of the state of Scotland, to be in league and amity with them, than with a country, though never so strong, yet divided by sea from us; especially England lying betwixt us and them, where we might be sure of a sudden mischief, but behoved to abide the hazard of wind and weather, and other accidents, that might hinder our relief. But after, when the contrary part of the argument was maintained; wherein allegation was made, that England ever sought to conquer Scotland, and therefore, in regard of their pretended interest in the kingdom, would never keep any sound amity with them, longer than they saw their advantage; whereas France, lying more remote, and claiming no interest in the kingdom, would therefore be found a more constant friend; it was unhappily concluded in favour of the last party; through which occasion, Scotland got many mischiefs after. And it is, by the very tenor thereof, ordered to be renewed and confirmed, from king to king, successively; which accordingly was ever performed by the mediation of their ambassadors, and therefore merely personal; and so was it renewed in the queen my mother's time, only between the two kings, and not by assent of parl. or convention of three estates, which it could never have wanted, if it had been a league between the people. And in my time, when it came to be ratified, because it appeared to be in odium tertii, it was by me left unrenewed or confirmed, as a thing incompatible to my person, in consideration of my title to this crown. Some Privileges indeed, in the merchants favour, for point of commerce, were renewed and confirmed in my time; wherein, for my part of it, there was scarce three counsellors more than my secretary, to whose place it belonged, that meddled in that matter. It is true, that it behooved to be enterined (as they call it) in the Court of Parliament of Paris; but that only serves for publication, and not to give it authority; that parl. as you know, being but a judicial seat of judges and lawyers, and nothing agreeing with the definition or office of our parliaments in this isle. And therefore, that any fruits or privileges, possessed by the League with France, is able now to remain in Scotland, is impossible; for ye may be sure, that the French king stays only upon the sight of the ending of this Union, to cut it off himself: otherwise, when this great work were at an end, I would be forced, for the general care I owe to all my subjects, to crave of France like privileges to them all, as Scotland already enjoys; seeing the personal friendship remains as great between us, as between our progenitors, and all my subjects must be alike dear unto me; which either he will never grant, and so all will fall to the ground; or else it will turn to the benefit of the whole island: and so the Scottish Privileges cannot hold longer, than my league with France lasteth. And for another argument, to prove, that this League is only between the Kings, and not between the People; they, which have pensions, or are privy intelligence-givers in France, without my leave, are in no better case by the law of Scotland, than though pensioners to Spain. As for the Scottish Guard in France, the beginning thereof was, when an earl of Boghan was sent in aid of the French, with 10,000 men; and there being made constable, and having obtained a victory, was murdered, with the most of the Scottish army. In recompence whereof, and for a future security to the Scottish nation, the Scottish Guard was ordained to have the privilege and prerogative, before all other Guards, in guarding the king's person. And as for the last point of this subdivision, concerning the Gain, that England may make by this Union; I think no wise, nor honest man will ask any such question. For who is so ignorant, that doth not know, the gain will be great? Do you not gain by the Union of Wales? And is not Scotland greater than Wales? Shall not your dominions be increased, or lands, seas, and persons, added to your greatness? And are not your lands and seas adjoining; For who can set down the limits of the Borders, but as a mathematical line or idea? Then will that back-door be shut, and those ports of Janus be for ever closed: you shall have those, that were your enemies to molest you, a sure back to defend you; their bodies shall be your aids, and they must be partners in all your quarrels. Two snowballs put together, make one the greater; two houses joined, make one the larger; two castle-walls, made in one, makes one as thick and strong as both. And do you not see, in the Low Countries, how available the English and the Scottish are, being joined together? This is a point so plain, as no man, that hath wit or honesty, but must acknowledge it feelingly. And where it is objected, that the Scottishmen are not tied to the service of the king in the wars, above 40 days; it is an ignorant mistaking: for the truth is, that, in respect the kings of Scotland did not so abound in treasure and money, to take up an army under pay, as the kings of England did; therefore was the Scottish army wont to be raised only by proclamation, upon the penalty of their breach of allegiance; so as they were all forced to come to the war, like snails, who carry their house about with them; every nobleman and gentleman bringing with them their tents, money, provision for their house, victuals of all sorts, and all other necessities, the king supplying them of nothing: necessity thereupon enforcing a warning to be given, by the proclamation, of the space of their attendance, without which, they could not make their provision accordingly; especially as long as they were within the bounds of Scotland, where it was not lawful for them to help themselves by the spoil or wasting the country. But neither is there any law, prescribing precisely such a certain number of days; nor yet is it without the limits of the king's power, to keep them together as many more days as he list; to renew his proclamations, from time to time, some reasonable number of days before the expiring of the former; they being ever bound to serve and wait upon him, though it were an hundredth year, if need were. Now, to conclude; I am glad of this occasion, that I might 'liberare animam meam.' You are now to recede: when you meet again, remember, I pray you, the truth and sincerity of my meaning; which, in seeking Union, is only to advance the greatness of your empire seated here in England; and yet with such caution I wish it, as may stand with the weal of both states. What is now desired, hath oft before been sought, when it could not be obtained; to refuse it now then, were double iniquity. Strengthen your own felicity. London must be the seat of your king, and Scotland joined to this kingdom by a golden conquest, but cemented with love, as I said before; which, within, will make you strong against all civil and intestine rebellion; as, without, we will be compassed and guarded with our walls of brass. Judge me charitably, since in this I seek your equal good; that so both of you might be made fearful to your enemies, powerful in yourselves, and available to your friends. Study therefore, hereafter, to make a good conclusion; avoid all delays; cut off all vain questions; that your king may have his lawful desire, and be not disgraced in his just ends; and, for your security in such reasonable points of restrictions, whereupon I am to agree, ye need never doubt of my inclination: for I will not say any thing, which I will not promise; nor promise any thing, which I will not swear; what I swear, I will sign; and what I sign, I shall, with God's grace, ever perform."

The King explains some Doubts in his former Speech.] When the Commons were returned to their house, the Speaker signified his maj.'s pleasure that they should adjourn to the 20th of April, on account of the Easter holidays. During this intermission, the King's last Speech had been misrepresented by some of the hearers, which obliged him to send for both the Houses again, on the 2d of May, to clear up those points to them which admitted of a double meaning. Accordingly, the king delivered himself in these words:—

"My lords and you gentlemen of the lower house of parl.—It is the chiefest comfort of the sower, to sow his seed in good ground, where there is hope, it may yield fruit. Since I last spake unto you, I have heard, by common report, with what applause and good liking my speech hath been received, and digested: I hope you continue in the same liking still; and I wish, my hope may not be deceived; that my seed hath not fallen into stony, or sandy hearts; whereby what I spake may be mistaken, and prove barren, by preconceived opinions; the growth be choaked, forgotten, or carried away by the fowls of the air, or prevented contrary to my meaning. For my part, I can find no symptoms or signs in the Lower House, by which I may misjudge them, but that they will proceed in the same course of particular preparation, that they began in: as for the Upper House, there hath been no word spoken of the matter since your last meeting. I come not now therefore to persuade that, which is already begun (having no doubt in either of your inclinations) but to facilitate, and make the way fair for your going on. I shall do but the part of a good gardener, to prune, and dress, and take away the weeds and brambles, that may hinder the springing and budding of this good plant. And because there are, and maybe, divers explanations and expositions of my Speech, I was desirous to explain myself unto you; for (as I said in my former Speech) 'ejus est explicare, cujus est condere.' I have not hindered* any speech; for it is not my manner, neither have I time to do it; only, for order-sake, I will contain all I have to say, under three heads; viz. I. To interpret mine own Meaning in my former Speech. II . III. To endeavour to set before you some Course of Proceeding hereafter.—I. Upon my Speech some have builded gold and silver; some, hay and stubble: I must be as a fire to consume and burn up the hay and stubble, and to sift out and preserve the gold and silver. I understand, that some have interpreted my words, as expressing a desire and proposition of a perfect Union. I have not studied (as I said) to give a full answer to such interpreters; but I know you can put a difference between wise men and fools: fools handle things either with subtilty, or ignorance; wise men, with substance, and solid argument. I propounded ever, and so I crave at your hands an absolute and full Union, but not a perfect Union; such an Union as must have that preparation, which is made: and, because I spake of an absolute Union, to say, or think, I wished nothing in the mean time, were absurd. But it is most true, I ever wished such an Union, as there might be 'unus rex, unus grex, una lex.' These men, that thus interpret, mark them well; and you shall find, that they propound, and pray for that, they would most shun: 'probate Spiritus;' and see, if they give you not gilded pills; whether they have not 'mel in ore, fel in corde.' Something must be done, you all confess; the devil himself cannot deny it: then what preparation can you have, or wish, other than hath been? This is but as if a surgeon should let blood on the contrary side, to let out the ill humour.—You would have a Commission, to prepare for this your perfect Union, when yourselves have, in the beginning, propounded it, have enacted it, that commissioners of both nations should meet and treat; and these commissioners, of your own choice, for your part, being met, have deliberately propounded, have maturely digested, and have advisedly brought forth something in that form, whereupon it is fit you should proceed, and now, forsooth, you would have a Commission. I will never grant a commission: It shall never have my consent, or allowance.—I remember a Speech in Hen. VIII.'s time, in the parl. house: the king propounded something which came into the house; one in the house said, That he thought the king's meaning was good, so as it were according to law: I pray (my masters) that I may hear no more of such foolish diversions, and aversions.—It is merely idle and frivolous, to conceive, that any unperfect Union is desired, or can be granted: it is no more unperfect, as now it is projected, than a child that is born without a heard. It is already a perfect Union in me, the head. If you wanted a head, that is me, your king over you all; or if you were of yourselves no body; then you had reason to say, it were unperfect; but it is now perfect in my title and descent, though it be not an accomplished and full Union; for that time must ripen and work.—When a child is in the mother's womb, though it hath all the lineaments and parts of a body, yet it is but an embryo, and no child; and shall be born in his due time: when it is born, though it then be a perfect child, yet it is no man; it must gather strength and perfection by time: even so is it in this case of Union. The Union is perfect in me; that is, it is an Union in my blood and title; yet but 'in embrione' perfect. Upon the late queen's death, the child was first brought to light; but to make it a perfect man, to bring it to an accomplisht Union, it must have time and means; and if it be not at the first, blame not me; blame time; blame the order of nature.—I remember, at the beginning, when I first craved an Union, my desire was to have a perfect Union: then this whole body drew back; said, It could not be dispatched at once; it were fit it were entered into by little and little; devised all restrictions they could to tie it within bounds; produced sundry precedents of the like; as ; and when I would have had a more full and liberal Commission, you bounded it yourselves.—But how would you have a perfect Union, but by this preparation? By bills, by committee, by argument: and yet, I say (using our Saviour's words) 'hoc facite, aliud non omittite.' Mary! I would not have you think on that to be done to-day, that is to be done to-morrow. II. The 2nd part of my division is to answer objections. 1. One objection is, What Gain shall we have by it? I thought I had expressed it sufficiently before. But do they ask, what Gain? Is it not Gain to add a nation to this; to make it one great and glorious empire; to have that people to join their arms and strength with you upon all occasions; to make of half a land one intire; to add to the splendor of the king's court; to turn curses into blessings; to turn blood and rapine into peace and plenty; remembering always, that you have the blessing of the seat here, and that this is the center? But I confess it is good to be sometimes far from the prince's court: 'procul a numine, procul a fulmine.' But whether that be so here, or no, I appeal to be judged by the children above 6 years old in London; I desire that the commissioners for these parts would speak as they find: I desire no other witnesses than those that best know. But if you find that my residence here doth harm, I will make two offers: one, I will keep my seat alternatim, in the several countries; I will stay one year in Scotland, and another here, as some other kings do, that have several kingdoms: the other is, I will keep my court nearer Scotland, at York; at some place thereabouts, so as you and Scotland shall be both alike 'procul a fulmine:' and I protest, I will do either of these, if you think it for your good; and if I shall not see this Union likely to go forward, I will do it howsoever. Observe then the wandering Objections of these men; consider of the substance of these speeches, whether they offer you not gilded pills. I fear me, they would neither be found wise, nor honest, if they be examined and ripped up: for if you mark it, they are nothing but iterations of my Speeches, which I would be sorry to hear retorted against me. 2. Obj. The 2nd Objection: there can be no security for such cautions, as shall be agreed on. To this I cannot tell what to answer; because neither I am well versed nor skilled in your common-law, nor you will give credit to the Judges in that, which they can say in this point. But I will bring it to this dilemma; either I can give security, or I cannot: if I can, why do you not yourselves enter into consideration of it, and accept it? If I cannot, then must you leave all to me, after the parl. to do what I will; and if any thing light upon you, other than you looked for, you must take, and bear that, which your own folly hath brought you unto, because you did not prevent it in time, when it was in your hands. 3. Obj. We must yield them now but a little, because we must keep them in appetite: for you say, 'Turpius ejicitur, quam non admittitur hospes.' Ans. We are not now making marriages with Spain; this is no new contract or bargain, that requires precise conditions. 'Res non est integra.' The Union and bargain is already made; nothing now to be thought on, or dealt in, but the means. It is an idle thing now to talk of appetite. It is true, that the Lords commended a perfect Union; but I am sure they ever had relation to the instrument, and to the course that was taken, for proceeding by the degrees therein propounded; neither did I ever hear, before now, of any man, that meant other, than this proceeding upon the first Instrument. Now shall I come to some other Objections, more passionate and violent, but more idle, and of less weight than the rest. It is affirmed, that the taking away of hostile laws is a donative, a great grace and favour; where it is known, as now they stand, they do press yourselves, as well as them of Scotland; though, by the Union that is already made, they lose their force and vigour. It is true, that it is fittest to take them away by parl. because they were established by parl. but all that can be said, is no more, than as if you should say, it is fit to take hostile laws away, because they are taken away. It is said also, that if you deal by bills, they are like to have a cold effect; prejudging the good disposition of the whole house. I am sorry to hear of such speeches, against duty, almost against allegiance. I know not their meaning, except they delight to sing with the owl upon the bush, &c. It is a strange and ominous prophecy, for which I know no answer, but that I shall pray, that such swallows bring but one summer with them. It is no marvel, if men of that coat have neither hopes nor fears from me; and fear I shall be well advised, what I do with them. I looked for no such fruits at your hands; such personal discourses and speeches, which, of all other, I looked you should avoid, as not beseeching the gravity of your assembly. I am your king: I am placed to govern you, and shall answer for your errors: I am a man of flesh and blood, and have my passions and affections, as other men: I pray you, do not too far move me to do that, which my power may tempt me unto. Now for the Course I would have you hold, the third part of my division; let it be my advice, that you do all things with reverence, with love; that it may seem, you have duty, respect, and care to please him, that will, by all his best endeavours, seek to give you contentment. That speech of 'Love me little, and love me long,' was a damned speech; for love and affection must be ardent, settled upon good grounds, not removable. Men die, men grow cold; but daily increase, especially in brethren, in two dugs of one breast, in children towards their parents. I would wish you to proceed with order, and with diligence, and above all, with love to your sovereign: I say, with the more diligence; because now the sickness increasing, the heat of the year, yea your own hay-harvest, do persuade you to make haste into the country. Make no more doubts than is needful; wherever a thing is made doubtful, there nothing will ever come to perfection. If any doubts do arise, make me acquainted with them; pour them into my bosom; I will strive to give you satisfaction: if I cannot answer, or satisfy them, let the blame rest upon me. And, to conclude, I desire, that your travels may be such, as you may procure strangers to reverence us, our enemies to fear us, our friends to be glad, our subjects to rejoice with you and me; that the world may see, there is an Union still in working and proceeding: that you beware of all fanatical spirits, all extraordinary, and colourable speeches; that there be no distractions, nor distempers, among you; that you breed not contempt to the great work so well begun, and discouragement to others, that wish well; that you tempt not the patience of your prince; and finally, that, with all speed, you proceed with as much as can be done at this time, and make not all you have done frustrate."

Complaint against the Depredations of the Spaniards.] A bill was brought into parl. this session, entitled, 'An act to explain another, made the last session of this parl. called, An act to enable all his maj.'s loving subjects of England and Wales, to trade freely into the dominions of Spain, Portugal, and France.' This was passed into a law and may be seen in the printed Statutes. But we find, by the Journals, that Spain was not then in such strict amity with us as to suffer a free trade. For, on the 16th of May a Message was sent from the Commons to the Lords, by sir E. Sandys and others, to this effect: "That a Petition, directed to his maj. and the high court of parl. had been exhibited to them, by several merchants of this realm, complaining, grievously, of many intolerable wrongs and injuries that had been offered them, by the subjects of Spain, in all parts abroad where they trade. As well in taking and unjustly detaining of their goods, as in bereaving them of their liberties; and in the cruel usage of divers of them; either by committing them to the Gallies, or by other tortures." That the Lower House had taken the said Complaint to heart, and examined the same, as far as they could, not being able to take examination of the adverse parties, being of a foreign nation. Nevertheless, they find that the particulars of the said Complaint, being 20 in number, at the least, are for the most part very just; insomuch, that thereby they conceive that a dishonour is offered to his maj. wrong to his subjects, and disreputation to the whole state. That thereupon, they having entered into consideration of redress, have thought fit, in regard the matter concerneth a foreign nation, that is in amity with his maj. and this state, to forbear to proceed therein, any otherwise than by Petition to his maj. And they earnestly desire their lordships will be pleased to join with them in this Petition and that for their better information therein, they will allow of a Conference, at such time and place as their lordships shall think fit to appoint." Answer. That because the Lords do find the matter to be of so great weight, both in regard to form and substance, they will take some time to consider of it maturely, and send them a fuller Answer as soon as they can. But it was not till the 8th of June, that the Lords sent to acquaint the Commons that they had considered of the case, and desired to see the Petition which the merchants presented to them; and that then they would return further Answer touching the Conference.—The Petition, which is printed at length in the Journals of the Commons, was sent, according to desire, with certain Reasons and Articles annexed to it. Importing, That they thought it needless to send the Petition before, because as it was inscribed to his maj. the lords spiritual and temporal, and to the rest of the court of parl. they imagined the like had been presented to their lordships. In the Petition they observed two points; 1. A Complaint. 2. A Direction for Remedy. That they had only examined the Proofs of the Complainants, not having power to convene before them the persons complained of. And, in their judgments, so far as they could examine, the Complaint was just, the Grievances great, and the Remedy necessary. For the 2nd point, they had not entertained any purpose to meddle with that; being more proper for his maj.'s wisdom and clemency, whose subjects were all under his protection; therefore they leave it wholly to him, and do now only renew their former request, that Petition may be made to his maj. for some such means of redress as in his princely wisdom shall be thought fit. But we are not told by the Journals, whether the Lords joined with the Commons in such a Petition; nor is there one word of this matter mentioned in any of our historians, by which we may learn whether these grievances were redressed or not.—July 4th, 1608, the parl. was prorogued, by commission, to the 10th of Feb. following; and from that time, by four other prorogations, to the 9th of Feb. 1609. It is remarkable that there was no Supply either asked or granted in this last session. And indeed what was hitherto given since this king's accession, bears no proportion to the heavy taxes laid on the subject at the latter end of the last reign.

The E. of Salisbury lays before Parl. the King's Necessities.] Feb. 9, 1609. The Session was opened; from which day the lord chancellor adjourned the house to the 14th. On that day the earl of Salisbury, lord treasurer, in a set speech to the Lords, which he divided into two parts, took occasion to inform their Lordships, "First, by making a particular relation of the state his maj. was reduced to, both in respect to his present debts and other occasions of expence; and some necessary means to be considered of for a present supply for his wants, and support of his royal state in time to come; which causes he affirmed were the chief reason for calling this session of parl. Next, concerning the Prince, who, though already duke of Cornwall by natural descent, yet was to be created prince of Wales and earl of Chester. For the first again, concerning the State of the King's Debts, &c. his lordship explained, by many substantial arguments, reasons, and precedents, according to the knowledge he had gained, as proper to his place of Treasurer, and other observations. Lastly, he made a motion that a Message might be sent for this purpose to the Lower House, for a friendly Conference thereupon."—This motion was agreed to, and a message to the Commons was sent the same day, importing, "That because some things of extraordinary nature were the occasion of calling this meeting, their lordships were desirous the Commons should be acquainted with them, since without their concurrence nothing could be done. That they thought it necessary to treat of these matters at first, whereby their lordships hoped this would prove a parl. of consolation. Therefore they desired a Conference, for consideration to be had of some necessary Supplies to be granted to his maj. for his present occasions. And further signified that their lordships will join with them, for retribution to his maj. as shall be judged most fit and reasonable." The Commons readily accepted of this proposal; and a Conference, with time and place, was agreed on between committees of both houses. And the Lords ordered, that the lord treasurer should deliver the substance of what he had this day opened to them at the committee. It is not clear by the Journals what was said or done at the first Conference. There is a long account of it entered in those of the Commons, in the Reports made by the Solicitor-General, sir Fra. Bacon; but the Items of them are so short as not to bear a connection. Especially in that of the Public Debts and Disbursements, which are so intricate as not to be understood at all.

Feb. 21. The Commons sent a message to the Lords, requesting another conference with their committee, about the Matter of Contribution and Retribution, moved at the last conference, which was agreed to; and, on the 26th, the lord treasurer made a Report to the house of what had passed in this last conference. Wherein he particularly took notice of a motion, proposed by the committee of the other house, "That his maj. might be made acquainted, by some of their lordships, that it was the desire of the Commons, that some course might be taken concerning Wardships and Tenures." Which being debated among the Lords, they agreed that a select number of their house should be chosen to acquaint the king with the Commons' request. Feb. 28. There was a long debate in the Commons, on the two businesses of Support and Supply, the heads of which are given in their Journals; but are again too intricate to unravel. We shall therefore chiefly follow the Journals of the Lords, and only give some remarkable hints from those of the Commons, as they fall in our way; one instance of which is now before us. On the day before-mentioned, the result of the debate on the Supply was, a division of the house on the question, Whether it should be put off for that time or not? It was carried to sit still, only by 160 against 148. It was then moved to say, "That they were willing to relieve the king's wants cheerfully; time enough for retribution afterwards. That the Supply might be postponed, but to support immediately. To intend, was mental purpose; to give a plain open English answer, that we propose to give somewhat." On the whole, a Resolution was taken, on a message from the Lords, to send an answer to this purpose; "That they would think of the Supply in due time, and doubted not but to give his maj. good satisfaction. For the matter of annual Support, in lieu of Wardships and Tenures, when they shall hear from their lordships about them, they will be ready to join with them in conference."

The Commons complain of Dr. Cowel's Book tending to advance the Prerogative Royal.] Feb. 27th. The Commons sent a Message to the Lords to acquaint them, "That they had taken notice of a Book, lately published by one dr. Cowel, which they conceived does contain matters of scandal and offence towards the high court of parl. and is otherways of dangerous consequence and example. That being desirous there should be a joint examination of the offensive contents of the said Book, and some course taken for the punishment of the person who published the same; they therefore desire their lordships to appoint a conference for that purpose." The Lords returned for answer, "That they were willing to join with them in any cause proper to maintain the honour of that high court, and to cherish a mutual correspondence between both houses, which together make the body of the parl. whereof his maj. is the head. They therefore appointed time and place for a Conference, not only on the complaint, but to go again on the topic of a supply." Wilson informs us, "That the Book, here mentioned, which had given offence, wrote by dr. Cowel, a civilian, was to prove the excellence of the Civil Law in comparison of the Common Law of England. That the king had let fall some expressions at his table, in derogation of the latter, and highly extolling the Civil Law before it. At the same time, declaring his approbation of a book, lately writ by dr. Cowel on that subject. This, says our author, nettled the great lawyers much; and had not some of them been raised so high, that they could not, with their court-gags, look downwards, it had bred an open contest. However, adds he, though they did not stir in it themselves, we may suppose they, underhand, stirred up this prosecution against the civilian, for fear, that if his scheme should take place, they should have their lessons to learn over again*.

Feb. 23th. The lord treasurer informed the Lords of the King's Answer to the Message sent to him, at the desire of the Commons, relating to Tenures and Wardships. "That his maj. reserveth to himself, 'tanquam res integra,' the power of affirmative, or negative, to grant it; as on further deliberation, he shall see cause." Hereupon it was moved by the earl of Northampton, lord privy seal, "That in regard the matter was of great importance, respite might be taken for imparting his maj.'s said Answer to the Lower House, till to-morrow, on their next meeting; when some fit course might be considered of for that purpose. This motion being seconded by the lord chanc. it was agreed that no Answer should be returned to the Commons till the next day. At which time the Lords were interrupted from considering of the affair, by another message from the Commons, importing, That they desired their lordships to appoint a meeting of the committees of both houses, to receive their Answer touching the matter of Support and Supply. The lords accordingly appointed 2 that afternoon for the purpose.

The very next day a message was sent from the Lords to the Commons to this effect; "That whereas the House of Commons, by a Message of late sent from them, had moved their lordships that his maj. might be made acquainted, by some of their house, with the desire of the said Commons, touching the matter of Tenures and Dependencies on Tenures; their lordships had acquainted his maj. therewith, and received his Answer. And conceiving that the time appointed this afternoon, concerning dr. Cowel's Book, may fitly serve both that and imparting his maj.'s Answer, do desire that this meeting may accordingly serve for both these purposes." The Commons replied, That they received their lordships message very respectfully, and would be ready to attend their service at the time and place appointed.

March 3d. The lord chancellor reported to the Lords the substance of what was delivered, by the committee of the Lower House, at yesterday's Conference, on the points of Supply and Support. "That the Commons had expressed a tender feeling towards his

maj.'s wants; and a due regard to relieve them. But they could not conceive, as they affirmed, how it could be done in any other way than by Subsidy. Which being proper to be first moved in the Commons, they will consider of a fit resolution and proceed therein in due time. That, as to the other point of Support, they hold this matter to be most considerable, and therefore proper for the Lords; of which they expect to be informed from them at their convenience." Then the lord privy seal declared to the house what had passed in the Conference relating to dr. Cowel's Book. "That the attorney-general, in delivering the sense of the Lower House, did very modestly and discreetly lay open the offence taken against the party, and the dangerous consequence of the book." Afterwards the bp. of London read the particular exceptions which the Commons had made to it; which were, 1. On the word Subsidy; 2. On the word King; 3. On the word Parliament; 4. On the word Prerogative. On all which words the said dr. Cowel had so unadvisedly enlarged himself, as the Commons apprehended that the same was very offensive, and of dangerous consequence. On this Report, the Lords took a little time to consider, and then thought proper to send a Message to the other house, to desire another Conference about this Book, and in the mean time ordered their clerk to seek precedents of that kind, and faithfully to acquaint the house therewith. The next day the lord treasurer informed the Lords, "That his maj. had taken notice of this matter; and had lately perused the places in the book to which exceptions were taken. That he had called the said Cowel before him, and heard his Answers thereunto; and, having duly considered of the errors committed by the author, in that behalf, was graciously pleased to deliver his judgment and resolution to the Lords, to be by them communicated to the committee of the Commons." We are not told by the Journals what this Resolution was; but it may be supposed to finish the business, for there is no further mention made of it.

Proceeding in relation to Tenures, &c.]
March 10th. The lord privy seal made a report to the Lords of what had been done at the last Conference relative to Tenures, &c. His lordship observed, "That the committee of the Commons insisted chiefly on 3 particular points, in the debate, on which the matter of Tenures depended. These points were Honour, Conscience and Utility; to the last of these they said, "That since his maj. out of the greatness of his mind, had been pleased to set it aside; so they, in their duties, would urge it no further than otherwise it should be meet. And it would be most proper to treat of that when the other two of Honour and Conscience should be discussed. These last two they confessed were of much weight; speaking in most reverend and tender manner of his maj.'s Honour; and likewise affirming, that it was far from them to put any thing into the clear spring of his Conscience. Therefore their conclusion was, That his Maj. might be addressed by their lordships to accelerate his Answer concerning this matter of Tenures, as soon as conveniently he might; yet submitting themselves wholly to his gracious pleasure." Upon hearing this Report, the Lords agreed to address his maj. as the Commons desired; a Committee was ordered for that purpose; and the lord privy seal enjoined to deliver the contents of it to the king, and bring back his maj.'s Answer.

March 12th. The lord privy seal reported to the House the Answer his maj. was pleased to give to the committee appointed to address him, on the request of the Commons, about Tenures, &c. And said, that his maj. strictly observing every point thereof, was pleased to give his Answer in effect following: "That although he took good notice of the distinction of time, when the matter was first moved, and the present; and that there are infinite affairs as well of state as others of parl. which keep them still in exercise. Yet, in respect of the humility, dutiful carriage, discretion and judgment of the Lower House, shewed in this matter; of the wisdom of the Lords in moving it; and, lastly, the season of the year; his maj. had thought of those particulars; and was pleased that they should treat of the business; and that the Lower House should have speedy notice of his pleasure therein. Furthermore, his maj. mentioned some other business in hand this parl. and first, of Grievances, which he declared himself to be so willing effectually to redress, that although he doubted not the good disposition of his posterity, yet he is desirous to provide, "That if they should have will, they may not have power again to grieve the people." This Answer being delivered, the lord chanc. put the house in mind of the Supply; which was spoke of by the Commons at the last Conference. And thereupon moved, that the Lower House might be made acquainted with his maj.'s Answer about Tenures, as soon as possible. This was agreed to, and the Answer was delivered to the Commons that afternoon. Great was the joy which the Commons expressed on this gracious return to their request; which they signified to the king by the mouth of their Speaker, attended by the whole house. The Lords too did the same by the chancellor; but, we find by the Journals, that he was unwilling to undertake the employment, 'ex ore,' and desired to have it in writing; which the Lords would not consent to, but trusted to the chancellor's wisdom and understanding of the matter, to dress it up as he pleased.

March 29th. The lord treasurer reported to the Lords what was done at the last Conference; and how far the committee of the Lower House had proceeded in the matter of Tenures, to this effect: "First, his lordship observed that mr. Recorder of London declared, That ease and convenience had led the Commons to seek this matter of Tenures and their dependents; that love and loyalty had caused them to take the course therein they had done; and that having now the king's Answer, which was a licence to treat of that business, they departed, joyful in their hearts, like the sons of Emaus.—That this matter consisted of 4 considerable points: 1. What they desire: 2. What they would offer: 3. How they would levy it: 4. How they may have security for what they seek. That of the two first, they had determined in this sort; viz. That Knights Service generally might be turned into free and common soccage."—Next follows in the Journals, a long Account of those particular Grievances, relating to Tenures, the Commons wanted to have redressed. But, as these complaints and several more, concerning the Prerogative Royal, are all amply recapitulated at the end of this session, we shall postpone them till we arrive at that period. Only, observing here, that the Retribution the Commons offered to the king in lieu of these perquisites of the crown, was 100,000l. yearly; wherein they included all the 'esse' and 'posse,' which the king ever had, in the matters aforesaid, to be compounded for.—After the Lord Treasurer had made the foregoing recital to the Lords, it was Resolved, "That to the end that house might better examine every particular, so desired, and the several values of them; and thereupon consider of the offer made, in order to be better prepared to take farther course of proceeding with the Lower House; the Lords should go into a committee of the whole house thereupon.—But, Easter now approaching, and the parl. being thereupon adjourned, it was not till the 18th of April that this matter of Tenures was again resumed by the Lords. And, on a motion of the lord treasurer, because his maj. had not signified his pleasure to that house how far he likes of these proceedings; therefore he moved that a committee of Lords should be appointed to wait on the king, and to understand from him whether he shall be pleased to approve of this scheme of parting with Tenures, &c. or no?"

A Committee being appointed accordingly, consisting of all the great officers of state, &c. April 20th, after a call of the House of Lords and a severe admonition from the Chancellor, for due attendance, the lord treasurer reported his maj.'s Answer, to this effect: "He first took notice, That the Reason of this present meeting was to deliberate in what manner to deliver this Answer to the committee of the other house. For, he said, that the business to which the Answer was made is not ordinary; not a Grievance, nor yet a request for justice, nor any such matter, to which the king may or ought to be urged to any present or certain answer. But, that this was a suit for a valuable recompence, to be eased of certain payments and burdens, by law justly lying on the subject, and of which no man can justly complain." The matter requested his lordship remembered to be this, That all Tenures, by Grand Serjeanty,

Petit Sergeanty, Knights Service in Capite, &c. may be turned into free and common Soccage; as of a Mannor, which he affirmed was the basest and meanest service. Unto this request his lordship reported his maj.'s Answer to be, "That he would upon no terms whatsoever part with any branch of his sovereign prerogative, whereof the Tenures in Capite from his person, which is all one as of his crown, was no small part. But, touching the dependance upon Tenures, such as, marriage, wardship, premier seissin, relief, respect of homage, and the like, which are only the burthens of Tenures, (the honours and Tenures reserved) his maj. is pleased when he shall understand what recompence will be offered for them, to give further Answer, towards contracting for the same, with all convenient speed."—Upon this the judges were asked their opinion, Whether the Tenure of Honour, &c. may be reserved to his maj. and the Charge or Burden, with other things of like nature, be released? To which they answered with reservation, in the affirmative. It was then resolved, "That the lord treasurer should deliver his maj.'s Answer to the committee of the Lower House that afternoon; and leave the consideration of the course and means to their wisdom and conduct."

May 7th. The Lord Treasurer acquainted the House, "That neither he, nor their committee, were at all satisfied with the proceedings of the Commons, in this matter. That there was no freedom of debate used in their meetings, which was the only way to come at a good and speedy end. But, only a written message read unto them, to which, when any thing was objected by the Lords, the others were debarred from making any reply. That the Lords had objected to the Commons, That whereas the members of that house had offered to give for the matter of Wards, Tenures and Dependents thereon, 100,000*l.* per annum, and had received answer, That his maj. as then advised, would not accept it; nor saw any reason to depart from his first demand of 200,000*l.* yearly Support, and 600,000*l.* Supply: his occasions being now, in all appearance, greater than before: especially as the Wards were now desired by them, which were not spoken of before, nor included in the king's demand. To which the Commons written Answer was, That they had since entered into a re-examination of the matter and do find no reason to alter their offer. That their purpose was to have laid the burden on the landed men, when it was moved to them, that they should think on some course to make up the king's demand, &c. But, they cannot find how so huge a sum may be levied, without grieving a number of his maj.'s poorer subjects. Howbeit, in all reasonable matters, they will be willing to give his maj. satisfaction. Lastly, they acknowledge their great obligation to him for giving them more liberty to treat of these matters, than ever was granted to any of their predecessors; and further than that leave they would not go."

The Lord Treasurer acquaints the Lords with the Murder of Henry IV. of France.]

May 8. The lord treasurer, in an eloquent speech, as the Journals express it, not without some sensible passion, in regard of the matter which he was to deliver, and of the weighty consequence depending thereon, reported to the house: "That the French king, having on Thursday last crowned his queen, and on Friday having been at the palace, and returning from thence to the Louvre, accompanied with three nobles, as he sat with his back towards the end of the coach, passing through a narrow lane, was, at the turning, slain by a base fellow with a long knife. He declared the manner of his murder, as he had received the news of it, but the truth of circumstances he left to further intelligence. His lordship then discoursed on the exceeding virtues and vices of the dead king; and, that at his death, he had a great army in readiness: that he was an assured friend to the king their sovereign, and to this realm; and an especial defence and wall between the reformed religion and its opposites in Christendom. He then shewed them what cause they had to fear many inconveniences by this loss; and, lastly, he told them the great necessity there was to provide treasure before-hand against all chances."—To this declaration the lord treasurer added a motion, That a message might be sent to the Lower House, which was agreed to, and the message was to this effect: "That their lordships had all this session found that the House of Commons bore great respect to theirs, and desiring likewise to keep up the good correspondence between them; as well knowing that both houses, though sitting in several places, yet make but one body and one great council, have thought good to acquaint them with an accident of great importance. And, because it was something rare, therefore their lordships desired that such and so many of the Lower House as they themselves shall select, may presently meet with certain of the Lords in the Painted Chamber." Answer was immediately returned, that the Commons would instantly attend them.

May 26. The Lords' Journals inform us, that the lord treasurer "took occasion to put the house in mind of the chief motive for calling this parl.; which he said, besides the celebration of prince Henry's creation, was to derive from the subject somewhat towards the upholding the state of this monarchy. In which, as his meaning was well understood, he doubted not but every man would put it forward. He also informed them, that the necessity of the Supply increased, and much time was spent; though notwithstanding there had not been gained of the Commons so much as to have a free intercourse of arguments, but only messages about it. Wherefore his lordship moved, "That a speedy Conference should be desired of the Lower House, not with hope, at this time, to gain what is wished, but to deliver to them the convenience and necessity of such a free conference. By which course, he conceived, the thing might be better infused and spread in that house, than if it was carried unto them by a person thereunto appointed. He further told the Lords, that he understood many of the Lower House were departed; and an injunction was laid on the remainder not to conclude any new thing before the return of the others. Yet his lordship conceived there was a power left with these that remain to debate other matters; in which perhaps a persuasion may be wrought to such a conference as is desired." After this, it was resolved that a message should be sent to the Lower House to desire a Conference with their Committee on Tenures, &c. and answer was soon after returned, that the Commons agreed to this proposal. The chanc. of the excheq. who with others brought this answer, likewise informed their lordships, "That the Commons had well considered of the matter which did at this time concern the safety of his maj.'s person; and had thought good to propose unto them some things, in which they desire their lordships to join with them in Petition to his maj. 1. That Proclamation be made forthwith, that all Recusants, before the 2nd of June next, do avoid the city, and resort to such places where they are by law confined; and not to remain within ten miles of the city or court without licence. 2. That all Recusants be disarmed, and their arms disposed as the law requireth. 3. That no subject do resort to the house of any ambassador to hear mass. 4. That all Jesuits be imprisoned, and not permitted to have conference. 5. That the oath of allegiance be administered in the court, by the Lords and others of the Council, to all that ought to receive it, and in the country by the justices of peace."—Answer. "That the Lords will be ready to join with the Commons, in such a Petition to the king, when they can fix upon a proper method to do it."

After the messengers were withdrawn, the Lords went into consultation amongst themselves, how their Committee should act the next Conference about the Supply. And, it was agreed that the lord treasurer should open the matter to the Commons; and endeavour to shew them the difference between a free Conference and a dry meeting, and the likelihood of the former's succeeding. Next, to put them in mind of their first offer of 100,000*l.* per annum, wherein Purveyance was included; and if they desired to have that given up too, then they must enlarge their sum. Lastly, that though his maj.'s occasions are increased, since his demand of 200,000*l.* per annum, yet he was pleased to abate thereof, and therefore to wish the other side might advance. Of all which, if they were willing to debate, then his lordship was to shew what the king would fall to, and to deliver the opinion of the committee of this house which way it was to be raised. All the Lords to have liberty to speak to this matter in the debate, as well as the treasurer.

May 27th. The Lords presented a Petition, or Address to his maj. for the putting the laws in execution against Popish Recusants, &c. And on the 30th, the apb. of York reported his maj.'s Answer to it, That he took very graciously this motion of the Commons, in regard to his safety, as proceeding from their duty and love; and will, with all convenient speed, consider thereof. Accordingly, some few days after, a proclamation came out, commanding all Romish Priests, Jesuits, and Seminaries, to depart the kingdom by the 4th of July next; and all Recusants to return home to their dwellings, not to come within 10 miles of city or court, and to remain confined according to the statute, in that case provided.

Form of the creation of Henry Prince of Wales, &c. June 2nd. The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House of Lords, That it was his majesty's pleasure they should all attend in their robes at Whitehall; in order to be present at the Creation of the Prince of Wales, which was to be solemnized on the 4th of June. The Lords Journals have preserved the Form of this Creation; and as it is somewhat singular, we shall transcribe it from that authority.—"This day the Chamber, commonly called Whitehall, or the Court of Requests, was very richly hung from the upper end more than half down towards the lower end, where was set up a strong bar of timber thwart the room. In the highest part of the room was placed, for his maj. a sumptuous Cloth of Estate, and of either side scaffolds for Embassadors of foreign Countries. On each side against the walls were erected seats, one above another, for strangers and noble personages, with the lord mayor and his brethren in the midst. Upon forms and wool sacks did sit all the lords of parl. and the judges in their robes; and likewise the officers and attendants as on the days of sitting in parl. Below the bar was placed the Speaker's chair; forms on the ground, and seats on each side, one above another, fit and convenient to receive the whole House of Commons. His maj. being set under his Estate (for whose coming all the lords in their robes and seats, except such as attended his person and the prince, as also the Speaker, and all the lower house, did wait and attend;) the prince, his highness, honourably attended by divers noblemen, the knights of the Bath, officers at arms, and his own servants, entered in at the nether end of the house, and was with great state and solemnity brought up to the foot-path before the king; where kneeling at the first, and then standing, his highness was, with all due ceremonies, created Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester; and a patent thereof first read by the lord treasurer, principal secretary of his maj. and afterwards delivered to him. Which done, and all ceremonies finished which thereunto appertain, the prince, his highness, in great state and magnificence, some little time after the king's maj. departed the court at Whitehall."

June 7th. The parl. met again, by adjournment; and the same day the lord chancellor, in a grave speech, declared to the House of Lords, "That the great care which their lordships and the lower house had for his maj.'s safety, had produced a Proclamation, that contained a clause commanding all bps. justices of assize, justices of peace, and also all others of his maj.'s officers, whom it may concern, to minister the oath of allegiance, according to the laws. His lordship further told them, that according to the Petition of the two Houses, the lords of the council had already been sworn by the king himself, in the presence of the prince. That the lower house had generally taken the same oath; and that it was the king's pleasure, that the residue of the lords, spiritual and temporal, should do the like." This was immediately complied with, and all the lords present were sworn by 6 of the privy council, and the rest as they came to the house some days after; and the Oaths were likewise administered to different persons, both clergy and laity, all over the kingdom.

Farther Proceedings relating to Tenures, &c.] June 18th. A Message was sent by the Commons House to the Lords, importing, "That they now desired a free conference with their lordships, as soon as they pleased to appoint; and that their lordships should come prepared to give satisfaction to the Committee of the other House in 3 points, viz. "1. What more the Lords would offer unto the Commons to be considered of, above the ten things already proposed, and above that which they of that house have thought on to be given by way of retribution? 2. That the Lords would deliver unto them the lowest price of those things which they shall have to contract for. 3. What course may be taken, and what projects their lordships will propound, for levying that which shall be given, otherwise than upon the lands?"—The Lords took some time to consider of this Message, because, as they sent word to the Commons, the king was to be consulted about it; and they appointed a committee to wait upon his maj. accordingly. The king was not over hasty in giving an Answer to a matter of that great consequence; and it was not till June 26th, that the lord treasurer reported his maj.'s Answer to the Lords on the three points above given. To the first he said, 1. "That he durst so far put confidence in the Lords of the Committee deputed by this House, that he would leave in them an implicit trust to treat of whatever may tend to the good and ease of the subject, without touching his honour, or taking that from him which he may not spare. 2. To the 2nd, his maj. is pleased to set a price, as is desired, but he requireth to have one night's respite more, to sleep on it; and this day he would send his Answer and good pleasure, in writing, before the conference. 3. To the last point, his maj. leaveth and doth repose trust in the Lords to propose, answer and dispute, as they shall think good and see occasion."—To this Answer which the lord treasurer delivered, the lord privy seal added, "That his maj. was likewise pleased to require the Lords in this conference, to consider that they are all Peers and equal with the Council; and that accordingly, they will have equal and like respect and care of the service and be 'pares in onere,' also."

Further Proceedings on Matters of Grievances and Impositions.] We are now left in the dark, by the Journals, in what was further done at these Conferences, till the 9th of July, when we find a Memorial entered, as that day, in these words:—"Mem. 'quod die Martis 10 die Julii, 1610, in the afternoon, as well the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, as the Speaker and the whole House of Commons, attended his maj. in the great room or chamber, called the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, the prince and the duke of York being then also present; where, after his maj. had vouchsafed, very princely, to declare, in general, his intent concerning such Impositions, as the Commons, by their Grievances, lately exhibited unto him, and had complained of. And the lord treasurer having likewise by his maj.'s commandment, opened more particularly, in a long and exact speech, the nature and quality of these impositions, with the cause and order of raising the same; (which his lordship affirmed to have been chiefly done before himself was treasurer, by advised council, first taken, and by divers conferences, first had with many of the principal merchants of all companies, and with their assent and allowance, and not to be in that kind burthensome, as generally is conceived.) His maj. was then pleased, in a second Speech, to remember that he received from the Commons their Grievances but on Saturday last, so as this being Tuesday, there hath been only two days past; and therefore to all their Grievances they might not, at that time, expect satisfaction; howbeit, to some of them, they should presently receive his Answers; which, being formally put in writing, by direction, his maj. commanded the clerk of the parl. openly and distinctly, to read; which accordingly was done, and were as follows, viz.

Grievance. "Imposition of 1s. upon the chaldre of sea Coals." Ans. There was never any Imposition laid upon the sea coals of Blyth and Sunderland, by the king's authority; but it being conceived that they were members of Newcastle, (and so within their composition) they were only mentioned in some letters patents with the town of Newcastle. But, it appearing that they were things distinct, let the said pretended Impositions be laid down, and no more taken.—Grievance. "Exaction for sealing of new drapery." Ans. The king hath received no knowledge of any abuse of the said patent; and if any complaint hath been made unto his maj.'s courts, he doubteth not but justice hath been done; and it is his maj.'s express will that all such abuses, upon due complaint, be reformed. And, for the right and validity of the said patent, his maj. understandeth that there is a suit depending, wherein the same is brought in question, which hath been divers days solemnly argued on both sides, and is now ready for judgment, wherein his maj. requireth the court to proceed with all expedition.—Grievance. “Imposition upon Alehouses.” Ans. The intent of that ordinance was matter of reformation, because alehouses did multiply over much by the favour of licences; and for the profit it was but an incident which his maj. least regarded; and that it might be done by law, it was warranted by the opinion and advice of the lord Popham, and the principal judges of the land; who, upon conference with others, maintained that referring the power of licences to the justices of the peace, by the statute, was not privative to the king's power in that case. But, seeing it is a thing so much desired to be removed, and especially since it seemed to breed a jealousy in his loving subjects of a precedent of imposing payment upon them within the land; let it be laid down and no more taken.—

Grievance. “Monopoly of licence of Wines, upon the advantage of old and impossible laws.” Ans. The law, though old, as they affirm, yet was still in force; and it seemeth the Commons, (if they will remember some of their late proceedings) would be loath to disclaim making use of old laws. Nevertheless, at their prayer (saving the patent which they themselves acknowledge to have been made in favour of so great a person and of so great desert) his maj. is content a law be passed for restraining any such licence to be made in time to come.”

These concessions of the king make it appear that hitherto he was willing to keep on good terms with his parl.; and, though small in themselves, in comparison of the larger demands of the Commons, yet they seem to pave the way for a perfect union between them. It is certain what the king was desired to part with, were things, some of them, that had been transmitted to him through a long series of his predecessors; and others which had been set up, or laid on, in the reigns since the Reformation, and particularly in the last. Who the person was, mentioned in a parenthesis of the last Answer, is uncertain; it seems to be either the prince or the duke of York; for George Villiers, afterwards duke of Buckingham, did not make his appearance at court till near 5 years after this period.

We may suppose that these Answers from the king met with a favourable reception by the Commons; for, though the Journals do not express so much, yet some few days after, the bill of Supply was sent up by them, consisting of one entire Subsidy and one 15th and 10th from the temporality.

The King offers to accept of 200,000l. yearly, in lieu of Tenures, &c.] July 17th. The lord treasurer reported to the House of Lords, “That himself, and some other lords, not as members of parl. but as persons otherwise interested in the king's service, did the night before acquaint his maj. with the effect of a conference held that afternoon, between the Committees of both Houses; and that he had got the king's Resolution on the matter, under his hand, which was also to be imparted to the Commons, and which he read to the Lords in these words:

“James R. Right trusty and well-beloved cousins: Having understood what hath passed in your Conference with our Lower House, and perused the Memorial of your desires; we are now determined to answer you, in the point of the Price, as it shall appear in whose heart sincerity is lodged. Of the particulars newly come to the press, we presume you have so well remembered what to impart to your fellows, as it shall appear to them what opinion we have of their respect to our honour, and how loth we would be for money to contract for those things with which just and gracious princes have been used to bind their subjects. In the which we do promise, on the word of a king, (whereof God is witness, to whom all hearts be open) that howsoever those that cannot judge of a king's heart may feed themselves with false fears and jealousies, that prince liveth not that more desireth to derive strength from his subjects than we do. And therefore, after you have laid before them, how strange it is to us to be pressed in so many things which have been left to the grace of princes; wherein we mean no more to vary from the ancient greatness of our progenitors, than they who are our subjects can be content to do, who press still in all their speeches to live ‘more majorum:’ you shall take the liberty, in our name, to accept the sum of 200,000l. yearly, for all these things which we have offered before, or have now vouchsafed to part with to you and them. In all which, we doubt not but you will make it appear how far we are contented to borrow of ourselves, for satisfaction of our loving subjects. And so we bid you farewell. From Theobald's, July 16, 1610.” Superscribed, “To our right trusty and right well-beloved cousins, and to our right trusty and well-beloved the Lords of the Higher House of Parliament.”

This written Message from the king, being imparted to the other house, it produced more conferences between the committees appointed to settle the affair, called now the Great Contract between king and people. July 19, the Committee of the Lords proposed to the Commons, That the king might have security in land for the 200,000l. per annum; and that some Ordinance or Entry may be made, before the recess of the House, which may both bind the king and them to the Contract, which their lordships conceive to be already concluded; especially since time will not now serve to have it pass into an act.

July 21st. The lord treasurer acquainted the Lords, That he had received from the Committee of the Lower House a Memorial, containing the substance of the most material points in the Great Contract with his maj. and read the same to the house. Ordered, “That the like instrument should be drawn, as their lordships assent unto the said Contract; wherein the same power and liberty should be reserved to his maj. and to the Lords, as the Commons had, by the said Memorial, reserved to themselves; and therein the same words to be expressed, viz: 'addendo, minuendo, interpretando, &c.'

July 23rd. The lord treasurer read to the Lords a draught of a Memorial, penned by his lordship, according to their last order; which was approved of by the whole house. And it was ordered, that both the Memorials should be registered in the Journal Books of that house. And, on that day in the afternoon, the king and prince came to the house; and, after hearing a speech from the Speaker of the Commons to his maj. on presenting the Subsidy Bill, and other bills, the king himself was pleased to make a short speech to both houses, (but full of learning and princely wisdom, as the Journal expresses it) to this effect:—"He first told them, That the time was so far spent, that it was a sufficient excuse for him to speak without preamble; therefore he put them in mind, that at their last attending of him at Whitehall, he then, by his own mouth, promised them that he would, before the breaking up of this session, give them Answer to such other of their Grievances as they of the Lower House had presented unto him, and which then he did forbear to answer." Then the clerk was commanded to read his maj.'s most gracious Answers to the Grievances aforesaid, which were as follow:

But before we give this long account of Grievances and Answers, as they are entered in the Lords' Journals, it is proper to look back into the proceedings of this session, in which, besides the Subsidy Bill, 6s. in the pound, granted by the Clergy, was also confirmed. After the reading of the following Memorial, which was done, by his maj.'s command, to both Houses, the lord chancellor, by another command, prorogued this parl. to the 16th of Oct. next ensuing.

"His Majesty's Answers, delivered to the whole assembly of both Houses, July 23rd, 1610, unto certain Grievances formerly delivered to his Majesty, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the Commons House of Parliament."

"Touching the execution of the laws of this our realm made against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, their Receivers, and all other Popish Recusants, we have so sufficiently expressed our care and resolution in our writings, and in our late Proclamation; as also in our late Speech concerning this point, as we shall not need to give any further or more particular answer in that behalf.—There hath never been hitherto any particular Church in the world (for ought that we have read or heard) that hath allowed such ministers to preach in it as have refused to subscribe to the doctrine and discipline settled in it, and maintained by it; and hereof the reformed churches in France do yield a fresh example, who have and do

daily require subscription to the Articles of their Synods, though very many in number; nevertheless, as in our own princely judgment we ever intended to make some distinction between the persons and dispositions of the deprived and silenced ministers, in regard of better hope of conformity in some than others, although they be in the same degree offenders by our laws; so we shall be pleased, when we know the numbers, the names, and qualities of these for whom this Petition is made, to take such order in that behalf, as in our princely wisdom we shall hold most fit and convenient for the good and peace of the Church.—Although never any Christian king had in greater detestation the covetous and immoderate heaping of many benefices together, especially where the neglect of the Cure is joined therewith; yet it cannot be expected at our hands, that we should in this, more than in any other cases, abridge any of our loving subjects of that which they have in express words granted unto them by the laws of this our realm; or if we might lawfully in this case so do, yet we should not hold it convenient, until some farther provision be made, that the Benefices of this realm might be made competent Livings for godly ministers and learned preachers; and that with some difference in proportion answerable to their gifts and merits. In the mean while, the number of ministers now qualified to enjoy two Benefices, with Cure, will be greatly diminished, if such as have power to qualify would abate the number of their chaplains allowed them by law, as we are resolved for that cause to abate our's; besides, we will lay strict charge upon the bishops, under pain of our displeasure, that such ministers as either now have, or hereafter shall have, two Benefices, with Cure, shall carefully observe the 41st and 47th Constitutions, confirmed by us, An. 1603, whereby it is provided, that every such parson as hath two Benefices shall (where he doth not reside) maintain a preacher, lawfully allowed, that is able sufficiently to teach and instruct the people in his absence; and in case the bishop, upon complaint made unto him, shall neglect his duty in taking order with such as have ingrossed Benefices into their hands, or shall not have provided for the serving of the Churches with sufficient preachers in their absence, upon information given thereof to ourselves, we shall make it appear how much we dislike such neglect, and how much we tender a reformation in such cases.—By occasion of the Conference at Hampton-Court, in the beginning of our reign, and upon some other complaints, our Clergy, by our direction, made a Constitution with a condition which we confirmed, wherein they shewed themselves very willing to forbear the censure of excommunication for contumacy, where the original cause was of no great weight, and of private interest, so as there might be a law made whereby contumacy in such cases might otherwise be sufficiently punished. And accordingly they caused a bill to be drawn for that purpose, and exhibited unto the Lower House, which found no passage there; nevertheless, when such a bill shall be hereafter agreed upon as may enable our Ecclesiastical Judges condignly to punish the said contempts in the causes mentioned, otherwise than by excommunication, and so produce the reformation which is so much desired, we shall be pleased to give our royal assent unto it, so as it shall rest in our hands to effect that which is desired.—Touching the Inconvenience and dangerous extent of the statute 1 Eliz. cap. 1. our approved care for the well ordering of Ecclesiastical Courts and Causes, ought to banish from the conceits of our loving subjects, all needless and imaginary fears; nevertheless, we are pleased to assure them, by our royal promise, that our Ecclesiastical Commissions shall not be directed to singular persons, but to such a number of commissioners, and them so selected, as the weight of such causes doth require; and that no definitive sentence be given or pronounced by such our commissioners under the number of 7 of them, sitting in court, or 5 at the least, and that only in case of necessity. And further, that we shall not take advantage by any power given us by that statute, to grant forth any Forms of Commissions extending further than to imprisonment, and reasonable fine: and likewise that we shall restrain such our several Commissions to the number of 2, the one for the province of Canterbury, and the other for that of York; besides we are resolved to establish an Order touching the use and practice of our said Commissions, as that none of our loving subjects shall be drawn from remote places, either to London or York, except it shall be for such exorbitant offences as are fit to be made exemplary, and for the enumeration of Ecclesiastical Causes in particular; and as it is a matter full of difficulty, so it is needless, as we suppose, considering that they are already so limited and confined, that no ancient Canons or Spiritual Laws are in force, that are either contrary to the laws or customs of this realm, or tend to the damage or hurt of our prerogative royal.—For the Grievances apprehended in the Commission. First, a Sovereign King, being ‘mixta persona,’ and having authority, as well in causes ecclesiastical as temporal, it was with great wisdom ordained, matters of the Church being many ways impugned, and the censures of it grown into contempt, that there should be a Commission, consisting as well of temporal as ecclesiastical persons, who might have power for one offence at one time, and by one sentence, to inflict, as there should be cause, both a spiritual and temporal punishment. But as to the Enquiry by Juries, it hath not, for many years, been practised, and we are content that hereafter it be omitted in our Commission. And concerning Appeals, the use hath always been to exclude them in Commissions of this nature; and yet if any of our subjects shall be justly grieved with any sentence given by our commissioners, we shall be content as we find just cause, to grant unto them a Commission of Review: also for the Execution of divers Statutes aimed at in your Grievances, although it hath been from time to time committed, in some sort, unto our commissioners; and that every such Commission hath been stiled and penned by the attorney-general, with the advice of the chiefest temporal judges; yet we are well pleased, and will give commandment accordingly, that our temporal and ecclesiastical judges, assisted with our learned council, shall confer together, concerning the exceptions by you taken, to the end that hereafter our said commissioners may have no further power to intermeddle with the execution of any part of the said statute, than it shall be found fit for our service, necessary for the suppressing of Popery and Schism, and no ways repugnant to the laws and policy of this our kingdom. But for making any Innovations in the Forms and Proceedings heretofore used by our said Commissioners, we know no cause to depart therein from the example of our progenitors, nor from that which the laws of this our kingdom hath approved; and touching Fees, since it is a Court by statute erected, and no fees in the statute expressed, it was very fit that the commissioners should have authority to limit and appoint to every officer his reasonable fees, and we will commend the further care thereof to some principal persons of our Commission to take a view of them; and as to reform what they find amiss, so to establish such as shall be moderate and reasonable.—Touching the Grievances found in the execution of the Commission, we know that there is no Commission nor Court, either of ecclesiastical or temporal jurisdiction, but may be subject more or less to abuse in the execution of their authority; nevertheless, it is our part to have our ear open to receive complaints of that kind, especially from our parl. when we shall find them to be just; and therefore our purpose is to see such reformation to be made of all abuses in the execution of the said Commission, as may best procure the ease of our subjects from charge or vexation, and such punishment to be inflicted on Pursuivants, or other inferior Ministers, which shall be offenders, as may repress such misdemeanors in time to come.—It is our princely care and office to uphold and maintain all the Courts of Justice, both ecclesiastical and temporal, within this our realm; that none of them encroach upon the other, but keep itself within the true bounds and limits thereto appertaining. Neither is it unknown (we suppose) to the whole realm, what pains we have already taken to that end; and we propose (God willing) therein to persist, until we shall settle a certain order as well concerning Prohibitions, as the incidents thereunto belonging, that no one of our courts may be prejudiced by another. And that (all late inventions and novelties on all sides eschewed) Prohibitions may freely proceed from such courts, in such causes and in such form, as by the ancient laws of the realm hath been accustomed. And touching Writs of Habeas Corpus, and Homine Replegiando, our pleasure is, that they be granted according to law.—Although we know well that by the constitutions of the frame and policy of this kingdom, proclamations are not of equal force, and in like degree as laws; yet, nevertheless, we think it a duty appertaining to us, and inseparably annexed to our crown and regal authority, to restrain and prevent such mischief and inconveniences as we see growing in the commonwealth, against which no certain law is extant, and which may tend to the great grief and prejudice of the subjects, if there should be no remedy provided until a parl. which prerogative our progenitors have in antient, as well as later times, used and enjoyed. But if sithence the beginning of our reign, Proclamations have been more frequent than in former times, or have extended further than is warranted by law, we take it in good part to be informed thereof by our loving subjects, and take it to heart as a matter of great consequence; and therefore we will have Conference with our Privy Council, and with our Judges and learned Council, and will cause such our proclamations as are past, to be reformed where cause shall be found; and for future time will provide that none be made but such as shall stand with the former laws or statutes of the kingdom, and such as in cases of necessity our progenitors have, by their prerogative royal, used in times of the best and happiest govt. of this kingdom.—Our desire is, that all our subjects universally may be governed by the laws that make best for the peace and quiet of the country where they live, and whereby justice may be equally and speedily administered, as well to poor as rich, with least charge and expence; and for those 4 counties for which suit is now made to have them exempted from the jurisdiction of our council in Wales, and the marches of the same, we conceive it to be a matter of very great importance; for it tendeth to the alteration of a settled state of govt. continued by the space of many years, in the times of divers kings and queens, our predecessors, advised by as wise and judicious privy counsellors, and executed and put in use ever since the making of the statute 34 Hen. VIII. that gave strength to the govt. by many as grave, rev. and learned Judges as this realm ever had, who lived at and nearest the time of the said statute, and therefore best understood the sense and meaning of it. Therefore we find our crown, upon so good grounds, so long possessed of that form of govt. in those parts; and having holden one constant course, ever sithence our coming, to keep the state of all affairs of this realm, and especially of justice and govt. the same we found; to the end there might, in a manner, be no shew of change by us (which hath been justly observed as an apparent mark of God's blessing upon us and our kingdom) we have retained and continued still the same govt. in those counties, with fit moderation by your last Instructions; holding it both just and convenient, as well for those as all other parts whereunto it is applied. Nevertheless we will take time, and inform ourself of all things that may lead our judgment to the best ordering of a cause of so great weight and consideration, and will thereupon resolve and do as we shall find answerable to justice and policy of state, which cannot be separated; always professing for the satisfaction of our loving subjects in general, that as we are and ought to be slow to put down or alter those Courts and Governments, which the wisdom of former times hath established; so we are firmly resolved never to erect in any other parts of the realm, any like courts, or provincial Councils, except it be by assent of parl. and for full assurance thereof, we will yield to any security that by act of parl. shall be reasonably devised."

"Die Martis 26 Junii, 1610.—If any Body Politic or Corporate, or other person or persons, or any from or under whom they claim, have had possession, and been reputed owners by the space of 60 years, and neither the king nor his progenitors, nor any other for him or them have had possession, by taking of profits by the space of one whole year, without interruption, within 60 years, the king's title before that time shall be extinguished; and such possessor or reputed owner of the inheritance shall hold the inheritance against the king's maj. his heirs and successors; and against his patentees, and all claiming from, by or under him or them, or any of his progenitors; and if the king's maj. or his progenitors, have been in possession only of a rent reserved upon arrentation of Assarts, or waste grounds in forests or other lands, or upon some grants in fee-farm; and any Body Politick or Corporate, or other person, have enjoyed the lands, tenements, or hereditaments for which such rent is paid, by the space of 60 years and more, as his own proper soil and inheritance, the king's maj. his heirs and successors, shall enjoy the said rent only; and the reputed owners shall hold the inheritance according to the several reputed estates; and all others claiming or pretending title under any that shall gain the inheritance against the king by this law, either for years, life, entail, or for other estate, either at the common law, or according to the custom of any manour, shall hold and enjoy the same, according to their former supposed estate.—And, it was thought reasonable that some course be thought upon, concerning such as pay the king any rents for land, as chief lord, or otherwise, having had, by the space of 60 years or more the freehold and inheritance of the said lands in themselves, or such from whom they claim that claim, that by colour of such rent received, the king should not be entitled to the inheritance.—And, that some course may be taken for limitation of entries, and actions of rights, and titles of lands belonging to the Duchy of Cornwall, principality of Wales, and counties of Chester and Flint; and, namely, that some provision be made for it in the patent now shortly to be passed to the Prince of Wales, that such as have been reputed of the inheritance and had possession above 60 years, shall not be impeached."

"Patentees to be concluded, in like sort, as if the estate had still remained in the King.—

1. That Letters Patents of his maj. his heirs and successors, and other his progenitors, not heretofore made void by judgment, or such entry as hath been made known by one year's continuance of possession, shall be continued, and taken most beneficially for the patentees, their heirs and assigns; in case any estate of inheritance be passed, and for the patentee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to whom any lease hath or shall be made, according to the purport of the said letters patents or lease; and no other exposition to be made of any patent, grant, or lease, of the king, or his progenitors, but such as the law makes in grants, and leases, made by common persons, any collateral matter, common rule, or maxim to the contrary notwithstanding.—2. And that all Letters patents, grants or leases, from henceforth shall be expounded, constructed, taken or adjudged, to pass all rights, titles, estates, and interests, whatsoever the king at the time of the said letters patents made, might have passed as king or duke; and that such grants as have been made under the Duchy-Seal of Lancaster, of land reputed Duchy-Lands, by the space of 60 years, shall be good notwithstanding the king have any other title hereunto, in right of his crown or otherwise. 3. That the king or any patentee of the king, his heirs or successors, shall not take any forfeiture of his estate for non payment of rent, but only shall have a penalty of double the rents; but that the lessee shall enjoy his estate against the patentees as he did under the king; and that leases made upon suggestion of surrenders, may not be overthrown for defects or imperfections of or in the surrender, or for want of surrender. 4. The subject upon every information of instruction be admitted to plead the general issue, "not guilty;" and not be forced to any special plea; neither shall any Injunction in respect of such plea be granted, to turn him out of possession, having had possession by the space of one year before. 5. The point concerning penal laws and informers, shall be ordered as shall be most for the benefit and ease of the subjects, preserving the force of the law, and a course to be established for the due execution thereof, and inflicting the penalty. 6. All purveyance and takings for his maj.'s use, the queen, the prince, and all other the king's children, and for all offices, courts, councils, and societies whatsoever, to be utterly taken away, as well purveyance and taking of household, stable, navy, servants, labourers, and all other provisions; and also, for carts, horses, and carriages, both by land and water; and, generally, all purveyances and takings for whomsoever, whatsoever, of what name or nature soever, to be for ever extinguished; the composition for the same to be all dissolved and released; the clerk of the market, and all others, to be disabled for setting any prices; the power and prerogative of pre-emption to be determined not intending hereby the pre-emption of Tin. What regard shall be had to the merchant-stranger in this point, to be left to further consideration. 7. That his maj. would be pleased to pardon, release, and discharge all old debts, due to him or any of his progenitors, before the 30th Eliz.

and that hereafter every subject, sued or molested for any debt due to his maj. or his progenitors, or that shall grow due to his heirs, may plead that the same debt became due to the king or his progenitors, by the space of 10 years past; and that the same in the mean time hath not been sued for in any of the king's courts, and that the same appearing to be true or so proved, shall be a good plea in bar. 3. All pre-fines, and post-fines due upon alienation, by fine or recovery, to be taken away."

"16th July, 1610.—That where any man shall be outlawed, at the suit of a common person, before judgment or after, the plaintiff first, and all others after him in order as they desire, all may be paid their just debts out of the forfeiture grown to the king, before the king or any other take any advantage of such forfeiture. In like manner, in all attainders of felony and treason, all creditors to be satisfied for their just debts, out of the estates of the persons attainted. That the clause in the stat. 34 and 35 Hen. VIII. by which the king hath power to alter the laws for Wales and make new, be repealed."

"In the interim till our next Access:—No man to be questioned or troubled for any land upon defective titles, either upon pretence that the patent is void, or for assart lands, and such like, which have had long possession and no patent. No man to be questioned for land gained by the sea, be it ancient or new. No concealed ward to be sought after, nor any to be questioned, after the death of whose ancestors an office hath not been found within 10 years. No man to be questioned for old debts; nor alienations without licence; nor be confined to plead his licence, or title, or tenure, in the exchequer."

"18th July, 1610.—1. That whereas the House of Commons have already, among their Grievances, preferred a petition to his maj. as of right and justice, that the 4 English counties may have a trial by law, concerning their inheritance to the common laws of this realm, and so to be exempted from the jurisdiction of the President and Council of Wales (a matter wherein the whole realm is deeply interested), notwithstanding, upon occasion of this great Contract, the Commons doth humbly petition to his maj. as of grace, that without further suit, trial, or trouble, those counties may be restored to that their ancient right, the same being no way prejudicial to his maj.'s honour, in point of sovereignty (as we conceive), as being alike to his maj. in which of his courts his subjects have their trials; and in profit much less: but rather being a matter of greater benefit to his maj. in the duties due for suits in his Courts at Westminster, and to his maj.'s loving subjects there, it will be a matter of great comfort, and of enabling them the better to perform their part of this Contract, by easing them of much causeless vexation and charges, which in trifling suits they now bear and endure. 2. The king to be bound upon demurrers, to express the cause of demurrer for form, as the subject is by the stat. 27th Eliz. 3. Petition to be made to his maj. to grant out Commissions, to declare the just and due fees of all the courts and offices in this realm, so far forth as they are to be paid by the subject; as they to be reduced into a book and printed. 4. His maj. also to be petitioned to appoint some to make a diligent survey of all the penal statutes of this realm, to the end that such as are obsolete or unprofitable may be repealed; and this for the better ease and certainty of the subject; all such as are profitable concerning one matter, may be reduced into one statute to be passed in parl. 5. The Lords to join with the Commons in Petition to his maj. for recompence to be made by his maj. to all such officers of courts, as are damnified by this Contract in point of Tenures."

"20th July, 1610.—6. His maj. to be petitioned that he will be pleased to grant no Protections contrary to law. That the extent of every article that is decreed for the good of the Commons in this great Contract with his maj. should be expounded and explained in all causes doubtful, by the Commons, according to their true meaning. Reservation to be made of further addition at the next session, of any proposition within the bounds agreed on; viz. not to impair his maj.'s honour, in point of sovereignty, nor to diminish his estate, in matters of profit, without recompence for the same."

"21st July, 1610.—Answer to the Lords' 3 Propositions, viz. 1. What assurance his maj. shall have of 200,000l. yearly revenue? Answer. Not having resolved yet whereupon to raise this revenue, nor in what manner to levy it, thus much we are resolved of, That it shall be stable and certain to his maj. and convenient for his maj.'s officers to receive and gather it.—2. What matter of content in the interim shall be brought down into the country? Answer. 1st, to the meaner sort, the assuring them that nothing shall be levied upon their ordinary victuals, viz. bread, beer, and corn, nor upon their handy labours. 2dly, to the better sort, the view of these things, which in lieu of that sum we shall receive from his maj. whereof copies to be taken down by such as please. 3rdly, in general to all, his maj.'s gracious Answer to our Grievances.—3. What course now for the settling of this great Contract and proceeding in it? Ans. First of all, we proceed now, by addition of some more Articles, which, together with the former, in one entire copy, we will present to the Lords. 2dly, for the settling of it at our return to find it as we leave it, we will enter in our book, 1. What we have demanded, viz. these Articles. 2. What we have resolved to give therefore to his maj. viz. 200,000l. by the year. 3. The security to be by act of parl. in as strong sort as can be devised. 4. The manner of levying it to be in such sort as may be secure to his maj. and in the most easeful and contentful sort to the subject, as by both houses of parl. can be devised."

"Memorial concerning the Great Contract with his Maj. touching Tenures, with the Dependents, Conveyance, &c. conceived by the direction of the Lords of the Higher House of Parliament, viz.

"Whereas the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Lower House of parl. have this day, by committee, delivered to the Lords Committees of this House, a Memorial by them conceived and put in writing, containing certain Articles concerning the great Contract with his maj. which during this session hath long and often been in speech and debate between their lordships and them, as well on his maj.'s behalf, as for the interest of their lordships, and of the said knights, citizens, and burgesses; by which Contract they are tied to assure unto his maj. his heirs and successors, the sum of 200,000*l.* in yearly revenue, in satisfaction of the great yearly profits which his maj. hath or may make, as well in respect of the wardships of the bodies and lands of his subjects, and all other incidents to Tenures, as of the benefit arising by post-fines, defective titles, assarts, and many other immunities and privileges, together with the extinguishing of purveyances, (all tending to the profit and ease of his maj.'s subjects), in the conclusion whereof there is this clause inserted, viz. 'that the extent of every Article that is desired for the good of the commons, in this great Contract with his maj. should be explained and expounded in all clauses doubtful, by the Commons, according to their true meaning.' And whereas at the presenting of the same Memorial, it was also delivered in the name of the Lower House, by sir Edwyn Sandys, that, notwithstanding the said clause inserted, it was not intended to make any question of the price, or of any main part of the Contract, because they were agreed in the substance; but only to receive some liberty for the exposition of the extent of some branches, which contained those requests which they had made under that liberty; (which his maj. gave them to propound such other things as should not derogate from his honour or profit) in all which they desired also, by the mouth of sir Edwyn Sandys, to retain liberty, 'addendo, minuendo, et interpretando.' And, whereas it was also delivered by the gent. aforesaid, that the Lower House were resolved, at the end of this, to deliver a clear Answer; that is to say, concerning the king's assurance, though for the manner of levy, they had not yet taken the same into consideration in the absence of their fellows; yet of this one thing they did desire their lordships to remain assured, that it was their full intention and resolution that his maj.'s revenue, depending upon this Contract, should have these two qualities; one that it should be a revenue firm and stable; another that it should not be difficult in the levy. In both which they assured themselves, they did fully answer the meaning of that speech which made mention of Terra Firma. And, forasmuch, as the knights and burgesses of the Lower House, have also acknowledged (and that most truly) that they did always understand themselves bound to limit themselves, so carefully, in all things which they have sought for, or shall do, not being particularly expressed at the time that they did accept of the price, as not to demand or expect any condition, whereby his maj. should lose either honour or profit, as aforesaid. The Lords also who are likewise in their own particular estates and possession, (beside the care of the public good) no less interested in the said great Contract than they, and by their eminent places and degrees, are more strictly bound to take care of those things which do particularly concern the honour and revenue of the Crown than others are, have now, upon good advice and deliberation, thought fit and necessary, not only to acknowledge their personal consent to the substantial parts of this Contract, but with the privity of his maj. as an argument of his consent, given order likewise for an entry to be made of the same Memorial, in manner as is aforesaid; that is to say, with the same reservation, which was verbally desired by them in these words; 'addendo, minuendo, et interpretando;' and, with that reservation which is contained in the latter clause of their Memorial, viz. 'That the extent of every Article, that is desired for the good of the Commons, in this great Contract with his maj. should be expounded and explained in all causes doubtful, by the Lords of the Higher House, for the good of his maj. and themselves.'

In this situation did this Grand Affair, between the king and the people, stand at the end of the last session; and, by the Demand of the subject and the monarch's Answer, it seemed as if a Contract might have been concluded at their next meeting. The Commons, in this last session, had bartered long for 180,000*l.* per annum to be paid the king for these liberties; and at last came up to the price demanded (200,000*l.*) but it was all to no effect. The same parl. met again on the 16th of Oct. the time limited by the last prorogation. But we have now no other authority to go by, for the proceedings of the ensuing session, than the Lords Journals; those of the Commons being lost.

The Great Contract relating to Tenures, &c.] Oct. 23d. The business of the Great Contract was resumed by the Lords, who, as their Journals express it, thought good to begin with the greatest and most weighty matter now depending in deliberation; concerning, as well Tenures, with their dependants, as Purveyors and other things; in the state that affair was left at the breaking up of the last session. Their lordships agreed to send a Message to the Commons to desire a conference, by committees of both houses, in order to bring this weighty business to a happy conclusion. Answer was returned that they accepted of the Proposal, and Oct. 25th was appointed for that purpose. Afterwards, on the lord chancellor's motion, it was ordered, That all the Lords then in town, and not present, should be warned and required by the house to give their personal attendance, on that day at the hour fixed, which was between 9 and 10 in the morning. At the time appointed, there appeared in the house according to the list, 11 bps. 12 earls, 1 viscount, and 25 barons. The first thing they did was to name a Committee: next was read openly the Memorial, concerning the Great Contract, as it was given in the last session, by direction of the Lords; as also the other Memorial, which was delivered at the end of the last session by the Committee of the Commons. Then the lord chancellor put the lords in mind of the state of the business concerning the said Contract; and moved that their lordships would now give their advice what should be spoken that afternoon to the committee of the other house, touching the premisses, and by whom the same shall be delivered. And because this matter is of such great moment, his lordship wished the debate thereof might be by way of interlocution; to that purpose the house to be adjourned, and the Lords to sit as in a committee; which was generally approved and agreed to.

After a short adjournment, the House of Lords met again on the 30th. When their Lordships were informed by the lord chancellor, That Robert Bowyer, clerk of parl. had lately received, from the under-clerk to the Commons, a letter dated Oct. 27th in these words:

"Sir, I am, by order of the Commons House of parliament, directed to repair unto you, and to desire of you a true Copy of his Majesty's Answer to the Grievances of the subject, presented the last session of parl. as well the Answers to the first four, concerning matter of Profit, as the rest concerning matter of Government, answered the last day. The order is, that you are to subscribe your hand unto it, and to make it ready before Monday morning next, at which time there will be a special occasion of use for it. I am your very assured friend, Ra. Evans. Saturday, Oct. 27, 1610."

The Chancellor added, That the said clerk, in respect of his duty to this House, had forbore to satisfy the contents of the said letter; and had only returned for answer, That of himself he had no power or authority to make forth, or deliver Copies of that nature; but, at the next sitting of the Lords, he would acquaint their lordships with the said letter, and then be ready to do what they should command him.

This Answer was approved by the Lords; who, having considered of the matter, "Thought it both fit and reasonable that the Copy desired should be sent, authentickly, to the Lower House; because the matter and substance thereof equally concerned both houses; and was originally intended by his maj. to be imparted to all his loving subjects without distinction." But, their Lordships did not approve of this manner of demand; which should have been by motion to themselves, and not by a letter from an under clerk to the clerk of this House, or by any such order or direction as above. Notwithstanding this, as their wisdoms thought it not convenient, that, for this cause, the weighty business of this Great Contract with his maj. being now in treaty, and for which this session of parl. was chiefly held, should any way be in danger to suffer interruption, impediment, or delay; it was agreed to by all the Lords and ordered, "That the Clerk of this House should, by the leave of the house, send to the said clerk attending the Commons the Copy desired, under his hand, with an Answer to this purpose:"

"Upon receipt of your letter, I have this inst. 30th Oct. acquainted my lords of the Higher House of parl. therewithal. Whereupon, their lordships are well pleased and content that I shall send you, under my hand, that which is desired, which herewithal you receive accordingly. I rest your assured loving friend, Ro. Bowyer."

But, an Entry was ordered to be made in the Journal, with special caution and provision, that this particular be not at any time drawn or used as a precedent; but, that in all cases of like nature, hereafter happening, due course and care should be observed for preserving the honour, dignity, and privilege of that house.

The Parl. dissolved.] This condescension of the Lords to the Commons had not the wished for effect; for though the conferences began again between the two houses, about the Grand Contract, yet they came to no conclusion. The Journals give no account of any Report made from these committees, relating to that affair; and on the 6th of Dec. after two short adjournments, the parl. was prorogued by commission, to the 9th of Feb. ensuing. And, on that day, the lord chancellor produced another commission, from the king, by which he declared this parl. to be finally dissolved.—It is easy to see, by the abruptness of these proceedings, that the king and his parl. parted in no good humour with one another; but, since the Journals are silent, as to that matter, we must have recourse to the history of the times for an explanation. Wilson tells us, "That on the meeting of this session of parl. the members were willing to secure their allegiance to the king, out of piety; yet, they were so strict even in these youthful days, which he called obstinacy, that they would not obey him in his encroachments upon the public liberty which he began then to practice. For being now seasoned with 7 years knowledge in his profession here, he thought he might set up for himself; and not be still journeymen to the lavish tongues of men, that pryed too narrowly into the secrets of his prerogative, which are mysteries too high for them, being Arcana Imperii, fitter to be admired than questioned. But, the parl. were apprehensive enough, that these hidden mysteries made many dark steps into the people's liberties; and they were willing, by the light of law and reason, to discover what was the king's, what theirs: which the king unwilling to have searched into, after five sessions, in 6 years time, dissolved the parl. by Proclamation."—Our Historian has thought proper to mention this Proclamation, only, without giving us a copy of it: but we are beholding to the Continuator of Stowe's Chronicle for a genuine transcript of this act of state, which will fall very aptly in this place:

The King's Proclamation setting forth the Reasons of this Dissolution.] "Whereas the king's most excellent maj. continued this parl. together, longer than hath bin usual, or might well have stood either with his important affaires of state, or with the publicke business of three whole termes spent in the two last sessions; or with the occasions of the countrey, where the service and hospitalitie of many persons of qualitie hath beene missing, and divers shires, citties, and burrough townes have benee lvyrdened with allowances made to the knights and burgesses whom they imployed; besides the particular expense of the nobilitie and others attending that service. And all this in expectation of a good conclusion of some of those weighty causes, which have been there in deliberation, not only for the supply of the necessities of his majesties estate, but for the ease and freedom of his subjectes, in many things proposed by his majesty in parl. for differing and surpassing the favors and graces of former times, both in nature and value. His maj. hath now resolved (for preventing of further trouble of all those that would prepare themselves to be here against the time limited by the last prorogation) to declare by these presents that they shall not need to give their attendance at the day appoynted, for any service to be done as members of this parl.; because his maj. (for many good considerations known to himselfe) hath now determined to dissolve this parl. by his commission under his Great Seal of England. Dated, at Whitehall, 31st of Dec. 1610."

A new Parl. called.] No parl. was called till the year 1614, when writs were sent out, for one to meet at Westminster, on the 5th of April. The usual preliminaries at the meeting of a new parl. being settled, the king came down to the House of Lords, and being seated on the Throne, made the following Speech to both houses of parl.; the original of which is preserved in the Cotton Library:—

The King's Speech at opening the Session.] "It is the saying of the wyseste king that evere was, 'That the harte of kings weare inscrutable;' but in the laste parlements, I muste calle to your remembrance the comparisone I used, whearin I presented myselfe unto you as a mirrore, whearin you mighte cleerelye see the integretye of my purpos for our lengtheninge that parlements for the generall good and benefyte of the commonwelthe; but as I then sayd of the nature of a mirrore, that it mighte be deffyled by the eyes of the behoulderes, so did some of the lowere house looke uppon me with poluted eyes, and as I may saye, deffyled my mirrore; I canne saye no more nowe then I did then, but to offere you the same mirrore, to [looke to] protestyng as I shall answeare it to Almyghty God, that my integretye is like the whitnes of my roabe, my purety like the mettle of golde in my crowne, my firmnes and clearnes like the precious stones I weare, and my affectyones naturalle like the rednes of my harte.—Three important and weighty ends have caused me to caule this present assembly of the lords spirituall and temporall, the knights and burgeses representyng the bodye of my comones, which I muste divide into 3 parts and branches, 'Bona Animæ, Bona Corporis, & Bona Fortunæ,' Relygeon, Safety, and the Asystance of my subjectes, which are the true grounds of this and all well-intended parlements.—For relygione, which the philosopheres, with the glymering lighte of nature, caled Bona Animæ, I muste comend to your considerasones, the great increase of Poperie; notwithstandinge the assiduous labore I have bestowed, and the greate care I have ever manifested, as may witness both my penne and tonge, I think, with moare paynes than any of my predecessores; and for my zeal in private, not to vant of it, for avoydinge vayne glorye, yet I hope all my course of life and actyones will speake for me.—In this is to be considered the Cause and the Remedye; for the Cause, it is undoubtedlye impunitie which made them presume to so notorious declarasones of their increase, and their impunitie proceedethe from two reasones: first, some brainches of the lawes made to meet with them are so obscure, that I myself, with conference with my lords the judges, cannot cleere them; as I could instance in many particulers, that this time weare fite for it, as in the oathe of alleageance, to which many scruples have rissen, and are yet unresolved.—Secondlye, for want of due presentment in the contreye by the offyceres appoynted to it, according to the provisyone of the lawe; and in some places when presented, yet they are so favored by the justices of peace, that as a lieutenante of myne in one contreye hath informed me, he could not procure three of the peace, excepte some of his owne frends and servants, that woulde assiste him in the due execushone of my lawes. And this in the first place, I comend to your considerasones.—Not that I desire to make any newe or more rigorous lawes againste them; but that these may have execushone, which is the life of the lawe, and without it they are but deade words. I speake this not for my favore to them, but for consyense and pollesye.—For Consyense, to avoyde the scandalles which the Jesuites have ever caste uppon the late queene of famos memory, and uppon my governmente, that we have persecuted and taken bloode for relygeone, which I have evere disclaymed.—For Pollesye, sinse no state nor storie cane evidense that any relygeone or heresy was ever extirpated by violence or the sworde, nor have I ever judged it a waye of plantyng truthe. An example of this I take out of the booke of Jobe, wheare when many rigorouse counsels weare propounded, Gamaliel stood uppe and advised that, 'If that religion weare of God, it wold prospere; if that of man, it wold perishe of itselfe;' besyde mene are so prone to glorye in defendinge and sealinge their oppinyones with their bloode, that the prymityve churche, in one age, declyned into an affectashon of martirdome. And many heresy's hathe had his martires that hathe gone with the same alacretye, and desyre, and assurance, to the fyre, as those that have witnessed for the truthe have done.—The second and neareste consyderason, to the soule, relygeon, is the safty or 'bonum corporis,' which Lattyne hathe but one worde 'salus.' The principall safetie of this bodye consystes in the preservatione of the king and his issue, and this in preserving a due successyone.—Since the laste parleamente, God, for my synnes and the peoples, hath takene awaye one and the first braynch thearof, but as he gave me the afflyctyones of Jobe, so hathe he gevene me the petyense, and in the end the rewarde, another for him, a grand-child in his plase, onely the sayeng of Jobe inverted, 'The Lorde hathe geven, and the Lorde hathe takene,' I may say, the Lorde hath takene, and the Lorde hathe geven, yea, he hath geven me compensatyone, 'eodem genere,' a sonne for a sonne.—For the matche of my daughter, though I must saye, that besydes his many other good qualytyes, he is one whom for his persone I could asserete, of all that ever myne eyes beheld; yet, I made this matche only 'reipublice causa;' and for establisshement of religion and the comone-welthe have I sacrefysed my daughter. For the Comone-Welthe, that if my issue male shulde faile, you could have not only prynses borne of true Englishe and Scotts bloode, but norished with the mylke of the same pure relygeone you now professe.—For Relygeone, in some respect for her, that being younge and a woman, bothe subjecte to frailtye, I wold not delyver hir into the hande of the lyon, when I see so many strong and grounded champyones cannot resiste the cunning and spetiousnes of their perswasiones.—Besyde the Reasone of State takene from the mouthe of Henrye VIIIth. my ancestore, from whome I clayme my crowne, when he gave my great-grand-mother the lady Magarate to king James IVth. he sayd, 'Heare was no danger in the matche, for that the lesse wold never drawe the greater, but the greater the lesse;' and this rulle was approved by the providence of God, who gave no issue to the two Marys, my mother, and Mary of Englande, heires of his crowne, and marryed to France and Spayne two mightye kingdomes.—Thearfore, I desyre you to shewe your affectyones to my sonne in lawe, by some recognishone, that he may see hee is not helde as an aliene and unregarded among you, and to make a declarashon of the successhone of his issue, if God for our synnes wold take away my issue male.—To the 3rd pointe, which is bona fortunæ, as the safety or bonum corporis is the esse, so is this the bene-esse and moste necessarye to it.—The extraordinary charge I was at in this mariage, suche as I beleve was nevere greatere, which I did performe in the eyes of you all, for my honor and yours is not unknowre, howe by the deathe of my sonne, the mariage peing put of, I was constraigned to defraye my sonne in lawe and his trayne six monthes.—The great expense bothe by sea and lande for transportyng hir into a farre contraye, answerable to my honore and hers, and this kingdomes, cannot be forgotten by you. Yet if any objecte the aydes, I referre it to youre consyderashons and judgment, howe lytle it is, mesured by the tymes whearin it was firste granted and by this; every one of you feileth it in your fees of courte that are my servants, and in anntyente rente this change of tymes. Therefore, sinse reipublice causa, I have undergone this disbursement, it is the commonewelthes intereste to repair it.—Besydes many greate occasyones of expense, by entertainemente of forraine princes and ambassadors, the great and large Christmasses I have kept at my comyng to the crowne, the feare of Ireland, and the consyderashone of that newes bothe of peace and ware are many; I doubte not but your affectyones will holde some proporsyone with my wante.—But I muste be playne with you, I will deale no moare with you like a marchante, by waye of exchange, for every bargaine chete the lone. I will expect loving contribushone for loving retribushone, which is, 'suum cuique tribuere,' the sume of all justyce; and to take care bothe for your ease and preservasone.—To come to accompte with you how and what, it is too base for my qualletye; I will only prove what you will doe in your love, and what the people can spare with their ease; and notwithstanding my many straights, I have chosen to relye on your good affectyones rather than to streche my prerogatyves.—But first, I muste cleare some ruinos and aspersyones caste abroad by ill affectyones, that heare are some private undertakers uppon whome I dide relye, who with their credite or industerye, wolde doe greate matters: first, as I proteste it is in itselfe false, so is it unworthie of me, because I had rather have any thing with generall love, moare respectyng the source and affectyon from whence it is derived, then any proffyte by them. This I hope you will credite; silence all the dissonante and jarring strings of the kingdom, which shall bringe you home your prynses grace and favore."

After the king had ended his Speech, the Lord Chancellor made a short one; the purport of which was, to signify his maj.'s pleasure to the Commons, that they should retire to their accustomed place, and there, out of their own body, choose one, fit and able, to be their speaker, and present him to the king on the 7th of April. Accordingly, on that day, the Commons presented sir Randolph Crewe, kt. as their Speaker; who was introduced to the king by sir Ralph Winwood, kt. principal secretary to his maj. and sir Julius Cæsar, kt. chancellor of the exchequer; and, with the usual ceremonies, was allowed. The first thing the Commons did, after this, was to make an order that every member should take the sacrament at st. Margaret's church, Westminster.

The King's 2d Speech to the Parliament.] April 8th. The lord chancellor delivered the king's pleasure, that all the Lords, members of that house, should to-morrow, by 2 o'clock in the afternoon, attend his maj. at the Banqueting-house of the Court, there to understand his further pleasure and direction, touching certain business to be treated on in this parl. We are not told by the Journals, what the King said at this meeting; nor, like the former speech from the throne, is it mentioned by any historian, or even printed in this King's Works. We are, therefore, obliged to the before-cited repository of antiquities, for this Speech also; which is transcribed from a M.S. as old as the time, and in its own orthography:

"According to my promys, I will make you that presente I mentioned the other day at our laste meeting; but, first, I muste make a requeste, that consernynge which I offer, you will looke uppon the affectyon of the givere, and not the vallue of the gyfte; especyally, because it is supported between twoe so beutefull shuiters, sinceritye and love; for sinceritye without love may be too coulde, and love without sinceritye dissimulacion; but whear thes two are conjoynded they make a perfecte bewtye; it is the contynuanee of that mirrore, which I onse offered and nowe presente againe, and 'dimidium facti qui bene cœpit habet.' I have begune 'bonis auspiciis,' to make it a parleamente of love, that as the laste begane with discorde and ended so, so this maye begine with concorde and love, and contynue so.—I may offere; it is my parte to be gracious, and yours retributyng. I maye reseave assystance and you ease, not to me, but to the thinge which is also the goode of yourselves, the comone goode, that wee doe mutually owe in love. And I maye saye with the prophete, 'Woe is to him that shall caste dissensyon;' if the kinge and comone-wealthe weare contrary, devishone mighte ensue, but beinge one as they are, this holey emulacion of mutual goode shall begyne to-daye one my parte, and one yours hereafter; that the world maye see the love of the kinge to his subjectes, and your love to the kinge, and thear shall be no emulasyon but who shall offere with moste affectyon.—God is loved for the gyfte he bestowethe, and loves againe for thanke, which is all man cane give, and thearefore in scripture goode men are called the friends of God, because they are benevolente; and I that am kinge and in that offyse doe represente God that muste geve, begine withe offyses and gyftes, and expecte from you a chearfullness in retribushone, with a greatfull harte, accordynge to a comone proverbe manye tymes used to mee, by manye of the courte to move me to some suite, that they dide moare respecte the signefycashone of my grace and favore in such a marke of my benevolence, than the vallue of that which was demaunded; but because I wolde not make aney abrupte speche to you, I will remember you of somewhate spokene the laste daye, to styre you upp to goe one to the principle buseness with moare alacretye.—Firste, as I saye, 'a jove principium,' to have care to the grate encrease of Poperey; yet I wold not have Papistes to vaunte of theair goode seede, sinse theair greateste conquestes are one weomene and ignorante persones; they assaylle onlie the weaker, and gete to them not suche as they wold but suche as they cane, and it is verrey remarkable, an ill cause is moste vigilente and carefull to defend itself; yet, as I saye, not to proceed to towche lyfe or lande; for, as I noted, persecushone was never a justefyed waye of establishinge relygeon; but by the executshone of goode lawes, in which lette my lords the judges witnes for me, if I do not twice a yeare give it them in charge, that they enquire of that encrease in thair circuites; and also twice every yeare require an accompte of it; and for some remedy thearin, I desire you the lords of the upper house, to consulte with the judges; and you of the comones with your owne lawiers.—To that I speake of the Oathe of Allegiance, I intended it not in the lawe, for thear is nothing in the substance of it but every good subjecte maye receave it; but in the waye howe to admynester it, bycause men maye keepe home in thear owne houses, thear is no provishone howe men maye be cauled to it; it is true, that it is a grate happyness that men may lyve in quiete under the lawe, every man under his owne olyve and his owne vine, but this sweetnes oughte not to extend to those, that make that a protectyon to lyve againste lawe.—For that which concerned my sonne in lawe, I shall not need to saye much, I doubte not to fynde you redy; and the bylle, I thanke my lords, hathe bine alrede rede and welle received of them.—For the third parte, which concerned the Reliefe of my Estate, I pray you understand me arighte, for righte understanding is the effect of true elloquence; I speake to you the knights and burgeses representing the comones, bycause yours is the greatest parte and you suffer moste, that you will consydere the charge I was at in the maryage-pointe.—The State of Irelande, which I pretend not without juste cause, yet without feare; for though they cane never be reduced to so perfecte obedyence without establissement of relygeon, yet in the laste tryalle of thair parleamente, I have found many goode subjectes theare.—Yet consyder that the memberes most removed from the harte have moste neede of succore; they lye moste obnoxious to harne, and as a praye to all enemyes of the bodye; and though none of myne ancestores could nevere be cauled so absolutly a kinge of that contraye as I maye, yet thear muste be a greate care had of those remoteste partes of the dominion which have alwayes byne emunc-tories of Englande, and whearin moare hathe byne spent in one yeare than wold, by frugal-lety, be saved heare in manye.—I do not, as I sayde, offere you lyke a marchante or charla-taine, but to lette you see what I owe you in justys, 'suum cuique tribuere;' yet what I geve, free-grace will require that you accepte with cheariulnes.—I demaund not this nor that, but only the ground of your love, and the mea-sure of it by the measure of your benevolence; but what shall be the ende of this, the kinge will growe in love with parleamentes, and so be ever drawinge and wearinge of his sub-jectes. I answer, my comforte shall be, onely to meete you to consulte of the comone weall-fares, and howe I may ease you, and to re-ceave your greevances, for I hope to fynde a waye, by improoveinge my revenewe justely; beleve me, I shall be ashamede to demaund any moare in this kynde, or to be ever impor-tunate; yea, as I saye, of any private men; but this as I vowe it is farre from my harte to accepte, so hathe it nevere byne offered; it is true that every honeste and goode subjecte oughte to offere his camelles and service unto me, and so perhaps I have herde the oppyny-ones of many, but nevere in so unworthie a proposytyon.—The rumore perhaps hathe growne from the ambysious contensyon of some men, in the electyone of some knyghte of the sheeres, which I nevere herde of before 24 howres; what I wholye disavowe, that I nevere directly or indirectly dide prompte or hinder anye man in the free electyone, and wheare anye faulte have come by me I wolde have the rezine syned for it; nor dide I ever put any confydence in a partee parleamente, and of this I appeale to all the sherryfes and lordes, let them accuse me freelye.—Another brainche I must add to the former three, which indeede concernethe bothe safty and proffyte, and concourethe to them bothe; that wee maye meete this parleamente to remoove and take awaye all oppynyone of drines betweene me and my subjectes, which our length-enynge out of the laste hathe risted in the harte of manye bothe at home and abroad; of which though some of the lowere house weare in parte guilty, yet I muste confesse theare was misunderstandinge on bothe sydes, and perhaps, mesages broughte betweene us by some (whom God forgyve) rather to coun-tynance and encrease then to reconsylle and cleare the erre; but, 'sublata causa tollitur ef-fectus,' this beinge removed and our understand-yngs rectefyede, I hope, this shall be cauled a parleamente of love.—I will begyne my parle-amente contrary to the ordere of all other, who gave, lyke a retribushyone, their graces in the end; but, I will begyne this with offeres to you, which I speake not to intyse you or intrape you, but severalley to shewe my love and intensyone to unburthen you of many greefes; but I referre the partyculeres to be delyvered in wrytyng at our nexte meetynge.—To conclude with some generall notes to ad-vance the busenes for which wee are mette; I commend to your consyderasons, the tyme of the yeare farre spent, the waight and im-portance of the affaires compared with it, will styre you upp to proceede rowndley, and not to loose tyme in cerremonyes and trifles.—2ndly, To remembere that what Greevances come into questyone, that you will use a meane; I confess it is more fyte you should presente them unto me, every man for his contraye or toune wheare he is burthened, provided they be fyte greevances; but to heape them toge-ther in one scroule, lyke an armie, will but caste aspersyone uppon me and my gouverne-mente, and will savore moare of discontente then desyre of reformashon.—And do not be-leeve I am so tendere of my prerogatyve as some have rumored me; I desyre to keepe also that meane, as I wolde not loose any the honores and floweres of my crowne, which I have receaved with it, but rather loose my life, so I wold no waye stretche them, no, I will wade no farther thearin then the beste of my predecessores have done.—And wheare any controversyes arise, my lordes the judges cho-sene betwixte me and my people, shall discide and rulle me.—As touching Proclamashones which in the laste parleamente was excepted at; as he is a trayterous subjecte that will saye a kinge maye not proclayme and bynd by it, so did I nevere intende proclamashones to have force of lawe, but to prevent misgreefe arrisyng, whearin the lawe hathe no provishon, untill a parleamente cane provide; and this I speake because of my laste long proclama-shone conscrnyng duelles, which I proteste I did oute of consyence to meete with that giddy opynyone of reputashon, seeinge they have found a shiffle to avoyde the provishon of lawe by things beyonde seas, by the example of the late kinge of Fraunce; hopynge it shall take bettere effecte then thear it hathe done, by reason of this things notorietye, which, howe barbarous it is, that every fellowe that hathe byne but over in the Lowe Contreyes, though he retwrn in raggs, shall come a judge of honore; to meete, I saye, with this inconve-nience, untill a parleamente could take order thearin, which now I commende to your grace and consyderashon.—Lastely, the Forme I meane to houlde in our proceedinges, to avoyde the longe conferences betweene the Upper and the Lower House, which breede but delaye, for sometymes the Lower House broughte nothinge but tonges, sometymes no-thinge but years; I meane to propound to the lordes matteres propre to them by bylles, and the lyke to you, and to speake to you myself and receave your answers; this to prevente unnesessary meetynges, and to hastene our busenes, that wee maye proceede to the moste urgente pointe. And I do propose to contynue this parlemeute to another session at Michellmas, when maye be supplied any suche defecte as this shorte tyme will not geve leave, perhaps, to be amended. For I will meete you oftene in this kynd to shewe myself contrarye to all tyrantes, who love not advisynge with their subjectes, but hate parleamentes; but moste I desyre to meete with you when I mighte aske you nothinge, but that we mighte conferre together freelye, and I maye heare oute of everye cornere of my kingdome the complaynte of my subjectes, and I will delyvere you my advise and asystance, and wee will consulte onlye 'de reipublica;' so shall the world see I love to joyne with my subjectes, and this will breede love as acquaintance doth amongste honeste men, and the contrary amongste knaves.—That as the laste parlemeute begane with trouble and contention and ended so, so this maye begine with alacretye and love, and conclude so lykewise; whear saltie shall be abroad and love at home, and all aspersiones and rumores of discontente betweene me and my people shall be taken awaye, and wee maye synge together, 'ecce, quam bonum et jucundum;' and when you shall retwrne to your contraye, you shall have prayses, and be approoved in the choyse made of you, that you have behaved yourselves discretelye, that you have geven contente to your king, and accorded. But I shall be ashamed to be wearisome to you.—Howe to proceede in this mutual love, to meete in a sounde oppynyone with the kinge as he doth with you is a parte of your worke.—For undertakers, I proteste, I never was so bace to calle or relye upon anye but your generall love, and if anye had hyne so folliche to offere it, yet had it byne greater folley in me to have accepted it; and for electyones and patchinge a parlemeute, I knowe none of them, nor interceded, and who will doubte of this gives me the lye. I did proceede with a desyre to truste my subjectes, and to this my counsell and other gentlemen have encouraged me, that as I intended gratyously to them, they wolde deale lovinglye with me, and this was all the undertaking.—To remembre the shorvenes of tyme, to avoyde all curiostye, and to proceede with celeretye to the moste waighy affayres; and if anye sholde begine with newe materres, newe questyones, 'Rejice anniles fabulas, rejice genealogias;' if anye bringe disorder amonge you, accompte him an enemy that doth not only not maintayne this summum bonum, this harmony, but seekes, by disensyones questyones, to sever the affectyones of the kinge and people; that I maye rise with desyre to returne and meete you oftene, and you returne with the prayse of discrete and well-tempered men; if anye man preche anye other doctryne, Anathema sit, and esteem his eloquence as a guildene sepulchere. This I have spokene to your hartes, your affectyones, and to your heades, your reasones; and if anye other issue succede blame yourselves, for I have dealte with sinceritye. And will conclude with my offeres, which, bycause they proceede of grace, I have put them into bylles."

May 7th. The Lord Chancellor moved the house That an Order, made the last session of parl, for the better Attendance of the peers, might be read and confirmed; which was done accordingly.

Debate in the Lords as to a Conference with the Commons upon Impositions.] May 21st. A message was sent from the Commons to the Lords to desire a Conference with them, touching the point of Impositions; but, the number of the committee, time and place was left to their lordships appointment. The messengers being withdrawn, the Lords resolved themselves into a committee of the whole house, to consider what answer was proper to be returned to the said message.—The next day this matter was resumed: it appearing to be a business of great importance, and 'vexata questio;' the lord chanc. shewed the house "What disadvantage it would be to the king's cause, as well as to their own honours, if altogether unprovided, they should meet with the Lower House. In which regard, his lordship moved that the lord chief justice, and chief baron, with one judge of each of the said courts, there named, who had been required and were then present to assist that court, might now be heard to deliver their opinions, for the better information and enabling of their lordships to treat with the Commons on the point of Impositions; and that no answer should be sent down to the other house till this was concluded."—This motion occasioned a warm debate amongst the Lords, some approving and some disliking the motion; and the difference not being likely to be settled by arguments on either side; it was at last agreed that the lord chancellor should put the question: "Whether the Judges should deliver their opinions, touching the point of Impositions, before a farther consideration be had of an Answer to be returned to the Lower House concerning the message from them lately received?" This question was carried in the affirmative; and the judges desiring to withdraw a little into a private room to advise by themselves, they soon after returned; and standing uncovered in their proper places, the Lord Chief Justice, in a grave and eloquent speech, "Humbly desired to be excused, for that time, giving his opinion in the case, for many weighty and important reasons which he mentioned. Concluding, that he and his brethren were to speak upon particulars in judicial courts, between the king's maj. and his subjects and likewise between subjects themselves; but in no cause, to be disputants on any side." Then the Lord Chancellor moved the house That forasmuch as no opinion or direction was to be had from the Judges, they would now advise what Answer was to be sent to the Lower House, who expected to hear from them. But time not now serving the farther consideration thereof was referred to the next morning; and the Judges were ordered to attend again. Accordingly,

May 24th. The Lord Chancellor renewed his motion of what Answer, &c. on which arose another strong debate, many of the Lords approving and others disapproving of any meeting at all with the Commons on this point: since they all, in general, agreed, That the Lower House was not bound by any order or course taken by their committee, but free and at liberty to alter the same, or vary from it, as their judgments led them. But, to put an end to this debate, it was agreed that another question should be proposed by the Lord Chancellor to this effect: "Whether this house shall meet with the Lower House, and give them a hearing touching the point of Impositions? And the greater number of the lords answering "not content," it passed in the negative.—But still some message must be sent to the Commons; and that day being far spent, the matter was again put off to the next meeting. Accordingly May 26th, the following Message from the Lords was agreed upon to be sent to the Lower house: "Whereas the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Commons House of parl. did desire of the Lords a conference concerning Impositions; to which their lordships answered, that they would take it into consideration, and send them an Answer by messengers of their own; their lordships do now return this Answer unto them, That they are, and always will be willing and ready to hold a loving and mutual correspondence with them: but their lordships having entered into a grave and serious consideration, as well of the matter itself, as of divers incident and necessary circumstances, do not think it convenient to enter into any Conference with them concerning the point of Impositions, at this time."

The same day two bills were brought in, and read a first time in the Lords, one of them intituled, 'An act against Vexation of his maj.'s subjects by the Assigning of Debts to the Crown.' The other, 'An act for Repeal of a branch of a statute, 34 Hen. VIII. intituled, 'An act for certain Ordinances in the king's majesty's dominions and principality of Wales.' Upon reading of both these bills, the lord chanc. observed to the house, "That these were Bills of Grace, offered by the king to his subjects for their ease and benefit."—But these concessions of the king had no effect on the Commons; so much were they irritated against the Lords for not yielding to a Conference: and, on May 28, a Message was sent up to the Lords, by sir Edward Hobby and others, in these words:—

Complaint of the Commons against the Bp. of Lincoln.] "That at such time as the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Commons House of Parl. sent up to the Lords a Message, praying a conference with their lordships about Impositions: they hoped that, neither out of the words nor matter of the message, it had been possible to have framed any sinister or unworthy construction. That notwithstanding, by public and constant fame, they had heard, to their heart's grief, that one in this place and within these walls, namely, the lord bishop of Lincoln (Rd. Neile), in order to dissuade the Lords from a conference so desired, as aforesaid, did use words to the effect following, or the same words, viz. 'That the matter, whereof conference was by that house desired, is a 'noli me tangere;' in conferring, also, that the taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy is an impediment; so, as whoso had taken the said oaths might not enter, safely, into conference of the said matter. Affirming farther, That it did strike, not at a branch, but at the root of the prerogative of the imperial crown; and that he doubted least in such a conference, as was desired, there would, from some of the committees of that house, proceed some undutiful and seditious speeches, unfit for their lordships to hear; tending to a dangerous rent and distraction of both houses, and to make an alienation between the king and his subjects.' That of such scandal their house is so sensible, that they have sent these messengers to signify their grief, and that they held the Lords so honourable, that they cannot but also take notice thereof. Wherefore, that house did desire that their lordships will join with them in some course to give them satisfaction for so great a wrong done to the Commons; which they have taken so to heart, that they have determined to forbear all parliament matter, until they may receive Answer from the Lords; wherein they doubt not but their lordships will deal nobly with them, and they desire it may be speedily."

Sir Edw. Hobby being asked by the lord chanc. Whether he had in writing the Message so delivered, as aforesaid? Answered, he had not. The lords then returned Answer "That they had taken notice of the message, and will take the same into further consideration, as the weight thereof requireth: wherein they will have respect both to their honours and the honour of the other house; and will send them further answer. After this, a short Memorandum is entered on the Journals, intimating, That before the Answer, above specified, was agreed on, the serjeant of the Lower House came to the gent. usher of the Lords, to learn, Whether their lordships would send answer to the message on that day, or not? To which the gent. usher, with the privacy of the Lords, answered, as from himself, That he knew not.

May 30th. The Lord Chancellor moved the house to consider and resolve of an Answer to be sent to the Message or Complaint, which they lately received from the other house, touching the bp. of Lincoln. And, by order, the abp. of Canterbury produced a copy of one, ready drawn, for that purpose, which being read, was to this effect: "That the Lords, having received from the Commons a Complaint against the bp. of Lincoln, have seriously entered into Consideration of it, and do now return this Answer, That their lordships would take very tenderly that any unworthy aspersion should be laid on that body, which they so much respect; and with whom they desire to hold all good correspondence and agreement." But forasmuch as the Complaint seemeth to be grounded, not upon direct or certain proof, but only upon common public fame; their lordships do not think that common fame only is a sufficient ground, whereon they may proceed as in this cause is required. Nevertheless, their lordships are so respective of any thing that may concern that house, that when they shall be more certainly informed, in direct and express terms, what the words were wherein the lord bp. of Lincoln is to be charged, and how the same are to be proved, they will proceed therein so effectually, according to honour and justice, as it shall thereby well appear how careful they are to give to that house all good satisfaction in this business that may be, and to omit nothing that can be justly or lawfully done in that behalf. This Answer was approved on by the whole house, and sent in writing to the Commons, by messengers of their own; with this instruction, That if they, of the Lower House, should require to have the Paper, then the messengers were authorized to deliver the same, which they did accordingly.

May 31st. Another Message from the Commons, brought by sir Roger Owen and others; who, having first repeated the substance of their lordships Answer of yesterday, acquainted this house: "That though the Commons did not take common and public fame to be a sufficient ground or proof, by a legal and ordinary course of justice, in proceeding against any man; yet they held it enough to induce the Lords of that house to take the matter into consideration. And, albeit they did not set down the words, in particular; yet was the matter, as they conceive, sufficiently laid down, when in effect they said, 'That the lord bp. of Lincoln, in this house, to dissuade the Lords from a Conference with them touching Impositions, termed the prerogative, &c. a 'noli me tangere;' insinuating that the taking of the oath of supremacy and allegiance did restrain a man from treating of that business: also he doubted but in the conference would be used, or spoken, some undutiful and seditious words, not fit for their lordships to hear, or words to the like or worse effect. That now the Commons do desire the Lords, if these words were not spoken, so to signify it to the house; otherwise, if they were used, then they hope their lordships will do as they have promised. Lastly, from the commons, he said further, That they knew not what other course they could have taken to bring this matter to examination, or otherwise have any undutiful speech, which may be moved in either house, called in question."

After sir Roger Owen had delivered his Message, the lord chancellor asked him, If he had it in writing? To which he answered in the negative. The lord chancellor then acquainted him, That the house would take his message into consideration, and send Answer, if they could, before they rise: otherwise, will let them know as much. Accordingly, the same day, the lords sent to acquaint the other house, "That they had considered of their last message, and, in debating thereupon, the lord bp. of Lincoln had humbly intreated that he might be heard to explain himself; which being granted unto him, he had made a solemn protestation, on his salvation, that he did not speak any thing with any evil intention to the House of Commons, which he doth with all hearty duty and respect highly esteem. Expressing, with many tears, his sorrow that his words were so misconceived and strained further than he ever intended them; and that his speech should occasion so much trouble to their lordships or that the Lower House should take offence at it. Which submissive and ingenuous behaviour of his, had given this satisfaction to their lordships, that, howsoever the words might sound, his intention was not as it hath been taken. And their lordships do assure the Commons, That if they had conceived the said bishop's words, to have been spoken or meant to have cast any aspersion of sedition, or undutifulness unto their house, (as it seems report has carried it to them) their lordships would forthwith have proceeded to the censuring and punishing thereof with all severity. Nevertheless, though their lordships have thought fit to signify their carefulness at this time to give them contentment, for the better expediting his maj.'s great business, and to retain all good correspondence with them; yet their lordships are of opinion, That hereafter no member of their house ought to be called in question, when there is no other ground for it, but public and common fame."

The Messengers then proceeded to tell the Commons another part of their message, which was, that the Lords did desire a Conference with them by committees of either house, about a Bill for punishing Abuses committed on the Sabbath Day, called Sunday; which was accepted on. This bill had been depending some time in the house of lords; but as it was prevented from being made a law by the sudden dissolution of this parl. we can give no farther account of it. And at the conference the committee of the Commons, declaring, That they had no authority, or warrant, to treat, or confer, but only to hear what should be said by the others, and report the same to their house; the Lords broke up the conference, and delivered back the bill to their own house. Before we go on with the further proceedings of this session in the House of Lords, it will be necessary to look back into the Journals of the Commons, for an enlargement and confirmation of the foregoing particulars; as well as a recital of some matters not mentioned in the other authorities.

Case of the King's Attorney-General.] April

8th, when the Commons were adjusting their privileges, and rectifying elections; a remarkable Case was started by Mr. Duncombe, "Whether the Attorney-General might be elected, in respect there was no precedent that such an officer of the crown could be chosen a member of that house? Sir Hen. Hobart's case being different, he being a member of this house when he was made attorney-general." In the debates on this question, Sir Roger Owen argued, "That no attorney was ever chosen; nor, anciently any privy-counsellor; nor any that took livery of the king. He quoted some precedents for this; as the 7th Rich. II. a knight banneret was put out of the house; and by printed authority, he instanced Sir Thos. Moore's treatise after he had been chancellor and speaker. That the eye of a courtier can endure no colours but one; the king's livery hindering their sight. Compared them to a cloud gilded by the rays of the sun; and to brass coin which the king's stamp makes current." Sir John Savile moved, "That those privy-counsellors who had got seats might stay for that time; but to put the question, Whether Mr. attorney should serve in that house? Much more debate ensued on this, till, at last, it was agreed to be referred to a committee to search precedents, &c. Upon the whole, it was resolved on the question, That he shall for this parl. remain in the house; but never any attorney-general to serve for the future.

Debate on the Motion for a Supply.] April 12. Mr. Secretary Herbert moved for a Supply. He said, "that if he was but a private person, and not bound by duty, his motion would not be entertained with so much jealousy. But, as a sec. of state he urged it not for the private use of the king, but the public good of the commonwealth. That the state cannot act without redress of those miseries we are under. He took them to be ill members, who, to enrich the king's coffers, ransack and ransom the king's subjects. The strength of the king is in the wealth and love of his subjects. And to relieve the necessities of the state, the king hath taken 'rectam et regiam viam,' by calling a parl. 'Nemo tenetur suam turpitudinem revelare;' the king's Debts should be made known by those who are best acquainted with them. His Navy, the walls of our country, never in better equipage; yet, in such necessity, as must have been long since dissolved; if special care had not been taken to prevent it. That the cautionary towns, for want of pay, were like to mutiny. Ireland was not so much a thorn in our foot, but a thorn in our side. If a revolt should happen there, what shame and disgrace would be to leave it, or what trouble and danger to recover it? The last disorderly parl. there hath awakened Tyrone; who is now treating with the Pope to come next summer, and that all the ill-affected there wait the issue of this parl. His maj.'s Charge in Germany, for settling the right inheritors there. The state of France,

The custom of Spain to fish in troubled water. If, by the double marriage, the king take part, he must needs become a party, though with the charge of a royal army. The superfluities of one year, of every man at his table, apparel, &c. will discharge the king's Debts and protect us and all our privileges. That we now are exposed, by our poverty, in all other parts to contempt and scorn. That his maj.'s grace, as it is offered to us, may be termed another Magna Charta. The marriage of his daughter was another cause of this debt. That the Pope never had so great a blow as by that match; which occasioned the king to banish so dear a daughter from so indulgent a father. He concluded, that a cheerful and speedy contribution would be grateful, but with all the convenience possible; which would be great joy to all, when heard abroad, that all differences between the king and his subjects were ended."

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "That not only his duty to the king, but care of his country, for which he would lay down his life, moved him to inform the house of what he knew they would be glad to hear. That there was no safety to any counsel in this house, whilst the other motion for a Supply to the king was deferred. That 1500 poor mariners were ready to salute them every morning; others, for want of money, ready to pull off his gown. That these were not private expences, or household affairs, but for navy and forts. Dover Castle like to fall down; two or three in the Isle of Wight were in the same condition. Ireland was like to be hazarded for want of money. The garrisons in Flushing and Brill ready to mutiny for the same cause; which are pledges for near 700,000l. If abruptly these things be spoken, he was in fear and trembling for the consequence. And if now the Supply was undertaken, it would be many months before money came in. He offered to disclose the particulars of the debts to any member privately; and the assurance for the well-disposing of what was granted. But that it was not agreeable to the king's pleasure to disclose his debts to every one, no more than to direct them what they should give. He therefore moved for a sub-committee to be appointed for this business."

The Attorney-General began next with telling the house, "That since they had been pleased to retain him there, he owed them the best offices he could; and, if they had dismissed him, his best wishes would have been still with them. That all pertinent speeches tended to one of these three ends; either information of the matter to persuade consent, or to trace out the best means to effect the thing proposed. Little remained to him in any of these 3 kinds; since the first had been already delivered by them to whom properly it belonged. But they were to consider what hangs over us all, viz. Danger; what upon us, Want. That in times of peace it was proper to provide for defence by a supply of treasure, as well as in time of war; which sometimes happens for a flag of glory, or a flash of revenge, and may be pursued or left at pleasure. But when a state is environed with envious foreigners on the one side, and encroachments on trade on the other, and religion so much questioned, peace may flatter us, but not secure us. That the states of Europe were never so dark; and, but to look a year before him, would trouble the best watchman in Europe. There ought to be provision of arms for travelling in the night as well as going to war. And what treaty can we make with strangers for wrongs, but basely on our parts and gloriously on theirs, whilst we are in want. That no private man is more subject to sheriff's officers, than a state in want to surprizes; and that treasure was like ballast to a ship, the word, 'Steady.' That persuasion in this matter was needless and unwise; a wise man should make a fire, but can let it alone when it burneth well. The fire of their affections was kindled by the king's speech; his graces did shine and warm them, without the help of a burning-glass. The king had made such a tract, in almost every point of his prerogative, that the footsteps of king James would ever remain. The king's prerogative was not like a bow or watch-string, but groweth stronger by continuance; and that when his means shall abound, in grace he will superabound. 'Dulcis tractus pari jugo.' The king's business and commonwealth to go together. Lastly, he moved for no particular committee or sub-committee, but a committee of the whole house."—These were the sum of the arguments the courtiers made use of to enforce the Supply; but many more, pro and con, were the subject of a whole day's debate. The result of which last was, chiefly, to urge that it was not now a time. That divers members were not yet come. The house to be called first. To receive the communion first, as appointed, according to the primitive church, and then to make an offering, &c. In short, the business was deferred till after Easter.

The Complaint against the bp. of Lincoln was made in the Commons, May 25th, on which a long debate arose; and several severe speeches were thrown out against the whole order. One said, There had been continual interruptions all this parl. This bone, amongst the rest, thrown in by a devil, if a bishop may be a devil. That a speech an hon. person made in this house hath rubbed them, and they now winch; sorry such as he had the king's ear so much, &c. and moved to proceed to no other business till this was righted. The next day and day after were entirely taken up with disputes how to act in this affair; nor could a letter from his maj. quiet them; but a message was resolved to be sent to the Lords, to require satisfaction, which was done accordingly, as is before related, with the rest of the proceedings in the Lords' Journals.

The King threatens to dissolve the Parl.] June 5th. The Commons still persisting in their former resolution, the Speaker delivered a Message to them, which he had received from the king, "That unless they forthwith proceed to treat of his Supply; he would dissolve the parl." This Message somewhat alarmed the house, and sir Geo. Moore got up and spake to this effect:

"That this Message from the king gave him much uneasiness, because of the state of the commonwealth: his maj.'s wants and the people's grievances; in both which the commonwealth is interested, and is the ship wherein they all sailed, and must live or die. That if they neglected what was now to be done, the commonwealth would receive the prejudice. And moved, without farther delay, to appoint a committee to consider of what was fittest to be done concerning all these great matters."—This speech was seconded by other members, who moved to oblige the king, lest he should lay a heavy hand upon them; that this was a dissolution, not of this, but of all parliaments. That great care was to be had of a good conclusion, without any extremity on either part. Moved to present his maj. with some proportion of Supply presently. And to have a special care to avoid the king's penury, or his disgrace, &c.—At length it was agreed upon the question, "That a Committee of the whole House should prepare an Answer to the King's Message; to meet that afternoon; all other committees, except one on the Bishops' Business, set apart till this affair was done. But though the house met the next day, there is nothing of this business in their Journals; and we must have recourse to those of the Lords for an end of this unfortunate dispute between the three Estates of the kingdom.

Things standing in this situation, and the Commons persisting in their resolution that they would proceed to no business till they had more satisfaction given them from the Lords about the bp. of Lincoln, on the 6th of June, the Lords being met, after a general and long silence in the house, the Lord Chancellor, in a very grave and worthy speech, as the Journals express it, "Gave the Lords great thanks for having so nobly borne with the many motions he had so unreasonably made unto them. And begged leave now to move to them a business, which, as he said, himself scarce understood. He then put their lordships in mind, that the king, for weighty and important reasons, did call a parl. to begin the 5th of April last, and that now it was his maj.'s pleasure to dissolve the same; and for that purpose a commission is now put forth, under the Great Seal, which is this day to be executed." But first he moved that the following Message should be sent to the Commons, which was generally agreed to:—"That the Lords have understood a Commission under the Great Seal of England is set forth for dissolving this parl. as this day, which was begun on the 5th of April last. And forasmuch as they thought to have heard something from that house this morning, they have hitherto stayed the publishing the said commission. Their lordships now expect to know whether they shall hear any thing from them or no; otherwise, the lords commissioners must this day dissolve the parl."—The commons took a little time to consider of this Message, and afterwards returned this answer; "That, by it, they were informed of a commission issued forth to certain lords, for dissolving the parl. as this day. And, that their lordships have hitherto made stay of publishing it, expecting to hear something from them, &c. ut supra. In answer to which, they give their lordships to understand, That this morning they received a letter, directed to their Speaker, from his maj. whereby it was signified, "That whereas his maj. by former letters, had declared his determination to dissolve the parl. on Thursday next, except, in the mean time, their house should proceed in his important business, for which the same was especially called: yet now it was his maj.'s pleasure to dissolve the parl. to-morrow, being the 7th of this month, unless they shall before that time perform what, by the said former letters, was required. Lastly, that they have entered into consideration of this great matter."—The lords commissioners named in the commission, by order of the house, withdrew to advise what in this case was fit by them to be done; and being returned into the house, by general consent of all the Lords then present, answer was sent to the Lower House, That their lordships having considered of the answer, which that house sent to them, have resolved to adjourn this court until 2 o'clock to-morrow in the afternoon; which was done accordingly.

The Parliament dissolved.] On that day were present in the House of Lords, besides the lord chancellor and the 2 apbs. 16 other bps. 17 earls, 1 viscount and 33 barons. Who, being all assembled in their parliament robes, after prayers were ended, the commissioners, taking notice of his maj.'s commission for dissolving the parl. left their proper seats, and went up to sit on a bench or form, prepared for them and placed cross the house, between the chair of state and the woolsack, whereon the lord chancellor usually sitteth. After some small intermission, the gentleman usher was commanded to signify unto the Speaker of the Lower House, that the Lords were ready, in their robes, and did expect the coming up of him and the Commons, to whom his maj.'s pleasure is further to be declared; according to the commission directed to several lords for that purpose.—The Speaker and the Commons being come up to the bar of the house of lords, the Lord Chancellor declared, "That it had pleased his maj. to ordain this parl. to be begun and holden on the 5th of April last; and now, for divers good and weighty considerations, known to his maj. he had thought proper to dissolve and finally determine the same; and, that for the same purpose, his maj. had been pleased to grant a commission to certain Lords." Then the clerk of parl. going up, received the Commission from the Chancellor on his knees; and, afterwards, from his own place, read the same to both the houses.—By the sudden dissolution of this parl. all the bills which had been brought in or passed in either house, were frustrated and entirely disannulled. At the end of the Lords Journal is a Note, or Catalogue, of such bills as were delivered into that house, with their titles, by which it appears that about 60 of them were before the Lords; and though several were rejected, that there were enough left to employ their thoughts and time for that session.

After this, the king and his ministry went on for some years, and supported the Court and state without the assistance of parl. What other ways and means they had to do it, than by the ordinary annual Revenues of the Crown, Customs, &c. will appear in the sequel: for though small in themselves, yet they were treated as Grievances in the next parl. and looked upon as impositions on the public.

A new Parl. called.] Rushworth informs us, that it was not till the year 1620, that writs were issued for a parl. to meet on the 30th of Jan. in that year, and on the 18th of this reign.* But it appears, by the Journals, that this parl. was summoned to meet first on the 16th of Jan. from thence it was prorogued, by proclamation, to the 23d, and then again to the 30th as aforesaid; divers great and weighty considerations of state, occasioning these prorogations. It is observable, that the first Writ of Summons, which is given at length in the Journals, in the usual form, is directed to Charles prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall and of York, and earl of Chester, &c. Which prince, we find, gave his attendance, in the House of Lords, almost every day of this ensuing session.

A Proclamation setting forth the King's Reasons for calling this Parl.] Along with the writs for calling a new parl. the following Proclamation was published, for the electing of proper members to sit in the House of Commons; which we shall give in its original orthography.†

"By the King:—Having occasion at this tyme to deliberate upon divers great and weighty affaires, highly tending to the continuance and further settling of the peaceable government and safety of this our kingdom, whereof God hath given us the charge; we have thought good, according to the laudable custome of our progenitors, to crave the advice and assistance herein of our well affected subjects, by calling a parl. to begin upon the 16th day of Jan. next; and though there were no more to be had in consideration but the present face of Christendom, so miserably and dangerously distracted at this tyme, besides a number of other great and weightie affaires that we are to resolve upon; we have more than sufficient reason to wish and desire, if ever at any time, especially at this, that the knights and burgesses that shall serve in parl. be, according to the old institutions, chosen of the gravest, ablest and best affected myndes that maie be found. And therefore out of the care of the common good, whereof themselves are also participant, we do hereby admonish all our loving subjects, that have votes in elections, that choise be made of persons approved for their sincerity in religion, and not of any that is noted either of superstitious blindness one way, or of turbulent humours another way, but of such as shall be found zealous and obedient children to this their mother-church.—And, as to the knightes of shires, that they cast their eyes upon the worthiest men of all sorts, of knightes and gentlemen that are guides and lightes of their countries, of good experience and of great integrity. Men that lead honest and exemplarie lief in their countries, doing us good service therein; and no bankrupts or discontented persons that cannot fish but in troubled waters.—And, for the burgesses, that they make choice of them that best understand the state of their countries, citties, or burroughes; and where such may not be had within their corporations, then of other grave and discreet men, fit to serve in so worthy an assembly. For we may well foresee how ill effects the bad choise of unfitt men may produce, if the house should be supplied with bankruptes and necessitous persons, that may desire long parliaments for their private protections; or with young and unexperienced men, that are not ripe and mature for so grave a councill; or with men of mean qualities in themselves, who may only serve to applaud the opinion of others on whom they depend; nor yett with curious and wrangling lawyers who may seek reputation by stirring needless questions; but we wish all our good subjects to understand theis our admonitions, as that we noe way mean to bar them of their lawfull freedom in election, according to the fundamental laws and laudable custome of this our kingdome, and especially in the times of good and settled government. Witness ourself at Theobould, this sixth day of Nov.”—The following is a

On the meeting of the parl. Jan. 30th, the King being seated on his throne, was pleased to make the following Speech to both Houses. The substance of it, in Latin, is given in the Lords Journals. Wilson and Rushworth have inserted one at large; but, upon comparing their's with the foregoing speeches of this king, so great a difference appears both in stile and manner, as render them justly suspected. The following is the genuine Speech, taking from Franklyn's Annals, who tells us, "that he had it from Mr. Munday, an ear-witness thereof;" and, upon examination, we find it corresponds exactly with the Latin Abstract in the Journals:—

"My lords spiritual and temporal, and you the commons. 'In multiloquio non deest peccatum,' said the wisest king that ever was; and this experience I have found in my own person; for it is true, that there have been sessions of parl. before this time, wherein I have made many discourses to the gentlemen of the Lower House, and in them delivered a true endeavour of my heart: but as no man's occasions, be they never so good, can be free from censure, in regard of the excellency required to make perfection; so it may be, it pleased God, seeing some vanity in me, to send back my words as wind spit into my own face. So, as I may truly say, 'I have often piped unto you, but you have not danced; I have often mourned, but you have not lamented:' but now I have put on this resolution for the few days that are left me in this world, wherein I know not how far I have offended God; and if it may please you, especially of the Lower House, to apply this rule unto yourselves, you may find the more fruit.—Now to the errand of your being called hither; for entring whereunto the more easily, I will begin with the general Condition of a Parliament, not to instruct you, whom I suppose not to be ignorant, but to refresh your memories; and first what a parl. is. It is an assembly composed of a head and a body: the monarch is the head, and the body is the 3 estates; which are called in all monarchies a parl. which was used and created at the first by monarchy; for king's were before parliaments; who, as soon as they had settled a form of govt. and were willing that their people should be guided by laws, called a parl.: I know there are divers sorts of foreign parliaments, some more, some less in number: but I leave them; only this I would have you to observe, That it is a vain thing for a parliament-man to press to be popular; for there is no state or parliament without monarchy; so the Grizons, Swisses, and Low Countries, which are governed without a king, have no parliaments, but councils and assemblies. This I put you in mind of, that you serve under a monarch, and that you must stand or fall with it.—Now consider, 1st, Who calls you? your king.—2ndly, Whom he calls? the Peers, who in respect of the eminency of their places and high honours, have an interest therein by birth and inheritance, because they are to assist the king in his greatest affairs. In the next place is the Church, the Clergy; yet not all of them, but the principal heads thereof, the bishops, whose holiness of life doth claim a privilege in advice, and in respect of their baronies: also the Knights stand for the Shires, and the other, gentlemen for the Burroughs; of these is the whole body composed: 3rdly, why you are called; viz. To advise the king in his urgent affairs, to give him your best advice in such errands as he shall ask of you, or you shall think fit to ask his advice in. The king makes laws, and ye are to advise him to make such as may be best for the good of the commonwealth. There is another cause also, viz. The House of Commons is called, for that they best know the particular estate of the country; and if the king shall ask their advice, can best tell what is amiss, as being most sensible of it, and also petition him to amend and redress. You are the authors of sustenance also to him, to supply his necessities; and this is the proper use of parliaments. Here they are to offer what they think fit to supply his wants; and he is in lieu hereof to afford them mercy and justice; and this is that I boldly say, and am not ashamed to speak it, that all people owe a kind of tribute to their king, as a thankfulness to him for his love to them; and where there is this sympathy between the king and his people, it breeds a happy parl.—Thus much the general Condition and special Use of Parliaments in this kingdom. Now I come to the particular Causes which moved me to call this parl. First, as in all parliaments, the king must have a special care to make good laws; for 'ex malis moribus bonæ leges oriuntur': for the elder the world grows, men become the more wise, the more crafty, and the more sinful; and therefore the more need to make new laws for new crimes. And here I am in a large subject, yet because of my intended brevity, I will speak of no particulars, but hold it best to leave it to the times wherein you should both see and read them.—First, for Religion there are laws enough, so as the true intent and execution follow; the Maintenance of Religion stands in two points: 1. Persuasion, which must precede; 2. Compulsion, which must follow; for as all the world cannot create a new creature, be it never so little, so no law of man can make a good Christian in heart, without inward grace; but the minister must persuade, and leave the success to God; and if there were not so many priests and Jesuits, there would not be so many perverted to ill; yet it is not enough to trust to a good cause and let it go alone; likewise the busy Puritans, do but see how busy they are in persuading the people. But God forbid, that I should compel mens' consciences, but leave them to the law of the kingdom; for the rumour that is spread, that I should tolerate Religion in respect of this match, which hath been long intreated with Spain for my son, I profess I will do nothing therein which shall not be honourable, and for the good of Religion: the trial which you have had of my Works and Writings, wherein I have been a martyr, tortured in the mouths of many idle fellows, may give you ample testimony of my integrity, in such a sort, as I hope you trust the wisdom of your king so far as that I will never do one thing in private, and another in public: but if, after this my Declaration, any shall transgress, blame not me if I see them severely punished.—Now the main errand, to speak truth, which I have called you for, is for a Supply of my urgent necessities; ye can all bear me witness I have reigned 18 years among you; if it be a fault in me, that you have been at peace all this while, I pray you pardon it; for I take it for an honour to me that ye should live quietly under your vines and fig-trees, eating the fruit of your own labours, and myself to be a just and merciful king to you; ye have not been troubled with pressing of men, and with a thousand inconveniences which the disaster of war produceth; and yet within these 18 years I have had less Supplies than many kings before. The last queen (of famous memory) was so far supplied in her time, as it grew to an annual contribution; which by computation came to 135,000l. a year at the least. I had never above 4 Subsidies, and six 15ths; I challenge no more desert than she; but sure I am, I have governed you as peaceably the time since my Supply hath been, as if women with child, 'quæ decem tulerunt fastidia mensis', who after ten months longing are delivered of their burden; but I have travailed ten years, and therefore now full time to be delivered of my wants. I was ever willing to spare you till now. It is true, 2 arguments were used in other parliaments against Supplies: first, that many Subsidies had been given by them, and therefore they required a time of respiration; which objection is now taken away: the other was, that my treasure was confusedly governed by me; so as some did not stick to say, that they would give me all they had, were they sure it would come into my purse: now you have seen trial of my late care in 2 years last past, in looking into the particulars of my estate, wherein I must confess that I have found my Revenue, as Job's friends, forsaking me. In my Household Expence I have abated 10,000l. per ann.; in the Navy 25,000l. per ann.; and shortly hope to abate 10,000l. more in mine Ordnance; I have brought mine Expences from 34,000l. to 14,000l. and yet was loth at first to think that things were so much out of order; but at the last, by means of the information of some private honest gentlemen, I was induced to enter into a particular survey; and herein such was the love of my young admiral to me, as he took the only envy of all upon himself for my sake; and though he but young, yet I find him true in faith, and an honest man, who hath had the better success in all the rest; he took under himself divers commissioners, as a young commander should do, the better to preserve him from errors, and then sought no reward, but my good service; yet went nevertheless through all with a great diligence and happy success; and therefore I hope the kingdom shall say I have a true care of my estate, not taking from others, by violence, house or land, but governing my own with good husbandry: and now I look your Supply will not fall into a bottomless purse.—The next cause of your calling is for an urgent necessity, the miserable and torn estate of Christendom; which none that hath an honest heart, can look on without a weeping eye. I was not the cause of the beginning thereof, (God knows) but I pray God I may be a happy instrument of a happy ending the wars in Bohemia; I mean, wherein the states expelled the emperor, and chose my son-in-law their king: I was requested at first by both sides to make an agreement between them; which cost me 3000l. in sending Doncaster on an embassy for that purpose. In the mean time they cast off all allegiance, and chose my son, who sent to me to know whether he should take the crown upon him or not; and yet within 3 days after, before I could return my answer, took the crown on his head; and then I was loth to meddle in it at all, for 3 reasons.—First, I would not make Religion the cause of deposing kings. I leave that cause to the Jesuits, to make Religion a cause to take away crowns. Next, I was not a fit judge between them; for they might after say to me, as he said to Moses, 'who made thee a judge over us?' And myself would not be content that they should judge whether I were a king or not.—Lastly, because I had been a meddler between them, and then to determine my son might take the crown upon him, had been improper; and yet I left not off, so far as nature compelled me, to admit his good. I permitted a Voluntary Contribution to preserve the Palatinate, which came to a great sum; for that purpose I borrowed also 75,000*l.* of my brother of Denmark, and now have sent to him to make it up 100,000*l.* and all this have I done with the Charge of Ambassadors, and otherwise; which have risen to an infinite sum, which I have born myself, and hath cost me above 200,000*l.* in preserving the Palatinate from invading, finding no hope of the rest, besides 300,000*l.* and besides the Voluntary Contribution: and I am now to take care for a worse danger against next summer, albeit I will leave no travel untried to obtain a happy peace; but I thought good to be armed against the worse time, it being best to intreat of peace with a sword in my hand. Now I shall labour to preserve the rest; wherein I declare, that if by fair means I cannot get it, my crown, and honour and all shall be spent with my son's blood also, but I will get it for him: and this is the cause, for all the causes of Religion are involved in it; for they will alter Religion where they conquer, and so perhaps my grand-child may suffer, who hath committed no fault at all. There is nothing done without a speedy Supply, and 'bis dat qui cito dat;' wherefore I hope you will no more fail me now, than you have done my predecessors. In this I must trust your cares; and I think if a man could see all your hearts in one face, it would testify a general acclamation of this my motion. Consider who it is that moves you, your King; and his care of Reformation, and the Charges which he hath discharged, besides 40,000*l.* of late in the pyratrical war; and consider if I deserve not your respects. For your parts, you may be informed of something fit to be required of me for matter of justice; I never directly nor otherwise desired the contrary; for which purpose I have chosen judges of the best learning and integrity that I could; and if they prove unjust, I will not spare them. It's strange that my Mint hath not gone this 8 or 9 years; but I think the fault of the want of money is the uneven balancing of trade; for other things (I confess) I have been liberal; but the main cause of my wants hath been the ill govt. of those whom I have trusted under me: for Bounty, I will not make every day a Christmas; and yet it may be I have hurt myself in some, and in others my subjects; but if I be truly informed, I will rightly reform; but for you to hunt after Grievances to the prejudice of your king and yourselves, is not the errand: deal with me as I deserve at your hands; I will leave nothing undone that becomes a just king, if you deal with me accordingly. I know this parl. hath been of great expectation; and so was that at my first coming, when I knew not the state of this land. I was then led by the old counsellors I found which the old queen had left, and it may be there was a misleading, and a misunderstanding between us, which bred an abruption. And at the last parl. there came up a strange kind of beasts, called Undertakers, a name which in my nature I abhor; which caused a dissolution; now you have the advantage, that I call you out of my free motion, and my trust is in your good offices for my good estate; even in all and every one of you I hope I want not good subjects; and I assure you, ye shall find an honest king of me: how happy a fame will it be that he is revered and loved by his people, and reciprocally loves them? Now shall I be honoured by my neighbour princes, and my govt. peradventure made an example for posterity to follow. And so I leave you."

The Lord Chancellor's Speech.] The king's speech being ended, the Lord Chancellor, sir Francis Bacon, viscount St. Alban, made a brief exhortation to the house, to this effect:—"May it please your maj.; I am struck with admiration in respect of your profound discourses, with reverence to your royal precepts, and contentment in a number of gracious passages, which have fallen from your maj. in your speech. It is a saying of Solomon, somewhat dark, but apt, 'That the words of the wise are like nails and pins fastened by the master of the building in the midst of assemblies;' so, in regard of the reverence of your maj.'s words, they are like nails that strike through and through; first into the memory, then into the hearts of the hearers, which is the best way to imprint them into their minds. For myself, I hold it as great commendation in a chancellor to be silent, when such a king is by, who can so well deliver the oracles of his mind, as for me to speak. Only, sir, give me leave to give my advice to the upper and lower house briefly in two words: 'nosce teipsum.' I would have the parl. know itself; 1st, in a modest carriage to so gracious a sovereign; 2ndly, in valuing themselves thus far, as to know, now it is in them by their careful dealing to procure an infinite good to themselves in substance, and reputation at home and abroad. As there is great expectation in the beginning of this parl. so I pray God, it may be as good in the conclusion; that it may be generative, begetting others hereafter. Now I am to put you in mind of your laudable custom, to elect one to be your common mouth or Speaker; for which purpose you are presently to assemble yourselves in the house of Commons; but the king, for the presenting of such to his maj. giveth you till Saturday next, the 3rd of Feb."

The lord chancellor having concluded, the Commons retired to their house, and there chose The. Richardson, esq. serjeant at law, for their Speaker, who was presented to the king on the day appointed, and, with the usual ceremonies, approved of. In order to give the proceedings of this parl. with the utmost impartiality, we shall keep strictly to the authority of the Journals, except where Rushworth, or any other historian, intervenes with some circumstances not taken notice of in the former work.

Feb. 5th. The Lord Chancellor moved, "That such as have any proxy from any Lord, licenced by his maj. to be absent, should deliver the same to the clerk of that house; and that every lord should cause the writ of summons, to him directed, to be given to the same clerk; to the end that by these proxies and summons, so entered, it may better appear who was absent." After this, the Lord North stood up and acquainted the house, "That having read and considered of the summons, directed to himself, he found the same to vary from the former and ancient form of writs of that nature. The consideration of which was by their lordships referred to the committees, which shall be nominated and appointed to consider of the orders and customs of this house, the privileges of the Peers of the kingdom, and lords of parl." A committee was immediately named for that purpose, who had power to call to attend them the lord chief justice, some other judges, the attorney general, and such other of his maj.'s council as they thought fit, to meet in the Painted Chamber, after the rising of the house.

Complaint against Rd. Camell.] Feb. 8th. One Rd. Camell, a clerk in the Petty-Bag-Office, was brought to the bar of the Lords, to answer a Complaint made against him, for omitting in the body of the writs, directed to several Lords, these words, 'prædilecto et fidei nostro,' and had only given the names of such Lords to whom the said writs were directed. And though the said Camell did then and there, on his knees at the bar, humbly acknowledge his fault, and declared himself very penitent for the same; yet, as he was not able to excuse or make any defence for his neglect, and because it was held justly offensive to those Lords whom it particularly concerned, and to be much against the honour and dignity of the house; by unanimous consent, the said Camell was committed prisoner to the Fleet. On the 10th, an Order was made for his enlargement, on his humble Petition to the house.

A Conference for putting the Laws in Execution against Jesuits, &c.] Feb. 14. Sir Edw. Coke, accompanied with the lord Cavendish, sir Fulk Grevil, chanc. of the excheq. the Treasurer of the Household, mr. sec. Calvert, and several others of that house, delivered the following Message to the Lords:—"That the Commons do pray a Conference, concerning joining in Petition by committees of both houses unto his maj. for the better execution of the laws against Jesuits, seminary Priests, and Popish Recusants; and this, by the Nether House, is desired to be with all convenient expedition." After the messengers were withdrawn, the Lords took the Message into consideration; the desire of the Commons was generally approved on, and a committee for the conference was appointed.

Feb. 15. The lord chancellor declared that his maj. having been moved to know his pleasure when the Committees of both Houses shall wait on him, with their Petition, relating to Jesuits, &c. had appointed Saturday the 17th inst, for that purpose. The lord chancellor was desired to be the common mouth, in delivering the Petition from both houses to the king; but some debates arising, about the form of the Petition, the consideration thereof was referred till next morning.

Feb. 16. It was moved, that since the Commons desired his maj. to declare himself for the execution of the laws against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and Popish Recusants, by Proclamation, whether to the word Proclamation, 'or otherwise' should not be added? Upon a division of the house, it was carried for the additional words; but with Proviso, That if the Commons did not approve of them, they should be left out in the Petition. The Committee of Lords having acquainted that of the Commons with this resolution, the Commons insisted upon it, that nothing formerly agreed to should receive any alteration in matter or form.

Quarrel between the E. of Berkshire and Ld. Scroop.] This day the lord chancellor acquainted the house, that this morning a quarrel or jar happening between two noble members of that house, the earl of Berkshire and the lord Scroop, namely, that the former did push or thrust the other forcibly in the house, against the honour and dignity of it. Hereupon both the said lords were called to the bar to answer the misdemeanor aforesaid; and it appearing by proof, that the said earl was the aggressor, and did violently push the lord Scroop, they were both ordered to withdraw into separate rooms, till the house could take consideration of this matter. Soon after the earl of Berkshire being called again to the bar of the house, and being on his knees, the lord chanc. told him, that the house had considered of his fault, which they found to be very great; in that his lordship being a peer, who therefore should be tender of the privileges of the house, had, in the house, and in the presence of the Prince his highness, offered force to a member of the same. The censure therefore was, that his lordship be committed close prisoner to the Fleet, until the house should take further order in that cause. The gentleman-usher was ordered to attend the said earl to his own house, at his request, but disarmed, and from thence to the Fleet.—Afterwards the lord Scroop was called for, and brought into the house, and ordered to his place; to whom, standing uncovered, the lord chanc. declared, That the Lords had considered of the nature of the fault wherewith he stood charged, and found him not worthy of blame, for any fault of commission, but only of omission, in not complaining to the house. That otherwise he had carried himself temperately, and therefore it was the pleasure of the house he should keep his place.—On the following day, the lord Scroop moved the house for the enlargement of the earl of Berkshire, upon which it was ordered, that the said earl should immediately have the liberty of the prison, but to continue there till the house shall take further order therein.

Feb. 19. The lord chancellor made a report to the Lords of what had passed at the access of both houses unto his maj. on Saturday last. His lordship's relation was brief, as he said, as well because most of all their lordships were then present; but principally for that his lordship knew, and willingly acknowledged, he was no way able, in any degree, to deliver it in such sort as his maj. spake it.

The Earl of Berkshire's Submission.] The lord Berkshire's Submission having been delivered in writing, it was openly read in hæc verba: "My lords, I am wonderful sorry to have so overshot myself, as to have done any thing that distasted justly the house; especially, at such a time as his highness was therein; which I desire your lordships to conceive to have proceeded out of sudden passion, in respect of a conceit and apprehension of some distaste given me. But still I submit myself to your lordships grave and wise censure, humbly requesting your lordships to accept of this, as satisfaction, from him that will ever be, your lordships humble servant, F. Berkshire."—The lord Berkshire was then called, and being directed to stand up, from his knees, the Lord Chancellor spoke to this effect: "My lord of Berkshire, when you were last here you heard of your fault and punishment, now you shall of your release: the lords having understood and nobly considered of your Submission; and the party, especially grieved, being a suitor for your discharge, whereunto all their lordships have yielded; with this, that a public reconciliation and satisfaction be made between you." The lord Berkshire then went to the Prince at the upper end of the house, and, on his knees, said somewhat in a low voice to him; it was not heard by the rest of the lords, but thought to be an acknowledgment and submission for his offence committed in his highness's presence. Afterwards the lord Scroop went from his place to the Prince, and there, in presence of his highness and many of the lords standing by, the aforesaid two lords were reconciled. The lord chanc. being returned to his place, openly rehearsed this matter to the house; and added, that if either of the said lords, so reconciled, should at any time hereafter, do, or offer to the other, any wrong, contrary to this reconciliation, the party so offending would be deemed guilty of an high offence to the prince and contempt of the house.

Feb. 20. A Message was sent from the Lords to the Commons, desiring a Conference, in which the substance of his maj.'s Answer to the late Petition of both houses, might be delivered to them, by the lord chanc. who by common consent had been appointed the prolocutor of both Lords and Commons, on that occasion. The time, if it was convenient to them, forthwith in the Painted Chamber. This was agreed to by the Commons; and on the return of the lords committee, the lord chanc. acquainted the whole house, That he had communicated the substance of his maj.'s Answer to the committee of the other house, from such notes as he had taken of it, when it was given. That, thereupon, sir Edw. Coke, one of their committee, had desired him to let them have the Memorial in writing which he had taken; since they of the other house had delivered in their suit, or Petition, in the same manner. To this he answered, That forasmuch as the paper, on which he took the said Memorial was small, and unfit for public perusal, he desired he might have time, till to-morrow, to perfect his said notes.—The question being then put, Whether they should be delivered in the manner the chancellor mentioned? It passed in the affirmative. The lord Hunsden moved, that the original should remain with the clerk of this house, but was not seconded. Nothing material happening to come before the Lords for some days, we shall now relate what was passing in the House of Commons during this time.

Debate in the Commons as to Recusants.] Feb. 5. Sir James Perrot moved, "That all the members of the house might take the Communion; which was a touchstone of their faith." Sir Edw. Gyles moved for "liberty of Speech, but not to admit extravagant speeches; and that such should be punished in that house. That there were many Popish Recusants, and multitudes of Jesuits and Seminaries, ready for mischief, in and about this city. That their malice encreased with their number. Put the house in mind of the gunpowder-plot. Moved to petition the king to put the laws in execution against them." This motion was seconded by sir Jerome Horsey, who moved, "That 4 or 6 of that house might be appointed to search the vaults and cellars, under the parliament house, twice a week. Their numbers hereabouts might prove dangerous; and their malice like to be the principal cause of the ruin of the king of Bohemia. Their making bonfires and rejoicing at it. But hoped that the king yet remained the Lord's Anointed, and that he would be again established; and be the means to ruin the Pope. That they that eat their God would eat us, &c." These and many such expressions were thrown out against the Papists. And it was at last agreed for a Conference with the Lords to join with them in a Petition to the king to put the laws in force against them.

Debate on the Supply.] Mr. Secretary Calvert put the house in mind of what this parliament was principally called for. "The ardua regni, mentioned in the writs, were to make good laws, and to supply the king's wants; which last was for to keep the state from danger and scorn. That this was more pressing and now a bleeding business; therefore, though it was not usual, yet, in respect to the necessity and rareness of the case to begin first with this. That the king expected a Supply, in these his urgent necessities, and especially to recover the patrimony of his children, that the king's wants were known to be urgent; and how could it be otherwise, considering the vast expences of the Crown, and the small means the king had received from his subjects; except the Benevolence, none in 10 years time.—The king had strove to lessen his Expences, being loth to burthen his people; household, navy, ordnance, Ireland, &c. The crown not to be suffered to lie under this burthen without help. Dangerous, not to king only, but to kingdom also; for they are relatives not to be disjoined.—Though the king, for many just causes, had hitherto been neutral for Bohemia; in respect of conscience, honour, &c. Yet, for the Palatinate, if not by treaty, he was resolved by war to regain it. But this admits of no delay, one day's neglect may overthrow it. The state of it now is, that Spinola hath conquered all but Heydelberg and 2 or 3 other places; Bohemia defeated; all the confederate princes and countries fallen off, and reduced to the Emperor's obedience. That this affair had been referred to a Council of War who have reported 30,000*l.* charge for the first year. The king already hath borrowed and employed in that business 100,000*l.* That an extraordinary embassy was ready; but the best treaty was with sword in hand.—That all Christendom was in confusion; Germany, Bohemia, the Low Countries, Sweden and Poland; the Turk had got the greatest army they ever had, since the time of Solyman; which was to be ready by the 1st of March. This circumstance, alone, is very important to us; and it is not honourable for our king to have his sword in his sheath, when so many are drawn.—For our Grievances they are many and just; no body without some sores; the king had promised a gracious hearing on that score; and he that will not take hold of it, betrayeth his country for which he is trusted. Lastly, he moved for a committee."

Sir Wm. Cope spoke next. "He professed his own zeal to further the king's business; but was against the question for a committee at that time. He wished this parl. had been held a year ago; but now it was sitting to look what was to be done. That the Supply, granted, must be divided; for Bohemia, the Palatinate, and for the king's other wants; but a Committee was not fit now for any of them. That he expected a committee of the whole house would sit every afternoon; to consider the state of Christendom, England, the state of wars, and the best means to carry them on. This to be done by a general committee; which will be the greatest terror to the adversary."

The Treasurer of the Household said, "That he beseeched the hon. house to consider, that never any well-affected subjects had greater cause to be pressed and make Supply for preventing of pressing dangers. That there was no doubt of the king's willingness for retribution. Open and free dealing with him, were the best means to work upon his royal disposition. He promised all his own good offices to further this; and concluded, that whosoever doth not so, betrayeth both king and kingdom."

Sir John Davys. "I expected not this motion, this day; but I think it fit, since it is now moved. All men run together to quench a fire; which is our case. Though we are not so here; yet the Palatinate is on fire; Religion is on fire; and all other countries on fire. Though we begin this matter now, we cannot end it so; though we agree on Subsidies, yet, there must be time for drawing bills, reading and passing them; commissions, levying, paying in, &c. But this is the greatest cause, the greatest occasion for a Supply, since the Conquest. I shall mention 4 other causes. 1. For Recovery of the Holy-Land. 2. For the redemption of Rd. I. 3. For the recovery of France. 4. For saving of Ireland; but, the recovery of the Palatinate is greater than all.—For the sake of Jerusalem, there was a perpetual war, for 100 years, at least. Henry. II. gave 50,000 marks at that time. Rd. I. pawned all the jewels and demesnes of the crown. All this to obey the Pope's commands and imposture; which was to recover that blessed land the Pope had cursed, but, his end, to usurp their temporal jurisdiction. We, for the Palatinate, have a just title, they none.—For the second. Rd. I. his ransom was 150,000 marks; plate of religious houses, chalices, &c. were melted down for it. This was a noble work, and better than the French did; who left their king here, several years, unransomed. But Religion was not then in question, as it is now.—So for the wars in France; the title was just, and though recovered at last, yet there was great expence about it. No loss, if it had not been meddled with at all. But, the Palatinate otherwise; this is dangerous to the Low Countries, the United Princes, and the whole Protestant interest.—For Ireland, two millions were disbursed; and 6 Subsidies and 12 fifteenths given here. Yet, the loss of Ireland not so dangerous as the Palatinate; for the Irish would never long have endured Spanish tyranny. Therefore, I move for giving this very day; and no doubt, God will bless it." On the other hand,

Sir George Moore said, "That since diverse things had been proposed, every man expected and required liberty of speech. As free choice so free voice. That this was granted in the Proclamation before parl.; and since, by the king's own mouth. We live under laws made by ourselves; other nations are governed by the Civil Law; and, he doubted not but every man would keep himself within bounds. That Religion and the Church were the principal matters of a parl.; Grievances and Supply the next. Parliaments were antiently called to relieve Grievances, as appears by the statute of Edw. III. And many of those were increased in this long intermission. That Esau came out first, yet Jacob was the Blessing. Therefore, he moved, That the Supply and Grievances might go hand in hand together; and that a committee of the whole house might be appointed, to consider of both; but no speech now de quanto."

Sir James Perrot. "If we differ with our equals, to have it done in love; if, with our superiors, with respect. Supply and Grievances to be as twins; to go together and have no precedency. That there was a Proclamation to restrain speaking of Matters of State, and the king's speech confirmed it. There was, also, a restraint put on petitioning in religious matters. Moved for a Petition to the king to explain himself what he intended by Matters of State. If Recusants and the like, so Monopolies, &c. may come within the compass of the prerogative: even, for the Palatinate, what to be given, how to be employed, &c. may come within compass of Matter of State. A committee may form such a Petition, and bring it into the house to-morrow. Is against conference with the Lords; 'Frustra fit per plura, quod fieri potest per pauciora.' He truly honoured all the Lords in general; but, in the last parl. they rejected conference; if they denied them again it would be a prejudice. Moved for a committee to consider of a Petition to his majesty to the purpose above."

The Master of the Rolls. "I commend the last gent.'s speech, but differ from him, in sending a message to the king about that which he yielded before, as freely and fully as could be. I hope that none will abuse this liberty of speech, and, if they do, that this house would punish them for it, before notice be given of it to the king. For the necessities of the kingdom; all who have spoken have done it to one end; every one hath a special interest in it, in regard to his estate, children, &c. He speaketh both for king and kingdom. The hazard of the king's grand-children which are descended from the lady Elizabeth. The relief is thought necessary by all; the question only, of the time when to treat of it. If not speedily, it will do no good; necessary delays, though begun now, must make it long before it be received. I agree that Supply and Grievances go together; and that half the house may attend one and half the other. Necessity is a law, against which there is no reasoning. Let both be reported together. The king hath more desire to redress our Grievances, than we to supply him."

Sir Edward Coke. "Virtus silere in consilio, vitium in consilio." I joy that all are bent with alacrity against the enemies of God and us; Jesuits, Seminaries, and Popish Catholics; it was a grievance complained of the 8th of this reign, that the laws against Recusants were not executed; I would have all those Grievances, 8 Jac. reviewed, of which that was one; if any new increased to take special consideration of them. I and Popham were 30 days in examination of the Powder-Plot at the Tower. The root of it was out of all the countries belonging to the Pope, and Faux repented him that he had not done it. God then, and in 1583, delivered us for religion's sake.—The privileges of the house concern the whole kingdom; which, like a circle ends where it began. But take heed, we lose not our liberties, by petitioning for liberty to treat of Grievances, &c. No proclamation can be of force against an act of parl. In Edw. III.'s time, a parl. was holden every year, that the people might complain of Grievances. If a proclamation comes against this; the law is to be obeyed and not the proclamation. The 4th Hen. VIII. Strowde moved against the Stannary court; but was fined after the parl. and imprisoned by the steward of the Stannary. Thereupon, a law ensued, for freedom of speech in the house; but it ought to be done in due and orderly manner. My motion is, that the Grievances may be set down; those that are nought in radice, or tractu temporis, first. The king's ordinary Charge and Expences much about one; the extraordinary ever born by the subject; therefore the king can be no beggar. And, if all the corn be brought to the right mill, I will venture my whole estate, that the king's will defray his ordinary charges. Lastly, he moved for a committee of the whole house for Grievances; and said the remedying them would encourage the house, and enable them to increase the Supply."—After this the question was put, Whether a Petition to the king for Freedom of Speech, against Recusants, the business of the Supply, and for Grievances, should be referred to a committee of the whole house? And it was resolved to go upon them that afternoon.

Debate on the Scarcity of Coin.] Feb. 6. Mr. Glanville saith, that there is a general complaint throughout the kingdom of the great Scarcity of Money; which is a business worthy the consideration of this house; and thinketh it best to consider, 1. Whether there be such want of money or not? 2. What are the causes of it. For the 1st, he believeth that there is a want and scarcity of Coin, because of the general complaint of all men; for that landlords can get no rent of their farmers; for that the price of land is fallen from 20 years purchase to 18, 16, 14; and, in some places, to 13 and 12 years purchase; and for that the mint for coinage hath not gone these 10 or 12 years. 2. That the reasons and causes of the want of money are divers; more than, he doubteth, can be found out, or will be revealed. Some say, there is too much coin carried northward; that our expences and cost on foreign commodities and merchandise is another cause; and the excess of plate, in so much that gentlemen of ordinary fashion will be served in plate; and, although this may be thought a means to treasure up silver and gold against a time of scarcity and need, yet is there great want of it by using it. The patent of the East India Company is another cause of the want of money; for though they affirm they carry away no plate or coin out of this kingdom, but that they have it elsewhere, yet they sell our commodities beyond sea, and from thence carry the money they receive from it into the East Indies, and so they forestal the coming of the money hither.

Sir Wm. Spencer, son and heir of the lord Spencer, saith, that there is also a patent prohibiting any Gold or Silver Lace or Thread to be brought from beyond sea hither; a third part whereof (as those that are skilful in those trades say) would make good bullion; so as, there being (as the Patentees themselves cannot deny) made and used of Gold and Silver Thread and Lace in a year to the value of 60,000*l.* this patent by this means hindereth the importation of so much as would amount unto 20,000*l.* per ann. and then there is employed to make this 60,000*l.* worth of Gold and Silver Thread and Lace 20,000*l.* more per ann.; so as in all this patent is 40,000*l.* per ann. loss to the kingdom.

Sir Edw. Sackville saith, that in all businesses of this nature and weight, there is commonly a Petition, and other notes and collections delivered to his maj. pretending a good and benefit, that by this suit will accrue both to his maj. and to the commonwealth; the consideration of which petitions, and other collections concerning such businesses, his maj. ever referreth to some certain referrees; who examine it, and certify his maj. the validity of it. He therefore desireth, that those who were referrees in this business, and have certified his maj. of the conveniency of it, and have thereby so much abused both his maj. and the commonwealth, may be known, and that their reasons may be examined, to the end that they may receive the blame and shame of it.

Sir Giles Mompesson desireth, that the referiners may be called before the committee to declare, what they think to be the cause of the Scarcity of Coin: and that the merchants adventurers, and others who traffic in those parts, whence we have used to receive coin, may also be examined, what is the reason of such want of coin.

Sir Wm. Stroude moveth, that none of those that are interested in the Patents aforementioned, may be of the committee appointed for considering of this business.—After which it was resolved, That all those motions be referred to the former of Grievances.

Sir John Leedes put out of the House for not taking the Oath.] Feb. 10. Sir John Leedes having sat in the house not having taken either of the oaths, as others of the house had, and was bound to do by the statute, when as he saw every man thus particularly as before make protestation, that he had taken both the oaths, &c. went out of the house to the lord steward's deputies (who were purposely gone forth to minister the oaths to such as had not taken them lawfully, fully, &c.) desiring to have the oaths ministered unto him; but they, first asking him, whether he had sat in the house or no this parl. whereto he answered he had; and then they demanding, whether he had taken the oath in part or none at all, he said none at all, they forbore to give him the oath, till they had first acquainted the house with it; which they did.

Mr. Crewe. That sir John Leedes cannot serve in parl.; for then the house should dis-pense with an act of parl. which saith, he who sitteth in the house unsworn shall be accounted as a man not elected or returned. If this had been presumption, he should have been sent to the Tower: if corruption, that he would refuse those oaths, then a heavier punishment according to the law. But it was not the latter, because he, being or having been the king's servant, hath taken the oath heretofore.

Sir John Strangeways said, it could not be ignorance in him, for that he served in this house the last convention; and this parl. there hath been so much speech of it, that he could not but know the danger of it.—Upon this sir John Leedes was called to the bar, where he kneeled; and then, being bid stand up, he confessed he had sat in the house a quarter of an hour on Wednesday morning last, being unsworn. He was therefore disabled to serve in the house for this parl. and a new writ was sent forth by course, not order, to make election of another burgess in his place; and he was discharged without farther punishment, paying the serjeant's fees, his punishment being remitted, because the omission was only imputed to negligence.

Mr. Sheppard expelled for his Speech concerning the Sabbath.] Feb. 15. Mr. Sheppard, on the 2nd reading of 'an Act for the keeping of the Sabbath, otherwise called Sunday,' said, "That this bill was idle and indiscreet, first, for the title of it. Every one knoweth, that Dies Sabbati is Latin for the Sabbath-day, and Dies Sabbati is Saturday, as it is taken in all writs, returns, and amongst lawyers. So as it is no otherwise than if it should be titled, 'an Act for the observing of Saturday, otherwise called Sunday.' So much for the title. The body is no better than the head. This is first an act made in the spite of the face and teeth of the King's Book, which allows of dancing on the Sundays; and king David says, 'Let us praise God in a dance.' This is a point of divinity, let us leave it to divines; and, since king David and king James bid us dance, let not us make a statute against dancing. He that preferred this bill was a perturber of the peace, and a Puritan." Here he was staid by command.

Sir Tho. Wentworth said, "That this bill was put in by a worthy member, and that the manner in which it was now so traduced was not fit to be supported."

Sir Geo. Moore said, "That in every parl. sithence he served, there had been bills for observing the Sabbath. To inveigh in such a bitter manner against this bill, when in 27th Eliz. a more strict passed, was not sufferable. He for his intemperances ought, as others before, to be brought to the bar. To be first sequestered, and then called to the bar to answer it."

Sir Wm. Cope. Sheppard took occasion, from Puritans who keep the Sabbath, to rail against this bill that is for observing the Sabbath.

Sir Edw. Coke. Whatsoever hindereth the observation of the sanctification of the Sabbath is against the scripture.

Mr. Crewe. Before a man's words be out of his mouth they are his own; but, when they are out, they are presently other men's.

Mr. Sheppard answered, "That he knew not, nor had means to know, who preferred the bill."—He was then commanded by the house to withdraw himself out of the house, which he did accordingly.

Sir Hen. Anderson. Sheppard's actions were violent. He said, there was a kind of cattle crept up of late, and wished they might not be perturbors of the peace; that Sheppard did wrong to all the house, and him particularly, who preferred the bill.

Sir Tho. Hobby. Sheppard said, that, if a Puritan be presented to the Ordinary for non-conformity, presently a justice of the peace would be ready to fly in the ordinary's face.—On the following day,

Mr. Pymme said, "He observed 4 offences that were committed by Sheppard in his Speech. 1. Against him who preferred the bill. 2. Against the justices of peace. 3. His profaneness. 4. Against the laws made by this house, and against the house's indiscretion. 1. For the first, he said, he that preferred the bill was a perturber of the peace. 2. That justices of the peace were maintainers of puritans, for, if any man complained to the Ordinary against a puritan, you should have a justice of peace ready to fly into the face of him that so complained of them. 3. That king David said, 'Let us praise God in a dance;' thereby comparing the dancing about maypoles, which was forbidden by the statute, to the dancing before the ark; saying, shall we inhibit dancing, which king David allowed of and commanded? 4. That by this bill was no other, than to make a law in spite and in the face and teeth of the King's Book; thereby setting dissention between the king and this house, which could not but proceed from some ill ground, and hath an ill object: and farther exclaimed against the laws of this house, saying, we made gins, engines, and barricadoes against papists, and not so much as a mousetrap against a puritan.—For the punishments there were 4 points. 1. To pronounce him an unworthy member of this house. 2. To imprison him. 3. To fine him 100l. 4. To except him out of the pardon.

Mr. Price. If any man has erred in judgment, not of affection, let us not want charity.

Sir Edw. Coke. That it is in religion as in other things, if a man go too much on the right hand, he goes to superstition, if too much on the left, to profaneness and atheism. And, take away reverence, you shall never have obedience: 'maxima charitas, facere justitiam.' He wisheth to have such birds crushed in the shell; for, if it be permitted to speak against such as prefer bills, we should have none preferred.

Sir Jeremy Horsey. That in 85 Eliz. there was preferred a bill into this house, that such as came not to church on the Sundays should pay, for every Sunday he was absent, 12d.—Mr. Sheppard was then called in to the bar, and there on his knees he heard his sentence, viz. "That the house doth remove him from the service of this house, as being unworthy to be a member thereof."

Debate on the Patent for Inns, &c.] Feb. 19. In the Committee of Grievances, Mr. Noye said; let us enquire, whence grow these Grievances; for the king hath let us know that he is not acquainted with it. Monopolies and power of dispensation of penal laws are chief grounds of all the Grievances, and this ariseth and proceedeth 'per importunitatem impetrantis;' and therefore let us examine, who these are, for the king by his Book hath published his distate of these importunate suitors: and therefore it is good that we teach them more manners. Before any patent is passed, there is first a Petition to his maj. shewing what good will accrue to the commonwealth by granting of the same, and what increase of benefit to the king; and what abuses (for want of such a remedy as they propound) do abound: whereon the king ever referreth the Petition to some whom his maj. thinketh fittest to consider of the petition, both for matter of law, conveniency, and good of the state and commonwealth; and thereupon the referees are to certify his maj. the truth of what they think of the petition; and, as they certify for the lawfulness and conveniency and good both of his maj. and his estate, and the particular good of the commonweal, his maj. accordingly granteth it. Wherefore it is most fit, the referees should be examined. There are some patents that in themselves are good and lawful, but abused by the patentees in the execution of them, who perform not the trust reposed in them from his maj.; and of such a kind is the Patent for Inns, but those that have the execution abuse it by setting up Inns in forests and bye villages, only to harbour rogues and thieves; and such as the justices of peace of the shire, who best know where Inns are fittest to be, and who best deserve to have licenses for them, have suppressed from keeping of ale-houses; for none is now refused, that will make a good composition. There are also some, who have gotten a power to dispense with the statute of Vagabonds, Rogues, &c. and so make themselves dispensers of the royalties only proper for the king himself.—The like patent is granted for toll, leets, warrens, markets, &c. and set up bills of it on posts, like new physicians that are new come to town, making merchandises of it. Seeing all those new projectors do all things against the king's intention, which is nothing less than to grieve his subjects, it were good to send for them and examine them; and, if they have done well, to encourage them, if ill, to punish them.

Sir Edw. Coke. There is prerogative indisputable, and prerogative disputable. Prerogative indisputable, is that the king hath to make war: disputable prerogative is tied to the laws of England; wherein the king also hath divers prerogatives, as 'nullum tempus,' &c. None of all these Monopolies but have fine examples. There are 3 sorts of patents. 1st. Directly against the law: 2d. good in law, but ill in execution: 3d. neither good in law nor execution. For the first, when the sword of justice, which the laws have trusted the king withal, is given to a subject; and the king saith in his Book, that all grants of Monopolies, and dispensations of penal laws are void in law: when the king granteth his power to a subject, the commonwealth rues for it; and of this kind are old debts. For remedy of this that a course be taken, that, if debts owing to the king are not called for within a time, then to be lost. Of the 2nd kind are Patents for Inns. A 3rd are those which are neither good in law nor execution; and these are concealments, which are dishonourable to the king, for no subject may do it; and indeed the king never knows of it, the sole fault whereof lies in the referrees; and for this a bill should be drawn, that if the king hath been out of possession 60 years, and not recovered any rent for it within that time, then not to be recovered by the king as a concealment. Monopolies are now grown like Hydras' heads: they grow up as fast as they are cut off. All new offices raise the prices of things. In 4 Hen. 7. a dispensation was granted, that some should not pay Subsidies: this was after repealed by act of parl. for otherwise it would have grown so common, that no man would have paid, seeing others freed. He shewed that all the kings, from Edw. III. to this king have granted Monopolies; and, even in queen Elizabeth's time, there were some granted. Sir Rd. Mompesson and one Rob. Alexander procured of queen Eliz. a Patent for the sole transporting of anise-seed. Monopolies have been granted heretofore 'de vento & sole;' that in Devonshire and Cornwall a patent was granted, that none should dry pilchards but those patentees.

Mr. Alford. That this was the first parl. that ever he saw counsellors of state have such care of the state. 1 Edw. III. 'Est jus regium revocare' all Patents; and that we should desire his maj. to extend his prerogative to suppress all the patents, and let us fall upon them that have thus by importunity procured them patents. And first, concerning the Patent for Inns, every poor man that taketh in but a horse on a market day is presently sent for up to Westminster and sued, unless he compound with these patentees: and all ancient Innkeepers, if they will not compound, are presently sued at Westminster for enlargement of their house, if they but set up a new post, or a little hovel more than of ancient was there. And instead of reformation of abuses, this patent doth but raise reckonings on the poor traveller; and, instead of restraining the number of Innkeepers, at Bath, where there wont to be but 6, and the town desired sir Giles Mompesson there might not be more, yet he increased them gradatim from 6 to 20 Innkeepers.

Debate on the Scarcity of Money.] Feb. 26. Sir Edwin Sandys said, he remembered the king's recommendation to this house concerning the scarcity of money. He laboured to shew the necessity of considering of this point. And first beginneth to shew the want of the husbandman and handycraftsman; the one cannot be set to work, and, for the other, the looms are laid down almost every where; and every loom maintains in work 40 men; and so many men are now, for want of money in this kingdom, as it were turned out of the inheritance of their hands. The want in the 2nd sort of men, viz. yeomen; they likewise break their conditions, covenants, and bonds, not (thanks be to God) for want of fruits of the earth, but for want of money; and the fairs also of the kingdom are at a stand. The want of money in the 3rd sort, viz. gentlemen; they by this means want their rent. There is no distemper like to that of want, which hath no laws or bounds.

Sir Wm. Herrick. There was wont to be coined 300,000l. per ann. for 20 years together; and, since the East India Company was set up, there hath not been coined above 20,000l. in any year. That the Goldsmiths trade, having been incorporated these 400 years, is now, for want of bullion and outlandish coin, clean decayed: that there was more plate made in the 7 last years of Eliz. than hath been these 7 years last past, by much; and therefore the Goldsmiths making of plate is not the cause of want of coin; which, notwithstanding the greater quantity that was made in the late queen's time than is now, was yet plentiful enough. The shew of the Goldsmith's shops in Cheapside is the greatest in Christendom. There are now above 20 shops set up.

Sir Edw. Coke sheweth, that there were two things that principally concern and encrease kingdoms and commonwealths, viz. soldiers and money. That there was coined from the 1 Eliz. unto 16 Jac. nine millions and a half of silver and gold. Sheweth further, that there are 7 Causes of want of Money and Coin in this kingdom.—1. Money turned into plate.—2. Gold folia that is employed in gild-ing of things.—3. Change of Money, or silver being much undervalued by us here of that our gold is; which was raised; and so was not our silver, and also all our money passeth at lower rates here, than it doth beyond sea in other countries.—4. The East India Company, who had licence to transport 100,000*l.* at their first setting up; and albeit they do not, since that time carry out of the kingdom any more English money, yet they intercept the dollars and other money that would otherwise come into this kingdom, and bring in for it nothing but toys and trifles.—5. The goods imported exceed the goods exported, and therefore there must needs go forth of our coin to pay for the surplussage.—6. The French merchants for wine carry forth 80,000*l.* per ann. and bring in nothing but wines and lace, and such like trifles.—7. The Patent for Gold and Silver lace, which not only wastes and consumes our bullion and coin, but hindereth the bringing of any into the kingdom; which was wont to be so much as would yield 20,000*l.* per ann. of good bullion.

Mr. Secretary addeth an 8th cause, and that is the great number of cattle that are every year brought out of Ireland, for which much, and only money is exported out of this kingdom.

Sir John Strangeways. There is 100,000 head of cattle brought every year out of Ireland; which are here sold, some for 40*s.* others for 3*l.* a piece; and they that sell them will have no payment but in money.

Sir Edwin Sandys divideth the causes of Want of Money in this kingdom into 3 general heads.—1. The Want of Importation of Coin into the kingdom. 2. The Abundance of Exportation of coin out of the kingdom. 3. The great Consumption of Money in the kingdom. For the first, there was wont to come out of Spain a great mass of money, to the value of 100,000*l.* per ann. for our cloths and other merchandises, and now we have from thence for all our cloths and merchandises nothing but tobacco: nay, that will not pay for all the tobacco we have from thence, but they have more from us in money every year 20,000*l.* So there goes out of this kingdom as good as 120,000*l.* for tobacco every year. There is an edict at Rochelle, that none shall import any Gascoign wines into their town, until their own country wines are sold; and yet we permit other countries to import into our kingdom foreign corn, to the great hindrance of the sale of that which is grown here amongst us.

Mr. Crewe. There is, as hath been alledged, a great confluence of causes of the Scarcity of Money; and 'felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas.' I think the stock of money that was wont to be employed out of the bulk of the Dutchmen's money is a great cause of this sudden damp and scarcity of money in the kingdom. We have in hand 3 great businesses of state, and for the good of this commonwealth. The first is to sweep the house of parliament of the Monopolies. 2. To know the cause of the want of money in the land.

3. To look out the bills of Grace; wherein his maj. was graciously pleased to say, he would meet us more than half way.

Sir Henry Poole addeth, that one other cause of want of money is, that there is so much conveyed into Scotland; and therefore wisheth some course may be taken to prohibit that it be not transported thence beyond the seas.

Sir Dudley Digges. The East India Co. doth not export above 30,000*l.*; and that the cause that the Mint standeth still is, that the state giveth not valuation to money.

The Master of the Wards. If the value of the importation of the East India Co. do exceed, the value of the merchandises exported, then we may assure ourselves (as also of all other trafficks and trades) that there hath been money exported.

Sir Edw. Giles. The year that I was sheriff of Devonshire, and so almost every year, there goeth out of Devonshire for corn 100,000*l.* per ann.; for there is not much grown in that county, which is very populous, by reason of the number that are set on work there in making that country kersies.

Sir Tho. Rowe. That money goeth here at so low a rate, of that it doth in foreign countries (and foreign coin being prohibited here) so that none can bring in any foreign money hither, but he shall lose by it; which makes all such as come hither bring with them bills of exchange; whereas, otherwise they would bring with them money; and most of these strangers carry forth of this kingdom's money. The East India Co. carrieth not out of Europe 30,000*l.* per ann. money merchandize. A due proportion ought to be between gold and silver. The standard of silver is not alike here with other countries. The Dutch raise and fall their money at their pleasure. Any that shall bring in money here shall lose 8 per cent.—It was then ordered, "That a Committee of the whole house shall sit every Tuesday, to consider of the causes of Want of Money, and that they shall have power to send for any man or books concerning this business."

Feb. 27. In a Committee on the above business,

Sir Wm. Herrick, who was once a goldsmith, saith, that there is most years carried into Poland, 50,000*l.*

Sir Edw. Coke. That 10,000*l.* per ann. was wasted by melters of gold.

Sir Edw. Sandys. There are 3 principal causes of Want of Money in the kingdom. 1. Defect of Importation of money. 2. Excess of Exportation of money. 3. Consumption of money in the kingdom. Merchandize and money is all one in matter of Importation and Exportation, but in matter of consumption money is the chief. The fountain of money is Spain. By traffick we have had heretofore out of Spain, every year, 100,000*l.* per ann. besides the wines and other commodities we have had from thence in exchange of our merchandizes. It is lawful to bring money out of Spain for victuals, although it be prohibited otherwise. The cause we bring not money out of Spain, is, for that we have our return in tobacco; which, if we would bring out of other places, which are under the protection of our king, we should have more money from Spain. The Summer Islands and Virginia have plenty of tobacco, and it grows every year better than other; for that country tobacco was worth 2 years since but 4s. the pound, and it is now so much bettered, as it was sold this last year for 8s. That it will be a double profit to us to divert the bringing in of tobacco out of Spain, and to cause it to be brought out of Virginia and the Summer Islands; for thereby we shall enrich those countries under our dominion, and also England shall be better stored with money, when we will not take our return for our merchandize in tobacco, but in coin or bullion, as we were wont to do.

Mr. Towerson. The great concourse of strange Bottoms, that bring in out of other countries merchandize, do carry forth, as it is to be doubted, nothing but money. And also the high rate and price of the Mint for coining is a great cause also that it goeth not. That the least part that the East India Co. hath spent is gone forth in money or coin. There is much money transported into Turkey, for which there is brought into the kingdom nothing but currants, silks, and indigo.

Sir Nath. Riche. The defect of trading into the West Indies, as in the time of Eliz. is a cause that there is a greater Scarcity of Money than there then was. Another cause is, the great impositions laid on cloth, as the pretermitted custom and the like: and that the want of the price of wools is a great cause of the want of money. The importation of salt out of France is another cause of it, for the French do carry away for their salt nothing but our gold and silver. In Spain our merchants are paid in brass, and to change that into silver or gold they lose 15 of the 100.

Mr. Guy. There is not now so much lead digged as was wont to be, for that the tax that is imposed on it is so great. At a monastery in Liege and Brussels there is an abundance of English coin; wherefore it were good that order were taken that so much money be not transported out of England by strangers or others.

Sir John Walter. The proclamation in the lord treasurer Salisbury's time, that no foreign coin should be current here with us, is a great cause of the Scarcity of Money. Before this we had much coin came in out of Spain, France, Germany, and the Low Countries.

Sir Foulk Greville, chanc. of the excheq. The under valuation and difference of the standard for money, is as well the cause that foreign coin is not brought in, as is the proclamation which did command that no foreign should be brought in.

The Master of the Wards. The Merchants Adventurers Customs, which were wont to be, 37,000*l.* are now come to be but 27,000*l.* per ann.; so there was 10,000*l.* loss to the king and kingdom, and proportionably there must be 200,000*l.* per ann. less brought in than there was wont to be. The French do import much more than they export. The Turkey Co. do carry forth more coin than the East India Co.

Mr. Secretary. There may not be a prohibition that any tobacco should be brought out of Spain; for then the Spaniard will prohibit the bringing of some other merchandize, which is more needful for us to vent, and to have from them: for that, by the Treaty with Spain, all free trade and traffick used at the time of the treaty is to be allowed and used to both kingdoms, and their merchants, or others, for each other's commodities. Heretofore the Spaniard was wont to fetch our commodities, and lay us down money for it; and they have more need to seek our merchandize, than we theirs: nay, it would be happy for this kingdom if Spain would prohibit the sale of their merchandize to our English merchants; for the merchandizes brought from thence are not needful to us, but they are only superfluous commodities; and the Spaniards would gladly give us money for our commodities, rather than go without them, being indeed such as they cannot want.—It was hereon resolved by the House, that the Importation of Tobacco out of Spain is one reason of the Scarcity of Money in this kingdom.

March 1. Mr. Hackwill reporteth from this committee, that in their examination of sir Giles Mompesson's business, they found the heads and extent of his offences to multiply, and they therefore desire a present message to the Lords.

Sir Edw. Coke. There are in my observation 6 kinds of men, that never thrive or prosper. 1. Alchymist; for 'omne vertitur in fumum' with him. 2. Monopolizer; for he engrosseth to himself what should be free for all men. 3. Promoter, who for the most part lives upon the spoil of poor men. 4. Concealment-monger, or he that gets Concealments. 5. Depopular, who turns all out of doors, and keeps none but a shepherd and his dog. 6. New Projector, who is lately started up.

March 2. Mr. Hackwill, concerning sir Giles Mompesson, reported, that the Committee of Grievances is of opinion, that a message should be sent to acquaint the Lords; that we have discovered matters and offences tending to the wrong of his maj. in his justice, honour, and estate, to the disinheritation of his maj.'s subjects, and the corruption of the commonwealth, and this by a man of quality; and therefore we thought it fit to pray a conference with their lordships.

Proceedings against sir Giles Mompesson, a Monopolist and Patentee.] We shall now present the reader with a narrative of the proceedings against sir Giles Mompesson, a member of parl. a Projector, and a great Dealer and Patentee. This man the commons convened before them, and ordered him into custody of the serjeant at arms; but he, being conscious of his guilt, found means to make his escape and fled beyond sea. The particulars of this affair will best appear from the Journals of the Lords, to whom the commons carried their complaint against the said sir Giles, and others concerned with him in the execution of his projects: all the judicial proceedings both against this man, and others of much higher rank, in the sequel, being transacted before this supreme Court of Judicature. We shall therefore now return back to the Journals of the Lords where we left off, in the diurnal account from that authority.

March 3. A Message from the Lower House was delivered to the Lords by sir Edw. Coke, attended by several knights, citizens and burgesses, to this effect:—"That the House of Commons had entered into a due consideration of divers heavy Grievances, and do desire a Conference about them; leaving the time, number and place to their lordships appointment. He further added, as part of what they had enjoined him to say, that whilst their house was thus, amongst themselves, in treaty and advice, the principal offender, sir Giles Mompesson, was escaped. Therefore, the Commons did desire strict scrutiny should be made for finding him out within the realm." The messengers being withdrawn, the Lords agreed to the conference; the number, the whole house; the time and place, March 5th, at 2 in the afternoon, in the Painted Chamber. Sir Edw. Coke and the rest were again called, and the lord chancellor acquainted them, That the house had agreed to meet with the Commons, as above; and that their lordships would give their best aid and assistance for finding out the offender. On which answer, sir Edw. desired to explain his message a little further; and declared that the Commons were not fully provided for a conference so soon: but that his meaning was, That if their lordships would be pleased to yield to one, then the other house would prepare the business so as it might give least interruption to their lordships greater affairs: and, when they were ready, would return and acquaint their lordships with it. The chancellor answered, That the Lords would suspend the time, till the Commons were ready for the Conference.

Several proposals were then made for the apprehending of sir Giles Mompesson; and a Message was sent to the Lower House to acquaint them, "That they had appointed a committee of 40 lords, of which the Prince was the first, to confer with a number of the Commons, immediately, about that point." The lord Zouch, warden of the Cinque-Ports, was ordered to send his warrant thither, to search for and apprehend the said sir Giles, if he should attempt to escape that way. The two lords presidents, of Wales and of the Council at York, were ordered to cause strict search to be made in the several ports under their charge. The lord treasurer had the same charge given him, to take care that all officers of the customs and other officers, within the ports, havens and creeks of this land, be warned of this business. Lastly, orders were given to the lord-admiral that he should instruct all vice-admirals and other maritime officers under his jurisdiction, to make the like search for this extraordinary runagate.

All these orders and directions of the Lords being told to the Committee of the Commons, they approved of them, with thanks; and only desired that a more private search might be made for the offender. Accordingly, a warrant was ordered to be drawn, as from the Lords, and signed by the chancellor, as their Speaker; and the lord chamberlain, the earls of Arundele and Southampton, the lords Hunsden and Houghton, were appointed for that purpose. Which warrant, was ordered to be directed to the deputy-clerk of the crown, and clerk of parl. and to all mayors, bailiffs, &c.—In the midst of these orders and directions, the lord-admiral, the marq. of Buckingham, declared openly to the house how much he had been deceived and abused by this offender, sir Giles Mompesson; who, but very lately, had wrote to him, protesting his innocence, affirming that what was objected against him was but matter of cavil, and that he desired only a legal trial by due course of law.

March 5th. The Lord Chancellor acquainted the Lords, that the deputy-clerk of the crown, and the clerk of parl. with others had, according to their lordships direction, made search into the several houses of sir G. Mompesson, sir Fra. Mitchell, and in the house called and used as for the exercise and execution of letters patents, concerning Gold and Silver Thread, &c. in Woodstreet; and that in each search the said clerks had brought away divers books and writings, concerning such matters wherewith the said sir Giles standeth charged; which they had sealed up, according to the direction of the house. The Lords ordered that the said things so sealed up, should be safely kept by the clerk of parl. until their lordships should be pleased to give further direction, about delivering them to such members of that house as should be assigned to receive the said books and papers, for the better manifestation of the truth in such matters as the said sir Giles stood charged with.

Motion for an Academy for Youth of Quality.] The same day the lord-admiral Buckingham, moved, "That since the Education of Youth, especially of Quality and Worth, is a matter of great consequence; therefore to provide that such persons, in their tender years, do not spend their time fruitlessly, about the town or elsewhere, his lordship wished that some good and fit course might be taken for the erection and maintenance of an Academy, for the breeding and bringing up of the nobility and gentry of this kingdom, in their younger and tender age: and for a free and voluntary contribution, from persons of honour and quality, for that purpose." This motion (says the Journal) was generally liked and commended, and many grave and judicious speeches were used, by several lords, touching the most considerable and material points, and the perfect accomplishments of this most honourable project. Some concerning the place where such an Academy should be placed and erected; others, what qualifications, arts, sciences and exercises should be there taught and practised; then, how to be maintained; and to what kind of young gentlemen freedom shall be given to resort to live there as they shall please, with other circumstances. And, in order that the matters and points aforesaid might, with more conveniency, be opened and discussed, the house was adjourned during pleasure.

Further Proceedings against sir Giles Mompesson.] March 6. The Lords received a message from the Commons, "That they had taken notice of some warrants, issued by their lordships, for search in certain places for papers concerning sir Giles Mompesson. That the parties, therein employed, had found and brought in certain papers sealed up, also, a trunk and a bag in which other papers and books are sealed up, which they desire may be delivered to them. That one question had been made by the persons so employed, concerning their power, and they desire further warrant, from the lords, to authorize them to open locks, doors or chests, that their search may be more enlarged." Answer. "That the Lords do grant the request of the Commons in all its points; and will give direction for the proper additional words to be added to the warrant."

March 12th. The Lord Chancellor reported what passed at the last Conference of both Houses; the inducement of which was, to clear the king's honour touching Grants to sir Giles Mompesson, and the means of procuring the same. The effect of this Conference was, "That the king, on the Petition of the said sir Giles, to have a Patent to reform abuses in divers innkeepers, and a warrant to compound for the penalty of obsolete laws touching the prices of horse-meat, had referred the same to several judges, for the point of law; and to divers lords, for the point of conveniency. That his maj. had shewn the like care, in granting the Patent for Monopoly of the sole making of Gold and Silver Thread. That sir Henry Yelverton, attorney-general to the king, had advised the same to be returned into his maj.'s own hands, and then by indentures to authorize divers persons to manage it; but that this also was referred by his maj. to the consideration of several of his council. That the benefit arising to the king was made over to others, pro tempore; that the authority granted by the king, was much abused in the execution thereof, to the intolerable grievance of the subject; and, lastly, that much imposture was used in the trade."

Order to prevent Lords from speaking in their own Defence at Committees, &c.] The Lord Chamberlain then stood up, and declared to the house, "That, at the said Conference with the Commons, two great lords, meaning the lord chanc. and the lord treasurer, spoke in their own defence, not being allowed so to do, when committees are named, and the said conference directed and limited by this house; which was against the antient orders thereof. Therefore his lordship moved that an Order may now be entered to prevent the like hereafter." The motion was agreed to, with this addition, "That the said lords should give the house satisfaction, by an acknowledgment of their error herein."—Whereupon the Lord Chancellor Bacon removing again to his seat as a peer, did acknowledge, that contrary to the orders of the house, he had spoken, at the last conference, more than he had direction from the house to do, and owned that he had erred therein. Which acknowledgment the Lords, in general, accepted of. The Treasurer also did the same; and then it was particularly ordered that these acknowledgments should be entered in the Journals. Moved by the lord Spencer and agreed to, "That no Lords of this house are to be called Great Lords, because they are all Peers."

The Lords taking into consideration the Grievances complained of by the Commons, it was agreed, That a select committee should be chosen to confer with that house, as well to demand of them such letters-patent, commissions, warrants, examinations and other writings, which concerned the Grievances; as also to receive, by word of mouth, such further informations as might conduce to the proving of such Grievances as they had complained of.

A Message was then sent to the Commons to desire a conference, and after a long stay, Answer returned, That they accepted of their lordships motion, and would appoint 50 of their house to meet them at 9 in the morning. That their committee should bring with them all the letters-patent, &c. which the Lords required to see concerning the Grievances; and should likewise inform their lordships of such other verbal proofs, which they had received about them.

Report concerning Protestation upon Honor.] The same day, the earl of Arundel reported to the house, "That on the 11th inst. the Lords Committees for Privileges, &c. attended his maj. according to order, and that his maj. was pleased to rest satisfied, as well in their enquiring of privileges, belonging to the peers, as also that they did no ways trench into the royal prerogative, as the judges had suggested, unto the said committee. His lordship further reported, That his maj. was pleased, of himself, to take notice, That he understood the peers conceived it a privilege, belonging unto them, to protest only upon their honours, and not to be put to their oaths, in suits, as ordinary subjects were." To which the Lords answered, "That it was very true the house had taken consideration of it; and found much cause to think, that in the time of divers of his royal progenitors they had enjoyed that privilege, which they thought the practice of later times had invaded, to their disadvantage; by encroaching upon it by little and little, when they were not careful of it. But withal, they told his maj. that this was no part of their errand to him; and therefore besought him to conceive, that what they spoke was only as private men, who were no way authorized, at this time, in these points, from the house. His maj. said, "That he understood it so, but desired them to answer him one question ingenuously, which was, Whether they thought Protestation, upon Honour or Oath, to bind them more." To which the Lords all answered, unâ voce, That they conceived protestation, upon honour, to bind more than oath did; as being the same before God and before the world; and, in regard to the trust given to their degree, a far greater charge. Adding, that they conceived the constant and undoubted usage of trying peers, for their honours, blood, lives and estates, upon their honour only, did plainly prove it; and that they thought no past age had produced any example of inconvenience in the practice of it. His maj. seemed fully satisfied, and bid them tell the house from him, "That he willingly agreed to this privilege, so as they would take care the common justice of this kingdom might not suffer in it. And that he was so far from diminishing their privileges, that he would rather add unto them any that were fit."

March 13. The names of the committee for the Conference, to be had this morning, with the Commons, were read. Moved by the earl of Arundele, "That the whole house (as a committee) might consider of the business now to be handled, in the Conference, with the Commons; which was generally agreed to. Whereupon the Lord Chancellor, moving from his place to his seat as a peer, after long debate, it was concluded and agreed to, That the lord chamberlain should begin the said Conference, and that it shall be lawful for any of the Lords of the said committee freely to question with the Commons; to this intent only, to be informed of their proofs of the Grievances of which they complain; and, to that end, to enter into disputes and arguments with them, and to appoint another meeting, if the cause shall so require. It was further agreed, "That the attorney-general should be assistant to the said Lords of the committee; and should take notes of the proofs produced in the conference; and that any lord might also take notes thereof, and compare the same with others. The lord chamberlain to make report thereof to the house."—At the return of the Committee from the conference, the lord chamberlain reported, That the committee of the Lower House desired to be excused from entering into verbal information and disputes, for that they had no authority so to do. But that they humbly desired leave to return to their house for such authority, and to meet again upon the same business."

In the Journals of the Commons of this day, is an entry, "That when sir Edw. Coke made the Report of this last Conference, in that house; he told them, That their proceedings were highly applauded, both by the Prince and all the Lords. And the lord of Bucks, having leave to speak, delivered himself to this effect: he first said, "That the king was both passive and active in these affairs: passive by his maj.'s gracious acceptance of these proceedings in parl. which was plain that the king loved plainness: active in that he strikes whilst the iron is hot; and since the king was willing to grant all we can ask, let us leave formality and ask real things. That, for his own part, since he had been righted in their house, he would do all his best endeavours to further the good both of king and kingdom; which could not be severed. That now he knew the wisdom of parliaments, he would submit himself to be a scholar to them. That two of his brothers being drawn into question on these affairs, he would not defend them; but leave them to the censure of parl. That he who begot these two had also begot one who would seek for their punishment."

The same day a Message from the Commons was brought by sir Edw. Coke and others, viz. "That whereas, at a meeting for a conference this morning, the lords committees of this hon. house desired to receive of them, not only all letters-patent and other writings, but also verbal informations of all other matters whereof they had made use in the proof of their Grievances, now complained of: and forasmuch as then they had no authority to enter into dispute, or to give any verbal information thereof, they had humbly desired leave to return to their house to receive such authority for the same: they do now humbly implore another meeting, on Thursday next, by 9 in the morning, at such place as their lordships shall appoint; and they will come prepared to give them full satisfaction." Ans. "The Lords have considered of this their request and will meet them, at the time desired, in the Painted Chamber. Nothing else material done. Adjourned to Thursday."

Report from the Committee on Grievances. March 15th. When the Lords of the Committee were ready to go to the Conference about Grievances, the lord treasurer declared, "That as every man ought to have a high esteem of his honour, so he ought not to be so rash as to infringe the orders of this hon. house; That many might think him peremptory, in defence of his honour, the other day; but he protested it was not out of any pride; for he freely confessed he spake, at the last Conference, more than he ought, by the ancient orders of this house; but he neither loved error, nor will condemn order; and therefore moved, That whatsoever was spoken of him, or by him, might not be prejudicial in their proceedings in this business."

After the Conference the lord chamberlain reported to the whole house what had been done at it; which was to this effect: "That the Commons had delivered in a Declaration of their Grievances, and the capita of their proofs, in writing, sub protestatione not to be a precedent for them to deliver in their proofs, in writing hereafter. Their Grievances were grounded upon grants of the Forfeitures and Dispensations of penal statutes, for Inns, grants of Monopolies for Gold and Silver-Thread, and grants of Concealments. Touching penal statutes, they highly commended his maj.'s care, both now and in former times, in referring the same to the Judges and his privy-council, and his resolution not to grant Dispensations therein. For the grants of Monopolies, they shewed, that many grants of the like nature have been questioned in former times, and resolved to be unlawful. For instance, in the Monopoly of sweet Wines, granted by king Philip to the town of Southampton. The monopoly of Starch. Monopoly for making Salt adjudged void; for that the invention alledged in the grant was not new. Monopoly of Train Oil. Monopoly for Cards. As to the grants of Concealments, they shewed how dishonourable it was for any lord to grant the like, much more for a king: that a cathedral church and 12 hospitals were swallowed up thereby: that it was contrary to the king's royal direction in his Book of Bounty; wherein he refuseth to be moved with grants of that nature. They set forth their care in these 3 points, viz. 1. Not to meddle with the king's prerogative; 2. To preserve the king's honour; 3. To restore the subjects their wealth. That they had delivered the Patents, Commissions, and other Writings, demanded of them. Two of the Declarations of the said Grievances, concerning Inns and Concealments, were then read."

After this, the lord Wentworth moved, and it was ordered, That no bill but the prince's bill should be read, until the business of sir Giles Mompesson be past and determined. The house to sit on convocation days, for the more speedy dispatch of that business. Adjourned till two in the afternoon.

Proceedings relative to the Grievances. March 15th, P. M. The third Declaration of Grievances, concerning Gold and Silver-Thread, was read. The lord chancellor opened the most considerable points in it, which he conceived to be five: 1st, the Patents, which are three, and the points in law concerning the same. Next, What Parties are to be charged for the same. The proofs, wherein are to be considered what hath been delivered by the Commons; and what may be further found out, and how. The Punishment to be inflicted on the Offender. Lastly, the precedents and manner of the punishment, according to the quality of the offender.

It was then debated by the Lords on which of these points to begin; and that it might be carried on more freely, it was agreed that the whole house should be a committee, ad libitum; on which the chancellor left his place, and sat as a peer. It was moved by the lord Spencer, and seconded by the lord Wentworth, That sir

Allen Apsley, with Twedy, Wilmot and Ferret, who abused the execution of those Patents, should be sent for and committed to custody. The earl of Southampton moved, "To begin first with the execution of the Patents by the patentees and their agents; and, as there were 3 Patents complained of, to appoint 3 committees, of a new number, each committee to examine the execution of one Patent. Also because the Lower House could not, nor did not, take the examinations, to them delivered on oath; therefore that the witnesses might be sent for, and sworn to their examinations." Which motion was seconded by the lord chancellor with this addition, "That the oath is to be given publickly in the house; for that it could not be administred in a committee." All which motions, on the question, were agreed to.—Next follows the names of the Lords appointed for the 3 Committees, with the order of the times for sitting.

March 16. The lord chamberlain, being the first of the committee on the Grievances by the Patent of Inns, declared, "That whereas it was yesterday ordered that parties, whose examinations were to be taken on oath, should be sworn in open court, it appeared that the gentlemen undernamed, whose testimony is very necessary, are members of the Lower House; and therefore he desired, that a message should be first sent, with great respect, to the other house, before they be sworn. Their names were sir Francis Fane, knt.; sir Rd. Titchburn, knt.; sir Fran. Goodwin, knt.; John Drake, esq; and Rd. Weston, esq. A message was accordingly sent to the Commons who returned for answer, "That as it was a matter of great and weighty consequence, they would take it into consideration, and send an answer by messengers of their own." This occasioned a long debate in that House, in the course of which,

Sir Edw. Coke said, that every one who sitteth here is as a judge, and hath a vote negative in the making of the laws of this kingdom: that the Judges of the Common Pleas, or of any court, are never sworn as witnesses in any case, albeit they know of something concerning it, and can testify in it; but, if their knowledge be asked, they answer it without an oath: that no Judge of the Star-Chamber can be served with a subpoena ad testificandum in that court; and therefore none of us are to be examined as witnesses in any thing whereof this House with the Lords are to be judges.

Mr. Noye. That the Lords have no more reason to desire any of us to be sworn to any thing that we have delivered to them, and wherein we desire them to join with us, than we have to crave to examine any of them for any thing that we receive from them.

Sir Robert Phillips. That, had the Lords been acquainted with such cases as that which we have sent them, they would not have sent to us a message to have any of us sworn as witnesses: but desireth, that this may not breed (as it is to be doubted some set it on foot for that purpose) any jar between us and the Lords, and so hinder our proceedings in the great business we have in hand: that we may answer, that since it is a thing that may be prejudicial unto us, that their lordships will be pleased to proceed on that which we have done; and, if they doubt of any thing, that records may be looked into, which will clear all the material doubts and points of that business.

Sir Edw. Coke. That for a member of this house to be examined on oath in a business sent from us to the Lords was never before desired: that we were best to answer, that we have no precedents that ever it was done, and that there is no necessity in it, because the greatest matters are sufficiently proved.

Mr. Wentworth. That we with the Lords are but one body, and therefore are not to be examined on oath; but we may attend them to answer by word without oath to affirm what they shall desire to be affirmed.

Sir Thos. Rowe. That we, having already adjudged the business, are not to be called as witnesses.

The Chancellor of the Dutchy. That, if we will not have a member of this house to be called to witness on his oath, then what will become of the business against the Lord Chancellor, which is principally testified by two members of this house.

Sir Dudley Digs. That the business against the Lord Chancellor is not of this kind; and, if the witnesses against him be found guilty of the delivery of the corruption and bribes, that they are then to be held (in his judgment) unworthy to sit as members in this house.

Mr. Alford holdeth it a preposterous thing to be called as witnesses in a business, where we have before been judges.

March 17. A Message from the Lower House, by sir E. Coke, and others, intimating, "That the Commons had been acquainted some principal persons of their house were desired to testify, upon oath, their knowledge concerning the Grievances complained against that wretched man, sir Giles Mompesson, and others: that the parties so required had offered themselves to be sworn; and therefore that house will not be scrupulous herein, as the Lords may perceive their concurrence and readiness to expedite that business:" which message was gratefully acknowledged by the Lords. And the aforesaid 5 members desiring a day's respite to put down their several dispositions in writing, to which they were to be sworn, it was granted.

March 19. A Memorandum is entered, That by reason of want of health and indisposition of the Lord Chancellor, a commission was awarded to sir James Ley, knt. and bart. lord chief justice of the king's bench, signed by the king, and under the broad seal, to execute that office in his stead. We shall soon find what was the Lord Chancellor's illness.

The same day a Message was sent from the Commons by sir Fulk Grevile, and others, "That the knights, citizens and burgesses of that house have sent up to the Lords a bill of Subsidies; which, as it passed that house with great and general alacrity and expedition, they doubted not but the lords will, with the like chearfulness, expedite the same."

In the midst of their inquiries into public Grievances, the Commons had thought fit to consider the necessities of the state, and grant the king a Supply.

The Subsidy Bill passed unanimously.]— March 12. The Subsidy Bill was debated in that house, and, at last put to two questions, whether the bill should be recommitted? which passed in the negative; and, whether to be engrossed, or no? which last was carried for engrossing, without one negative voice. On the 18th it passed the Lower House, and was ordered to be sent up to the Lords, as above-mentioned. We cannot omit, that a Message from the King was delivered to this house, on their unanimity, &c. in passing the Subsidy bill, "That he returned them thanks for their chearfulness in it; and looked upon it as giving him their hearts and all."—When this bill for granting two entire Subsidies, by the temporality, was read a first time by the Lords, the lord chief justice repeated the last proviso of the act, which declares, "That since it is not usual to grant a Subsidy at the beginning of a parl. they desire it may not be drawn into a precedent, nor be prejudicial hereafter, as the royal assent may be given, by commission, or otherwise, for the speedy levying of the same, the parl. still sitting." Ordered that this bill be read again in the afternoon.

Another Message came from the Commons, brought by Sir Rob. Philips, and others, "That, in their search into the Abuses of Courts, they found Abuses in certain eminent persons; for the which they desire a Conference, that such course may be taken for the redress thereof, as should stand with the honour and dignity of a parl. The time, place, and number of committees, they humbly leave to their lordships." Answer was returned, "That the Lords were well pleased to accept of the Conference required; the committee to be of their whole house, and at 2 this afternoon, in the Painted Chamber.

March 19, P. M. The lord treasurer returned, with the committee of the whole house, from the Conference; and, being to make the Report, told the lords that he desired respite till the next morning, that he might, in the mean time, peruse his notes taken thereof.—This day concludes with a Memorandum, That whereas, in the Subsidy bill granted by the laity, the University of Oxford was named before the University of Cambridge: it was much debated by the Lords what course was to be taken for an equality between them, that the one might not have the precedency of the other. But nothing was concluded on, about this matter, at that time.

Complaint against lord chancellor Bacon, and the bp. of Landaff for Corruption.] Before we proceed to this Report, it is necessary to look back a little into the Journals of the Commons, for the beginning of this business against so renowned a man, as sir Francis Bacon, lord Verulam. March 15th, sir Rob. Philips made a Report from the Committee, appointed to examine into the proceedings of the Courts of Justice, which he divided into three parts; the person against whom; the matter; and the opinion of the committee upon it, with the desire of further direction from the house. The person, he said, was the Lord Chancellor; a man excellently well endowed with all parts of nature and art; of whom he would not speak much, because he could not speak enough. He then proceeded to accuse the lord chancellor of Corruption, and opened the nature of the evidence to prove it; but, as this will appear much clearer in the Trial of the Lord Chancellor before the Lords, we shall postpone it till then.—The Commons, pursuing this enquiry in their own house, on the 19th received a Message from the king by one of the secretaries of state, “That the parl. had now sat long, and Easter being at hand; he left the time of cessation to that house: that his maj. named Tuesday, the 10th of April, if they thought proper; but this of their own choice.”—His majesty taking notice of the Complaint against the Lord Chancellor, said, “That he was very sorry a person so much advanced by him, and sitting in so high a place, should be suspected. That he cannot answer for all others under him, though his care in the choice of Judges had been great; but if this accusation should be proved, his majesty would punish him to the full. That the king would, if it be thought fitting here, grant a Commission under the great seal of England, to examine all upon oath that can speak in this business. The commissioners to be six of the Upper House, to be chosen by them, and 12 to be elected by this house. That his maj. was sorry the Chancellor should be so questioned, and hoped he would be cleared; but, if not, assured the house that he would punish him to the full.”—This message was most gratefully taken by the Commons; but, the matter being to come before the Lords, the offer of a commission, for examining on oath, was needless; so it was sent up to that house as aforesaid.

March 20. The Lord Treasurer reported the Conference yesterday with the Commons; in which he informed their lordships of great Abuses in the Courts of Justice. This he divided into three parts:—1. Of the Persons accused. 2. Of the Matters objected against them. 3. The Proofs. The Persons were the lord chancellor of England, and dr. Field, lord bp. of Landaff. The incomparable good parts of the Lord Chancellor were highly commended; the place he holds magnified, from whence bounty, justice, and mercy were to be distributed to the subjects, with which he was solely intrusted; whither all great Causes were drawn, and from whence no Appeal lay for any injustice or wrong done, save to the parl. That the lord chancellor is accused of Bribery and Corruption, committed by him in this his eminent place; of which two Cases were alleged, the one concerning Christ. Aubrey, the other Edw. Egerton. In the Cause between this Aubrey and sir Wm. Broncker, Aubrey fearing some hard measure, was advised to give the lord chanc. 100l. which he delivered to his counsel, sir Geo. Hastings, and he to the lord chancellor. The proceedings in this business going on yet, but slowly, Aubrey wrote several letters, and delivered them to the lord chanc.; but could never get any answer from him, till, at last, delivering another letter to him, the chancellor told him, that ‘if he importuned him again he would lay him by the heels.’ The proofs of this accusation are five.—1. Sir Geo. Hastings related it long since to sir Geo. Montague. 2. The lord chanc. fearing this would be complained of, desired silence of sir Geo. Hastings. 3. Sir George Hastings’s testimony thereof; which was not voluntary, but urged. 4. The lord chanc. desired sir Geo. Hastings, to bring the party, Aubrey, unto him, and promised redress for the wrongs done to him. 5. That the lord chanc. said unto sir Geo. Hastings, if he would affirm the giving this 100l. his lordship would and must deny it upon his honour.—The Case of Edward Egerton was this: There being a suit depending in chancery, between the said Edw. and sir Rowland Egerton, the former presented his lordship, a little after he was made lord keeper, with a bason and ewer of 50l. and above; and afterwards he delivered to sir George Hastings and sir Rd. Young, 400l. in gold, to be presented to the chancellor. Sir Rd. Young presented it; and his lordship took and poised it, and said it was too much, and returned answer, “That Mr. Egerton had not only enriched him, but had laid a tye upon his lordship to do him favour in all his just causes. The proofs are the testimony of sir Geo. Hastings, and one Merefill, a scrivener, thus far, That he took up 700l. for mr. Egerton; who then told him that a great part of it was to be given to the lord chanc.; and that mr. Egerton afterwards told him that the 400l. in gold was, accordingly, given to the lord chanc.”

At this Conference was further declared, that a bishop’s character was touched in this affair; whose function the Commons much honoured, though his person was somewhat tainted therein. The affair was thus: the business depending being given against mr. Egerton, he procured a new reference thereof from the king to the lord chancellor: his lordship first demanded the parties to be bound in 6000 marks, to stand to his award. Having entered both into bond for that purpose, the chancellor awarded the matter against Edw. Egerton, for sir Rowland Egerton. The former refused to stand to the said award, and a new bill was exhibited in chancery. Hereupon his lordship ordered, that the bond of 6000 marks should be assigned unto sir Rowland Egerton; and he to put the same in suit in his lordship’s name. The bishop of Landaff, as a friend unto Edw.

Egerton, adviseth with Randolph Davenport, and one Butler who is since dead; to endeavour to procure a stay of the decree upon that award, and a new hearing. It was agreed that 6000*l.* should be given for this by mr. Egerton, to be shared amongst them and certain hon. persons; and a recognizance of 10,000*l.* was required by the bishop from mr. Egerton, for performance thereof. The bishop's share of this 6000*l.* was to have been so great as no court of justice would allow. The Commons produced letters of the bishop's naming the sum, and setting down a course how this 6000*l.* was to be raised, viz. The land in question to be decreed to mr. Egerton, and out of that the money to be levied; and, if this matter was not effected, then the bishop promised, in verbo sacerdotis, to deliver up the recognizance to be cancelled. The recognizance was sealed, and Davenport rides to court, and moved the lord-admiral for his letter to the chancellor herein; but his lordship denied to meddle in a cause depending in suit. Then the said Davenport essayed to get the king's letter; but failed in that also: so that the good they intended for mr. Egerton was not effected; and yet the bishop, though required, refused to deliver up the said recognizance, until mr. Egerton threatened to complain thereof to the king."

The treasurer also declared, "That the Commons do purpose, if any more of this kind should happen to be complained of before them, that they will present the same to the Lords: wherein they shall follow ancient precedents, which shew, that great personages have been accused for the like crimes in parl. Lastly, they humbly desired, That forasmuch as this concerns a person of so great eminency, it may not depend long before their lordships. That the examination of the proofs may be expedited; and, if he be found guilty, then to be punished, if not, the accuser suffer the same."

This report being ended, the Lord-admiral acquainted the lords, "That he had been twice with the lord-chancellor to visit him, being sent by the king. The first time he found his lordship very sick and heavy; the second time he found him better and much comforted, because he had heard that the Complaint of the Commons against him for Grievances was come into this house, where he assured himself to find honourable justice. In confidence whereof his lordship had written a letter to the house; which letter the lord-admiral presented to be read, as follows:—

Lord Bacon's Letter to the Lords.] "To the right hon. his very good Lords, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in the Upper House of parl. assembled.—My very good lords, I humbly pray your lordships all to make a favourable and good construction of my absence; it is no feigning nor fainting, but sickness both of my heart and of my back, though joined with that comfort of mind that persuadeth me that I am not far from heaven, whereof I feel the first fruits: and, because, whether I live or die, I should be glad to preserve my honour and fame, as far as I am worthy, hearing that some Complaints of base Bribery are come before your lordships, my requests unto your lordships are; 1st, That you will maintain me in your good opinion, without prejudice, until my cause be heard. 2ndly, That in regard I have sequestered my mind at this time, in great part off from worldly matters, thinking of my Account and Answer in a higher court; your lordships would give me some convenient time, according to the course of other courts, to advise with my counsel and to make my Answer; wherein nevertheless, my counsel's part will be the least. For I shall not, by the grace of God, trick up my innocency with cavillations, but plainly and ingenuously, as your lordships know my manner is, declare what I know or remember. 3rdly, That according to the course of justice, I may be allowed to except to the witnesses brought against me, and to move questions to your lordships of their cross examinations, and likewise to produce my own witnesses for discovery of the truth. And lastly, if there come any more petitions of that nature, that your lordships would be pleased not to take any prejudice or apprehension of any number or muster of them, especially, against a Judge that makes 2000 degrees and orders in a year, (not to speak of the courses that have been taken for hunting out complaints against me) but that I may answer them according to the rules of justice, severally and respectively. These requests I hope appear to your lordships no other than just; and, so, thinking myself happy to have so noble peers and rev. prelates to discern of my cause, and desiring no privilege of greatness for subterfuge of guiltiness; but meaning, as I said, to deal fairly and plainly with your lordships and to put myself upon your honours and favours; I pray God to bless your councils and persons. And so I rest, your lds. humble servant, Fr. St. Alban, Canc. March 9, 1620."

The Bp. of Landaff's Defence.] The clerk having read this letter, the bp. of Landaff was admitted to speak in his own Defence, on the Accusation of Brocage, in a Bribe intended to the lord chancellor, in mr. Egerton's cause. The said bishop declared his great grief, "That he remained accused, arraigned, condemned and executed, in dicta causa. For, although he should, as he doubted not to do, clear himself, yet the scandal would not die. He said that the party who accused him was the party grieved; a man weak and mad with affliction; and as for the action whereof he was accused, he was but made use of in it. He was requested, first by Francis Jenour but refused; then by Tristram Woodward, and then he also denied it; at last the party himself requested him, at whose tears he yielded thus far; that the party, viz. Edw. Egerton, might acknowledge unto him a recognizance of 6000*l.* it was only acknowledged, not enrolled, nor intended to be enrolled; he was only trusted with it for mr. Egerton's good, Davenport and others were to be the actors. That he discharged his trust accordingly, though Davenport and others importuned him to the contrary. His aims in this action were two; the one charity, to do Mr. Egerton good, the other to prefer a beneficial suit to an hon. friend to whom he owed his very life. If he had an eye to some private gain to himself, having a wife and children, he had therein sinned against God, in not relying wholly on him for their maintenance; but no share in the sum of this 6000*l.* was ever purposed unto him, and upon strict examination of his conscience therein, he protested, before God, in whose sight he stood, and before this hon. assembly, 'qui estis dii, inquit,' That he was not to have had one denier of a share therein."

When the bishop had ended his Defence, the lord chamberlain moved, That for the better consideration of this business, and how to proceed to the proofs, the court may be adjourned, ad placitum, and the whole house sit as a committee; whereupon the lord chief justice removed to his place, as an assistant.—After much debate thereof, the lord chief justice returned to his seat as Speaker; and it was agreed, that a Message should be sent to the Commons, declaring, "That the Lords, according to the conference yesterday, have taken consideration of the Complaint by them made against the lord chancellor and against the lord bp. of Landaff. That they find the Commons have made use of 3 letters, written by the said lord bp. of Landaff, and of other writings, mentioned by them in the said Complaint; also the Testimony of two gentlemen, members of that house, sir Geo. Hastings and sir Rd. Young; in taking whose testimonies the Lords intend not to touch the privileges of their house, but to have it as from private persons and not as members of parl. Lastly, that the Lords may also, with the like respect, desire the testimony of any others, though members of that house, if cause shall require, upon the examination of the abuses complained of." Answer. "That the said two gentlemen will voluntarily, and not by commandment or direction of their house, attend their lordships; and that all letters required shall be sent accordingly. As for the general request, That the Lords may send for any other member of that house to be examined, herein they humbly pray that they may advise thereof." The conclusion of this matter concerning the bishop, will be found in the proceedings of the lords, under May 30th of this session.

During the time that the whole house sat as a committee, as aforesaid, it was debated and agreed to, that the parties undernamed should be also sent for, to be sworn and examined in this business, viz. Christ. Aubrey, Edw. Egerton, Fra. Jenour, Ralph Merefill, Tristram Woodward, Randolph Davenport. It was also moved and much debated, Whether sir Wm. Broncker and sir Rowland Egerton, the two adversaries of Christ. Aubrey and Edw. Egerton, should be sent for to be examined, whether they gave any bribe on their part.

It was moved by the earl of Southampton and agreed, That an Answer should be sent to my lord chancellor's Letter; whereupon a message was sent to him to this effect: "That the Lords received his Letter, delivered unto them by the lord admiral. They intended to proceed in his cause, now before them, according to the right rule of justice; and they should be glad if his lordship shall clear his honour therein. To which end they pray him to provide for his defence."

Moved by the earl of Suffolk, and much debated, touching the Precedency and Equality of the two Universities, when much was alleged, for the right of precedency, in each of them; but the earl of Suffolk desired only an equality between them; which was ordered to be put to the question to-morrow, after the Subsidy bill was read.

March 20th, P. M. An Answer was brought from the lord chancellor to the Message of the Lords, "That he returned them humble thanks for their assurance of justice in his cause, and well-wishes to him of success. The one secures, the other comforts him. That he intends to put their lordships in mind hereafter of some points contained in his Letter; for that the same were not spoken of in the message delivered unto him."—Sir Geo. Hastings and sir Rd. Young, jurati à voir dire, to all questions, asked by the court, or committee, or by any authorized by the court, whether their answers be by word, or set down in writing. Several witnesses sworn, in the cause of Grievances on the patent for Gold and Silver-Thread. Edw. Egerton was also sworn a voir dire, &c. after which he delivered a Petition touching the Proceedings in his Cause in Chancery; 'cujusquidem tenor sequitur in hæc verba.'

Mr. Egerton's Petition against the lord chancellor Bacon.] "To the rt. hon. the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in the present parl. assembled. The humble petition of Edw. Egerton, esq. humbly sheweth, That your petitioner being unmarried, and sickly, by Indentures of Uses, and other Conveyances, entailed divers manors and lands, in the counties of Chester and Stafford, to the use of your petitioner, and the heirs male of his body; and for default of such issue, to remain to sir John Egerton, and his heirs; which said conveyances were voluntary, without any consideration for the same, and with power of revocation.—That sir John Egerton having by deed executed in his lifetime, conveyed all his own lands unto Rowland Egerton, his son and heir; and having advanced in marriage all his daughters, did make his last will and testament in writing, under his hand and seal, having first bound the said Rowland, in a statute of 5000*l.* to perform his said will.—That the said sir John, by his last will, in general words, devised all his lordships manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, to your petitioner and his heirs, and made your petitioner sole executor. By which said will all the estate of the said sir John, in any part of your petitioner's lands, (if he had any estate therein, as indeed he had not) was lawfully devised to your petitioner, and his heirs.—That the said sir Rowland unduly obtained of sir John Bennet, kt. letters of administration, to be granted to two of his sisters, after the said will was exhibited to be proved; whereby your petitioner was put to 2000*l.* charge in suits of law.—That sir Rowland hath also, by indirect means, got into his hands the said Indenture of Uses, and all your petitioner's other writings and evidences, and refuseth to let him see the said Indentures of Uses, or to deliver to your petitioner a true copy thereof, albeit, in law, the same doth belong to your petitioner.—That the lord Ellesmere, late lord chancellor of England, before the probate of the said will, did decree, That the said sir Rowland should have and enjoy the manors of Urin Hill and Heywood-Barnes, being a great part of your petitioner's inheritance, worth 600*l.* per ann. with any cause of equity contained in the said decree.—That your petitioner made humble suit unto the right hon. Francis visc. st. Alban, now lord chanc. of England, to have the benefit of a subject to recover his ancient inheritance by ordinary course of law: That the present chancellor took from your petitioner 400*l.* in gold, and 52*l.* 10*s.* in silver plate; which money was accepted from your petitioner, by the chancellor, saying, 'Your petitioner did not only enrich him, but also laid a tie upon him to do your petitioner justice in his rightful cause.' That afterwards the said lord chanc. sent for your petitioner, and did, by great oaths and protestations, draw your petitioner to seal an obligation to his lordship of 10,000 marks, to stand to his lordship's award for all the lands whereof sir John Egerton died seized on; but not for any other of your petitioner's lands.—That afterwards your petitioner was, divers times, sent for by Tho. Sharpeigh, then steward of his lordship's house; and your petitioner was several times offered, That if he would presently pay 1100*l.* in ready money; that is to say, 1000*l.* for his lordship, and 100*l.* for the said Sharpeigh, that then your petitioner would have all his lands decreed unto him; which your petitioner could not then presently pay in ready money.—That afterwards the lord chancellor did not only confirm unto the said sir Rowland, the lands which he then held of your petitioner's inheritance, being worth 600*l.* per ann. but he did also take away from your petitioner more lands, worth 15,000*l.* and decreed the same unto the said sir Rowland, who did not make any title thereunto before the said bond was taken, or the decree made. Likewise the lord chancellor did decree, That the said bond of 10,000 marks, made by your petitioner to the said lord chancellor in his own name, should be set over and delivered to the said sir Rowland, who should sue for the same in the lord chancellor's name, and recover on it to his own use.—The lord chancellor did further decree, That your petitioner shall not take the benefit of the statute of 5000*l.* made by the said sir Rowland, to perform the will; and your petitioner is restrained, by the said decree, from the benefit of a subject to recover his right, by the ordinary course of common law, without any cause of equity set forth in the said decree.—That your petitioner having spent 6000*l.* in suit at law, and being deprived of all his said evidences, being utterly impoverished by the evil dealing of the said lord chancellor, and by the indirect practices of the said sir Rowland, is likely to be defrauded of all his ancient inheritance, contrary to the common justice of the land, except he be relieved herein by this high court of parl.—Your petitioner humbly prayeth, that the said sir Rowland may be ordered to produce and bring forth, upon oath, all such Indentures of Uses, Writings, and Evidences, as he hath, or any other hath to his use, concerning your petitioner's said lands, and whereby he claimeth any estate in the lands, to the end your honours may judge thereof, and do therein further, as to your wisdoms, shall seem to stand with justice."

After this Petition was read, mr. Egerton affirmed upon his oath, that the contents of it were true; and he was afterwards examined further in open court. Rob. Sharpeigh, esq. Randolph Davenport and Christ. Aubrey, were also sworn and examined.

March 21. At the request of mr. Egerton, 3 more witnesses were sworn and examined in his Cause: and many more witnesses offering themselves to be sworn, in the Cause against the Lord Chancellor, 3 several committees of the Lords were appointed, with a judge, or an eminent counsel, to attend each, to take Examinations, in order to expedite the Cause. Special caution was given them, that no one should be urged to accuse himself.—A Message was brought from the Commons by sir Thos. Edmonds, and others, "That the Commons acknowledge, and take in good part, the great respect between the two houses in all causes of this parl. To answer which, they are well pleased, that the Lords of this Court may examine any members of their house, who will freely offer themselves to their lordships for that purpose." At the same time he added, "That they had sent to their lordships a bill against Relators, Informers, and Promoters; and, especially, commended the good success and expedition of it; because they did conceive it would give great content to the country." Which bill was read a first time, notwithstanding the order of the house of the 15th inst. Fran. Joyner, Ralph Merefill, and John Churchill, were sworn, as witnesses in the Chancellor's cause.

March 21, P. M. Sixteen more witnesses were also sworn against the Chancellor; and as the examination of all these witnesses would take much time, it was agreed that the committees should transmit the names of the principal of them, and the heads on which they were to be asked: the examinations to be taken in open court.

The Form of the Oath agreed on.

"You shall swear that you shall true Answer make to all such Questions and Interrogatories as shall be mentioned unto you by this High Court, or by the Lords of the Committees, or by any person or persons, authorized by this high court. You shall say the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and you shall not spare to do so, neither for fear, favour, or affection, or any other cause whatsoever, whether your depositions be in writing, or by word of mouth. So help you God, and the Contents of this Book."

Interrogatories to be ministred to them that shall be sent to be examined in open Court.

"1. Whether they, by themselves, or any other person, have given money, or any other gratuity, to the lord chancellor, or to any servants, friends, or followers of his? 2. Whether they have advised or directed any to do so, or know of any other that hath so done? 3. Whether they, or the parties which they advised so to do, or have heard so to have done, had then any cause or suit depending before him, or intended to have any. 4. Whether they have intended, attempted, or known others that have attempted, or contracted for any gratuity to be given, though not performed?"

Sir Geo. Reynel delivered, in writing, his account of the Bribes given by him to the lord chancellor; which he also confirmed by oath.—Ordered, That no witnesses be examined as to what they received themselves; but only what Bribes were given to the chancellor. Several other witnesses were examined, and their depositions taken in writing, on oath.

March 22. The lord chief justice related a Message, delivered yesterday from the Commons by sir Rob. Philips, and others; which consisted, he said, of two points, the one matter of Respect, the other of Substance.—In the first they acknowledged the good correspondence between both houses, especially in the Examination of the Grievances complained of, and presented to the Lords; with humble thanks for the support the Lords added to their labours, in giving the oath to the examinants; which they could not do. They humbly desire to know the time of the recess of this parl. and of the access again, that they may depart accordingly, and meet at the same time with their lordships. The 2nd thing being Matter of Substance, consisted of 4 points against the lord chancellor. "The 1st, a Suit in Chancery, being between the lady Wharton, plaintiff, and Wood, with others, defendants, upon cross-bills. The chancellor, upon hearing, wholly dismissed them; but, upon the entry of the order, the cross-bill against the lady Wharton was only dismissed; and, afterwards, for a Bribe of 300l. given by the lady Wharton to the lord chancellor, his lordship decreed the cause for her; and then hearing that Wood, and the other defendants, complained thereof to the Commons, his lordship sent for them, and damned that Decree as unduly gotten; and when the lady Wharton began to complain thereof, his lordship sent for her also, and promised her redress, and said, 'That the Decree was not yet entered.'—In a Suit, between one Hull, plaintiff, and Holman, defendant; Holman, deferring his Answer, was committed to the Fleet, where he lay 20 weeks; and, petitioning to be delivered, was answered by some about my lord chancellor, That the bill should be decreed against him, pro confesso, unless he would enter into 2000l. bond to stand to the lord chancellor's order; which he refusing, his liberty cost him, one way or other, better than 1000l. Holman being freed out of the Fleet, Hull petitioned the lord chancellor; and Holman, finding his cause to go hard on his side, complained to the Commons: whereupon the lord chancellor sent for him, and, to pacify him, told him he should have what Order he pleased himself.—In another Cause between Smithwick and Wyche, the matter in question being for Accounts, the merchants, to whom it was referred, certified on the behalf of Smithwick; yet Smithwick, to obtain a Decree, was told by one Mr. Burrough, one near the lord chancellor, that it must cost him 200l. which sum he paid to Mr. Burrough, or Mr. Hunt, for the use of the lord chancellor, and yet he decreed but one part of the certificate; whereupon he treats again with mr. Burrough, who demanded another 100l. which Smithwick also paid for the use of the lord chancellor. Then his lordship referred the Accounts again to the same merchants, who certified again for Smithwick; yet his lordship decreed the second part of the certificate against Smithwick; and the first part, which was formerly decreed for him, his lordship made doubtful. Smithwick petitioned the chancellor for his money again, and had it all, save 20l. kept back by Hunt for a year."

The Lord Chief Justice delivered also 3 petitions to their lordships, received yesterday from the Commons; the first from the lady Wharton, the next from Wood and others, and the third from Smithwick.—The 4th part of the Message consisted only of Instructions, delivered to the Commons by one Churchill, a register, containing divers Bribes and Abuses in Chancery; which they desire may be examined.

Four more witnesses delivered into the Lords their despositions, on oath, against the Chancellor, in writing, and signed by their own hands. One of which, Wm. Peacock's, being observed not so full as yesterday, he was asked if he had spoke with some of the lord chancellor's servants since that time: which he owned he had: upon which he was ordered to write his deposition over again, and add the substance of that conference.

Report from the Committee on Grievances.] It was now that the proceedings against the Lord Chancellor met with some stop, by the Lords, in the several committees appointed to enquire into the other Grievances complained of, by the Commons bringing in the accounts of their progress in them.

The Lord Chamberlain, one of the committee appointed to enquire into the Grievances of the Patent concerning Inns and Hostelries, reported, "That in the said Patent were three things considerable: 1st, the legality of it granted to Mompesson; but in that the committee had no power to judge. Next the inconvenience. Lastly, the abuses in the execution. That the inconvenience appeared in the patent, where the judges are made subject to a base of fee 5s. ; and, in the execution, because that sir Giles Mompesson affronted the justices of the peace, and threatened several of them with the council-table. And, because there were certificates sent him, from time to time, of those Alehouse-keepers, who were suppressed for ill behaviour, he made this use of it, to make them Inn-keepers. That he granted licences to divers base fellows to keep Inns; and sued out processes against 4000, for keeping Inns without licence, and for the price of horse-meat, of which he only tried two suits. Lastly, his lordship delivered a collection of the several abuses and the proofs of them."

The Earl of Arundele reported, "That the consideration of the Grievances by the Patents of sole Manufacturing Gold and Silver-Thread, complained of, being committed to his lordship and other lords joined with him in committee, That they had often met, the business being attended with great difficulty and consisted of many particulars. That they had examined many witnesses, and more were produced who were fit to be examined, if the time of recess was not so near at hand. The Lords Committees have thought good to present to the house those proofs they have made, not to delay the time; but their lordships were not to be excluded from giving further proofs hereafter.—His lordship observed, That the Committee dealt, chiefly, with the execution, not with the legality of these patents. They found in the execution thereof, that the authority given by these patents, which ought to have been rarely used, was used by them familiarly, to the undoing of thousands. That the warrants dormant, to seize and imprison, &c. exceed all kinds of warrants; of which there are three, and one of them is without date and razed; and the other hath a date by a new hand. That sir Giles Mompesson committed divers to prison, without examination, which they could not do by that warrant. Several were threatened with imprisonment. That one Fowlis did lock up divers in his own house. That several houses were violently broke up and the parties goods seized. That others were compelled to enter into bonds, not to exercise their own trade and to stand to their orders; and to make oath what quantity of Gold and Silver-Thread they sold, and to whom. That sir Giles confessed divers of these wrongs, and made restitution unto many. That this work of Gold and Silver-Thread was much sophisticated, since the grant of the sole manufacture thereof. He further declared, That the Lords Committees urged none to accuse himself, and admonished every man not to accuse another out of passion. He desired, That though sir Giles be fled, yet that Fowlis and other delinquents may be heard here, what they can say in their own defence."

The Earl of Southampton, one of the committee to consider of the Grievances complained of for Concealments, reported to the house, "That they find his maj. to be much abused in the pretence and execution of this grant. They find that sir Giles Mompesson obtained a commission to himself, to call all officers before him; by virtue whereof he fetched up, from all parts, the king's officers, and kept them here to fill his book, granted unto him of 200l. per ann. on concealed lands, in recompence of his service. The proceedings, warrants, and the abuses in the execution, are all set down in the declaration, delivered by the Commons. Their lordships labour was to look into these informations, wherein they desired the help of divers gentlemen of the Lower House; who, not as members of that house, but as private gentlemen and friends, gave their lordships full satisfaction therein. In this search, they found proofs of every point, set down in the said declaration; and, for their more full satisfaction, they reviewed the Records themselves, wherein they found some proceedings, not mentioned in the declaration, and not warranted by any commission, viz. 1. Process used by George Geldard, sir Giles Mompesson's agent, in the king's attorney's name; the said Geldard confessing to one and but one. 2. Sir Giles used Geldard and his man as his agents; Geldard to be Commissioner and Geldard's man to be his clerk. Their lordships found likewise, That Geldard's man gave the evidence to the Jury, and, though the jury found an imperfect verdict, yet Geldard proceeded as upon a perfect one. That Geldard compounded with divers who were questioned for their lands, as concealed, and employed those parties, as commissioners, for their own compositions. That they set down in their book an Advowson and a Rectory at 4d. per ann.; and lands, called Pease Marsh, at 10s. a year; which was affirmed by sir Geo. Moore, the tenant to it, to contain 700 acres, and to be better worth than 300l. a year. That there was no time limited to sir Giles to fill up his book; whereby, his vexing the subject, to fill the same, might continue 7 years. Lastly, their lordships conceived, That as his maj. had been abused in the Grant and in the Execution of it, so he should also have been in the end."—After this last Report was ended,

The Lord Admiral Buckingham stood up and moved the house, "That care might be taken hereafter, that the sophistication of the manufacture of Gold and Silver-Thread be prohibited; and none be permitted to work thereon, to waste and consume the bullion of the land. He commended the trade that set so many thousands on work; and, if order was first taken for bringing in bullion, and against the sophistication, it might be gainful both to the king and commonwealth; and to new patentees, if another patent thereof should be thought fit. He shewed further, "that the motive for the grant of Concealments was, that sir Giles Mompesson offered his service to consider how the multitude of officers in the exchequer might be cut off. In which his maj. first asked the opinion of the Judges; and his maj.'s pleasure was not to prejudice any officer, during his life, but to provide for the future; which was, and yet is, his maj.'s resolution to do; in consideration whereof, this Patent of Concealments was first granted to the said sir Giles. It was ill foreseen, that a man of his corrupt disposition should be admitted to view the Records, which he might embezzle, blot or raze out for his own profit; but, at that time, sir Giles had the reputation of an honest man. That sir Giles had abused this grant many ways, but, as yet nothing was past under seal. That the abuse, partly, grew out of this, that sir Giles had compounded with one Geldard for the same, who, to make his best commodity thereof, put into the book matters of great value at small rates; which, when his lordship heard of, he rebuked sir Giles and willed him to look to it, and not to suffer any thing to be past but what the chanc. of the excheq. should first allow of. That, thereupon, the said sir Giles, in the hearing of his lordship, delivered his book to mr. Chancellor to be viewed, and whatsoever he thought good to be put out. Lastly, though much was intended to the prejudice of his maj. and the subject, yet nothing was past."—When the minister had ended his speech, a motion was made and agreed to, "That, although the Proofs given before the Lords against sir Giles Mompesson and others his agents, for their misdemeanors, were good and manifold, yet, their lordships will hear the parties themselves what they can say in their own defence. But, because Easter is drawing on, and the time of recess very near, in which short space all the delinquents cannot be heard and proceeded against; it was further agreed, That a collection be made of all the proofs, concerning sir Giles only; which being read to the house, the Lords would proceed to sentence sir Giles, though absent; for that his flight is an eviction in law: and for that the expectation thereof is great as well as the grievance, therefore the proceedings should be with expedition, that the whole kingdom might hear of the Punishment imposed upon Delinquents, by this parl. as well as of the granted Subsidies.

A debate arising, in what manner to proceed against the said sir Giles, whether by Indictment in that house, or otherwise? And there being some confusion amongst the Speakers, the Prince of Wales, who constantly attended this business morning and afternoon, made a motion, "That by the ancient Orders of the House, no lord was to speak twice, though to explain himself, except some other lord mistake his meaning in any part of his speech." This was commanded to be entered, and ordered to be observed.

On a motion of the earl of Arundele, the house was adjourned, ad libitum, and the lord chief justice left his seat, as lord chancellor. Then it was debated, What course should be taken with Matthias Fowles, George Geldard, and other delinquents, committed by the Lower House, and sent by them to be examined by the Lords; and many foul abuses proved against them. Likewise concerning sir Fra. Mitchell, whom the Lower House had first committed for a contempt against them, and is also found guilty of many great misdemeanors, relating to the patent of Gold and Silver-Thread. But nothing was then resolved on; and the chief justice returning to his seat, as chancellor, a message was sent from the Lords to the Lower House, to desire they would please to present themselves this afternoon, with their Speaker, to hear his maj.'s commission read for the royal assent to the two Subsidy bills: also, to acquaint them, that the Lords had agreed the recess from parl. this time, to be on Tuesday next; but that the Lords do leave the time for access again, to the consideration of the Commons: and further, to let them know that the Lords are very careful to expedite the bill against Promoters, which was so earnestly commended unto them. Which bill had been once read, but, because the time of the recess is so near, their lordships intend to spend this interval in proceeding to sentence sir Giles Mompesson only. Lastly, their lordships desire a Conference with them, about the safe keeping or bailing of Matthias Fowles, George Geldard, and other delinquents, committed by them of that house; and that they come prepared to give their lordships satisfaction therein." Answer returned, "That the Commons agreed to all these propositions of the Lords; would come prepared for the Conference that afternoon; and give them an answer to every thing."

March 22, p. m. The Speaker of the Commons being sent for in, and come to the bar, the lord chief justice delivered to the clerk the king's commission, signed by his maj. and under the great seal, with the two acts of Subsidies annexed to it. Which commission being read, the Commons withdrew.—The Lords being to meet the other house in the Painted Chamber, the earl of Dorset acquainted their lordships, "That he was informed by several gentlemen of the Commons, that the message sent them in the morning was wholly mistaken in the delivery of it. On which another message was sent to the same purport, by other messengers, in order to explain the former."—On the return from the Conference, the lord treasurer made the report of it to the Lords, that the Commons render their lordships humble thanks for their

hon. and respectful entertainment; with hearty thanks to Almighty God for the great and good unity between the two houses. That whereas their lordships had left the time of access again to parl. to be resolved on by them; they, upon serious deliberation, have agreed the same to be on the 17th of April next. That they refer unto their lordships the bailment or commitment of Matthias Fowlis, Geldard, and other prisoners, by them transmitted to their lordships. But their opinion is, if it may so stand with their lordships pleasure, that a goal is the best bail for them. And, as for sir Fra. Mitchell, though he be by them committed prisoner to the Tower, yet he is left to their lordships determination."—After some debate on what should be done with those prisoners, it was ordered, That Fowlis and Geldard should be committed close prisoners to the Fleet; with a special charge to the warden for their safe custody: and a warrant was made out by the clerk of parl. accordingly.

Further Proceedings in the Lord Chancellor Bacon's Cause.] March 23. It was agreed, "That the two former committees, or any two lords of either of the said committees, be appointed to examine witnesses, in the Chancellor's Cause, from time to time, between the recess and access of parl."—Edw. Egerton, esq. presented a Petition, praying, "That sir Rowland Egerton be ordered forthwith to produce, upon oath, certain indentures and writings gotten unduly from the petitioner. Upon a motion of the lord Sheffield, the said petition was ordered to remain with the clerk, until the corruption and bribery complained of, be determined; and then the lords would take it into their consideration."

On a motion of the earl of Arundele, who acquainted the house, "That the lords committees being ordered to examine none to accuse themselves, they had taken only the declaration of Tho. Norton Gervase Unwen, and Anthony Berry, touching the Patentees of Gold and Silver; it was ordered, That the said persons should be now examined concerning sir Giles Mompesson only."

Sir Ralph Hansby being sworn in the Lord Chancellor's Cause, the earl of Southampton shewed, "That the said sir Ralph being examined by his lordship and others, concerning a Bribe of 500l. given by himself to the lord chancellor, he made a doubt whether his Answer thereunto might not be prejudicial to his cause; wherefore, their lordships resolution herein was required, Whether the said sir Ralph should be urged to make his Answer or not?" After long debate of this matter, it was ordered, "That the Examinations, taken in this court, should not be hereafter used in any other cause, or in any other court. And although divers of the Lords were of opinion, That the party's confession of the giving of a bribe could not be prejudicial at all to him, yet others doubted thereof. Therefore, it was put to the question, Whether the said sir Ralph should be examined what gift or reward he had given to the Lord Chancellor, and it was agreed he should be examined in that form only."

The earl of Huntingdon, one of the committee appointed to search Precedents of sentences, &c. reported, "That they had searched the records, and the earl of Warwick read the heads of several precedents, and then delivered the notes taken out of the records, and signed by the officers, to be kept by the clerk.—The collection of sir Giles Mompesson's offences, touching Inns and Hosteries, and the proofs thereof, were read, with the patent and commission concerning the same."

The King's Speech to the Lords.] March 26. The king came to the House of Lords, the peers being all in their robes, and the Prince with his coronet on his head; the earl of Oxford, as lord great chamberlain, bearing his white staff, and the earl of Montgomery the sword. His maj. being seated on the throne, made the following Speech to the Lords only:

"My lords, The last time I came hither, my errand was to inform you (as well as my memory could serve me, of things so long passed) of the verity of my proceedings, and the cautions used by me in the passing of those Patents, which are now in question before you; to the effect, that they might not be abused in the execution: and this I did by way of declaration. But now I am come (understanding the time of your censure to draw near) to express my readiness to put in execution (which is the life of the law) those things, which ye are to sentence (for even the law itself is a dead letter without execution) for which office God hath appointed me in these kingdoms. And though I assure myself, that my former behaviour, in all the course of my life, hath made me well known for a just king; yet in this special case I thought fit to express my own intentions, out of my own mouth, for punishment of things complained of. The first proof whereof I have given by the diligent search I caused to be made after the person of sir Giles Mompesson, who though he were fled, yet my Proclamation pursued him instantly: and as I was earnest in that, so will I be to see your sentence against him put in execution.—Two reasons move me to be earnest in the execution of what ye are to sentence at this time: first, that duty I owe to God, who hath made me a king, and tied me to the care of govt. by that politic marriage betwixt me and my people. For I do assure you in the heart of an honest man, and by the faith of a christian king (which both ye and all the world know me to be) had these things been complained of to me before the parl. I would have done the office of a just king; and out of parl. have punished them as severely, and peradventure more, then ye now intend to do.—But now that they are discovered to me in parl. I shall be as ready in this way, as I should have been in the other. For (I confess) I am ashamed (these things proving so, as they are generally reported to be) that it was not my good fortune to be the only author of the reformation and punishment of them, by some ordinary courts of justice. Nevertheless, since these things are now discovered by parl. which before I knew not of, nor could so well be discovered otherwise, in regard of that representative body of the kingdom, which comes from all parts of the country: I will be never a whit the slower to do my part for the execution. For, as many of you that are here have heard me often say, so I will still say: so precious unto me is the public good, that no private person whatsoever, where he never so dear unto me, shall be so respected by me, by many degrees, as the public good, not only of the whole commonwealth, but even of any particular corporation that is a member of it: and I hope that ye, my lords, will do me that right to publish to my people this my heart and purpose.—The 2nd reason is, That I intend not to derogate or infringe any of the liberties or privileges of this house, but rather to fortify and strengthen them. For never any king hath done so much for the nobility of England as I have done, and will ever be ready to do. And whatsoever I shall now say or deliver unto you as my thought, yet when I have said what I think, I will afterwards freely leave the judgment wholly to your house. I know ye will do nothing, but what the like hath been done before: and I pray you be not jealous, that I will abridge you in any thing that hath been used. For whatsoever the precedents in times of good govt. can warrant, I will allow. For I acknowledge this to be the supreme court of justice, wherein I am ever present by representation. And in this ye may be the better satisfied by my own presence, coming divers times amongst you: neither can I give you any greater assurance, or better pledge of this my purpose, than that I have done you the honour to set my only son among you; and hope that ye with him, shall have the means to make this the happiest parliament that ever was in England. This I profess, and take comfort in, that the Commons at this time have shewed greater love, and used me with more respect in all their proceedings, than ever any house of commons have heretofore done to me, or (I think) to any of my predecessors. As for this house of yours, I have always found it respective to me; and accordingly do I, and ever did favour you as ye well deserved. And I hope it will be accounted a happiness for you, that my son doth now sit amongst you, who, when it shall please God to set him in my place, will then remember that he was once a member of your house; and so be bound to maintain all your lawful privileges, and like the better of you all the days of his life. But, because the world at this time talks so much of Bribes, I have just cause to fear, the whole body of this house hath bribed him to be a good instrument for you upon all occasions: he doth so good offices in all his reports to me, both for the house in general, and every one of you in particular. And the like I may say of one that sits there. (Buckingham) He hath been so ready upon all occasions to do good offices, both for the house in general, and every member thereof in particular. One proof thereof, I hope my lord of Arundell hath already witnessed unto you, in his report made unto you of my answer, touching the privileges of the nobility, how earnestly he spake unto me in that matter.—Now, my lords, the time draws near of your recess: whether formality will leave you time for proceeding now to sentence against all, or any the persons now in question, I know not. But for my part, since both houses have dealt so lovingly and freely with me, in giving me, as a free gift, two Subsidies in a more loving manner than hath been given to any king before, and so accepted by me; and since I cannot yet retribute by a general pardon, which hath by form usually been reserved to the end of a parl.: the least I can do (which I can forbear no longer) is to do something in present, for the good and ease of my people.—Three patents at this time have been complained of, and thought great Grievances: 1. That of the Inns and Hosteries. 2. That of the Alehouses. 3. That of Gold and Silver Thread. My purpose is to strike them all dead, and (that time may not be lost) I will have it done presently. That concerning the Alehouses, I would have to be left to the managing of the justices of peace, as before. That of Gold and Silver Thread was most vilely executed, both for wrongs done to men's persons, as also for abuse in the stuff; for it was a kind of false coin. I have already freed the persons that were in prison: I will now also damn the patent: and this may seem instead of a pardon. All these three I will have recalled by proclamation, and wish you to advise of the fittest form for that purpose.—I hear also that there is another bill amongst you against Informers: I desire you, my lords, that as ye tender my honour, and the good of my people, ye will put that bill to an end so soon as ye can; and at your next meeting to make it one of your first works. For I have already shewed my dislike of that kind of people openly in Star Chamber; and it will be the greatest ease both to me, and all those that are near about me at court, that may be. For I remember, that since the beginning of this parl. Buckingham hath told me, he never found such quiet and rest, as in this time of parl. from projectors and informers, who at other times miserably vexed him at all hours.—And now I confess, that when I looked before upon the face of the govt. I thought (as every man would have done) that the people were never so happy as in my time. For even, as at divers times I have looked upon many of my coppices, riding about them, and they appeared on the outside very thick, and well grown unto me: but when I entered into the midst of them, I found them all bitten within, and full of plains and bare spots; like an apple or pear, fair and smooth without, but when ye cleave it asunder, ye find it rotten at the heart: even so this kingdom, the external govt. being as good as ever it was, and I am sure as learned judges as ever it had

(and I hope as honest) administering justice within it; and for peace, both at home and abroad, I may truly say, more settled, and longer lasting, than ever any before, together with as great plenty as ever: so as it was to be thought, that every man might sit in safety under his own vine, and his own fig-tree: yet I am ashamed, and it makes my hair stand upright, to consider, how in this time my people have been vexed, and polled by the vile Execution of projects, patents, bills of conformity, and such like; which, besides the trouble of my people, have more exhausted their purses, than subsidies would have done.—Now, my lords, before I go hence, since God hath made me the great judge of this land under him: and that I must answer for the justice of the same: I will therefore (according to my place) remember you of some things, though I would not teach you. For no man's knowledge can be so good, but their memories will be the better to be refreshed. And now because ye are coming to give judgment, all which moves from the king, that you may the better proceed, take into your care two things: 1st, to do 'bonum,' 2ndly, next to do it 'bene.' I call 'bonum,' when all is well proved, whereupon ye judge, for then ye build upon a sure foundation: and by 'bene' I understand, that ye proceed with all-formality and legality: wherein you have fit occasion to advise with the judges, who are to assist you with their opinions in cases of that nature; and woe be to them, if they advise you not well. So the ground being good, and the form orderly, it will prove a course fitting this high court of parl.—In sentence ye are to observe two parts: 1st, to recollect that which is worthy of judging and censuring: and 2ndly, to proceed against these, as against such like crimes properly. We doubt there will be many matters before you, some complained of out of passion, and some out of just cause of Grievance. Weigh both; but be not carried away with the impertinent discourses of them, that name as well innocent men, as guilty. Let your judgments only take hold of the guilty: proceed judicially, and spare none where ye find just cause to punish: but let your proceedings be according to law. And remember, that laws have not their eyes in their necks, but in their foreheads. For the moral reason of the punishment of vices, in all kingdoms and commonwealths, is, because of the breach of laws standing in force; for none can be punished for breach of laws by predestination, before they be made.—There is yet one particular, which I am to remember you of, I hear that sir Henry Yelverton (who is now in the Tower, upon a sentence given in the Star Chamber against him, for deceiving my trust) is touched concerning a warrant dormant, which he made while he was my attorney: the which my lord treasurer* here, refused to set his hand unto, like an honest man, when it was brought unto him. I protest, I never heard of this warrant dormant before, and I hold it as odious a matter, as any is before you: and if, for respect to me, ye have forbore to meddle with him in examination, because he is my prisoner; I do now here freely remit him unto you, and put him into your hands.—And this is all I have to say unto you, at this time; wishing you to proceed justly and nobly, according to the orders of your house: and I pray God to bless you: and ye may assure yourselves of my assistance; wishing that what I have said this day, amongst you, may be entered into the Records of this house."

The king having ended his speech, the Lords conceived so much joy thereat; that they ordered the whole house to go to him, at one in the afternoon, with their most humble thanks for it.

Further Proceedings in the Trial of sir G. Mompesson.] The collection of Offences and Abuses, committed by sir Giles Mompesson, in the 3 patents which were granted to him, being all read: it was resolved by the whole house, "That it did appear to the Lords, and they were fully satisfied, sir Giles Mompesson had erected a court without warrant; and, also, that he imprisoned the king's subjects and exacted bonds from them by threats, without warrant; and, afterwards, by undue practices, procured a proclamation and other warrants to colour such his doings. And yet that he executed all these ills, and seized the goods of divers persons, contrary to such authority, so unduly procured by him. That he neither paid the 10l. reserved rent to the king, nor brought in the 5000l. of bullion yearly, as he pretended and covenanted to have done. And that all his other offences and abuses had been fully proved against him." Hereupon it was agreed, "That the Lords would give sentence against sir Giles, in their robes, in the afternoon. The lord admiral, Buckingham, desired to be excused if he should be absent; but he gave his assent to their lordships censure of the said sir Giles; affirming, That he had highly abused the king, and also himself, more than any other lord of that house."

March 26, p. m. The whole house met again. The Lords were in their robes, in order to give sentence against the offender, it was much debated first, amongst them, what punishment sir Giles deserved for his high crimes: and, because the punishment inflicted heretofore on Empson and Dudley was much spoken of, the Lords desired to hear their indictments. The indictment of Rd. Empson, taken at Northampton, 1 Hen. VIII. was read; by which it was observed, that the said Empson was indicted for treason against the king. The attorney-general also certified to their lordships, that Dudley was indicted, in London, for treason. But to the end that these matters might be more freely discussed, and what punishment was fit to be inflicted on the offender, the house adjourned 'ad libitum;' when, after a long debate, the lords agreed upon a Judgment against sir Giles: the earl of Arundel observing, that their lordships might proceed against him hereafter, if more matter, or matter of a higher nature, was found out.—Accordingly a Message was sent from the Lords to the Commons, “That if they and their Speaker, according to the ancient custom of parliaments, come to demand of the lords, that judgment be given against sir Giles, for the heinous offences by him committed, they shall be heard: also that the Lords desire a conference with them, in the Painted Chamber, to-morrow morning.” Answer returned, “That they would come to demand judgment; and that they agreed to the conference.”—In the mean time the lord treasurer reported, “That, according to the order of the house made this morning, the Prince’s highness, accompanied with many lords, did present unto his maj. most humble thanks for his maj.’s most gracious Speech to the Lords that morning; which thanks, with the manner of presenting the same, was most joyfully accepted by him, as he expressed in many kind and favourable words; adding, “That the Lords had taken the right way to catch a king, by speaking to him by his son.”

Judgment against sir G. Mompesson.] The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, with their Speaker, being come up to the bar, the Speaker repeated the last message which the lords had sent unto them, and said, “The Commons, by me, their Speaker, demand judgment against sir Giles Mompesson, as the heinousness of his offences doth require.”

The Lord Chief Justice, as Speaker of the house of peers, answered: “Mr. Speaker, the Lords spiritual and temporal have taken knowledge of the great pains the Commons have been at, to inform their lordships of many Complaints brought unto them against sir Giles Mompesson, and others, whereof their lordships received several instructions from them; and, thereupon, proceeding by examination of divers witnesses upon oath, they find sir Giles, and several others, guilty of many heinous crimes against the king’s maj. and against the commonwealth.—Time will not permit their lordships to deal with all the offenders now; therefore they proceed to give Judgment against sir Giles, according to your demand; and, hereafter, their lordships will proceed against the other offenders. The Judgment of the lords against the said sir Giles is, And, the Lords spiritual and temporal of this high court of parl. do award and adjudge, 1. That sir Giles shall, from henceforth, be degraded of the Order of Knighthood, with reservation to his wife and children; the ceremonies of degradation to be performed by direction of the earl marshal’s court, whensoever he shall be taken. 2. That he shall stand perpetually in the degree of a person outlawed for misdemeanors and trespasses. 3. That his testimony be received in no court; and that he shall be of no assize, inquisition, or jury. 4. That he shall be excepted out of all general pardons to be hereafter granted. 5. That he shall be imprisoned during life. 6. That he shall not approach within 12 miles of the courts of the king or prince, nor of the king’s high courts usually holden at Westminster. 7. That the king’s majesty shall have the profits of his lands for life, and shall have all his goods and chattels as forfeited; and he shall undergo fine and ransom, which their lordships assess at 10,000*l.* 8. That he shall be disabled to hold or receive any office under the king, or for the commonwealth. 9. Lastly, That he be ever held an infamous person.”

Order for Observance of 26th of March.] March 27. Moved for by divers lords, agreed on, and ordered, “That in respect of his majesty’s most gracious Speech, made here on the 26th of March, the same day shall be, yearly, a sermon day throughout all England, especially at Westminster; and all the lords then in town to resort unto it.” Ordered further, and decreed, “That in all future parliaments, the Lords shall sit in their robes on the 26th of March, ‘in perpetuam-rei memoriam.’”

The King adds to Mompesson’s Sentence.] The lord admiral delivered his maj.’s hearty thanks to the Lords, for their sentence given yesterday against Mompesson, it being so just, and yet moderate, in respect of the heinousness of the offence. And said, That the king, out of regard to his people and detestation of the said crimes, is pleased, ex abundante, to inflict perpetual banishment on the said Mompesson, out of all his maj.’s dominions.

The Commons being ready in the Painted Chamber, for the conference; before the Lords went to them, the lord treasurer first reported the heads of what he was to deliver, by direction from the house. “To make a short recital of his maj.’s gracious speech here yesterday. His maj.’s good allowance and approbation of the sentence given against Mompesson; and that, out of his grace and favour to the people, he had added, to the punishment, perpetual banishment. That the lords of this house yesterday presented, by the prince, their humble thanks unto his maj. for his said speech to their house; which was well accepted of. To let them know that the lords did consider of the precedents for Empson and Dudley; but found they did not concur with this case of Mompesson they being both indicted for treason.”—The conference being over, it was ordered, That the whole Proceedings against Mompesson, should be drawn up by the king’s council, perused by a committee of lords appointed for that purpose, and entered in the records of parl.

Then the Lords sent a message to the Commons to know if they had any other business for them, because they did not intend to sit in the afternoon; if not they wished them all happiness in their departure and return. Ans. “That the Commons have received the noble message, sent by their lordships to them; for which they gave them most humble thanks that they also cease from business this morning. They acknowledge the great and good respect between the two houses, which hath been more this parl. than ever; and that they, for their parts, will endeavour to continue it: and so they wish all honour and prosperity to their lordships."—It was also ordered, That each earl and viscount should pay 40s. and each bishop and baron 20s. the proxies to pay for the absent lords; which money was to be distributed amongst some gentlemen employed by the committee, in searching records for parliamentary precedents; which were to be transcribed in parchment, and safely kept.—Three particular Committees of Lords appointed to take examinations in the Lord Chancellor's Cause, during the recess of parl. After which both houses adjourned to the 17th of April.

Further Proceedings in the Case of Lord Bacon and sir Edw. Villiers.] April 17. The Lords met; when the first thing that was done, was to read, a 2d time, a bill against certain troublesome persons, commonly called Relators, Informers, and Promoters; and it was committed. When this was over, the lord chamberlain acquainted the house, "That, in the interim of the cessation, the Lord Chancellor Bacon had been an humble suitor to his maj. that he might see and speak with him. And although his maj. in respect to the Lord Chancellor's person, and of the place he held, might have granted his lordship that favour; yet, for that his lordship was under the trial of this house, his maj. would not, on the sudden, comply with his request." That on Sunday last the king called all the lords of this house, which were of his privy council, before him; and demanded their lordships advice what was best to be done in that affair. The lords did not presume to advise his maj. because he himself did, suddenly, propound such a course, as the world could not advise a better; which was, to speak with the chancellor privately. That yesterday his maj. admitted the lord chanc. to his presence. His lordship desired that he might have a particular of those matters, wherewith he was charged before the lords of this house: for it was not possible for him, who passed so many orders and decrees in a year, to remember all things which fell out in them; and that, this being granted, his lordship would make two requests to his maj. "1st, That when his Answers should be fair and clear to those things objected against him, his lordship might stand upon his innocency. Next, That where his Answers should not be so fair and clear, then his lordship might be admitted to an extenuation of the charge: and where the proofs were full and undeniable, his lordship would ingenuously confess them, and put himself upon the mercy of the Lords." Unto all which his maj. answered, "That he would refer him to the lords of this house; and therefore his maj. desired that he, the lord chamberlain, would make report thereof to them." It was thereupon ordered, That the lord treasurer should acquaint his maj. with their thankful acknowledgment for this his favour, and that they held themselves highly bound to his maj. for it.

The lord admiral, Buckingham, in a speech made to the lords this day, protested to them, "That whereas it was the opinion of the world he had sent his brother, sir Edward Villiers, abroad, in the king's service, on purpose to avoid his trial, touching some grievances complained of by the Commons: his lordship was so far from it, that he had sent to hasten his coming home; and if any thing blame-worthy could be objected against him, his lordship was as ready to censure him as he was Mompesson. He desired that the consideration of his brother's affair might be expedited; for, although he was a member of the lower house, his lordship advised him not to go there till he had cleared himself here. Lastly, his lordship requested, that the said sir E. Villiers might come to his accusation, for so he should gain the greater honour; his lordship not doubting but that he could well clear himself from it."—On this several lords stood up, and declared their opinion, "That sir Edw. Villiers might go to the lower house: that the said sir Edw. is only named obiter, or, according to the French phrase, en passant, in the accusation against Mompesson and others; but, as yet, he was not accused of any particular offence by him committed."

The serjeant at arms, attending the house, by warrant, was ordered to go to the fleet, and bring Matthias Fowles to the bar by nine the next morning. Also, that the lord chief justice should grant a special warrant to the lieutenant of the Tower, to bring sir Henry Yelverton and sir Francis Mitchel before their lordships at the same time.

Articles of Charge against Sir H. Yelverton with his Answers.] April 18. The house adjourned themselves into a committee, to debate and settle in what manner to proceed against sir Henry Yelverton, then attorney general, and, being agreed, the chief justice resumed his place. Sir Henry was then brought to the bar; where, kneeling till he was bid to rise, the chief justice read the charge against him; unto which sir Henry made the following particular answers. "Charge I. That he committed divers persons for refusing to enter into bonds to restrain their own trade, &c. before he had any authority to require any such bonds. Response. He confessed that he committed divers to prison, and justified the same. That he committed none to restrain them of their trades, but for their stubbornness in not obeying the king's commands; which he did to advance the lawful profit of his master; and that he had authority to do it.—II. That he first signed and directed the warrants, dormant, having no authority for the same, and yet containing many unwarrantable clauses. Resp. He drew one, and first signed it; but no clause unwarrantable was in that, and he justified it: for the others, he neither denieth nor confesseth;

he remembers not whether he drew them or no.—III. That he advised the patent of Gold and Silver-Thread to be resumed into the king's hands, conceiving the same to be a monopoly; and advised the patentees to proceed by contract with the king. Resp. He advised not this alone; he was the weakest amongst many that advised the contract; he denied that he conceived it to be a monopoly, and doubts not but to prove it to be no monopoly; he denied that he confessed any such thing to the Commons; he denied his advice to the contract to colour a monopoly; he did it in duty to the king.—IV. He procured a proclamation to take bonds, and signed a docquet, shewing his advising with the Recorder of London and the city thereupon; whereas the recorder was not acquainted with it. Resp. He utterly denied he made any such docquet; he did sign one, and he did acquaint the lord chancellor and recorder of London with it, and desired the recorder to acquaint the city; but denied that the docquet is that he had acquainted the city with.—V. That 3401 quo warrantos, to the vexation of the people, were brought by him, touching the patent of Inns, and but two came to trial. Resp. He cannot particularly answer this: if it appear upon record that there be so many signed by him, he confesses it; but, till then, he humbly desires to be retained in their lordships favour. Adding, that if ever he deserved well of his maj. it was in this; that the king and subject were more abused by that patent than by any other; and, as he takes it, he suffers, at this day, for that patent.—VI. That he commenced divers suits in the exchequer, touching Gold and Silver-Thread; but did not prosecute the same. Resp. It may be he did.—These Answers and Confessions being read, the said sir Henry having leave to speak, said, "That he thought himself happy in these mists of his maj.'s disfavour, that he was pleased to cast that grace upon him, as to send him to this honourable house: that innocency had her present answer; wisdom required time. Therefore he made his most humble suit to have a particular of his charge in writing, and time to answer the same; that he might have leave to repair to his chambers, at Gray's Inn, and to his house, to search his papers; for that the matters, objected against him, did look into his actions for 4, 5, and 7 years of his serving his maj."—Sir Henry being withdrawn, and the house having taken this into consideration, he was brought to the bar again; when the chief justice told him, that he should have a copy of the charge objected against him; and leave, under the lieutenant's charge, to go to his house and chambers to view his papers; and to have time, until Saturday come se'nnight, to make his further answer; which was more than his own request. And an order of the house was made for it accordingly.

The Kings Speech to the Lords.] April 24 The Lords met in their robes, expecting the coming of the king, who soon after appeared in state; and, being seated on the throne, made a speech to them to this effect: He first made a short repetition of the speech, used by him, to the Lords and Commons on their access unto him, on Friday last, viz. "That, at that time, he made a recantation unto them of his former determination not to use any speeches unto them, but those usual at the beginning or ending of a parl. But that the Commons did behave so worthily unto him, that he was resolved to speak oftener unto them, hereafter, as occasion shall require. His maj. did put them in mind of the occasions of calling this parl. which were these: To relieve his wants he having received no Subsidies these many years; and for the relief of the torn estate of Christendom. To make good Laws. To hear and redress Grievances, which cannot come to a king's ear better than by parl.—For the first, his maj. told them that he had more cause to give his subjects thanks, for the two Subsidies granted to him this parl. than any king ever had; both, for that the same was granted in the beginning of the parl. and for the title of the grant. That his maj. had taken up, upon trust before-hand, the sums granted him by the said Subsidies; as well for the defence of the Palatinate, as for the maintenance of his son-in-law and his daughter, and their children, and of the dowager also; who are all expelled out of their country, as also, for preparation of arms for recovery thereof. That his majesty had procured a short truce and did hope to get a general peace and thereby to settle them in their country again; but was to be at great charges to send ambassadors, all over Christendom, for the effecting thereof; and if this peace could not be obtained, then his maj. would send his armies to recover the same. The great charges of either of these could not be supplied, but by more Subsidies. And whereas some say Subsidies may be granted at the next session; lest when the same are given, his maj. might dissolve the parl. with this session, within which time the important business now intended cannot be finished: his maj. protested before God, that whether there be any more Subsidies granted, or not, he intends not to dissolve this parl. till the matters in agitation be finished.—As to the making of good Laws, his maj. at his first coming to the crown, commanded a collection to be made of all penal statutes, which books he heard were now finished, and he was glad of it. The said penal laws, some intricate, some obsolete being the groundwork of all informers; and, amongst other good laws to be made, his maj. especially recommended a reformation of abuses by Informers, and that they be punished.—As to complaints of Grievances, his maj. commended those for public grievances; protesting, that he would prefer no person, whatsoever, before the public good. His maj. was also pleased "To put the Lords in mind of their antient orders of this house in hearing complaints, in the examinations of them, and their manner to give judgment thereupon. But advised them, the time being precious, to entertain nothing which was not material and weighty." He was pleased to say, further, "That he was now come to speak somewhat particular unto the lords of this house in regard to himself; and told them, that, as all libels against himself are generally punished, so a libel against his maj. in open parl. must not escape. And whereas many complaints are already made against courts of judicature, which are in examination, and are to be proceeded on by the Lords, his maj. would add some, which he thinks fit also to be complained of and redressed; which are, That no orders be made but in public courts and not in chambers: That excessive fees be taken away: That no bribery, nor money, be given for the hearing of any cause. These and many other things his maj. thought fit to be done this session; and added, That when he had done this and all that he can do for the good of his subjects, he confessed he had but done the duty whereunto he was born. That sir Hen. Yelverton, being the other day at the bar, did infer, That all the punishment upon him was for his good service done to his maj. The king said, That it seemed strange to him, that sir Henry should be examined upon any thing, save the Patent of Gold and Silver-Thread; for his maj. did not conceive that any matter was complained of against him relating to Inns and Hosteries, whereof he was here, also, examined. That, as to this patent, Mompesson made complaint to his maj. that sir Henry refused to send any process of quo warranto against a multitude of Innkeepers; and his maj. accepted of sir Henry's modest answer to this, that he disliked these proceedings against his subjects. But, afterwards, his maj. understood, that Mompesson agreeing that sir Henry Yelverton should receive the fees due unto him for the said process, sir Henry yielded thereunto, and Mompesson made no more complaints thereof.—His maj. to clear himself, did lay open to the Lords the many former just dislikes, which he had against this offender, sir Henry, before he questioned him; and said the first mislike he found in him was, That his maj. referring a pardon of petty theft, to be considered of by him and the then solicitor; he alone took it into his consideration, and signed a pardon for murder also.—That sir Henry passed at one time 4 patents for his maj. to grant, which the lord chancellor stayed at the seal, the same being found to be very inconvenient. Hereupon his maj. intended to have removed him, but, by way of preferment; and finding at that time a judge's place void, he thought to have bestowed that upon him. But because he had not any precedent that the king's attorney general was ever removed to any other place than that of a chief judge, his maj. did then forbear, expecting some other place for him.—That his maj. hearing of the charter of the city of London, lately renewed, containing many new excessive grants, although sir Henry then exceeded his maj.'s warrant, yet, his maj. was pleased, at the first to tell him gently and privately of it; when the said sir Henry, with many deprecations, denied absolutely that any new liberties were contained in the said grant; and desired to kiss his maj.'s hand on that condition, which he did. Afterwards when his maj. intended to question the said sir Henry for the same, the lord Admiral besought his maj. not to think of any private wrongs done to his lordship in the examination of this business, touching the charter of London. That sir Henry, at the first, justified himself by his maj.'s warrant, that by it he might have given away all London from him; yet, at last, he made a good submission, in the beginning; but in the end, he said, he had not wronged his maj.'s prerogative.—His maj. shewed how gentle the proceedings were against sir Henry, by him and the lords in the Star-Chamber. But since that now he taxes his maj. that he suffers for good service done to him, his maj. requires the lords who are able to do him justice, to punish the said Sir Henry Yelverton for his slander."

Complaint against Sir John Bennet, who had been expelled by the Commons for Bribery, &c.] When his maj. had ended his speech, and was departed from the house, the Lords received a message from the Commons to this effect: first, "That the Commons desire a re-conference on the bill against Informers. Next, that they had received complaints of divers exorbitant oppressions and bribery, committed by sir John Bennet, knt. late a member of their house, but now expelled by them for the same; that they desire a conference also about him." Agreed to be at 4 this afternoon, in the Painted Chamber. It was ordered, by general consent of the whole house, "That h. r. h. the prince should be one of all committees, if his highness so please to be."

Lord Bacon's Submission to the Lords.]— April 24, p. m. His royal highness signified to the Lords, That the lord chancellor had sent a Submission unto their lordships, which was presently read, in hæc verba:

"To the right. hon. the Lords of the Parliament in the Upper House assembled. The humble Submission and Supplication of the Lord Chancellor."

"May it please your lordships, I shall humbly crave at your hands a benign interpretation of that which I shall now write: for words that come from wasted spirits, and oppressed minds, are more safe in being deposited to a noble construction, than being circled with any reserved caution. This being moved (and, as I hope, obtained of your lordships) as a protection, to all that I shall say, I shall go on; but with a very strange entrance, as may seem to your lordships, at first: for, in the midst of a state of as great affliction as, I think, a mortal man can endure; (honour being above life) I shall begin with the professing of gladness in some things.—The 1st is, That hereafter the greatness of a judge, or magistrate, shall be no sanctuary or protection to him against guiltiness, which is the beginning of a golden work."

The next, That after this example, it is like that judges will fly from any thing in the likeness of corruption (though it were at a great distance) as from a serpent; which tends to the purging of the courts of justice, and reducing them to their true honour and splendour. And in these two points, (God is my witness) though it be my fortune to be the anvil upon which these two effects are broken and wrought, I take no small comfort. But to pass from the motions of my heart (whereof God is my judge) to the merits of my cause, whereof your lordships are judges, under God and his lieutenant: I do understand there hath been heretofore expected from me some justification; and therefore I have chosen one only justification, instead of all others, out of the justification of Job. For after the clear Submission and Confession which I shall now make unto your lordships, I hope I may say, and justify with Job, in these words, 'I have not hid my sin, as did Adam, nor concealed my faults in my bosom.' This is the only justification which I will use.—It rests, therefore, that without fig-leaves I do ingeniously confess and acknowledge, that having understood the particulars of the charge, not formally from the house, but enough to inform my conscience and memory: I find matter sufficient and full, both to move me to desert my defence, and to move your lordships to condemn and censure me. Neither will I trouble your lordships by singling those particulars which I think might fall off. 'Quid te exempta juvat spinis de millibus una?' Neither will I prompt your lordships to observe upon the proofs where they come not home, or the scruple touching the credits of the witnesses. Neither will I represent to your lordships, how far a defence might, in divers things, extenuate the offence, in respect of the time and manner of the guilt, or the like circumstances; but only leave these things to spring out of your own more noble thoughts and observations of the Evidence, and examinations themselves; and charitably to wind about the particulars of the charge, here and there, as God shall put into your minds, and to submit myself wholly to your piety and grace.—And now I have spoken to your lordships as judges, I shall say a few words unto you as peers and prelates, humbly commending my cause to your noble minds and magnanimous affections. Your lordships are not simply judges, but parliamentary judges; you have a farther extent of arbitrary power than other courts; and if you be not tied by ordinary course of courts, or precedents, in points of strictness and severity, much less in points of mercy and mitigation: and yet if any thing, which I shall move, might be contrary to your honourable and worthy end, (the introducing a reformation) I should not seek it. But herein I beseech your lordships to give me leave to tell you a story.—Titus Manlius took his son's life, for giving battle against the prohibition of his general: not many years after, the like severity was pursued by Papirius Cursor, the Dictator, against Quintus Maximus; who being upon the point to be sentenced, was, by the intercession of some particular persons of the senate, spared: whereupon Livy maketh this grave and gracious observation, 'Neque minus firmata est disciplina militaris periculo Quinti Maximi, quam miserabili supplicio Titi Manlii.' The discipline of war was no less established by the questioning of Quintus Maximus, than by the punishment of Titus Manlius. And the same reason is in the reformation of justice; for the questioning of men in eminent places, hath the same terror, though not the some rigour, with the punishment. But my cause stays not there; for my humble desire is, that his maj. would take the seal into his hands; which is a great downfall, and may serve, I hope, in itself, for an expiation of my faults.—Therefore, if mercy and mitigation be in your lordships power, and no way cross your ends, why should I not hope of your favor and commiseration. Your lordships will be pleased to behold your chief pattern, the king our sovereign, a king of incomparable clemency, and whose heart is inscrutable for wisdom and goodness; and your lordships will remember, there sat not, these hundred years before, a prince in your house; and never such a prince, whose presence deserveth to be made memorable by records, and acts mixed of mercy and justice. Yourselves are either nobles, (and compassion ever beateth in the veins of noble blood,) or reverend prelates, who are the servants of Him that would not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax. You all sit upon a high stage, and therefore cannot but be sensible of the changes of human conditions, and of the fall of many from high places.—Neither will your lordships forget, that there are 'Vitia temporis,' as well as 'vitia hominis;' and the beginning of reformation hath the contrary power to the pool of Bethesda; for that had strength to cure him only that was first cast in, and this hath strength to hurt him only that is first cast in; and, for my part, I wish it may stay there, and go no further.—Lastly, I assure myself, your lordships have a noble feeling of me, as a member of your own body: and one that in this very session had some taste of your loving affections, which, I hope, was not a lightning before the death of them, but rather a spark of that grace, which now in the conclusion will more appear: and therefore my humble suit to your lordships is, That my penitent Submission may be my sentence; the loss of my Seal my punishment; and that your lordships would recommend me to his maj.'s grace and pardon for all that is past. God's holy spirit be among you. Your lordships humble servant, and suppliant, FRAN. ST. ALBAN, Canc. April 22, 1621."

This Submission being read by the clerk, and afterwards repeated by the lord chief justice, the house adjourned, 'ad libitum,' for the better debating, Whether the said Submission was a sufficient Confession for the lords to ground their censure on? their lordships being all agreed, That the lord chancellor's Submission was not satisfactory, for that his Confession therein was not fully nor particularly set down but did, in some sort, extenuate it, and seemed to prescribe the sentence to be given against him by the house: It was resolved, That the lord chancellor should be charged with the Briberies and Corruptions complained of against him, and that he should make a particular answer thereunto. But, whether the chancellor should be brought to the bar to hear the charge, or, that respect being had to his person, as having yet the king's great seal, the charge shall be sent to him in writing; was much debated. And, being put to the question, it was carried for the latter.

It was then ordered, That mr. Baron Denham and mr. attorney general* should be sent to the chancellor with this message, "That his Confession was not fully set down in the said Submission, for 3 causes: 1. His lordship confesseth not any particular bribe nor corruption. 2. Nor sheweth how his lordship heard of the charge thereof. 3. The Confession, such as it is, is afterwards extenuated in the said Submission; and therefore the lords have sent him a particular of the charge, and do expect his answer with all convenient expedition."

Corruptions charged on the Lord Chancellor Bacon, with the Proofs thereof.

"I. In the cause between sir Rowland Egerton, knight, and Edward Egerton, esq. the lord chancellor received 500l. on the part of sir Rowland, before he decreed the same. Proved by the deposition of sir Rowland Egerton, and John Brooke, who provided the money, and payed it to the chanc.'s agent. Bevis Thelwell deposes he delivered 200l. to the lord chancellor. He received from Edw. Egerton, in the same cause, 400l. proved by the depositions of sir Rd. Young and sir George Hastings, Ralph Merefeild, and Tristram Woodward.—II. Perient and John Churchill; who speaks of a greater value by the report of Hody.—III. In the cause between the lady Wharton and the coheirs of sir Fra. Willoughby, he received of the lady 310l.; proved by the depositions of the lady Wharton, Rd. Keeling, and Anthony Gardner.—IV. In sir T. In the cause between Holman and Young, he received of Young 100l. after the decree made for him: proved by the aforesaid Rd. Keeling.—VII. In the cause between Fisher and Wrenham, after the decree was past, he received of Fisher a suit of hangings worth 160l. and better; which Fisher gave by advice of Mr. Shute: proved by sir Edw. Fisher.—VIII. In the cause between Kenneday and Vanlore he had of Kennedy a rich Cabinet worth 800l.: proved by James Kenneday.—IX. He borrowed of Vanlore 1000l. upon his own bond, at one time; and the like sum at another time, on his own note, indorsed by Hunt, his man: proved by Peter Vanlore.—X. He received from Richard Scott 200l. after his cause was ended, but upon a precedent promise; likewise, he had in the same cause 100l. for sir John Lenthall's part: proved by Rd. Scott and Edw. Sherborne.—XI. In a cause between Wroth and sir Arthur Manwaring, he had of the former 100l.: proved by John Churchill and John Hunt.—XII. Sir Ralph Hansby, having a cause depending before the chancellor, he had of him 500l.: proved by sir Ralph.—XIII. Wm. Counton had an extent granted him for a debt of 1200l. the lord chanc. staid it and wrote his letter; on which part of the debt was paid presently, and part at a future day. The lord chanc. hereupon sends to borrow 500l. and, because Counton was to pay one Huxley 400l. his lordship required Huxley to forbear it for 6 months, and thereupon obtains the money from Counton. The money being unpaid, suit grows between Huxley and Counton, in chancery; where his lordship decreed Counton to pay Huxley the debt, with damages and costs, when the money was in his own hands: proved by Wm. Counton.—XIV. In the cause between sir William Brunker and Aubrey, the chancellor received from Aubrey 100l.: proved by the depositions of Christ. In the cause between Smithwick and Wyche, he received from the former 200l. which was repaid: proved by John Hunt.—XIX. In sir Henry Russel's cause, he received money from him; but it is not certain how much: proved by Hunt.—XX. In the cause of Mr. Barker, the chancellor received of Barker 700l.: proved by Rob. Barker and Edw. Sherborne.—XXI. There being a reference from his maj. to his lordship, of a business between the grocers and apothecaries of London, he received of the grocers 200l.: proved by sir Tho. Middleton, alderman Johnson, and John Bunbury. And he received, in the same cause of the apothecaries, who opposed the grocers, a taster of gold worth 40 or 50l. together with a present of ambergrease: proved by sir Tho. Middleton and Samuel Jones. Also, of the new company of apothecaries, in the same cause 100l.: proved by John Kellet and Gabriel Sheriff.—XXII. He took of the French merchants 1000l. to constrain the vintners of London to take from them 1500 tuns of wine: proved by Rob. Bell, Wm. Spright, and Rd. Peacock. To accomplish this business he used very indirect means, by colour of his office and authority, without bill or suit depending; terrifying the vintners by threats and imprisonments of their persons, to buy wines, for which they had no use nor need, at higher rates than they were at that time vendible: proved by John Child, Henry Ashton, Tho. Haselfote, Ralph Moore, Tho. Knight, and the chancellor's own letters and orders.—XXIII. The lord chancellor hath also given way to great exactions by his servants, both in respect of private seals, and likewise for sealing of injunctions, with other things: proved by Thomas Manwood and Rd. Keeling."

April 25, p. m. Mr. Baron Denham and Mr. Attorney General reported, That they did yesterday deliver unto the lord chancellor, the Charge of his Corruptions, &c. in writing, and required his lordship's Answer; who said he would return one as soon as possible.

The lord chief justice received a letter from the lord chancellor, directed to sir James Ley, knt. lord chief justice of the king's bench, and supplying the place of lord chancellor by commission; which letter the Lords would take no notice of, because it was directed to the lord chief justice, and not to the house.

It was moved by the lord Southampton, "That the lord chancellor's Answer was not satisfactory to their last message; but that he should be required to answer directly from his own mouth." Upon this a long debate arose, Whether he should be brought to the bar or no? At last another message was agreed upon to be sent to this effect, "That their lordships, having received a doubtful answer to the message they sent to him yesterday, they now send again to him to know of him, directly and presently, whether he will make his Confession, or stand upon his defence?"—Answer. "That the lord chancellor will make no manner of defence to the charge, but meaneth to acknowledge Corruption: to make a particular confession to every point; and, after that, an humble submission: but he humbly craves liberty, that where the charge is more full than he finds the truth of the fact, he may make declaration of the real truth in such particulars, the charge being brief, and not containing all circumstances." The Lords allowed him time, to April the 30th, to send such Confession and Submission as he intended to make.

Proceedings in the Case of Sir John Bennet.] The lord treasurer reported what occurred at the conference yesterday with the Commons, touching the affair of sir John Bennett, the effect thereof was, that the said sir John Bennett, knt.

judge of the prerogative court of Canterbury, being directed by Law, both what to do, and what fees to take, did, contrary to law, exact great and extream fees, with much bribery. Some complaints against him were opened, with a request from the Commons that they might send up more hereafter, if any came before them." A Petition from sir John Bennett to the Lords was read, humbly shewing, "That he was kept a close prisoner, under the custody of the sheriff of London, in his own house, and humbly desiring to have the liberty of that, upon good security." Upon a motion made to the lords, how far the petitioner should have this liberty granted him, it was at last agreed and ordered, "That whereas sir John had presented a Petition, setting forth that he was kept a close prisoner, &c. their lordships would permit him the liberty of his own house, upon this security; to give into this court the names of such sufficient persons as will be bail for his forthcoming; who shall be bound in the full sum of 40,000l. or else he shall be committed to the Tower, and have the liberty thereof."

Charge against Sir Francis Mitchell.]—April 26. The collection of offences committed by sir Francis Mitchell, copartner with Mompesson, with the proofs thereof, was read, viz. I. "That he received an annuity of 100l. per ann. to be continued for 5 years, for executing the commission, touching Gold and Silver-Thread. Proved by the deed of the grant thereof from Rd. Dyke and sir N. Salter, knt. to him the said Mitchel, dated May 27. ann. 17 Jac.—II. He and Henry Tweedy took upon them the execution of the first commission, touching Gold and Silver-Thread, and therein exceeded and abused their power, by committing divers to prison before conviction, and by committing others for refusing to enter into bonds required by them, and not warranted by the said commission. Proved by the several persons committed for refusing to be bound from following their free trades.—III. That there being a second commission, touching Gold and Silver-Thread, granted, he alone committed divers to prison, the authority being given to two.—IV. That he erected an office, kept a court, made officers and divers unwarrantable orders, and exacted bonds for the observance of the same. Proved by his books of orders, and the bonds themselves, &c.—V. That in a suit between Fowles and Lake, in the Star-Chamber he took of the latter three 22s. peices to compound the same: proved by Lake."

Sir F. Mitchell being called to the bar, was charged with the said offences; and he made his answers unto them particularly. Some he denied and others confessed; and then having leave to speak for himself, he made a discourse "commending the first commission of Gold and Silver-Thread; and that he misliked the second commission, and would not have meddled with it, if he could have avoided it: but Mompesson told him, weekly, that he had a command from the king to do thus and thus; and what could he do to withstand Mompesson?" then he was withdrawn.

April 26, p. m. Matthias Fowlis was brought to the bar, and charged with many heinous offences, in the patent of Gold and Silver-Thread, &c. by false-dying and counterfeiting the same; which, having answered to, he was ordered again to the bar the next morning.—

April 27. The charge against Fowlis continued, and his defence, which took up the whole forenoon. Afterwards the lords agreed to meet in their robes, and give sentence against sir F. Mitchell, in the afternoon; and Fowlis was ordered to attend also.

April 27, p. m. Some debate arose in the house, Whether sir F. Mitchell should be examined again, as to some points, before sentence? it was agreed he should. And, after some questions about other matters, he was particularly examined about sir E. Villiers, Buckingham's brother; who is named also by the Commons in their declaration. He said, "That he was told by hearsay, sir Edw. Villiers was with sir Henry Yelverton, about this business of the patent of Gold and Silver-Thread; but knows not for certain of any thing which sir Edw. said, or that sir Henry wrote any letters to the lord chancellor, about the commitment of any offenders against that patent. He said that sir Henry Yelverton committed 3 or 4 silk-men, as he hath heard; but he knows not whether sir Edw. was present at the commitment of the silk-men, or whether sir Edw. did threaten these silk-men; but adds, he hath heard that the said sir Edw. was accused of it; but he knows not by whom."

Petition of sir Henry Yelverton.] April 28. The lieutenant of the Tower was called on to bring in the body of sir H. Yelverton, according to an order of the house the 18th inst. The lieutenant excused his not bringing the prisoner, because he was so troubled with the rheum and tooth-ach he was not able to speak. The officer was sworn to this; and besides it was ordered, That the Earls of Dorset and Warwick, the bp. of Bangor, the lords Hunsden, Walden, and Grey should be sent to the Tower to view the person of the said sir Henry, and examine the truth of the excuse delivered by the lieutenant.—In regard that his maj. in a late speech in this house, had said, "That the objections of the writs of quo warranto, in the business of the Inns, against sir Henry Yelverton, was somewhat strange unto him," it was moved in the house, That the Lords should endeavour to give his maj. satisfaction of the reasons thereof. A committee was therefore appointed to wait on his maj. at such time as he should be pleased to admit them to his presence; and to inform him, That the same was particularly objected against sir Henry, in the declaration of the complaint of the Lower House to their lordships; and to shew his maj. the number of them that were molested thereby, under the hands of the officers of the crown-office; and how few were legally proceeded against.—April 30. The earl of Dorset, from the committee appointed to go to inspect sir Henry Yelverton at the Tower, reported, "That they found him in his bed, much swoln about the face with the rheum: that his Answer is ready; and that he hopes to be able in two or three days, to make his appearance at the bar."

The Lord Chancellor Bacon's Confession.] April 30. The lord chief justice acquainted the Lords, that he had received from the lord chancellor baron a paper-roll, sealed up; which being opened, was found to be directed to their lordships, and was read:

"To the rt. hon. the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in the high court of parliament assembled. The Confession and Humble Submission of me the Lord Chancellor:

"Upon advised consideration of the charge, descending into my own conscience, and calling my memory to account as far as I am able, I do plainly and ingeniously confess, that I am guilty of Corruption, and do renounce all defence and put myself on the grace and mercy of your lordships. The particulars I confess and declare to be as follows:" [In this Confession the chancellor repeats every particular head of the charge against him; but as that hath been given at large in the foregoing pages, it is needless to insert it again. We shall therefore only give his Answers to each Article, as they are put down in the charge seriatim.] I. To the first Article he confessed, That upon a reference from his maj. of all suits between sir Rowland Egerton and Edw. Egerton, both parties submitted to his award, by reciprocal recognizances in 10,000 marks a piece: that after divers hearings, he made his award with the advice of lord Hobart; and, some days after, the sums mentioned in the charge were delivered to him from sir Rowland. That mr. Edward Egerton flying off from the award, a suit was begun in chancery by sir Rowland to have the award confirmed; and a decree was made thereupon. That soon after his coming to the seal, when many presented him, he received the 400l. mentioned in this article, of mr. Egerton; but, as he remembered, it was for favours past.—II. That in the cause between Hody and Hody, about a fortnight after the cause was ended, there were gold-buttons, about the value of 50l. presented him.—III. That in the cause between the lady Wharton, and the co-heirs of sir Francis Willoughby, he received of the lady Wharton 200l. in gold, and, at another time, 100 pieces while the cause was depening.—IV. That he received of sir Tho. Monk 100 pieces; but it was long after his suit was ended.—V. That he received of sir John Trevor, as a new-years-gift, 100l. but he confessed it was while his cause was depending.—VI. In the cause between Holman and Young, he received of Young 100l. but it was long after his cause was ended.—VII. That while the cause was depending between Fisher and Wrenham he did receive of sir Edw. Fisher a suit of hangings of the value of about 160l. towards furnishing his house; and was at the same time presented by others, who were no suitors, with furniture for his house. — VIII. As to the charge of his receiving a cabinet, of the value of 800*l.* of sir John Kenneday; a cabinet was indeed sent to his house by sir John, but not of half that value; but he refused to accept it, and was determined to send it back again: that one Pinkney, who stood engaged for the money to pay for the cabinet, desired he might have it; and thereupon sir John entreated his lordship that he would not disgrace him by returning the gift, much less put it into a wrong hand; and that he was ready to return it to whom their lordships should appoint. — IX. He confessed he had borrowed 1000*l.* of Vanlore; but looked upon it as a debt, and was obliged to repay it. — X. He acknowledged his receiving 200*l.* of Mr. Scott, about a fortnight after the decree passed for him: and that he received 100*l.* of sir John Lenthall, about a month after the decree passed. — XI. That the cause between Wroth and Manwaring was ended by his arbitrement, by consent of parties, and he received of Wroth 100*l.* about a month after the cause was ended. — XII. That he received of sir Ralph Hansby, while his cause was depending, 500*l.* — XIII. That he did borrow the 500*l.* mentioned in this article, of Counton; but looked upon it as a debt which he was obliged to repay. — XIV. In the cause between sir Wm. Brunker and Aubrey, he did acknowledge his receiving 100*l.* of Aubrey. — XV. He confessed he received money of the lord Montague, while his suit was depending, to the amount of 6, or 700*l.* — XVI. He confessed his receiving 200*l.* of Mr. Dunch; but thought it was some time after the decree. — XVII. He confessed his receiving 200*l.* of sir George Reynell, his near relation, at his first coming to the seal, to be bestowed in furniture; but thinks this was before any suit began: and as to the diamond-ring he received of him while his cause was depending, charged to be worth 5 or 600*l.* it was not of near that value; though, he confessed, it was too much for a new-year's-gift: he also confessed his receiving 100*l.* of Mr. Peacock, at his coming to the seal, as a present, and that he afterwards borrowed 1000*l.* of him at twice; for which, he said, he would take no security or interest, and gave him his own time for repaying it. — XVIII. He confessed his servant Hunt did receive 200*l.* of Smithwick; but that he ordered it to be repaid. — XIX. That he did receive of sir Henry Russel 3 or 400*l.* about a month after the cause was decreed; in which decree he was assisted by two of the judges. — XX. He confessed he received of Mr. Barker the 700*l.* mentioned in this article, some time after the decree passed. — XXI. As to this article he confessed he received the sums there mentioned, viz. of the grocers, 200*l.* of the apothecaries, that stood with the grocers, a taster of gold, worth 40 or 50*l.* and a present of ambergrease; and of a new company of apothecaries, that stood against the grocers, 100*l.* But this was no judicial business, he observed, only a composition between the parties; and he thought, as they all received benefit by it, and were all three common purses, there was no great matter in receiving what they voluntarily presented. — XXII. To this article, in which he is charged with taking of the French merchants 1000*l.* to constrain the company of vintners to take 1500 tons of their wine, with threatening and imprisoning the vintners because they would not take their wines at higher prices than they were vendible, he confessed, sir Tho. Smith did deal with him in behalf of the French company, informing him, That the vintners, by combination, refused to take the wines at any reasonable prices, and that this would destroy their trade, which the state was concerned in; and that the company would gratify him with 1000*l.* for the trouble he should take in it. He did, he confessed, thereupon endeavour to compromise matters between them, and prevent a suit, propounding such a price as the vintners might gain 6*l.* a ton; and the king afterwards recommending the business to him, as a matter that concerned his customs, he dealt the more peremptorily in it, and did, for a day or two, restrain some of those that were the most stiff, in a messenger's hands; and afterwards the merchants presented him with a 1000*l.* — XXIII. To this article, That he had given way to the exactions of his servants, in respect of private seals and injunctions, he confessed it to be a great fault, that he had looked no better to his servants. — He then concludes thus:—"This Declaration I have made unto your lordships with a sincere mind; humbly craving, that if there should be any mistaking, your lordships would impute it to want of memory, and not to any desire of mine to obscure truth, or palliate any thing: for I do confess, that in the points charged against me, although they should be taken as myself have declared them, there is a great deal of corruption and neglect; for which I am heartily and penitently sorry, and submit myself to the judgment, grace, and mercy of this court. For extenuation, I will use none concerning the matters themselves; only it may please your lordships, out of your nobleness, to cast your eyes of compassion upon my person and estate. I never was noted for an avaritious man, and the apostle says, that 'covetousness is the root of all evil.' I hope also that your lordships do rather find me in the state of grace; for that in all these particulars, there are few or none that are not almost two years old; whereas those that have a habit of corruption, do commonly wax worse and worse; so that it hath pleased God to prepare me, by precedent degrees of amendment, to my present penitency; and, as for my estate, it is so mean and poor, as my care is now chiefly to satisfy my debts. — And so, fearing I have troubled your lordships too long, I shall conclude with an humble suit unto your lordships, That, if you proceed to sentence, your sentence may not be heavy to my ruin; but gracious and mixed with mercy; and not only so, but that you would be noble intercessors for me to his maj. likewise for his grace and favour. Your lordships humble servant and suppliant,

“FRAN. ST. ALBAN, Canc.”

This Confession and Submission being read, a committee of 12 lords were appointed to go to the chanc. and shew him the said confession, and tell him that the lords do conceive it to be an ingenuous and full confession. To demand of him also, whether it be his own hand that is subscribed to the same, and whether he will stand to it or no?—The committee being returned, reported, That they had shewn the chancellor the Confession, and delivered the rest of the message to him; who answered, “My lords, it is my act, my hand, and my heart, I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed.” Which report being made, it was agreed by the house to move his maj. to sequester the seals, and to intreat his highness the prince, that he would be pleased to do this; which his highness readily condescended to; and the former committee of lords were appointed to attend him.

April 30, p. m. The prince his highness reported to the house, “That, according to their request, he, with the lords that accompanied him, had moved his majesty to sequester the great seal from the lord chancellor; whereunto his majesty most willingly yielded, and said he would have done it, if he had not been moved thereto.”

Further Proceedings against Sir H. Yelverton.] Sir Henry Yelverton was then brought to the bar; when the lord steward informed the house, That his maj. is satisfied concerning the charging sir Henry, in this house, with the matter of Inns and Hosteries. Then the chief justice read the charge, which was made against him on the 18th of April, with his answers thereto, and demanded of him, Whether he now would affirm those Answers? Unto which he replied, “That the six charges against him may be reduced into two, the one of Gold and Silver-Thread, the other of Inns and Hosteries. He humbly desired, therefore, that he might then answer to every particular charge, in serie temporis.

May 2. A new commission from the king was read, constituting sir James Ley, knt. lord chief justice of the king's bench, to supply the office of a lord chancellor, or lord keeper of the great seal, in the house of Lords.—Afterwards the lord treasurer acquainted the house, “That he had his maj.'s commands to deliver a message to their lordships of a double nature; 1st, an Account of what was done; and, 2ndly, a Signification of what was to be done.—As to the 1st, his highness had presented their lordships request to his maj. that he would be pleased, as the case then stood, to command the seal from the lord chancellor. Accordingly, yesterday, his lordship, the lord steward, the lord chamberlain, and the earl of Arundel, at the king's command, went to the lord chancellor, and received from him the great seal, and delivered the same to his maj.; who, by commission, hath appointed the keeping of it to him and the other lords with him.—To the 2nd, his majesty hath commanded him to signify to their lordships, “That he understands sir Henry Yelverton, being called here before them the other day, as a delinquent, answered not as such, but as a judge or accuser of a member of this house, the lord of Buckingham. And whereas, in his first speech, here in this house, he touched the king's honour; saying, He suffered for the patents of Inns, or to that effect, he was so far from extenuating or excusing the offence, that the last day he had aggravated the same.” Wherefore his majesty's pleasure is, that himself will be the judge as to what concerns his own person; and, as to what relates to the lord of Buckingham, since he had besought his maj. that it might be left to this house, so he leaves it wholly to their lordships.

This message being delivered, the Lords conceived by it, that the king intended to take the judgment of sir Henry Yelverton out of their hands, as touching his own honour; his maj. having been misinformed, that the Lords had referred it back to him: wherefore a motion was made, That the house should be humble suitors to his maj. that he would be pleased not to resume this out of their hands, but give their lordships leave to continue judges thereof. After some debate, it was resolved, That a committee of the whole house should attend his maj. at his pleasure; and that the abp. of Canterbury, in the name of the whole house, should deliver the following message to him: “Whereas it has pleased your maj. in a late speech to this house, to require us to do justice upon sir Henry Yelverton, in a matter concerning your own honour; since which time some words have been used in this house, which your maj. conceives do rather aggravate than extenuate his fault: whereupon you maj. did this day signify by the lord treasurer, ‘That of what concerns your own honour, yourself would be the judge:’ the Lords knowing your maj.'s tenderness of the privileges of this house, and their own zeal unto your maj.'s honour, do humbly beseech your maj. to alter your resolution; otherwise, this change may strike some fear into us, that we are not held so tender and zealous, in our dutiful affections, in point of your maj.'s honour, as we desire you should think us to be, and are most ready to yield due proofs thereof.”

Agreed to proceed to sentence the Lord Chancellor to morrow morning; therefore the gentleman-usher, and the serjeant at arms, attendants of this house, were commanded to summon him to appear at the bar by 9 o'clock, and that the serjeant shew him the mace at the said summons.

The Judgment against the lord Chancellor Bacon.] May 3. The officers sent to summon the lord chancellor Bacon being returned reported to the house, That according to their lordships appointment, they had waited on him but found him sick in bed; that notwithstanding ing, they delivered their lordships message to him; who answered, "That he was sick, and protested he feigned not this for an excuse; for, if he had been well, he would willingly have come."—The Lords resolved, however, to proceed against the lord chancellor; and, the attorney general having read the Charge and Confessions, it was put to the question, "Whether the lord chanc. was guilty of the matters wherewith he was charged?" Agreed nem. diss. "That he was guilty." And to the end that the Lords might more freely dispute and resolve what sentence to pass upon him for his said offences, the house adjourned ad libitum.

After some time, the lord chief justice being returned to his place, put another question, "Whether the lord chancellor shall be suspended of all his titles of nobility, during his life, or no? It was agreed, per plures, "That he shall not be suspended thereof."—The sentence being agreed upon against the chancellor, the Lords sent a message to the other house, That they were ready to give judgment against the lord viscount St. Albans, if they, with their Speaker, came to demand it.—In the mean time the Lords put on their robes, and Mr. Speaker being come to the bar, after making three low obeysances, delivered himself as follows: "The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Commons House of Parl. having made complaint unto your lordships of many exorbitant offences of bribery and corruption committed by the Lord Chancellor, we understand that your lordships are ready to give judgment upon him for the same. Wherefore, I, their Speaker, in their names, do humbly demand judgment against him, the lord chancellor, as the nature of his offences and demerits require."

The lord chief justice answered, "Mr. Speaker; Upon the complaint of the Commons against the lord viscount St. Alban, lord chancellor, this high court hath thereby, and by his own confession found him guilty of the crimes and corruptions complained of by the Commons, and of sundry other crimes and corruptions of like nature. Therefore, this high court, having first summoned him to attend, and having received his excuse of not attending, by reason of infirmities and sickness, which he protested was not feigned, or else he would most willingly have attended; doth, nevertheless, think fit to proceed to judgment. And, therefore, this high court doth adjudge, 1. That the lord visc. St. Alban, lord chancellor of England, shall undergo fine and ransom of 40,000*l.* 2. That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower, during the king's pleasure. 3. That he shall, for ever, be incapable of holding any office, place, or employment, in the state or commonwealth. 4. That he shall never sit in parliament, nor come within the verge of the court.—Then his highness the Prince was intreated by the house, That, accompanied with divers lords of this house, he would be pleased to present this sentence given against the late lord chancellor unto his maj.; which he consented to.

The Sentence upon Sir F. Mitchell.] May 4. The offences wherewith sir Fra. Mitchell was charged, being read, and the question being put, Whether the said sir Francis be guilty of the offences, or any of them, so charged upon him, that he is worthy to be censured? It was agreed, unanimously, that he was. Then a message was sent to the Commons, That the Lords were ready to give judgment against sir Francis for many exorbitant offences, of which they had found him guilty; if they, with their Speaker, will come to demand it.

The Speaker, being come up to the bar, spoke as follows: "Whereas a complaint, from the House of Commons, hath been exhibited against sir Giles Mompesson and sir Fra. Mitchell, for many offences committed by them against the king and commonwealth; your lordships have proceeded with Mompesson, and given judgment against him; and understanding that you are ready, also, to pronounce judgment against sir Fran. Mitchell, I, the Speaker, in the name of the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the Commons House of Parl. do demand and pray that judgment may be given against the said sir Francis, according to his demerits."

The Lord Chief Justice then pronounced Judgment in hæc verba:—"Mr. Speaker; The lords spiritual and temporal have taken into due consideration the great care and pains, taken by the Commons, to inform their lordships of the great complaint, and the quality and nature thereof, presented unto them against sir Fra. Mitchell and others; wherefore their lordships, being well prepared by them to the true understanding of the same, have proceeded to the perfect discovery thereof, (by examination of divers witnesses upon oath) and do find, thereby, the said sir Francis clearly guilty of many great crimes and offences against his maj. and the commonwealth, and have resolved, at this time, to proceed against him for the same. Therefore the lords spiritual and temporal of this high court of parl. do award and adjudge, 1. That the said sir Francis shall stand and be from henceforth degraded of the order of knighthood, with reservation of the dignity to his wife and children. The ceremonies of degradation to be performed by direction of this court to the earl marshal's court. 2. That he shall be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, in the goal, in Finsbury fields, in the same chamber which he provided for others; the Tower where he now remains being too worthy for him. 3. That he shall undergo a fine of 1000*l.* 4. That he shall be disabled to hold or receive any office, under the king, or the commonwealth."

Proceedings in the Commons against Edward Floyde for scandalizing the Princess Palatine.] May 5. The house was moved to take into consideration an act, lately done by the Commons, in convening before them the person of one Edw. Floyde in examining of witnesses, giving judgment upon him, and entering it as an act of their own. That this proceeding trenched deep into the privileges of their house, for that all judgments do, properly and only, belong unto the Lords. Therefore, it was resolved not to suffer any thing to pass, which might prejudice their right in this point of judicature; and yet, so to proceed, as that the love and good correspondency between both houses might be continued.

The Commons had been some time engaged in examining witnesses against this Floyde; and having sufficient proof of his speaking the words he was accused of, on the 1st of May proceeded to give judgment against him. Many arguments ensued on what punishment to inflict upon him; and, amongst the rest, sir Edwin Sandys said, "That the house ought to be well advised, since there was much difficulty in the case: that their sentence would be censured in a great part of the christian world: that the root of this man's malice was ill-affection to religion, and consequently, to the state. There were but two eminent persons before, viz. king Edw. VI. and queen Jane, who had escaped the virulent tongues of opposites in religion. This lady Elizabeth was the third, who was much praised by all her enemies*. That he was for joining with the Lords in this proceeding; was it not for the great business they had, and should soon bring before them: In the sentence not to meddle with his religion, but his offence in tongue; for that would make him be canonized: that the words he had spoken were words of contempt, not of slander; therefore to punish him with as much contempt as may be, &c."—On the whole, the Commons agreed on a sentence, which the Speaker denounced against the offender, kneeling at their bar; which sentence was ordered to be entered in their Journals. And that the reader may the better understand the business, we give it in its own form, as follows:

"Be it remembered, that upon Tuesday, the 1st day of May, in the year of the reign of our sovereign lord James, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. the 19th; Edward Floyde, late of Clannemayne, within the county of Salop, esq. was impeached before the Commons assembled in this parl. for that the said Edward sithence the summons of this parl. in the prison of the Fleete, having communication concerning the most illustrious princess the lady Elizabeth, only daughter of our said sovereign lord, and the most excellent prince her husband, did use and utter, openly and publicly, false, malicious and despiteful speeches, of the said two princes; saying in this manner, 'I have heard, that Prague is taken; and Goodman Palsgrave and Goodwife Palsgrave have taken their heels, and run away; and, as I have heard, Goodwife Palsgrave is taken prisoner; and that those words were spoken by him, in most despiteful and scornful manner, with a sneering and scoffing countenance, and with a purpose to disgrace, as much as in him lay, those two princes; and that at other times he did, in like despiteful and reproachful manner, use other malicious and opprobrious words of them. Whereupon the said Commons, of their love and zeal to our said sovereign lord, and not minding to let pass unpunished those things, that tended to the disgrace of his maj.'s issue, a part of himself, who is head of the parl. did call before them the said Edw. Floyde, and thereof did question him; and thereupon so far proceeded, that after, upon the same day, for that the said matters, whereof the said Edward was impeached, were true and notorious, therefore the said Commons, in the Commons House assembled in parl. did adjudge and award, that the said Edward should be returned that night prisoner to the Fleete, where before he remained in prison, and to lie that night in a place there, called Bolton's Ward; and shall the next morning be brought to Westminster, into the great yard before the door of the great hall of pleas, and be there set, and stand, upon the pillory, from 9 until 11 of the clock, in the forenoon, with a paper upon his hat, with this inscription, in capital letters, of these words; 'For false, malicious, and despiteful Speeches, against the King's Daughter, and her Husband; and from thence shall presently ride to the Exchange within the city of London, upon a horse, without a saddle, with his face backwards toward the horse's tail, holding the tail in his hand, with the former paper on his head; and be there again set, and stand, upon the pillory, two hours; and from thence shall ride, in like manner, to the Fleete, and there to remain until the next Friday morning; and, on that morning, to ride, in like manner, into Cheapside, in the city of London, and there shall be set, and stand, upon the pillory, with the former paper and inscription, by the space of two hours, that is, from 10 until 12 of the clock in the forenoon of that day; and ride back to the Fleete, in like manner as before: And that there is set, and assessed upon him, a fine of 1000l."

This proceeding the Lords judged to be a great infringement of their privileges; and, on the day aforesaid, after mature deliberation of the matter, the lords sent a message, in writing, to the Commons, by two of the judges, importing, that, "the Lords, during all this parl. have had much contentment in the good correspondency that hath been between both houses: that their lordships have an earnest affection, and an assured confidence of the happy continuance of it to the end; with a full resolution of all possible endeavours, on their parts, tending thereunto. Their lordships having heard of a censure lately passed in that house, against one Edw. Floyde, are desirous of a conference for the accommodation of that business, in such sort as may be without any prejudice to the privileges of either house. This conference they desire, if it may stand with the occasions of that house, may be between the whole houses, at 3 in the afternoon, in the Painted Chamber; with power to each committee to treat and confer freely, and to understand each other's reasons."—To the end that the Lords might agree amongst themselves in what manner to proceed at the said conference, the house adjourned ad libitum; and, being returned, it was resolved that the abp. of Canterbury should begin, and the lord treasurer, the lord chamberlain, and the earl of Southampton, should argue and dispute about it.—Answer returned from the Commons by sir Lyonel Cranfield, and others: "The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, have commanded me to let your lordships understand, that they take great comfort in the message which your lordships sent them, and desire the happy continuance of the love and unity of both houses. Their whole house, as a committee, will attend your lordships at the conference desired, and at the time and place appointed."

May 5. p. m. After consulting a precedent shewn their lordships by mr. serjeant Crew, 4 Hen. IV. which proved, That the Commons were not judges in parl.; but that judicature belongs unto the King and Lords alone, the whole house went, as a committee, into the Painted Chamber. And, being returned, the house was resumed; when it was agreed, that the judges and king's council should make a report of the collections of what the Commons alledged for their right of judicature.

May 7. The Abp. of Canterbury reported, "That yesterday, according to the direction of the house, he presented their lordships Petition unto the king, humbly desiring that his maj. would be pleased that this house might continue judges of sir Henry Yelverton, for the matter concerning his maj.'s honour." At which time his maj. said, "That, in example of that most famous queen Elizabeth, when this whole house was suitors to her, he must return Answer, Answer-less." But that this morning his maj.'s answer was, "The lords knowing they enjoy their honours from him, and under him, he doubts not but they will be more tender of his honour for that cause; therefore he doth return back unto their lordships the whole and final ordering of that business of sir Henry Yelverton."

The Lords having considered the precedents alledged by the Commons at the last conference, do find that they tended to prove, 1. "That the house of commons is a court of record. 2. That they have administered an oath in matters concerning themselves. 3. That they have inflicted punishments on delinquents, where the cause has concerned a messenger of their house, or the privilege thereof."—Their lordships determined, "That the question, at this time, is not Whether that house be a court of record; nor whether the oath by them alledged to be ministred, in a matter concerning that house, was given by the house, or by a master in chancery, then one of their members; nor whether they have a right of judicature in matters concerning themselves? But the question is, Whether that house may proceed to sentence any man, who is not a member of their house, and for a matter which does not concern them, for which the Commons alledged no proofs, nor produced any precedents? Therefore their lordships agreed to pray a re-conference about the same; and, at the said conference, to stick to this only. "That the house of commons have no power of judicature, no coercion against any, but in matters concerning their own house."

May 8. The lord chamberlain declared, "That the king had commanded him to acquaint their lordships. That although nothing is so dear unto him as his honour; yet, as before, so he doth now, put into their lordships hands the cause of sir Henry Yelverton, not mistrusting their affections to him, nor their judgments."—Then the Lords directed the attorney general to open to the house, as well the first speech as the second, (because his maj. thought that sir Henry Yelverton had by his second defence aggravated the former) who coming up to the clerk's table, read part of the copy of the first charge upon him; and his notes for answers, wrote in the margin thereof by him. Also, the notes taken of sir Henry's second speech, which was sent to the king; and which he said he did speak in the house, or would have spake if he had been permitted. But, the morning being far spent, the lords determined not to proceed against him then, but take another time to consider upon what point of those speeches to think him worthy of censure.

May 8. p. m. The house being to meet the Commons at the re-conference, this afternoon, concerning the judicature in which the Lords conceived the others had trenched into their liberties and privileges; and wherein their lordships were not satisfied with the precedents alledged by the Commons, at the former conference in their defence thereof: yet being desirous to continue that good respect and correspondency which hath been all this part between both the houses, they thought proper to order, That the Abp. of Canterbury should begin the introduction to the conference, and propound any thing that might tend to a gentle ending of the same. And, that if the Commons would agree to a sub-committee, to end this business, then the abp. the lord admiral, the lord chamberlain, the earls of Arundel and Southampton were appointed for that purpose; and it was further agreed, that this sub-committee should be limited not to yield to any thing, in point of judicature, which they of the commons have done, lest it may in time become a precedent to wrong the privileges of the lords. The Commons agreed to a sub-committee, to end this difference.

May 12. The Abp. of Canterbury reported the conference held yesterday between the sub-committees of both houses, to this effect: 1st, "The Commons shewed their constant resolution to maintain the love and good correspondency between the two houses. 2ndly,

Their resolution not to invade the privileges of this house, that have dealt so nobly with them. Lastly, that out of their zeal they sentenced Floyde; but they leave him to the Lords with an intimation of their hope that this house will censure him also. Then they proposed a protestation to be entered with the Lords for a mean to accommodate the business between them.—A Protestation was immediately drawn up and agreed to, in these words; "That the proceedings lately passed in the House of Commons, against Edw. Floyde, be not at any time hereafter drawn or used as a precedent to the enlarging or diminishing of the lawful rights or privileges of either house: but that the rights and privileges of both houses, shall remain in the self-same state and plight as before." This protestation is also entered in the Journals of the Commons, without any addition or alteration by them.

Sir Henry Yelverton's Case.] May 14. The lord treasurer delivered a representation of sir Henry Yelverton's Case, as presented to the king; with his maj.'s pleasure signified that it might be read in the house. The substance of which was as follows:—

"Sir Henry Yelverton, in Michaelmas Term last, was sentenced in the Star-Chamber for breach of trust, in the unwarrantable passing of a charter to the city of London; tending to the disherison of his maj. both in matter of kingly power and high prerogative, and also, in matter of revenues and profits of the crown; to the oppression and grievance of the subject, by raising of excessive fees and exactions.—The sentence consisted of these 3 parts: 1. Imprisonment in the Tower. 2. A fine of 4000l. 3. A declaration of disability and unfitness to hold the place of attorney general. Under this sentence sir Henry suffers at this day; for, he is a prisoner in the Tower; removed from the place of attorney; and the fine is leviable upon him at his maj.'s pleasure. That, on the 18th of April last, he was brought to the bar in parl.; and being there charged, inter alia, with some miscarriages, touching the patent of Inns, he said, If ever he had deserved well of his maj. it was in that; adding, That the king and subjects were more abused by that patent than by any other, and that he suffers at this day, as he takes it, for that patent.—April 30. He was again brought to the bar, and spoke as follows: "I cannot but present myself this day, before your highness and my lords, with much fear and more grief; for I am compassed with so many terrors from his maj. as I might well hide my head with Adam. His maj.'s displeasure wounds me more than the consciousness of any faults; yet, I had rather have died than that the commonwealth should receive so much as a scratch from me. I, that in none of my actions feared the great man, in whom they (sir Edw. Villiers and sir G. Mompesson) did depend; much less would fear them who were but his shadows. But, my most noble lords, knowing that my lord of Buckingham was ever at his maj.'s hand, ready, upon every occasion, to hew me down, out of the honest fear of a servant, not to offend so gracious a master, as his maj. hath ever been to me, I did commit them, viz. the silk-men.—As to the patent of Inns, I cannot but herein bemoan my unhappiness, that in the last cause labouring by all means to advance the profit of his maj.; and, in this, with the sight almost of my own ruin, to preserve his maj.'s honour and the quiet of the people, I am yet drawn in question as if I had equally dishonoured his maj. in both.—When sir Giles saw I would not be moved to offend his maj. by his directions, I received a message from mr. Emerson, sent me by sir Giles, that I would run myself upon the rocks, and that I should not hold my place long, if I did thus withstand the patent of Inns, or to that effect. Soon after came sir Giles himself, and, like a herald at arms, told me that he had this message to acquaint me with from my lord of Buckingham, that I should not hold my place a month if I did not conform myself in better manner to the patent of Inns; for my lord had obtained it by favour and would maintain it by his power.—How could I but startle at this message? I saw here was a great assuming of power to himself, to place or displace an officer at his pleasure. I saw myself cast upon two main rocks; either, treacherously to forsake the standing his maj. had set me on, or else, to endanger myself by a by-blow and to hazard my fortune.—I humbly beseech your lordships to think that nature will struggle, when she sees her place and means of living thus assaulted; for now it was come to this, whether I would obey his maj. or my lord, if sir Giles spoke true. Yet, I resolved in this, to be as stubborn as Mordecai, not to stoop or pass those gracious bounds, his maj. had prescribed me.—Soon after, I found the message, in part, made good; for all the profits, almost, of my place were diverted from me, and turned into an unusual channel, to one of my lord's worthies; that I retained little more than the name of an attorney. It was so fatal and so penal, that it became almost the loss of a suit to come to me; my place was but as the seat of winds and tempests.—Howbeit, I dare say, if my lord of Buckingham had read the Articles exhibited, in this place, against Hugh Despenser; (see p. 67.) and had known the danger of placing and displacing officers about a king, he would not have pursued me with such bitterness. But, my opposing his lordship in the patent of Inns, in the patent of Alehouses, in the Irish Customs, and in sir Robert Naunton's deputation of his place in the court of Wards, have been my overthrow. For these I suffer at this day in my estate and fortune, (not meaning to say, as I take it, but as I know, for my opposition to his lordship) above 20,000l. I know well that I suffer unjustly, in my restraint, for my offence, by his lordship's means: for my heart tells me I was ever faithful to his maj.; I sought no riches but his grace."

The foregoing minutes of sir Henry Yelver-

ton's case being read, he was brought to the bar, where serjeant Crew and mr. Attorney General opened the charge against him; and shewed, That those Speeches did directly point to the lord marquis of Buckingham, and, by consequence, fastened a scandal on his maj. Sir Henry, having leave, explained himself touching the said speeches, and made his defence to the charge, which was very long. Afterwards, he was ordered to withdraw, and to be brought again to the bar to-morrow in the afternoon.

May 15. The affair of sir Henry Yelverton came on again; when the question being put, "Whether the said sir Henry is worthy to be censured, for words spoken by him in this house, which touched the king's honour?" It was agreed he should, nem. diss. Afterwards they agreed what Sentence should be passed upon him: 1. For matters touching the king's honour. 2. For the scandal on the marq. of Buckingham. 3. For the matter of complaint against him by the Commons. But the day being far spent in settling this affair, the lieut. of the Tower had orders to bring up the said sir Henry, at 9 the next morning.

Sentence against sir H. Yelverton.] May 16. The house proceeded to give Sentence against sir Henry Yelverton; the Memorial of which is entered in these words: "Whereas, on the 14th of May, sir Henry Yelverton was charged at this bar, that in the term of st. Michael last past, for breach of trust and misdemeanors by him committed, whilst he was attorney general to his maj. viz. for drawing without warrant a charter unto the city of London, tending as well to his maj.'s disherison, as to the grievance and oppression of the subject; was sentenced by the court of Star-Chamber to be a person unfit to exercise or hold the office of Attorney General; and was further adjudged to be imprisoned in the Tower, and to pay a fine of 4000*l.* to his maj. The said sir H. being by force of the said sentence imprisoned and still liable to pay the said fine, was, upon the 18th of April, brought to the bar of this high court, and charged with some complaints of the Commons, with some miscarriages concerning two patents, the one for making Gold and Silver-Thread, the other for the licencing of Inns and Hosteries; and being required to make Answer thereto; touching the last, he said, 'That if ever he deserved well of his maj. it was of that matter. That the king and subject were more abused by it than by any other; and that he suffered at that day for opposing that patent, as he took it. And having the favour of this high court to be advised of his Answer to the 30th of the same month, and coming again to the bar, the said sir H. made a long and large Answer to the particulars of this charge, as touching the said patents; and in his answer uttered divers speeches, by which he attributed all the effects of that sentence, viz. his sufferings, his hindrances, which he esteemed to the value of 20,000*l.* his ruin and his overthrow, unto his opposition against that patent of Inns and Hosteries; to the great scandal of his maj. in point of honour and justice. And the said sir H. in his Answer uttered several other words of scandal; which, though directly and immediately pointed at the lord marq. of Buckingham, lord high admiral of England, charging his lordship with matter of opposition against the said sir H. to his hindrance, ruin and overthrow; yet, by consequence, the same words reached his maj. and fastened a scandal upon his highness, in tolerating and giving way to those courses, supposed by the said sir H. to be injuriously wrought by the said lord marquis; glancing, and, in a sort, resembling them to the actions of Hugh Despenser, and comparing himself to Mordecai. After this the said charge was fully opened and pressed by his maj.'s council, the hon. court hearing the defence and examinations of the said sir H. to the same; but the day being far spent, their lordships did forbear to proceed to a sentence or judgment at that time. Afterwards the lords spiritual and temporal, on the 15th of May, after long and serious deliberation and conference, and upon due weighing of the speeches and words spoken before their lordships in this high court of parl. did with one assent, no man disagreeing, resolve, That the said sir H. was worthy to be censured by this court, for words spoken by him in this house, which did touch the king in honour; and did then also agree what censure to pass upon him for the same; but the day being again far spent, they proceeded not to judgment at that time, but ordered the said sir H. to be brought to the bar this day to hear the same; who being then at the bar, and the Lords in their robes, the lord chief justice pronounced the judgment in hæc verba:—The lords spiritual and temporal of this high court of parl. do award and adjudge, 1. That he, the said sir H. for his speeches uttered in this court, which do touch the king's maj. in honour, be fined to the king's maj. 10,000 marks. 2. That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure. 3. That he shall make such acknowledgment of his fault, and such submission to his maj. as shall be prescribed unto him by this court. The same to be made here at the bar, either in the king's presence, or, in his absence, at the king's pleasure."

This Judgment being given against the said sir Henry for his said speeches, which touched his maj. in honour; and the prisoner being withdrawn, the Lords took into their consideration, "That the said words and many others spoken here in this house, at the same time, by the said sir H. did directly tend to the scandal of the marq. of Buckingham, lord high admiral; and therefore, by their lordships appointment, the said sir H. was called in again, brought to the bar, and was charged with the same scandalous speeches by the king's serjeant and the attorney general. And, whereas, the greatest matter of averment, on his part, did depend upon a message which the said sir H. did affirm was delivered to him by mr. Tho. Emerson, from

Giles Mompesson; the depositions of the said Emerson taken here in court the 8th of May, were read by the clerk, wherein the said Emerson did upon his oath, absolutely deny the said message: and the said sir H. having leave to speak for himself, without interruption, did not give the house any good satisfaction for the scandalous speeches here by him uttered against the said lord. Wherefore he being withdrawn from the bar, and the said marquis also having withdrawn himself out of the house, the Lords having long debated the matter, resolved, That the said sir H. was worthy of censure, for his false and scandalous words; and, being fully agreed about it, the lord marquis and the prisoner were called in again, when the lord chief justice pronounced sentence against him in hæc verba:—"The lords spiritual and temporal of this high court of parl. do adjudge and award, 1. That sir Henry Yelverton, knt. for his false and scandalous words, uttered in this high court of parl. against the lord marq. of Buckingham, lord high admiral of England, shall pay 5000 marks unto the said marquis. 2. That he shall be imprisoned. 3. That he shall make such submission, in this court, to the lord marquis, as this court shall prescribe."

This Judgment being given, the lord marquis freely remitted unto the said sir Henry, the said 5000 marks, for which sir H. returned his most humble thanks to his lordship. The Lords also agreed to move his maj. to mitigate sir Henry's fine, and h. r. h. the prince offered to undertake that office.—It is also very remarkable that no censure was passed upon him on account of the complaint exhibited against him by the Commons; nor does it appear that they ever resented the omission. Soon after the king wholly relinquished the fine due to him from sir Henry on the sentence; he was set at liberty; reconciled to the marquis; and was esteemed, says Rushworth, 'a man valde eruditus lege, in his time.'—In the succeeding reign he was made a judge of the common pleas. He was author of The Reports; his father was Speaker of the house of commons, an. 1597; see p. 895.

A message was sent from the Commons to put their lordships in mind of the Complaint against the bp. of Landaff, for an offence proved to the house of commons, by the testimony of Randolph Davenport and divers other witnesses. Wherefore the Commons demand judgement against him for the same. Answer. The Lords have been busied with many matters of great importance; but they shall hear from them shortly touching the said complaint.

Proceedings against Edw. Floyde before the Lords.] May 25. The abp. of Canterbury, first of the committee appointed by the house to take examinations in the cause of Edw. Floyde, reported that they had taken several, and were satisfied of the proof of the crimes objected against him; and moved the house that mr. Attorney general might read the said examinations. Accordingly, the deposition of 6 persons were read, and then it was ordered that Floyde should be brought to the bar the next morning, in order to proceed to judgment against him.

May 26. Edw. Floyde being set to the bar, the Attorney General charged him with notorious misdemeanors and high presumption: "1. In rejoicing at the losses which had happened to the king's daughter and her children. 2. For discouraging of others who bear good affection unto them. 3. For speaking basely of them. 4. For taking upon him to judge of the rights of kingdoms."—To the 1st, mr. Attorney shewed, "That, in Dec. last, Floyde, being prisoner in the Fleet, having heard that Prague was taken, did upon all occasions shew himself joyful and glad of that calamity and affliction which had happened to the prince and princess Palatine, the king's only daughter and her children."—As to the 2nd, the Attorney said, "That Floyde relating unto one Henry Pennington the loss of Prague, with the captivity of the king's son-in-law, his daughter and her children; he the said Pennington wishing that himself and all the convenient men of the kingdom were pressed forth not to return with their lives, till they had redeemed her from captivity: he the said Floyde replied, I am sorry thou art such a fool; and the said Pennington reproving him for saying so, Floyde replied, That if he had been out of his chamber he would have struck him."—For the 3rd, mr. Attorney shewed, "That the said Floyde, taking occasion to speak of these matters, did term the prince and princess Palatine, the king's daughter, by the ignominious and despiteful terms of 'Goodman Palsgrave and Goodwife Palsgrave;' calling him 'that poor lad;' and scoffingly, with great jollity, related a stage-play of the princess, running away with two children, the one under one arm and the other under the other arm, and the third in her belly, with the Palsgrave following with the cradle."—For the 4th, the Attorney shewed, "That one Abdias Cole going to preach one Sunday morning in the Fleet, the said Floyde called to him and told him that Prague was taken; and the said Cole answering, 'That is little comfort to me.' Floyde replied, nay, now we may freely speak it, I, or any nobleman, have as good a right to be king of Wales, as he, meaning the Palsgrave, to be king of Bohemia."—Here mr. Attorney opened "that point of the ancient oath of allegiance; of which oath and the danger to the offender in such case, the said Floyde, being a lawyer, could not be ignorant, and that therefore his offence was greater. That he, being a man of good estate, was a justice of peace in his country in the county of Salop; and, was put out of commission, as was affirmed to be true by mr. Baron Bromley then present; and also that this Floyde, having heretofore studied the common law, in the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar, was put out of that society by the benchers."

Floyde being then demanded by the lord chief justice, what Answer he could make to these misdemeanors wherewith he was charged? he began with a long discourse to traduce the persons of such as had deposed against him; but being demanded to make a direct Answer to the Charge, he said, 'I cannot remember that these words were ever spoken by me.' Whereupon the clerk read the depositions of 6 witnesses against him. Then the chief justice demanded of Floyde, whether he spake those words, 'Goodman Palsgrave and Goodwife Palsgrave? To which he answered, 'I spoke not those words in such sort as they are laid down in the deposition.' 'Did you speak those words or words to that effect?' To which he replied, 'It was but a folly for him to deny them because so many had proved them.' And being demanded whether he spake the other words, or used the insolent behaviour towards the prince and princess Palatine? he answered 'I remember it not.'

The prisoner being withdrawn, though the Lords were fully satisfied by the examinations and Floyde's Answers, yet, for order sake, it was put to the question, 'Whether Edw. Floyde be so guilty of the offences of which he is charged, as that he deserves to be censured?' It was agreed by all, nem. diss. But one part of the sentence proposed being whipping, some Lords objected to it because he was a gentleman; this was also put to the question, and carried for whipping. Another question was, whether he should have his ears nailed to the pillory? It was agreed, per plures, not to be nailed.

The form of the Sentence being then read and agreed to, the prisoner was brought again to the bar, when the Attorney General praying judgment against him, the lord chief justice pronounced sentence in these words:—"The lords spiritual and temporal of this high court, considering the great offence of the said Edward Floyde, do award and adjudge, 1. That Edward Floyde shall be incapable to bear arms as a gentleman; and that he shall be ever held as an infamous person; and his testimony not to be taken in any court or cause. 2. That on Monday next, in the morning, he shall be brought to Westminster-hall, there to be set on horseback with his face to the horse-tail, holding the tail in his hand, with papers on his head and breast declaring his offence; and so to ride to the pillory in Cheapside to stand two hours in it, to be branded with the letter K in his forehead. 3. To be whipt at a cart's tail, on the 1st day of the next term, from the Fleet to Westminster-hall, with a paper on his head declaring the offence, and then to stand in the pillory there for two hours. 4. That he shall be fined to the king in 5000l. 5. That he shall be imprisoned in Newgate during his life."

Warrants were given to the serjeant at arms and to the warden of the Fleet to see this Sentence quickly executed; and the paper to be on his head was to contain these words: "For ignominious and spiteful words, and malicious and scornful behaviour towards the prince and princess Palatine, the king's only daughter, and their children."—Cambden tells us, That every part of this Sentence was executed on Floyde; but the Lords Journals assure us, That some days after on a motion from the prince it was ordered, That the punishment of whipping, with all that belongs to it, to be inflicted upon Edw. Floyde, be suspended and forborn, until the pleasure of the house be further known; the rest of the punishment to be executed according to the former order. It was also ordered, That, hereafter, when any censure beyond imprisonment be agreed on, that judgment thereupon be not then given, but on another day, or sitting, that time may be taken to consider thereof.

The King's Reasons for adjourning the Parliament.] May 28. The Lord Treasurer declared unto the house, That yesterday his maj. advising with the lords of the privy council, hath thought fit, and so has commanded him to tell them, to adjourn the parl. at this time, for these causes: "1. The season of the year, by the continuance of this great concourse of people, may breed infection. 2. The use that this time of the year may require to have the lieutenants of the counties, and the justices of peace, in the country. 3. Because the courts of Westminster-hall have not had their ordinary proceedings this session. 4. For that the profits of his maj.'s revenues are, as it were at a stand. 5. The omission of the state." The reasons why he will adjourn it rather than prorogue it are these: 1. "For that the adjournment keeps a kind of being in parl. 2. Whereas many good bills are preferred and not as yet past, the adjournment reserves them in the same state they now are. 3. It will keep many laws in continuance which will end with the session, without a special provision be made for the same. 4. His maj.'s free and general pardon is not yet prepared; which he intends to the better sort of people as well as to the meanest. 5. Seeing there are so many bills exhibited, his majesty cannot, in so short a time, apply his mind to advise which bills to accept of and which to refuse." The Treasurer added, "That, as in this parl. his maj. hath already redressed the corruptions of the chief courts of justice; and, by his Proclamation called in the patent of Inns and Hosteries; and forbidden bills of Conformities, which were things very grievous to his subjects; so his maj. cherisheth the bills against Informers, against the abuse of Supersedeas, against Monopolies, against Recusants, and for Limitation of Suits, with an intent to perfect them. And he also proposeth to reform divers grievances to the people. Wherefore, his maj.'s pleasure is, That you perfect the acts in the house against Saturday next, especially that of sir John Bennet; and hath appointed Sunday next, in the afternoon, to hear any thing concerning other Grievances. That on Monday, June 4th, his maj. will send a Commission for the adjournment of this parl."

Debate in the Commons touching the proposed Adjournment.] On the same day, a similar Message was brought to the Commons by mr. Secretary, upon which the following debate took place:—

Sir S. Sands saith, that he thinketh it not now fit to proceed with bills, by reason of the shortness of the time we are to sit, but to consider of the grievances in hand.

Mr. Hackwill would that we should have a Conference with the lords, and to tell them, that we are of opinion, that it is fit we should declare, that those decrees, where corruption is proved, may have a bill of review, if the parties whom they concern will; and that they who bring this bill of review shall pay good costs, if the decree be thought fit to be confirmed: that all the bills committed may be reported and delivered into the house; and those that have not been thought fit by the committee to pass, may sleep.

Sir G. Moore saith, that the first reason of calling of a parl. was to redress mischiefs and grievances; and, since we want time to redress the mischiefs, he would we should forthwith take order to proceed in the course proposed for the Grievances; and that a calendar should be made of all the bills in the house, and that it should be therein set down how far the house hath proceeded in every one of them.

Sir N. Rich would have wished that by commission (as the bill of Subsidies did pass) some few general bills might pass, and that there might be a short bill or clause, that the sessions should not end, notwithstanding the passing of such bills.

Mr. Secretary saith, that his maj. considered and advised with the lord chief justice, and other judges there present, that some few bills might have been passed, and the sessions not to have thereby ended; but those judges said, it was a thing not warranted by any precedents.

Sir Warwick Heale saith, that there is a precedent in sir Tho. Sherley's Case, that a bill might pass, and yet the sessions continue; and also this sessions is a good precedent, for that we have passed the bill of Subsidies by commission.

Sir E. Sandys would have all those bills, that are engrossed, read, and passed before the recess; because otherwise, at our next meeting, they will seem strange and new to us.

Mr. Alford would have no order made, nor any thing put to the question of all these motions till after dinner, that then we might further consult what to do. Which motion was thought fit by the house to be followed.

Sir Rob. Crane would have us petition his maj. that we might sit till about the end of the term, that we might pass some bills, and not return without some fruit of our labours into the country; which will otherwise with a heavy heart pay the Subsidies we have given.—The house liked not this motion. In the afternoon of the same day, the house being in a committee,

Mr. Crew saith, that since it pleased the king to say, at the beginning of the parl. that we had dealt with him not merchant-like, and had given him a precedent of our affection without precedent, and that he would meet us more than half way in remedying our grievances; therefore he seeth not but that we may with good hope petition his maj. for our sitting a longer time. He would have us desire a present Conference with the Lords, that they and we might join in a petition to the king, that the parl. might continue till we had finished some good bills for his royal assent: that in queen Mary's time bills did pass, and yet the sessions continued: that we may have a clause in the end of the bill, that that bill might pass, and yet the sessions continue.

Mr. Hackwill saith, that in the 11th Rd. II. an act did pass, that, notwithstanding some bills did pass, yet the sessions should not determine: that in this king's time, in sir Tho. Sherley's case, it was resolved, that a bill with such a clause might pass, and the sessions not be determined. He would have us send to the Lords for a Conference, and desire them to join with us in a petition to this effect.

Sir Ed. Sandys saith, he would have us to desire the Lords to join with us in a petition to his maj. shewing how ready we are to pass divers good bills; what great grievances are come to the subject for want of such bills: that we are willing, notwithstanding the weather, to sit for the service of his maj. and the kingdom: that the Pardon may pass this house in one day, for it is here to be read but once; and, for the enlarging of the pardon, that may be easily done by striking out of certain restrictions: that the bill for repeal and continuing of statutes is already once read, and will be also soon ready: that we, at a conference with the Lords, should desire them to join in a petition to the king, that we might continue our sitting to the end of the term, because in this term there is but little business to be dispatched; for usually this term is but to settle and prepare business against another term.

Sir R. Phillips would not have us stand on the pardon, but (if it cannot be had so soon) to let it alone.

Sir S. Sands saith, that he will walk in a path not yet trodden in, and propound what hath not yet been proposed. He would have us to take 3 things into our consideration; 1st, his maj.'s honour; 2ndly, the good of the state; and 3rdly, our own reputation; and that in all these he would have us do something: that he never heard of an adjournment by commission; prorogations have used to be made by the king, or by commission, but adjournments have ever been by the houses themselves only: that the king said, he would meet us in the remedy of our grievances more than half way, and that made us engage his maj.'s word in the country, that we had more than hopes of a good success of this parl.; but now we shall be like the cursed tree, which bore fair leaves but no fruit, for at the first we had fair hopes: that, if we go now home without fruit, we shall be worse welcome than we were after the last convention of parl.; for, though that parl. brought forth nothing, yet it parted with nothing: I wish that it had then given something, and that we had attended the fruit of it. He protesteth, that, if he had any other place to go to, he would not go into his country with empty hands; for if we go fruitless home, we shall be a mock and scorn to the country.—

The Speaker having taken the chair, —

Sir Edw. Coke reported from the committee, "That the whole vote of the house is, that, if we should part, as was this day propounded, we should go all away heavy: that the committee hath resolved to desire a Conference with the Lords about this; even to be humble petitioners, with their lordships, to his maj. to give us some further time, for perfecting of the special bills; to the comfort of his subjects." A message was sent to the Lords to this effect.

May 29. Sir Edw. Coke reported the Conference with the Lords touching the petition to the king for our sitting till the end of the term. He saith, that he told the lords that we shall not make a country farmer understand the difference between an adjournment and a prorogation: that for the general Pardon, it may soon be made ready: that there never was parl. that sat 15 or 16 weeks, and brought nothing to perfection: that there were never Subsidies given, but there were some bills of grace, and some bills for the good of the commonwealth which did pass: that after a prorogation the same parliament men are to come again: that in 30 H. I. the two parliament houses are called commune consilium regis: that we thought we should have sat longer, and till Midsummer, because the king in his speech said, we would be weary before Midsummer; whereby we took it, that we should sit till that time: that we, for these and other reasons alleged, do desire their lordships to join with us in a Petition to the king for further time. He saith, that the duke of Lenox answered, that their lordships would consider hereof in their own house, and that presently we should know their answer to our request.

Mr. Afford saith, that he hath seen an ancient roll of parliament, that the king ought not to end or break off the parl. when things are in hand and not concluded; and that, when we have notice that the time approacheth that the sessions shall end, then the Speaker useth to move the house that no more bills may be admitted, but that we may go on and proceed only with the businesses that are in hand. He saith, that he is therefore of opinion, that it is against the course of parl. that the king, in the midst of business, should break up the sessions.

May 29, p. m. The Lord Treasurer acquainted the House of Lords, That the lords of the privy council had attended his maj. that day, to whom he had taken notice, That after he had signified his intention to both houses for adjourning the parl. the Commons had prayed a Conference and thereby a Petition to be made to his maj. for a longer continuance of the parl.; to which the Lords as yet had returned no Answer. His maj.'s commands are therefore, "That though he is willing to hearken to any petition, which shall be made unto him by parl. yet, a petition of this nature cannot be pleasing unto him; it seeming to be a derogation of his prerogative, who hath the only power to call, adjourn, and determine parliaments.—That, out of favour to his people, his maj. had made choice rather to adjourn the parl. than to prorogue it; and therefore his maj. adviseth that a select number of bills may be chosen out, which he may pass, and either make a session, or an adjournment, at his pleasure. In which his maj. will advise with the judges. Whether the royal assent by commission to some bills, will put an end to a session; or, by adjournment, keep all other bills on foot in the same state as they now are. His maj.'s further advice is, "That the house do husband well the time; for, on Monday next he determines to hold his day either for the adjournment or prorogation of the parl. His pleasure is also, that those bills which have passed both houses be sent unto him before-hand, for the rest he will advise of afterwards. Lastly, that the business of sir John Bennet be hastened."

The prince moved the house, "That the Commons might be made acquainted with his maj.'s pleasure, signified by the lord treasurer; and of his maj.'s advice to husband well the time; and that if they have any thing more to say unto the king, that they do attend his maj. on Sunday next."—On this motion the Lords sent to desire a Conference, presently, with the other house: which being agreed to, and the Lords returned from it, it was ordered, That sir John Bennet be brought to the bar to-morrow morning, at 9 o'clock.

May 29, p. m. Upon the report of this Conference with the Lords being made to the Commons, the house was so discontented, that every man cried out "rise! rise!" and that without giving any answer to the lords, whether this did like them or not.

Mr. Delbridge, a Devonshire merchant, saith he will freely discharge his conscience, as becometh an honest man; and therefore professeth, that this message delivered us by the lords from the king, doth dislike him for his particular.

Mr. Mallory would have us return an answer to keep correspondency with the Lords; but, for all other businesses, he would have us let them rest.

Serjeant Ashley saith, that the prince did wish at the conference, that we should forbear to debate or consult of joining with the lords to get farther time.

Sir Edwin Sandys saith, he seeth the house is full of two passions, grief and fear; for his own part, he was never so full of either; that the country is in a dangerous taking: our religion is rooted out of Bohemia and Germany, and rooting out of France, unless God doth miraculously defend them: that trade is decayed and stopped in all the out ports (especially the Cinque Ports) so that, whereas they were wont to defend themselves and the kingdom, they are now become all such beggars; as the king must keep there a garrison to defend them: all the grievances of the kingdom are trifles in comparison of the decay of trade: that it is now no time to consult what to do, for we are too full of grief and fear: time may temper our passions; and therefore he would have us rise now, and send a message to the lords to-morrow.

Sir Robert Phillips saith, that we see religion at home in an ill case; and he prayeth God we feel not the danger of it.—A message was then sent to the Lords, to acquaint their lordships that the committee is returned with great grief to the house, and is now unfit to send an answer; but to-morrow we will send their lordships an answer. The house was so long debating of this message before they could resolve on it, that the Lords were risen. Sir Lionel Cranfield, master of the wards, would have spoken (the house being in this passion, and ready to rise) and began saying, he was in a great strait between his duty to the king, and his duty to this house; whereupon all the house cried out that we should send the message to the Lords (for yet it was not reported to us, that the Lords were gone, before the messengers came to deliver the message) and would not hear him: then sir Henry Vane, moved, that we should hear the Master of the Wards, but yet the house would not: then the Chancellor of the Dutchy, sir Humphrey May, moved, that we did overthrow the liberties of the house, if we would not permit every man to speak; but for all this the house still called out for the message; and so the house rose in a great passion and confusion.

Proceedings against the Bishop of Landaff for Brocage in Bribery.] May 30. House of Lords.—The first thing of moment the Lords went upon this day, was to hear the report of the earl of Huntingdon, one of the committee appointed to take examinations concerning Dr. Field, now bishop of Landaff. A collection was made thereof, which, with divers letters, sent up by the Commons, concerning that cause were delivered by his lordship into court. The bishop having withdrawn, the king's serjeant, Crewe, came to the clerk's table, and read the said collection in hæc verba:—"Edw. Egerton having a suit in chancery with sir Rowland Egerton, for lands of good value; and supposing he had some hard measure therein, was commended to dr. Field, now lord bp. of Landaff, for the procuring of some great friends to assist him in this cause. Upon conference between Edw. Egerton and the lord bp. about this matter, and to the end to procure such assistance and friendship, he acknowledged a recognizance of 10,000l. to the bishop, and one Randolph Davenport, a gent. belonging to the late lord chancellor; which was dated March 18th, in the 16th year of this reign. Whereupon there was a draught of a defeasance conceived, but not perfected, as it seems; by which it was agreed between them, That if, by means or mediation of the said commisses, or either of them, the said Egerton should prevail, either by decree in chancery, or at common law, to recover so much of the ancient inheritance of the said Edward, as is mentioned in the defeasance, then to pay the lord bp. or Davenport, or either of them, 6000l. within 2 years after.—On the 15th of March 1618, dr. Field writes a letter to E. Egerton, in the nature of a defeasance of that recognizance, which containeth, that the sum of 6000l. is for gratuities to such hon. friends as shall be made in his business, if he recover, by the power of those friends, his ancient inheritance; or, otherwise, a third part of whatsoever shall be added to that which had been formerly awarded to the said Edward in chancery. And, if nothing was done, then he promised, in verbo sacerdotis, to return the recognizance.—After this the lord bishop writes another letter, without date, to mr. Egerton, letting him know thereby, that there was a stay made of decreeing the lord chancellor's award till next term, by the means of one of my lord chancellor's gentlemen, who would have conferred with mr. Egerton, but that his leisure permitted him not then to do it; he therefore required some further warrant and direction to proceed in his behalf. Underneath this letter one Woodward, brother-in-law to mr. Egerton, writes this postscript, That he thinks his cause will do well, and that he hath assured the gentleman he shall find mr. Egerton faithful in his promise, and wisheth he would write back to Woodward to that purpose.—Woodward writes another letter to mr. Egerton without date, letting him know, that dr. Field is sorry my lord hath not sent an answer as he expected, but that my lord chancellor shall be moved this night for a stay of the decree; which he hopes to get by such means as he shall use; and that he hath assured him mr. Egerton would perform his promise.—Davenport being examined in this high court, touching the sharing the 6000l. betwixt him, Butler, the bishop, and others, saith, He himself should have had nothing; Butler was to have 2000l. and 1000l. was thought fit to be given to the lord chancellor; but his lordship knew not of it, and Butler dared not to move it. Davenport and Butler meant to have shared that 1000l. For the other 3000l. he knew not how it should be shared. The matter promised was a letter from the lord admiral, and a reference from the king to the lord chancellor.—Francis Joyner being examined in this cause, confesseth, he was the means to make mr. Egerton and dr. Field acquainted; and that the doctor had conference with Butler and Davenport about mr. Egerton's business; and that the doctor drew in the lord Haddington to be a furtherer of it. He spoke to the recognizance; and that the doctor confessed he was trusted from the lord Haddington, and that his lordship was to dispose of the money at his pleasure.—Tristram Woodward being likewise examined, confessed, Joyner told him dr. Field had friends at court; and how mr. Egerton was drawn to the doctor's house. The recognizance was taken for Butler and the lord Haddington, as he thinks; but out of it the doctor expected recompence, as he heard amongst them: and confessed he wrote the postscript to dr. Field's letter sent to mr. Egerton.—Edw. Egerton saith, "That he agreed with dr. Field for the recognizance, that he should have his land decreed to him: that 6000l. was to be paid on the event of the suit. He was to pay the money to dr. Field and Davenport; but how much each should have he knoweth not. He further said, That Woodward, his brother-in-law, and dr. Field procured him to acknowledge the recognizance; but he did not pay the charge of it: that dr. Field told him he would bring him to one Butler, who would procure an order from my lord chancellor for his relief in the cause as he would desire: thereupon the doctor demanded a recognizance of 10,000l. for payment of 6000l. when this examinant should have such an order from the court as he desired. The recognizance was entered accordingly; after which, this examinant finding no good thereby, demanded back his recognizance; when, after many delays, and a year's distance of time, he had the same delivered. Lastly, that Woodward told him dr. Field, capt. Field his brother, and Butler should have shared the money amongst them; but how, he knoweth not."

Then the king's serjeant read also the Proofs, which consisted of all the letters and examinations before mentioned. After which the bp. of Durham* stood up, and, in a speech, repeated the manner how this matter was first complained of by the commons to this house, with the several proofs thereof: but added, "That since there was nothing proved but an intent, at the most, he moved that the consideration thereof be referred to the abp. of Canterbury, and he to give the bishop an admonition for the same in the Convocation House." The archbishop (George Abbot) then rose up and said, "That dr. Field, the now bishop of Landaff, could not be excused from Brocage in Bribery; for which he was to blame: but hoped that he might bear his fault as dr. Field, and not as bp. of Landaff; and that, if it was referred to him, he would do that which belongs unto him.†

Whereupon it was ordered, That the Affair of the lord bp. of Landaff should be referred to the abp. of Canterbury, and he to be admonished by his grace in the Convocation House, before the bishops and clergy there. The Lords also taking into consideration the complaint of the Commons, touching this matter, agreed upon a message to be sent to that house, to this purpose: viz. "Whereas the house of commons informed this house of a great misdemeanor committed by dr. Field, now bp. of Landaff, and hath also sent since to demand judgment in that cause; the Lords having taken full examination thereof upon oath, do not find it proved in the same manner as, it seems, they were informed by examinations taken in their house. And, for further satisfaction of the commons therein, their lordships have sent them the examination of Randolph Davenport."—"Ans. The commons returned great thanks for their lordships honourable and just proceedings in the cause of the lord bp. of Landaff, and for sending the examination of Davenport; by which it doth appear, that his examination, taken by them, doth differ much from that taken upon his oath before their lordships"—Then the question was put, Whether the said bp. should take his place in the house before he received his admonition from the abp. or not? Agreed, per plures, that he should: Whereupon his lordship was called in by the gentleman-usher, and went to his place. Thus ended this Affair; of which, there is not one word in Wilson's Life of King James, or in Rushworth's Collections.

Charge against sir John Bennet for Bribery and Corruption. The Earl of Huntingdon reported, That his lordship, and the other lords joined in commission with him, had taken divers examinations in the cause of sir John Bennet, knt. judge of the prerogative court of the province of Canterbury; by which they find him guilty of much Bribery and Corruption; of which a collection was made, and his lordship delivered the same to mr. Serjeant Crew. The earl of Southampton also made the like report, and delivered the examinations and collections of the Bribery and Corruptions, wherewith sir John was charged, to mr. Attorney General. Which collections, with the names of the witnesses examined for proof being read, sir John Bennet was brought to the bar. The king's serjeant opened the Charge against him by shewing, That the said sir John, being a judge, as aforesaid, and being directed by the law what fees to take for probats of wills, and unto whom to grant letters of administration, he had perverted the course of law for bribes; and, being therewith corrupted, he granted administration contrary to law. He charged the said sir John with these particular Bribes and Corruptions, and read the examinations of the following witnesses for proof thereof." viz. Rd. Luther died, 1619, intestate, without issue; Abigail, his widow, required administration and paid 44l. But being opposed by Tho. Luther, a brother, she, at two several times, gave sir John 44l. more; and yet he granted administration to her and Tho. Luther jointly

* Richard Neile, who had himself been complained of by the Commons, when bishop of Lincoln, for some expressions in the house of lords, tending to advance the prerogative royal. See p. 1159.

† The circumstance took place when dr. Field was only a private clergyman; nor does it seem to have injured his character at court: for, in the next reign, he was removed to St. David's, and, afterwards, died bishop of Hereford, in 1636.

Proved by the examination of Tho. Tyler, W. Owen, and Abigail the widow. But before sir John joined Tho. Luther in administration with the widow, he promised sir John 100*l.* and, after he was joined, he gave him 120*l.* Proved by Tho. Luther. For allowance of the administrator's account, sir John had 100*l.* to distribute amongst the kindred of the intestate, and 50*l.* for pious uses, and seemed discontented he had not 50*l.* more. Proved by John Worsley and Abigail now his wife.—Wm. Bannister died intestate, 1615. His widow gave to sir John Bennet 30*l.* 16*s.* for administration. Proved by the examinations of Wm. Richardson and James Goodshall.—Hercules Wytham claiming to be executor by will, first gave sir John five broad-pieces, then Samford, sir John's man, undertook for 20 pieces more to his master and 2 to himself, to procure him a good end, which end, was against the will. Proved by the examination of Hercules Wytham.—sir Wm. Whorwood died 7 years past, Field Whorwood, a younger son, and a daughter offered to prove a will. Tho. Whorwood, the elder brother, offered to prove a second will. Badsor, the proctor, promised sir John 100*l.* for his hand to Field Whorwood, but paid only 3*l.* to him, and 6*l.* to his man Samford. Proved by John Badsor. Tho. Whorwood, by advice of Samford, gave sir John 38*l.* yet sir John gave sentence against him. Proved by Tho. Whorwood and John Batham.—George Sturges dying intestate, Francis Sturges, his kinsman, offered sir John, for administration, 20*l.* in gold, which sir John said was too light; then he gave him 40*l.* and had it granted. Proved by the examination of Rob. Davies, Rob. Sturges, and Rob. Labourne.—Philip Holman died 1619, Philip his son exhibited his father's will; a caveat being entered, he sent by Kelvert 20 pieces to sir John, which he accepted, and demanded 20*l.* more, which Kelvert promised but paid not: Proved by Philip Holman and Rd. Kelvert, proctor.—James Lingard died 1618, intestate; John his brother and James his nephew contended for administration; for 50*l.* paid sir John and 5*l.* to Samford, John the brother obtained it; which, afterwards, was revoked. Proved by Wm. Bass, proctor.—Rob. Sayers died 1618, intestate, his children minors; Simon Packhurst gave sir John, by direction of Samford, 20*l.* for administration, durante minore etate; which was revoked two days before Packhurst was to have had a cause heard in chancery, which concerned that estate: Proved by Wm. Bass, proctor.—Henry Ryley died intestate, 1620, John Ryley sued for administration; he gave sir John Bennet 5*l.* and sir John procured from John Ryley 9 rings set with diamonds, which were pawned to the intestate for 30*l.* but were not worth 10*l.* Anthony Ashley and Tho. Wells, two kinsmen of the intestate, agreed with Samford to give sir John 30*l.* and 10*l.* to Samford, to get sir John to order them part of intestate's estate. Then he ordered them 300*l.* which John Ryley was forced to pay, and the said 40*l.*

for a bribe to sir John and his man. Sir John had, besides, a piece of plate, which cost 4*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* to change the great bond for true administration. Proved by Ryley, Ashley, and Wells.—Jane Corne, widow, died intestate, yet Francis Winscomb pretended a will. Sir John received of Wm. Pound, pendente lite, the widow's next kinsman, 40*l.* to grant him administration, which this deponent paid. Sir John would not give it unless he might have that sum. Proved by Lewis Lashbrooke. The deponent's administrators in trust to perform her will, for obtaining of administration, gave 50*l.* in hand to sir John, and their bond to pay 50*l.* more, 3 months after; and 25*s.* for forbearing the last 50*l.* Proved by John Lewis and Rowland Johnson.

The day being far spent, the house was moved not to have any more read at that time; whereupon the prisoner was withdrawn, and it was ordered that he be brought there again to morrow morning. Accordingly on the following day, the house proceeded in the Cause of sir John Bennet; and the Attorney General charged him with the following proofs:—"That he received of mr. Meggs, on the behalf of mrs. Pitt, for the continuance of administration granted to her, and sought to be revoked, 46*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* Proved by the examination of Edw. Willet.—He received of the widow of Hugh Lee, for administration of her husband's goods; wherein she was crossed by a caveat, put in by the means of Samford, sir John's man, 35*l.* Proved by the said Edw. Willet.—He received of sir Edw. Scorey, for the administration of his father's goods, 100*l.* Proved by sir Edw. Scorey.—He contracted with Edm. Walton to have 20*l.* for the administration of the goods of John Clovil; and, the money being brought, there fell 5*l.* more casually out of his pocket; whereupon sir John also claimed that, and would not grant the administration otherwise. Proved by Edm. Walton.—He received of sir John Brand, for administration of his grandfather's goods, 50*l.* and this was by way of contract, sir John pressing to have more. Proved by Tho. Newnam and sir Rob. Hitcham.—He took of Wm. Auchmore, for the administration of the goods of Philip Auchmore, 15*l.* Proved by Rd. Williamson; and of Tho. Allen, for the administration of his father's goods, 5*l.* Proved by the same witness.—He received of Solomon and James Mansell, for a dividend out of their brother's estate, 20*l.* and then gave them but 300*l.* out of an estate of 8000*l.* having received from the widow of the intestate, as she confessed, 100*l.* to the intent that he should allot them no more. Proved by Solomon Mansell.—He had of Samuel Neast, for his favours in proving a nuncupative will of John Neast, 10*l.* and 5 pieces at another time; and forced him to pay a debt of 514*l.* to one Fishborne, for which Fishborne had neither speciality, nor so much as a superscription of the testator in his book. Proved by S. Neast. He also received of the said Samuel, 60*l.* for making a report into the court of chancery. Proved by the same.—He received of Hester Mitchell, for administration of the goods of her father, 20*l.* Proved by Wm Bass.—Flower Hanshaw, widow, died intestate in 1615, possessed of a personal estate of 11,249*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.* and for the granting administration of the said goods to Benj. Hanshaw, he delivered unto Samford 200*l.* of which he verily believeth sir John Bennet had the greatest part; besides 90*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* to pious uses. Proved by the said Benjamin.—Andrew Moor, about two years since, died intestate; the administration of whose goods was, by consent of one Clarke, and others, granted to the eldest brother of the said Moor; for which sir John had 60*l.* besides a gratuity given to Samford. Proved by Wm. Oland and John Ode.—Humphrey Rascarock of Pinkley, by his will, made Philippa his wife executrix, and died 1616; which will being controverted, she first gave 20 old angels to sir John to have the said will proved in common form; and, for sentence, gave 4*l.* Proved by Rd. Williamson.—Dr. Tighe 13 Jac. made his last will, died, and made Mary his wife executrix, upon condition that she should prove the will in due form of law. Mr. Tighe, brother to the said doctor, could not have a copy of the will from sir John, until he had given him 10 peices; and afterwards, the said mr. Tighe having spent a great part of his estate about the probat of the said will, and, being delayed therein, one Lyster, sir John Bennet's man, said unto the said Tighe, That if he would give his master 100*l.* and a gelding of 10*l.* value, besides 10*l.* to himself, then his master, sir John, would sentence the will for him. Tighe answered he could not provide so much money presently, but he would give good bonds for the payment thereof: Lyster would not take the bonds, and told the other, if he would not bring his master 40 peices, that then dr. Bancroft, brother to the said executrix, should have sentence. Whereupon he procured 15 peices, and brought them to sir John; who would not accept thereof, saying, he would not take paper for gold. Upon this, administration of the goods of the said dr. Tighe was granted unto Mary his widow, by the procurement of dr. Bancroft; and Lyster said, that a halting proctor had brought gold from Bancroft, which had overweighed him. Proved by Tighe, Styles, and Moxley.—Sir Henry Middleton, knt. made his last will, and therein made David Middleton and Hen. Middleton his son, executors thereof. Alice Middleton, wife of the said David, did give 40*l.* to sir John to have administration of the goods of the said sir Henry granted to her, during the minority of the said Henry the son. Proved by Rd. Williamson.—Mary Hawley, 6 years ago, died intestate, possessed of an estate worth 6 or 700*l.* Rob. Hanbury gave sir John 60*l.* or more, for the administration of the goods, as was confessed by John Wray, on his death-bed. Proved by John Fenwick, and Eliz. Hawley.—

That mr. Ashton, by the hands of Philip King, did give to sir John Bennet's lady, a Spanish carconet, or girdle, about the value of 100 marks, for the kindness he had received from sir John in an administration. Proved by Philip King.—That Rd. Hawley, about 5 years since, dying intestate, and the administration of his goods being granted to one Kenbury, during the minority of his children, sir John had 20*l.* or 20 peices given him by the said Kenbury. Proved by Tho. Gear.—George Scarlett, in 1615, died intestate: sir John would not grant administration of his effects unto Peter Scarlet, until the said Peter had given him 10*l.* in gold, in hand, and 5*l.* more to be paid shortly after; and it was paid accordingly. Proved by Peter Scarlet."

Sir John Bennet's defence.] The attorney general having read this charge, the lord chief justice demanded of sir John Bennet what Answer he would make to the same; who spoke as follows:—"I come in all humility, to prostrate myself at your lordships feet; if your lordships expect a speedy and perfect answer, at this time, I hope you will excuse me, as being surprized with such a tempest of affliction. The particulars of my answer must run thro' the compass of 19 years, the whole time of my being judge of the prerogative court of Canterbury; which doth constrain me to beseech your lordships to give me some time, not only to call to mind the acts of judicature of my own court, but also to confer with others. I humbly desire to have a copy of my charge, and, what I am justly charged with, I will confess, after I have had time to consider thereof. Those whereof I am otherwise accused, as of many, I desire, as by the law of nations I ought, to have liberty to peruse the accusations so exhibited, to use cross interrogatories, to procure witnesses to be examined, and to have council allowed me. Lastly, I humbly beg at your lordships hands, even for justice sake, time proportionable to the multitude of these accusations to make my answer; and I doubt not so to extenuate them all, that when your lordships shall see and consider the ground of them, you will not hold me so foul and guilty a man as I am accused for. I am the first ecclesiastic officer charged in this manner; and whereas I am accused of taking money to pious uses, amounting to a great sum, I will engage my life, that, upon proclamation made thereof, proof cannot be produced of 4000*l.* which is not above 200*l.* per annum, ever since I was judge; whereof, if I cannot give a good account, I will beg my bread all my life."

The prisoner being removed, the house took into their consideration these requests; and, after deliberation thereof, their lordships were pleased to grant the same, thus far, viz. "1. That he shall have time till the next access of parl. to make his defence. 2. Council to advise with only; but no council here in court to defend his cause. 3. Liberty to examine witnesses, ex sua parte; but not to examine any upon cross interrogatories; and his witnesses to be sworn in this court, upon such interrogatories as he shall deliver and the court allow. 4. To have copies of the heads of the charge; but no names of any witnesses or proofs. 5. To have leave at the hearing to take exceptions unto the witnesses produced against him; and their names are to be delivered to him at that time. 6. Liberty to search the records of his own court, and his own writings."—It was also ordered, "That sir John Bennet may be admitted to bail, on 20,000*l.* bond, to be taken in court, with such sureties as the court shall allow of; and if he cannot procure such bail, then to remain prisoner with the sheriffs of London."—The prisoner being called in again, and at the bar, the lord chief justice told him how far the Lords had granted his requests; and also that their lordships were pleased he should be bailed as above. The chief justice did also admonish him not to impair his estate, but that it remain in the same plight as when he was first complained of in court: Likewise to satisfy mrs. Scorey for 1100*l.* which he had of her money, left with him as a deposit; and to pay off the 1000*l.* which remains in his hands of sir Tho. Bodley's legacy to the university of Oxford.—Unto which sir John answered, "I do acknowledge the honourable favor of this court, in the goodness and grace of God to put me into your hands, and these favours towards me into your hearts. Mrs. Scorey's money I confess due, and will give her satisfaction for the same. As for the other 1000*l.* I have performed as much as sir Tho. Bodley required; having laid out other monies for the university of Oxford, which I intended to have done, whatsoever I may do yet, had not these cross misfortunes happened. As for my bail; I am in debt and disgrace, and doubt whether I can procure bail to enter into so great a sum. I humbly beseech your lordships that myself may be bound in 1000*l.* and my sureties in 1000*l.* more."—The prisoner being withdrawn, it was put to the question, Whether the former order touching his bail should stand, or be altered according to his request? And it was agreed the order should stand.—Let us now see what was passing in the House of Commons.

Further Proceedings touching the proposed Adjournment.] May 30. Sir G. Moore desired that there might be a clause added to the bill for the Continuance of Statutes, to this effect, that notwithstanding this session doth end, yet the bills may continue in the same forwardness which they now are in.

Sir B. Rudyard saith, that we are much bound to his maj. for his grace and favour in giving us leave to touch businesses of a high nature, and in them to go so far as to meddle with great persons, on whom we have passed judgment; which judgment is better far than many good laws, for laws will fall asleep, when the fright of those judgments will keep men awake to do their duties. He desireth, that we may so temper ourselves and passions, as that we may part out of this house like a sweet odour.

Sir Rich. Grosvenor saith, that we have hitherto sang nothing but placebo, and danced to the king's heart; but it hath now pleased his maj. to change this tune, and make us sing nothing but lachrymæ, and dance loath to depart. He wisheth our breasts were transparent; for then he would not send us home with such a hazard of all our safeties and reputation to those who sent us hither. Where we are now, our fortune hath placed us: where we would be, our hopes carry us. He would have us rather to trust the king with the whole, than to let us go with so small fruit of so great labours, and that we would not now meddle any further with any bills or grievances.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, he knoweth not whether he shall ever be of this house again or no, and therefore will now speak freely his conscience; that he believed at first, that this parl. would bring forth a happy success. He ever believed, that God's glory could not be maintained but by the spreading of the true religion; if those of our religion suffer abroad, it will defame and scandal our religion; for corruption grows apace. He would have us consider of 5 things. 1. Of our Religion at home; and, for the state of it, he thinketh, that since the Reformation, the Papists were never more impudent and daring than now; and, if please not his maj. to have some care of it, it will grow shortly to an equal balance, which are the greater number of Papists or Protestants. 2. For the honour of the king's children: this part of Christendom never received a greater blow than in the loss of Bohemia. He prayeth the king be not deceived in his hopes of bringing that business to a good end; for now we see, there is a labour to bring all Christian Religion under the govt. of the Archduke. 3. For the honour of the kingdom; it hath been the honour of this kingdom not to bear an ill word; and shall we now take such a blow as that which hath been given to the king of Bohemia, and our king's children, who (we may say) are relieved by the alms of others? 4. For the commonwealth; which if we consider in its wants and grievances, he thinketh, the parl. was the only physician to cure the desperation of the disease. In this it pleased his maj. to say, that, if he had known them, he would have remedied those grievances of our hearts; but in the way of this gracious offer of remedy it hath pleased his maj. (for causes best known to himself) not to divert, but to retard the same. 5. We are to consider of the course left to be held as we now stand; which is to be considered in 2 things: 1. What we shall presently do: 2. What we left last night to be done, touching the Message to the Lords. For the 1st, since the king hath tied us to Monday, in which short space we can effect no good business of any importance, he would have us set down the state and grievance of this kingdom, and lay the same at his maj.'s feet, to dispose thereof as he list: for the 2nd, that we should tell their Lordships we shall ever continue a good affection to the maintenance of the good correspondency between us and their Lordships.

Sir Tho. Wentworth saith, that he will speak without fear of any. He conceiveth, that the king's resolution is immoveable; and we are now to resolve either to do nothing, or else to be active and effect what good we can. He thinketh it dangerous to give over thus, leaving a kind of ill understanding between the king and his people. He would have us send to the Lords, to desire their lordships to pass those bills they have in their hands with speed, that we may do as much as lieth in our power to satisfy the people, who have paid their money; and he doubteth not but we may pass 12 bills at least.

Mr. Wrenham saith, he conceiveth with sir R. Phillips, that the greatest bond of unity is religion; and those princes who have the same religion should assist each other: for how can we think that the open enemies of the Bohemian, the Low Countries, and other parts, where the people are of our religion, can be friends to us? The poet teacheth, that 'Tunc tua res agitur paries cum proxinus ardet.' Nature maketh sheep flock together against the approaching of the wolf. He would have us go to the Lords to desire them to join in a course for the safety of our religion and the king's children.

Mr. Secretary Calvert saith, he wondereth that his maj.'s message is so taken: that it hath ever been the use, that the king hath appointed the time of the end of the parl. as he doth call it and appoint the beginning of it. He confesseth the dangerous state of religion at this present; but our disunion is not the way to remedy those dangers of the state. This parl. hath married the king and the people, by a right understanding of each other, and cursed be such as seek to part it.—At this wish of Mr. Secretary, all the house cried Amen! and then he desired, that we should go on, and do something in this short time.

Dr. Gooch saith, that it is discovered, that our religion suffers, our ordinances are bent against us, the justice of the kingdom is corrupted; and is not the time yet come that we should redress these grievances? The merchant says, he can trade no more: the artisan says, he can work no more. The one says, it is because every pack, every pedlar is trading beyond sea: the other complaineth, there are too many monopolies, too many proclamations. There were a people brought out of a great deal more danger than we are in, and came near the land of promise, yet could not attain to it. He thinketh the time is not yet ripe for us, nor this the place to give a remedy to the said grievances; and therefore he desireth, that we sit down and hope for a better time.

Mr. Solicitor saith, that he is of opinion and full of hope, that this is the parl. that shall end, as it began, very well, and give a remedy to our grievances. He saith, the commonwealth is full of diseases, but they are not past cure. He would not have us sit and do nothing, because we cannot do all the good we would do. The time of parl. is wholly in the king's hands and appointment, and we have received a message for the breaking up of this sitting, for reasons of state best known to himself; and he hath graciously offered to remedy our grievances, and would have us present them to him. He desireth, that we should prepare a bill, that our proceedings may be continued, although the sessions doth end. He would have us, if we cannot prepare things as we desire for the end of the sessions, rather embrace the king's first proposition than the last.

Sir Wm. Spencer saith, since we can effect nothing in this so short time, he would have us send to the Lords, to acquaint their lordships, that we purpose to adjourn our house till Monday, and then to go to the king.

Sir Wm. Herbert saith, that he once hoped, that this parl. which had so good a beginning, should not have had so much discontent in the end, and we have so little fruit of our liberality.

Mr. Alford saith, it is not possible for us to do any thing by bills or by petitions of grievances, that may do any good for the kingdom. At first we found the king so gracious, as he never saw any prince more favourable; and the lords so willing to set forward to remedy the grievances; but since Easter all hath been cold and quailed. He wisheth, that private respects mislead not to the hurt of the public. He desireth, that we would join with the lords in a petition to his maj. that we may have a meeting again after Michaelmas, and to get some promise thereof from the king under his hand.

Mr. Crewe saith, he would not have us to join with the lords, to petition the king for our meeting again after Michaelmas, for that is questionless wholly in the power of the king. We have given freely two Subsidies to the king, albeit we were never less able to give it. We went down before Easter with St. Hilary joyfully, but now we shall go with heavy hearts; that he never knew, after so long a sitting, an adjournment, but still a sessions, nor subsidies given without a general pardon; and is sorry they must now be severed: that there are passed both houses some bills, and others are ready to pass. He would have us confer with the lords, what bills they have ready to pass, and to proceed accordingly.

Sir Ed. Giles saith, that we shall be worse welcome into the country with nothing than with a few bills. If there be some who have laboured to break off this parl. they will rejoice to see us thus discontentedly and disorderedly to break off. He would have us to go to the Lords, and desire them to hasten the businesses and bills they have, and that we would do as much good for trade as we can.

Sir Rob. Crane saith, that he should like well that we should proceed with the matter of trade, if we saw there could be any good success in it; but we have sat here these 13 weeks, and have had several meetings for trade, and yet are we no nearer a good success than we were at first: that we have given two free Subsidies; and they are like to prove a free gift indeed. Whereas it is^e alleged, that the king hath need of his council, we shall willingly yield that they go to attend his maj.'s service: here are other honest hearts besides to go on with the businesses here in hand. He desireth, that we should confer with the Lords, touching our joining in a Petition to the king, and representing to his maj. the dangerous state of the kingdom; beseech him, that he will be graciously pleased to give us leave to sit a longer time.

Mr. Serjeant Ashley would have neither bills or grievances presented to the king, because the bills that are ready to pass, though they are good, yet they cannot give that satisfaction to the country, as the country expected; but would have us leave them and the rest of the business of the house so as we may find them in a good case at our return, when it shall please his maj. to call us.

Sir Ed. Cecil saith, he observeth this house is divided into 3 sorts of speakers, free, silent, and reserved speakers: that it hath been a good testimony of the worthiness of this house, that at the first we went on so well, and were so well approved of. It is true he hath heard, and doth believe, there have been ill offices done to this house by some member of this house; for, at first sitting, while the king's ear was open to us, there was a good harmony between his maj. and us; but by the carriage of some ill messages the king hath been misinformed. He desireth we may have a Conference with the Lords to join with us in going to the king, and to let his maj. understand the hearts of this house.

It was on this motion resolved, that a message shall go to the Lords, to desire a free Conference with them, touching the accommodating of the present business of this parl. which message was accordingly sent by sir Ed. Cecil, who reported, that the Lords had appointed a meeting for the free conference, and that they would have it be of all the members of both houses, and the time at 4 this afternoon, in the Painted chamber.

May 30, p. m. Sir Nath. Rich saith, that it is our grief that we are denied access to the king, who hath said, he would be sorry to deny us any thing, and that his maj.'s ears are stopped that he cannot hear us. We believe, and know not but his maj. is persuaded, that we are well pleased to give over; wherefore he would have our desire to sit here longer represented to the Lords, that the king may know it. The trade of the kingdom is declined so, as the king must keep garrisons in the Cinque Ports; for all the inhabitants there have, and are ready to leave them. As for bills, he would not have us present to his maj. a few bills; for he had rather that the kingdom should think that parturiunt montes, than that we should bring forth a mouse. As for Grievances, he holdeth, that they are not ripe for to be presented to the king; and therefore he would have no Grievances to be presented, but only the grief of our hearts. If the good bills which are in the house may be perfected, than he would have us go on with them; but he would have us desire the Lords to join with us, and to go with us to the king, to represent the lamentable estate of the kingdom, the decay of the trade of it, the danger of the safety of it and the king's honour.

Mr. Neale would have us propose to the Lords those bills which are passed, and those others which may be passed, and to desire their lordships expedition of the same; for he thinketh, that, without passing of so many bills as we may, we shall give no contentment to the places we serve for.

Mr. Recorder Finch would have us make much of the mother (the parliament) whatsoever becometh of the child (the business); for, though it perish in the birth, yet the mother may have more issue; and therefore would have us part well, and so hope of farther issue. He would have us pass as many bills as we may, for they are not to be taken as a retribution: that the king is tied to further an act for the good of religion. He would have us also express our griefs, that we want time to pass more bills, and to desire their lordships to join with us to further those that may be passed, and are best worthy of the passing.

Sir Ed. Sackville would have us pass those bills which are ready, and prepare as many more as we may make ready; for, if we rise on a discontent, we shall repent it; for that may be an occasion that we shall not meet again after the recess.

The Master of the Wards saith, that those who would have us rise discontented will do the country as ill service, as they hope to do good by a longer stay: that time will manifest, that the king hath more than reason to do what he doth: that there was never better shipping in England, than now there is. As for trade, he purposed to have made it his masterpiece, for he hath been bred in it, and would have spent his life to have done good in it; but the state of trade is not so bad as it is alleged to be, and some of the out ports never had better trading: that to part discontented is not the way to effect any good thing, and no private man's estate can be sure, when the public is not assured.

Sir D. Digges saith, that at the free conference their lordships did desire the continuance of the correspondency between both houses; but they expected (it being a free conference, and desired by us) that we should have spoken of some particulars: that to-morrow their lordships will send us a note, how the state of the bills and other businesses in their hands do stand.

May 31. Mr. Alford moved that all our bills are to take effect after the end of the sessions; so as, if this be but an adjournment, then those bills (which some would have pass, notwithstanding the sessions doth not determine) cannot take effect till the end of the sessions: and, if it be now a sessions, then all the business is behind hand, and must be begun anew.

Sir Edw. Coke saith, that there are some of our bills which are to take effect from henceforth, and they are to take effect from the beginning of the parl. when they are passed the king's royal assent:—that Hen. VII. was in 1. regni sui attainted of high treason; but as soon as he came to the crown, that attainder fell to the ground: that in 1 H. VII. bills did pass the king's royal assent, and yet the sessions continued. The Grievances are not yet ready to be preferred, and the ancient use hath been, that when the petition of Grievances was presented, then commonly there were also presented some bills to take away the same: and, if the bill against Monopolies and that against Concealments be not prepared, it will be to small end for us to present any Grievances: that it hath not been the use to present Grievances by fractions, but we must do it thoroughly; for, if it be done by halves, the king may have good reason to deny us. He wisheth therefore that we should embrace the king's first offer for an adjournment rather than a sessions.

Sir Ed. Montague would have us return humble thanks to his maj. for his gracious message, and to acquaint the king, how that we cannot, in so short time, prepare the Grievances for his maj.'s consideration.

Mr. Hackwill, concerning the adjournment by commission, saith that there is no question but this house may adjourn itself; yet it was a question in 1 Jac. but then it was resolved on, and a precedent vouched in the time of queen Mary, that this house might adjourn itself: that in 27 Eliz. there was a commission for adjournment of the parl. but this house did then adjourn itself, on notice by a message from the Lords: that the commission of adjournment was read there, and so is the use still: that, during the adjournment, the wages of the knights of shires and burgesses do continue to them and the members of both houses are still to have freedom against arrest, both for themselves and their servants: that in a year book of 33 H. VIII. queen Catherine Howard was attainted: that in 21st Oct. there was one parl. and that in 23rd Oct. in the same year there was another parl.; for it was the judges' opinion in those days, that every passing of the royal assent was a sessions: that in 1 and 2 of Mary the house was of opinion, that the giving of the royal assent did not make a sessions; and in the parl. cardinal Pole's bill was passed, and yet the sessions continued, for there were divers other bills that passed afterwards in that sessions: that there cannot be a royal assent but we are to be present.

Sir Ed. Coke saith, that the royal assent doth not make a sessions, unless the lord chanc. or lord keeper doth say, at the passing of the royal assent, that this shall be a sessions or prorogation of parl.; but, if he say no such thing then it is to be no sessions.

Sir S. Sandes saith, our end and necessity is to enable the subject the better to live: the opening of trade, the advancement of our home commodities, and the increasing of commerce between man and man. These things are the most weighty causes of the parl.; and he wisheth, we should rather embrace an adjournment than a prorogation. For the manner of the adjournment, there hath a commission used to come from his maj. to the Lords, but it hath been only to declare his maj.'s pleasure that we should have an adjournment; but the Lords themselves, and so this house by ourselves, have ever used to adjourn the sitting, after that the king's pleasure hath been signified, that there shall be an adjournment.

Sir Ed. Cecil moveth, that he might join with the Lords to acquaint the king with the state of the business of this house, and that we are content and part without grief. He feareth, that there are some amongst ourselves, who do pick out the worst of every man's speech and words (as lately of sir Edw. Coke's) without remembering the good service, that any one doth to the king and this house. He would have us represent so much to the king by our Speaker; whom he would not have use such large preambles nor eloquence (whereof we have no use nor need) but to go to the purpose.

Sir D. Digges saith, that it is true, that it appeareth by the Custom books, that trade is as good as ever it was; but the gain of trade is not so good as it was wont to be; for trade hath an inward disease, impositions and the like, that hath marred and decayed trade.—It was then ordered that sir D. Digges shall speak at the Conference with the Lords.

Sir Ed. Mountague saith, that he would have no bills to be passed at this adjournment; and he thinketh it will better content the country, when as they shall understand that this is but a cessation, and that the parl. doth continue, and we still enjoy our privileges from arrest and the like as if we did still sit in parl.

Sir Rob. Phillips would have no bills passed this adjournment. He saith, he must say he goeth home with a sorrowful mind; but not with a repining sorrow, but a sorrow that in all this time we have brought forth no fruit for the good of the king and the kingdom. If we should offer to have bills passed, and the king should not, at this time, give way to some special bills which we desire to have passed; then this will breed in us more discontent than if we had offered no bills at all to be passed.

Sir Edw. Coke saith, it is a maxim in law, that every court must adjourn itself; and, if there be a commission to adjourn the parl. then the adjournment is not good; but the commission should be to declare his maj.'s pleasure, that we should adjourn the parl. A commission to adjourn alone is not good; but, if the commissioners and members of parl. do join, they may adjourn either or both houses.

Sir Tho. Rowe would have no bills at all passed, because it is questionable whether the sessions do not end then or no; for Mr. Hackwell did deliver precedents of judges' opinions on both sides.

Mr. Delbridge would have no bills pass, but, because trade is much decayed, and lieth a bleeding, he would (to give some satisfaction to the country) that there might be liberty given to trade freely, according to the law, notwithstanding the patents and monopolies which are granted, and that the impositions laid on trade, since the last parl. may be taken off till that time; for now the charge laid on trade is such, that none can make a living by it: that, if a merchant trade with 100l. he shall pay for custom and fees outward and homeward of this 100l. 25l. to the king and officers: that customs are raised; and, whereas they paid of late for one kind of merchandise 2s. they now pay for the same merchandise 2s. 8d. It is true (as the master of the wards said) that it seemed by the Custom books, that trade is as good as ever it was; but that is, because Custom is raised, not trade increased.

The Master of the Wards saith, it is true he meant mr. Delbridge, when he said that he knew the trade of the town, for which some member of this house serveth, to be as good as ever it was: that he, on search, found the trade of that particular town doubled of that it was wont to be in the queen's time, and better than it was at the king's first coming; and this he hath found to be, not by the increase of the Customs, but allowing all late impositions: that he is confident still, that trade in general is not decayed, but in some particular places it is: that trade is as great as ever it was, but not so good as ever it was. As to the raising of 2s. on a bays to 2s. 8d. it was on petition remitted by the king to that particular town: that, if we had had a fortnight's liberty more to sit here, we could have done no good for trade: that against our meeting he will so prepare trade, as it shall pass then more speedily and the better: that neither the king's business nor our's is done; for the two Subsidies have been in substance no more than one Subsidy and two 15ths: that jealousy well grounded is wisdom; but, if it hath not good ground, it argues an ill disposition. He doubteth not, but that we shall meet again to effect what we have begun.

Sir D. Digges saith, that mr. Delbridge spake and meaneth, to his knowledge, that the trade of the manufactures, which are made in the town for which he serveth, is decayed.

Sir E. Sandys wisheth, that the king be not wronged, for here is no man that wrongeth his maj.: that there is no man here discontented; but here is no man here that will undertake, the country shall not be discontented; for want of money and trade will discontent them; and, though we shall all of us in duty palliate our discontent, yet his maj. would not have us to palliate our intentions and desires. Poverty, and want of money and trade pinch the kingdom at this time, and what are the bills which are passed (against Drunkards and for keeping the Sabbath) to remedy these wants? but, if we could have the bills against Informers, Monopolies and the like, he should have been glad to have them passed. Hope of passing good bills at our next meeting will content more, than the effecting such bills as are passed.

Sir Dud. Digges doth recapitulate his conceit of what the intention of this house is, concerning the free re-conference, wherein he is appointed principally to confer; and desireth to be rectified, if he conceiveth it not right. That he shall hear and not propose: that he shall confer to have an adjournment: that we will not meddle with Grievances: and that he shall shew, the inclination of the house is to have no bills passed: that he shall confer of these things, but not conclude any thing: that he shall shew the reasons, why the house hath such an inclination; and in a declaration to touch the business of the house.—It is then ordered, that he shall speak and treat of these things, and in the same manner, as he hath recapitulated them.

Sir Ed. Sandys would that sir D. Digges should shew the reasons why we incline to have no bills: first, to maintain the king's honour; for, if we bring down these bills and no more, the country will think we could get no more: 2ndly, the reputation of the house; that we have sat thus long, and shall pass not above ten bills, which will be the most we can dispatch in so short a time: 3rdly, the keeping of the people in content; who may mutter, if they see no better fruit of the charges they have been at.

The Master of the Wards saith, that we have to deal with a wise king, and one that can apprehend quickly when he is abused. For the reasons set down by sir E. Sandys: 1. He saith, that sir E. is mistaken; for it cannot be (as he saith) for the honour of the king, that we shall refuse to pass any bills, when as his maj. at our request, hath yielded to pass bills. 2. That it cannot be for the reputation of this house, to be so inconstant, as first to desire to pass bills, and then to desire not to pass bills. 3. For the content of the people, the bill against Informers, and that concerning Supersedeas (as he hath heard) are better than a general pardon.

Sir Ed. Cecil interrupted the master of the wards, saying, he was sorry to hear him in such manner to go between the king and us, and to say, that that which we have intended for the honour of the king is only to delude and abuse the king; and to tax the whole house, in such a fashion, of inconstancy and pettishness. He hath heard, that there were some of this house, who did the house ill service by misinformations; and we may justly suspect it, since here openly our speeches and intentions are wrested to the worst construction.

Sir Ed. Sandys saith, that the message delivered here from the king, by mr. Secretary, was, that his maj. thought it would be best for the house not to pass bills; and therefore what himself had spoken was but in prosecution of the king's thoughts and opinion.

The Master of the Wards saith, he spake but his opinion, as sir Ed. Sandys had done his; and that it was but his opinion, that not to pass bills was not for the king's honour, as it was the other's opinion, that it would be for the king's honour not to pass bills. He wisheth, that he may prosper as he hath done and laboured to do to the king, and otherwise, all good offices for this house.—We shall now return to the Proceedings in the House of Lords.

May 31. The lord treasurer reported the Conference with the Commons, yesterday; wherein his lordship shewed how lively they expressed the sorrow of that house for the adjournment of the parl. "Three things at the Conference he particularly remembered: 1. Their time and diligence employed in this parl. 2. The matter of importance there handled. 3. Their desire to have finished them; with an enumeration of a mass of business which they have entered into. They also expressed their grief and passion, that they could not perform what they had promised for the good of the common-wealth, and their earnest desire that the like correspondency might be held between them, which had subsisted all this parl. They desired to know how bills rest with us, that we may also learn how bills are with them, to the end such bills may be prepared as are fittest to pass; and that we may advise together what course is to be taken, not only touching the bills, but also such other matters as they have now in hand."—The Lords then sent a message to the commons, to desire another free Conference with them about the same subject. At the same time they sent down to them the bill touching the adjournment of parl. which they had passed, and specially recommended it to be expedited with all possible haste in their house. This was a bill of a very extraordinary nature; but there was no occasion for it, as will appear in the sequel.

May 31, p. m. The Lords then considered that they were to meet the Commons, at a Conference, that afternoon; and it was agreed, That, if the other house should make any new propositions, to give them no answer at that time, but to consider thereof. It was also agreed, That the lord treasurer should report to them the state of the bills, as they stand here, and to require the same account from their house; to the end that those bills may be prepared for the king's assent, which are most necessary. Likewise to make report to the house of this conference. Accordingly, The Lords being returned from the said Conference, the lord treasurer reported the same, "That, after each house had acquainted the other with the state of the bills, the Commons desired to have no royal assent to any bills at this time; because they do not know which to choose or prefer before another. They gave also many reasons to have an adjournment without the royal assent; and desired that the parl. might be so adjourned, as that each house may have power to accommodate business against the next access."

Difference between an Adjournment and a Prorogation.] A motion was made, that the judges be ordered to distinguish between the adjournment of a parl. by the king, and an adjournment by the houses. Whereupon the attorney general came to the clerk's table, and read the precedents of the 27th Eliz. for the adjournment of a parl. by the queen's commission: and, having many more precedents to read of the like nature, it was ordered that they should be read the next morning: also the lords, who were the sub-committee for customs and privileges, were ordered to search the records for precedents of the form and manner of adjournments of parl.

June 1. Mr. Attorney General read divers more precedents, out of the journals, of the forms for adjournments of parliaments. He shewed the difference between an adjournment and prorogation; and that the word prorogare is oftentimes used for adjournare; but the latter word never for the former. He shewed also, that a parl. being adjourned by the house, all committees were still of force, and the bills remain in statu quo prius; but an adjournment, by commission from the king, determines all committees, and they cease till the next sitting of the court; but the bills are preserved in statu quo prius.

Then the books and writings belonging to the Gold and Silver-Thread affair, which were found in the office kept for executing that commission, and brought into parl. were ordered to be delivered back to sir Edw. Villiers. And it was also ordered, That it be signified to the commons, that the Lords do find him clear of those matters, mentioned by them in their declaration.

The lord chief justice was ordered to admit sir John Bennet to bail, for his appearance there at the next access of parl. himself to be bound in 7000*l.* bond, and ten gentlemen, nine of which were knights, in 1200*l.* each.

Further Proceedings touching the Adjournment.] June 1. In the Commons, sir Edw. Mountague saith, that the lord treasurer said, that, when the parl. is adjourned by commission, declaring the king's pleasure, all businesses are to cease, and nothing is to be done in that cessation; but it is otherwise, when we of ourselves, without having the king's pleasure, do adjourn the parliament.

Mr. Noye saith, that he never heard that there was a difference of an adjournment made by the house only, and an adjournment made by commission by the king. If the king alone do adjourn the parl. then it is a determination of the sessions: if the parl. be adjourned by ourselves, we may meet again of ourselves; but, if it be an adjournment by the king alone, then it is an end of the sessions, and we cannot meet again, but on signification of the king's pleasure: that in the lord Dyer's time it was resolved, that, if an adjournment be by a record, it is an end of the sessions; but, if it be but by a remembrance, it is otherwise: but it is ordinary, that there is a commission from the king to adjourn the parl. but we do adjourn it of and by ourselves, and make a remembrance of it, and of the continuance of the sessions here in the house. If the sessions end, many statutes against hunting, and others, will be discontinued. He would have us be suitors, that the adjournment may not be on record by the king alone, but may be made by the several houses; for that it might otherwise breed a great question, whether the sessions determine or no; and his opinion is, that it doth determine the sessions. In the journal of this house, in 27 Eliz. it is expressed, that there was a committee appointed to sit in the time of recess, when there was an adjournment by commission from that queen to adjourn the said parl. and that, notwithstanding this commission, this house did (on notice of the same from the commissioners, being some of them attendants on the upper house, when the said commissioners, who brought the said commission, were gone forth, and their message declared to us by the speaker of this house) adjourn the said parl. as all other courts do use to adjourn themselves.

Mr. Mallet saith, that in 4 Ed IV. there was a writ sent by the king to adjourn the term; and thereon the judges did adjourn the term: and it hath ever been the use of all courts, that the judges have adjourned the term, though the king send a writ to do so.

The King's Speech to the Lords, touching the Adjournment.] June 2. The king came to the house, and, in a speech to the Lords, took notice, "That upon Monday last he sent a message to them, and another to the Commons, declaring his royal pleasure for the adjournment of the parl. and the reasons thereof. He gave them thanks for their obedience to the message, and the acknowledgment of the king's power to call, adjourn, and dissolve parliaments: for not joining with the commons in a petition to his maj. as they desired, for a non-adjournment at this time: also for leaving the form of the adjournment unto him; and for expediting the bill which his maj. sent touching the adjournment.—His maj. also took notice of the form of adjournment, discussed in that house yesterday, and that the opinions of the judges are, That the adjournment by the king keeps the parl. in statu quo prius until the next sitting; but that then no committees were to meet: but if the adjournment be by the house, then the committees and other matters do continue. That, in these matters, the judges and his attorney are to be heard in that house; but yet the privileges and liberties of the Lords were to be maintained, and no ways abridged.—That out of princely care to his people he gave much longer warning of this adjournment, than any of his predecessors had done, to the end that such bills as were most material to the common-wealth, might, in the mean time, be expedited; especially against Informers, and writs of Supersedeas and Certiorari: but his maj. first demanding the opinions of the judges, they said, he could do himself what those two bills required.—That whereas some say, 'No good hath been done this parl., and shall they so return?' his maj. put the Lords in mind of the two patents grievous to the common-wealth, of Inns and Gold and Silver-Thread called in by him; and also this parl. had censured the late lord chancellor: which is an example to all other judges.—He affirmed, That had the Commons made an humble answer to him on the adjournment, he would have granted them ten days longer; but now he would not yield to their request: yet, if the Lords thought that 8 or 10 days more will expedite those bills that be now in the house, he will grant it."

Then his majesty was pleased to go into his drawing-room, that the lords might more freely discuss this matter amongst themselves. And, taking it into consideration, they thought fit to advise with the Commons also therein; and sent a message to them to desire a free conference with their whole house, presently, in the Painted Chamber, on matters of great importance, wherein no time was to be lost.—The king being returned, the lords humbly thanked his majesty for his gracious and free offer; acquainted him with the message they had just sent to the Commons; and besought him to enlarge his offer to this day fortnight. The king granted their request, with this caution, "That it be understood to be his own free offer to give this election to the people, either to have an adjournment, or a longer time to pass some bills, and so to make a session."

Both Houses desire an Adjournment only.] June 2, p. m. The lords went to the conference; and, being returned, the lord treasurer reported to the house: "That the lords having acquainted the commons with his maj.'s free grant of a choice, whether the parl. should be adjourned on the 4th inst. or continued for a fortnight longer, and then prorogued; The Commons having considered of it, did acknowledge his maj.'s power to call, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve parliaments, and his maj.'s grace and favour in granting this election; for which they desired the lords to join with them in grateful thankfulness to the king."—Their humble desire also is, That it would please his maj. to adjourn the parl. the form whereof they leave to him; because they have discharged their committees, which they cannot now recollect so suddenly; neither will that time suffice to bring to effect the affairs of great importance which they had in hand. They desired also to present his maj. (with the lords,) three Petitions; first, for matters of trade, that is, that manufactures may be distributed to the several out-parts of the kingdom. 2. Money not to be exported out of the realm. 3. That ordnance may not be transported; lastly, they again renewed their former request, that both the houses may join in their thanks to his maj."—Then the lords sent another message to the commons, to acquaint them, that they had considered of their request, and had appointed a committee of 12 lords to join with a committee of their house to present it to his maj. that afternoon, if he would be pleased to admit them to his presence." The Lords humbly desired

h. r. h. the prince to present their thanks to his maj. and the abp. of Canterbury was appointed, by joint consent, to deliver the requests of lords and commons to him at the same time.

June 2. In the Commons. Sir Walt. Earle moveth, that sir Edwin Sandys may be cleared, by question in the house, for the words which he was here taxed for.

Sir Ed. Sandys saith, "that he hath received of late notice, that there is notice taken, and misinformation made of words which he should speak; viz. that after we came from the conference with the lords (who gave us notice that we could not sit any longer) that he then said, he would not have any business then done or resolved on; and gave his reason, because passion was no good counsellor: and he also then said, that trade was overthrown by monopolies, and that monopolies were maintained by corruption. He saith, that it was spoken by him suddenly and with passion, he being then very sensible of the decay and want of trade of that town, for which he serveth: that he taketh corruption to be in this case, when for money a monopoly is procured upon false suggestions. The other words, which he was said to speak, were these, that the whole kingdom was out of frame; and that it was for the king's honour, that no bills should be passed this adjournment. To this it was said, by the master of the wards, that he did slander and tax his maj.; and that none must think to delude the king with words, for we had to deal with a wise and judicious king. To these words he answereth, that he taxed not his maj.; that he, in his former speeches, took occasion, on the buisness of the masters of the chancery, to commend his maj.'s govt.; saying, that, amongst all the complaints that were brought into the house, it was a great honour to the king, that none of the judges of the law were so much as blamed; which sheweth the wise and provident care of his maj. in the govt. of the kingdom, whereof justice is the chief part."—Upon the question being put, it was resolved that sir E. Sandys is free from having given any just cause of offence either by these words or any other that he hath uttered in this house, either to his maj. or any other person, without one negative.

Sir S. Sandes desireth, that all question of any offence, for any words spoken by any member of this house, may be also cleared here by the sentence and opinion of this house. He saith, that, after a prorogation, our privileges endure not above 14 or 15 days; but, after an adjournment, they continue inherent in us, as if the house did sit: that in 27 Eliz. there was a committee appointed to sit during the adjournment; and that committee did, at the access, report the same to the house. He desireth to know, whether this committee was ordered and appointed to sit, before there was notice of the commission sent from her maj. for the adjournment, or no; and, whether there were accordingly a report of the labours of that committee.

Mr. Alford saith, he heard sir E. Sandys say some things now whereof himself hath heretofore spoken the like; for he hath here said, that he did pray to God to divert a plague from this kingdom; for that corruptions, monopolies and briberies were never so great in this kingdom. He saith, he hath not, to his knowledge, said any thing here in the house that was amiss, or might not become an honest man and a good subject to say: and therefore will not (having the king's word for freedom of speech) so much distrust any thing, as to desire to be cleared by the opinion of the house.

Sir Wm. Spencer saith, that no man had had cause to have doubted to be hereafter questioned for words (seeing his maj.'s gracious message, for our liberty and freedom of speech, was here entered in the house) but that, since that message was here entered, the master of the wards did here say, some would be questioned for some words spoken here in the house; and yet did not name the man, so as he might have been here by us, according to the course of parl. either censured or cleared.

Sir G. Moore would have all men here cleared by the vote of the house, to have spoken nothing here that deserveth to be questioned.

Sir D. Digges saith, that this kingdom is one of the best of the world for situation for trading: that his father did long since set on foot here a proposition concerning the manufactures; but they are now too much neglected, which undoeth this kingdom. He hath now a proposition to offer to the consideration of this house, which hath 3 principal ends. 1. To bring an advantage to the king in his Customs. 2. It shall increase shipping and trade of merchants. 3. That it shall be hurtful to no man. And to these ends he would have every port town rent their own customs, and pay as much rent to the king for their custom, by a mediation, as they have paid any time these 7 years; for now every merchant comes here to London, like lean kine, to grow fat by devouring the trade and merchants of the out ports: but, when they grow rich, they purchase lands and go live in the country; or else give over their trade and turn usurers, as most of the aldermen of the city do. It is manifest, how the trade of the out ports is decayed, by the decay of the port towns and havens; whereof Winchelsea in Sussex is a lamentable spectacle: for there are abundance of vaults in that town; and there was a very good haven, whereof there is scarce any sign or memory left. He would have it, during this cessation, commended by the members of this house to every port town, to consider of taking their customs at a mediation of 7 years; for this will get the king 20,000l. per ann. more rent for his customs, than now he hath; for now the king letteth forth the customs to farmers here of this city, who will not pay so great a rent as 160,000l. per ann. which they now give, but they will gain by it; and good reason there is they should do so, for they are at 16,000l. per ann. charge to officers to look to their profit in the out ports of the kingdom: that now all, or the best part of the trade of Europe is reduced to London, Amsterdam, Leghorn, &c. That all the deputies of the farmers will and do exact fees on the merchants in the out ports; which by this means will be prevented, and all clamours of this nature be thus staid. This will cause the inhabitants of the out ports to take care that money, wool, &c. and many other things (prohibited to be transported) be not carried out of the kingdom, as now they are, by the connivancy of the farmers deputies. He would have this propounded to all the out ports of the kingdom, to which places this will be a great ease, that they may send up their answer at our next meeting.

Mr. Towerson desireth, that sir D. Digges may set down this proposition in writing, because it consisteth of many heads, that the Londoners may give answer to it.

Sir Edw. Coke saith, that this motion of sir D. Digges is a worthy motion; for freedom of trade is the life of trade: that customers are called in latin Publicani, and every one knoweth, that Christ called publicans sinners; and we may justly match and call publicans customers, and customers sinners; for they cozen and deceive both the king and kingdom. He saith, he will never fear questioning for what he hath here said; for he hath here spoken old English, which is conscience. He knoweth he hath offended many, because it pleased this house to put him in the chair at the committee concerning monopolies; whereby he hath proceeded the more carefully. He would have those of the out ports, who shall desire to farm their customs, to offer good sureties: but, for the better furtherance of trade, he would have an order of declaration entered here, that none of those patents of monopolies, which have been here condemned, should be put in execution during this adjournment or cessation.

The King adjourns the Parliament.] June 4. The abp. of Canterbury reported to the Lords, "That yesterday, in the afternoon, the committee of the Lords, accompanied with that from the Commons, attended his maj.; where it pleased the prince his highness to present unto him the humble thanks of both houses, for the choice his maj. gave them of an adjournment or prorogation of the parl.—That then his grace made known to his maj. the election of the Commons, viz. an adjournment, with their reasons for the same; and also presented unto him the 3 Petitions, recommended by the Commons: 1. Touching new manufactures to be equally distributed to the out-parts of the kingdom. 2. Concerning bullion and coin to be preserved in the land. 3. Touching iron ordnance not to be exported.—That his maj. graciously accepted the thanks from both houses; and notwithstanding that he called to mind that the Commons embraced not, as they ought to have done, his many admonitions to expedite good laws; and that they disputed the reasons which he gave of the adjournment of this parl. (all power being in him to call, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve parliaments) yet his maj. was pleased, according to the choice the Commons had made, to adjourn this parl. at this time; the same to begin again in Nov. next. In the mean time he will, by his own authority, redress the abuses of Informers, and writs of Supersedeas and Certiorari; which were intended to be reformed by the two bills more especially recommended by him.—That his maj.'s Answers to the 3 Petitions of the Commons were: to the 1st, concerning the enlargement or dispersing of new manufactures, which he never heard of before, he will consider thereof with his council. To the 2nd, touching bullion and coin, his maj. would also advise with his council, and redress it. And to the last, about ordnance, some care had been taken already, and more should be hereafter.—Then his grace presented his maj. the hearty prayers of both houses, unto God, for his long life and prosperity. And the king, as general bishop of the land, did then also offer his prayers to God for both houses. Finally, he admonished them, "That at their return into the country, they give his people good satisfaction, both for the proceedings and adjournment of this parl."

According to an order made June 2, the Judges delivered their opinions touching the privileges of the house of lords during the session of parl. But, because it had not happened to their knowledge, that ever the house was adjourned for so long a time, as now it was intended to be; they could not satisfy their lordships of any precedent, for the continuance of their privileges during all the time of this long cessation. Whereupon their lordships delivered their opinions. "That the lords do know that the privileges of themselves, their servants, and followers do continue, notwithstanding the adjournment of parl.; and do adjudge the same to be observed in all points accordingly." Ordered, That this declaration shall be entered in the Journals, and a copy of it sent to both the compters to be published.—After several other orders were finished, h. r. h. the Prince, who never missed one day's attendance all this long session, produced the king's Commission for the adjournment of the parl. By virtue of which, the commissioners adjourned the parl. to the 14th of Nov. next ensuing. The lord chief baron, with other judges, were sent to the Commons with the same instrument, and withal to deliver this message:—"We are commanded to signify unto you, That his maj.'s pleasure is, that all committees, matters, and business of parl. shall rest in the state as they now are, until the next meeting."

The Commons' Declaration for the Recovery of the Palatinate.] June 4. Wilson and Rushworth both inform us, That the Commons, immediately before their recess, took into consideration again the Affair of the Palatinate. And, least the slackness shewn in it should be laid to them, they, unanimously, agreed to draw up a Declaration of their sentiments in this matter. The motion for this Declaration was made in the Commons by Sir James Perrott who said, "That since the knowledge, profession and practice of true religion was so powerful, precious, and profitable unto the souls of men; since the same was now so much distressed abroad in foreign parts, and sought to be endamaged and endangered here at home; since the deplorable estate thereof had been already fully set forth by some good members of this house, well known, and, as he hoped, sensibly felt by all the members of the same; since also the king's majesty, at the beginning of this parl. in his public speech, represented the danger of religion in general, and of the Palatinate in particular, with this princely and pious protestation, That if the same could not be recovered by treaty, whereof he had some hope he would then adventure his blood and life in the cause; wherefore the mover humbly beseecheth the house, that in the cause of religion (which is God's cause) and in the cause of his maj.'s children, for maintenance of the patrimony of that royal progeny, they would, before their departure, make a public protestation and Declaration, That, if religion and right may not be restored by treaty and peaceable means, that then, upon our return to parl. (being thereto required by his maj.) we would be ready to adventure the lives and estates of all that belong unto us, or wherein we have interest, for the maintenance of the cause of God, and of his maj.'s royal issue. And for that purpose, such Declaration being here made, he would that the same, by resolution of the question, and by public protestation might be both testified here, and also entered in the clerk's book, that it might not only remain here on record to be seen and followed, but, being divulged, it might oblige us all to the performance of this promise, discharge our duty to God, and more facilitate the treaty, which his maj. hath in hand with foreign princes, concerning this cause: or at least enable his maj. to relieve the distressed, to rescue religion, to recover the Palatinate, with the patrimony of his daughter's children, and to perform the princely promise which he made."—This motion thus made was entertained with much joy and a general consent of the whole house, and was seconded by sir Rob. Phillips, mr. Beecher, and others, who shewed divers reasons why the house should make such a declaration; viz. because that the reputation of the arms of princes is of as great defence and consequence as their proper force, and that now, while the parl. sitteth, the king hath his sword drawn; for the whole kingdom is then ready, both with purse and arms, to assist the king in the business of the Palatinate, whensoever his maj. shall be pleased to command.

Sir Ed. Cecil saith, that he thinketh this Declaration is come from heaven, and believeth that it will work better effects with our enemies, than if we had 10,000 soldiers on the march.

Sir Nath. Rich saith, that he doth much rejoice to see this general Declaration be here approved with such an acclamation; for that this will shew to the world, that we are not insensible of the sufferance of those of our religion, nor of the wrong done to the count Palatine.

This motion was entertained with much joy and a general consent of the whole house, and sounded forth with the voices of them all, withal lifting up their hats in their hands, as high as they could hold them, as a visible testimony of their unanimous consent; in such sort, that the like had scarce ever been seen in parl.—Then there grew a little question, whether we should enter this our Declaration of our general resolution to spend our lives and fortunes for the defence of those of our religion and of the Palatinate: but it was resolved, after a little debate, that it should be entered in the clerk's book, to remain on record, as our Declaration; which done, the house selected a committee of all his maj.'s privy council, that were members of this house, together with sir James Perrot and some other selected members, to draw up the Declaration of the house's general consent in this cause, and for to set it down in writing, that it might be entered and remain registered with the clerk of the parl. house.

Sir Dud. Digges moved, that the privy council of this house might, from the house, beseech his maj. not to use any delay in the treaty for the Palatinate; for our resolution is such as we have declared before.

When the committee had drawn up the Declaration, it being reported and publicly read in the house, was received with a general approbation and like acclamation of joy, by assent of voices and lifting up their hats in their hands, as was done when this was committed to the committee. The Declaration was as followeth:

"The Commons assembled in parl. taking into their most serious consideration the present estate of the king's children abroad, and the general afflicted estate of the true professors of the same Christian religion, professed by the church of England, in foreign parts; and, being touched with a true sense and fellow-feeling of their distresses, as members of the same body, do, with unanimous consent of themselves, and of the whole body of the kingdom (whom they represent) declare unto his most excellent maj. and to the whole world, their hearty grief and sorrow for the same; and do not only join with them in their humble and devout prayers to Almighty God, to protect his true Church, and to avert the dangers now threatened, but also with one heart and voice do solemnly protest, that, if his maj.'s pious endeavours by treaty, to procure their peace and safety, shall not take that good effect he desireth, in the treaty; (whereof they humbly beseech his maj. to make no longer delay) that then, upon signification of his maj.'s pleasure in parl. they shall be ready, to the utmost of their powers, both with their lives and fortunes, to assist him; so as by divine help of Almighty God (who is never wanting unto those, who, in his fear, shall undertake the defence of his own cause) he may be able to do that by his sword, which by peaceable courses shall not be effected."

A message was then received from the Lords; That the king had sent a commission to them, under the great seal, for adjournment of this parl. till the 14th of Nov. next, that the commission had been there read, and accordingly the house there had been adjourned: And that his maj.'s pleasure had been there signified, that all committees and other matters of parl. should stay till that time, and be left in the same state as now.—The messengers delivered the commission to be read, but the Commons, having no precedent for the reading of it, did not think fit to read the same. The messengers having withdrawn till the speaker understood the pleasure of the house concerning the Answer to be given to the Lords, were again called in and informed by mr. Speaker, that this house according to the king's pleasure, will adjourn itself accordingly.—Then

Sir Edw. Coke, with tears in his eyes, standing up, recited the collect for the king and his issue, adding only to it, 'and defend them from their cruel enemies.' After which the house adjourned to the 14th of Nov. next.

The Parliament meet again.] Nov. 20. Nothing material happening in the government, during the recess, but what will best appear in the sequel, we shall proceed with our Journals. A proclamation was published, bearing date from the court at Royston, Oct. 6th this year, for an adjournment of the parl. from Nov. 14th to the 8th of Feb. next coming. The reason given for it was, the season of the year and weather making it unfit for the states of the kingdom to assemble at that time. But by another proclamation, from the same authority, this adjournment was altered, on certain urgent and important occasions, to the 20th of Nov. at which time they were strictly commanded to meet to do business.—At this access of parl. 5 newly created Lords were introduced to their seats in the house, with the usual ceremonies. Their names and titles were Tho. lord Darcy, of Chich, created vis. Colchester; Henry lord Hunsdon, vis. Rochford; Fulk Grevile, lord Broke; Edw. Montagu, baron Montagu of Boughton; and Lionel Cranfield was made baron Cranford of Cranford in Bedfordshire.

Then a Message was sent to the Commons, "That his maj. being absent from parl. by reason of an indisposition of health, had commanded the lord keeper to deliver his pleasure to both houses; which the lords thought fitter to be done at a meeting: therefore their lordships did desire such a meeting for that purpose, in the Painted Chamber, to-morrow at 2 in the afternoon, if that time stands with their convenience." Ans. "The Commons will attend the service, at the time and place appointed." The Prince signified to the house his maj.'s pleasure, "That when the lord keeper had ended his speech to both houses, the lord treasurer and lord Digby should second the same.

The Lord Keeper's Report of a Message from the King to both Houses.] Nov. 24. The Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, (dr. John Williams, bp. of Lincoln) delivered the report of his speech, to both houses, in form following:—"May it please your highness and this noble house; If I had in my breast the least drachm of those high thoughts, which the Roman orator had in his, when he said, 'nihil dixi quod dixisse pœniteat,' that he never spoke, in his life, any one word that he repented of, I should not have been so unwilling to make a repetition of my other day's message, as by order of the house I am obliged to do: for in good faith, my performance thereof was so weak, that I had good reason to desire it might be rather (for the manner and all the interest I had therein) buried in oblivion, than received with a second repetition. And yet, considering the best sacrifice I can offer up to this noble company, is my humility and obedience. I will be unto myself, as Phocion was to Demosthenes, a kind of chopping-knife, to cut off the superfluities of that declaration, which wearied all your lordships the other day."—"I divided, according to my method indeed, but his maj.'s matter, the whole narrative into six several parts. 1. The Antecedent. 2. The Occasion. 3. The Pattern. 4. The Call. 5. The Form. And, lastly, the Continuance of this present assembly. One of these parts I let fall in the division, but took it up again in the discourse and narration. My Antecedent comprehended the several effects of his maj.'s gracious care over the kingdom, since the last recess, or departure, of this assembly: how the three petitions, presented from both houses by my lord's grace of Canterbury, were really answered. 1. That the matter of trade and distribution of manufactures to several parts of the kingdom was conveniently established. 2. The importation of bullion and conservation of coin within the land was discussed, committed, and referred. And, lastly, the exportation of iron ordnance was firmly prohibited. Then I presented to the noble houses the proclamation of grace, wherein were reformed six or seven and thirty several matters complained of as public grievances; all of them without the least trucking or merchandizing with the people: a thing usual in former times; but, out of his maj.'s zeal of justice, and no other consideration in the world, rooted out and eternally abolished. And here I crossed the seas and touched upon the reformation of Ireland, begun by a platform projected by the council of the one, and polished by the council of the other, and now to be perfected by commissioners chosen out from both the kingdoms. These I called the fruits of his maj.'s vocation, and the antecedents of this assembly.—The Occasion of this Assembly I fastened, partly upon some antecedents from abroad, but principally, upon a Declaration at home, recorded and divulged far and near, by the representative commonalty of this kingdom,

I know your lordships have perused the same, their noble manifesto of the 4th of June. (see p. 1294.) This I made bold to annalize a little, and observed, without altering phrase or word, four circumstances in the same; to which I applied four answers, warranted, to a syllable, by his maj.'s directions; as, I hope, my lords here of the council will bear me witness. 1. His maj. was encouraged to travel a little longer in his pious endeavours to procure a peace, by way of treaty: I declared, from him, that all this was done; I wish I could have said as profitably as I could well say charitably. 2. His maj. was besought this treaty might not be over-much lingered and delayed. I shewed from the king, that no more it was; and produced for testimony, the speedy return of that noble lord employed in that service. 3. His maj. was petitioned, upon the non proficiency of this treaty and his pious endeavours, to signify his pleasure in open parl. I told them from the king, that this petition was likewise granted; and was the principal cause why both houses were now re-assembled. Lastly, his maj. is assured, upon this signification, &c. which I shewed them, that peaceable courses are not so effectual, the breaches being now grown so wide and desperate. And thus I stated the Occasion of this re-assembly.—In the 3d place, I touched upon an heroical act of his maj. which I called a Pattern for this assembly; and that is the advancement of 40,000l. to keep together the body of an army in the lower palatinate; the which had otherwise been dissolved before this parl. could be assembled. I noted that, without this, their resolution had been lost; and so will all this be still without their further resolution.—In the 4th, I excused the Call of this assembly, which might seem to some men not to be so punctual; and shewed them, that, like war itself, so are the summons thereof accompanied with disorder and confusion. For, in matters of this nature, as I noted out of a good author, 'quæ lègitimum,' &c. Those parliaments which stand upon their precise, &c.*—5thly, I touched upon the Form of this assembly; which his maj.'s pleasure was should rather be by antient than modern precedents, That all, &c. and all-cunning and malicious diversions avoided, (for such things you well know there are in the world) they should, soundly, really, &c.—In the last place, I came unto the Continuance of this assembly, which his maj. limits, at this time, to some 7 or 8 days before Christmas; but renews again on the 8th of February next, to continue then for the enacting of laws and perioding of these reformations, as long as the necessity of the state shall require the same.—And now I have presented your lordships the natural bird, as it came from the nest, without so much as a feather of my own invention: for this is no speech but only minutes of his maj.'s directions. I shall only add, 1st, my preface, containing his maj.'s indisposition rather than absence; for absent his maj. thought he could not be, as long as he was represented by such a son: a son whom of I may say, (as Pliny did of Cæsenius Pœtus's): 'parenti non minus ab alia charus, quam quod filius sit,' as dear to his maj. for many other respects, as because he is his son: and then my double prayer, the one to your lordships, which I now repeat again and make for myself, for the time past, present, and to come, to pardon the weakness and innumerable imperfections of your most unworthy speaker; the other unto God, for his Holy Spirit to be present and president in this assembly."

Ld. Digby's report of the Message concerning Spain, &c.] The Lord Digby also made a short repetition of that part of his speech, which his lordship had delivered at the same time, viz.—In the delivery of the message I had from the king, I presented these 3 considerations; 1. his maj.'s Proceedings and the Issue of them; 2. the State of the Business at this present Time; 3. what Redress was fittest. I begun with his maj.'s proceedings from the unfortunate overthrow at Prague. Upon the news whereof his maj. instantly considered what was to be done, and resolved that the best was, to keep the Princes of the Union in arms; and, to continue their army, his maj. sent them 30,000l. by Albertus Morton. Then his maj. sent sir Edw. Villiers into Silesia, to fetch the Palsgrave's submission unto the emperor, upon such conditions as his majesty should think fit. His maj. then also sent me unto the archduke Albertus, to propose a Reconciliation; and sent to him the first, because he had the greatest stroke in the affairs of the empire, and greatest command over the Spanish army; in regard the emperor had all his greatness, saving a few little provinces, by resignation from the said archduke. The archduke willingly assented unto a reconciliation, in favour of his maj. and, to that end, the archduke writ letters to the emperor and king of Spain. In the interim, the Princes of the Union grew to disband; whereupon, the archduke, to show his willingness to a reconciliation, did procure Spinola to cease from arms. By those means the Palatinate was saved, which otherwise had been lost, and this cessation continued all the lifetime of the archduke.—Sir Edw. Villiers and I returned into England about the same time; I bringing with me the cessation from war, and he the Palsgrave's submission. And now the business was ready for a general treaty, which his maj. at the first intended to have with the emperor touching the reconciliation; and I was employed in that errand, accompanied with letters of recommendation from the kings of France, Spain, Poland, and Denmark.—The propositions which I was to make to the emperor were, That the Palsgrave should be restored to his lands and honours, in all points, as he enjoyed them when he married his maj.'s daughter; the Palsgrave submitting himself to the emperor, upon such conditions as the emperor and his maj. should agree on. The emperor answered, That he was willing to gratify his maj.'s demands, for the great moderation which he found in his maj. in the business of Bohemia, so as the king would undertake for the Palsgrave's submission. But the emperor referred the conclusion of this business unto a diet.—Then I made a 2d proposition, viz. That war might cease until matters were debated by a diet. Unto which the emperor answered, That he did not take it to be war or hostility that he waged against the Palsgrave. Yet, in favour to his maj. he would agree to a cessation.—After this the emperor hastening the Diet, the princes denied their appearance at the same, in regard they were under such concern as to look to themselves and stand upon their guard. Whereupon I moved the emperor to send to every prince particularly, and acquaint him with his maj.'s propositions; which the emperor did accordingly. Upon answer from the princes, the emperor wrote his letter to his maj., in answer to the propositions, which I received, thinking all business had, in effect, been fully concluded on. In which letters there was contained, That the emperor had written to the duke of Bavaria and the Infanta, for a cessation from arms: and that himself had granted a promise, either to procure count Mansfield to lay down his arms, or else that his maj. would declare count Mansfield an enemy. In these letters, also, the emperor did write, That he would not take up arms again, until 3 months after he had given notice to his maj. that he would renew the war.—Then I shewed the reason why the emperor would not agree to any truce, without the duke of Bavaria: 1. in regard of the emperor's agreement in the beginning of the troubles, neither to make peace nor war without the consent of the said duke; which happened because that upon the former truce made with the said duke, the soldiers that were in the Lower Palatinate, and wanted employment, came up into the Higher, and much infested the duke of Bavaria. 2. in regard the said duke had a great part of Austria in pledge for his satisfaction. 3. because the emperor was barred out of all passage but through Bavaria, Bethlem, Gabar, Rensorpe, and Budianus.—I coming to count Mansfield to treat with him about laying down his arms, found plainly, That the duke of Bavaria had, from the beginning, affected to get unto himself the Palatinate and the title of elector. The duke of Bavaria, in his letters to me, upon receipt of the emperor's letter to him concerning the truce, did discover this intention: for he wrote, That I should not need to labour for a truce, for the wars were at an end; in that he had agreed with count Mansfield, so that he doubted not but to keep both the Palatinates in peace, until the emperor and the Palsgrave had agreed. And here, I noted, That this answer was a bitter oraison.—The Infanta refused to have a peace, and acquainted me, that such was the emperor's mind also; whereupon I observed, That the emperor's answers to his maj.'s propositions had been deferred; so now it was come, either that his maj. should leave his children or else denounce war.—Touching the present state of the Palatinate, I shewed, That count Mansfield was come down into the lower part with 16,000 men, and sir Horace Vere had about 5000; all these having endured the hardships of war for near two years. And here I observed, That much was saved by these means, which must have been spent in raising, arming, and carrying over so many thousand soldiers into that place.—I said further, That the people of the Palatinate had lived free from oppression and rapine under the Spanish army; and that therefore some speedy course was to be taken for sending of money thither, lest Mansfield's soldiers, thro' want, should be driven to fall to spoil those of the Palatinate, and breed a liking in them to the Spanish government. I noted further, That count Mansfield's army did not consist of men, which fought for their country, wives, or children, but for money; which they must have speedily, or they are gone: and if the count, for want of pay, should take a dislike, he might, for honour, or other reward, fall off to the emperor, and then all were lost.—I also briefly described unto them the present state of all Christendom; the power of the emperor, and of the five armies maintained by the king of Spain: that the forces of the princes of the Union were disbanded; and that the Catholic League did continue to hold firm.—I observed how bravely sir Horace Vere and capt. Brough had behaved themselves of late in the Palatinate; and that, by the wisdom and valour of sir Horace, Heidelbergh was kept from the enemy, being a place of small strength; Manheim, a very strong town; Frankendale, which had endured a month's siege, and Worms; which is the present state of the Palatinate.—Touching what redress was fittest, I concluded, That it was proper to cherish and keep up that army which is already there, which must be with supplies of money; and that more forces must be prepared against next spring, so as we might have there an army of our own, to the strengthening the Palatinate, and encouragement of the Princes of the Union. This I recommended unto them, and wished that every one would shew his zeal and affection to his maj. therein.

* This paragraph and the next are left unintelligible, in the Journals, perhaps on purpose: because they seem to point at some reflections, too strong to be recorded,

The Lord Treasurer's Report of the Message relating to the Supply.] The Lord Treasurer (Cranfield) next made his report of the message, which he delivered to both houses, to this effect:—"That his lordship declared unto them the present state of the exchequer, and smallness of his maj.'s revenues; and that the two Subsidies, granted this parl. were spent about the Palatinate. That the business, now in hand, required a great and a speedy Supply, wherein his maj. had taken some course out of his own; and his lordship doubted not but that the Commons would add thereunto, and perform what they had so nobly promised in their Manifesto; the disposing whereof they need not to doubt of, but that his maj. intended the same to be wholly employed for the recovery of the Palatinate. Lastly, he wished that the Commons would so handle this business, as to make his maj. in love with the parliaments."

These several reports being made, the Lords proceeded to regulate committees on divers bills; which, with some other matters of less moment, concluded the business of that day.—Nothing being done in the several days following, in the house of lords, but hearing complaints and redressing matters of privileges, &c. it may be necessary to examine into the Proceedings of the Commons at this juncture.

Debates in the Commons on Privileges—the Supply—the Spanish Match, &c.] Nov. 21. When sir Edwin Sandys was missed, on the calling of the house, the Speaker delivered a letter, sent him from sir Edwin; whereby he signified, that he received a discharge from the king of his confinement, bearing date Nov. 6th, and that he would have attended this house, but that he is very sick, and therefore desireth the house will be pleased to pardon his absence. Whereupon the house was, at this time, content not to call on him.

Nov. 22. Mr. Alford saith, that the king hath commanded by two proclamations, that none should meddle or talk of state business; and yet hath again commanded, by the three lords, that we should not meddle but with the business of the Palatinate; that this is a precedent wherein we are warily to proceed; for hereafter the king may else say, we shall meddle only with this or that business, and not with other things, and so we lose the Privilege of a free parl. He would, that we should hasten to dispatch the business of the house; for hereafter, if we shall touch on any thing for the good of the commonwealth, his maj. may be incensed, and so dissolve the parl. In Hen. VII.'s time one Terrill, a member of this house, was, for telling the king of the business of this house, sent to the Tower, and by an act disabled, and all his posterity, for ever sitting or serving again in this house. We are taxed to be cunning and malicious, but he thinketh the king is misinformed of us; for we are the same parliament men (and have the same hearts and affections to his maj.) that gave, without precedent, a free gift of two Subsidies, at the beginning of this parl. when the king said we were good subjects.

Mr. Secretary Calvert saith, that mr. Alford hath expressed more fear than he seeth cause for him to do; and that he hath laid an imputation on his maj. saying, that since the last recess the king hath forbidden all men, by proclamation, to speak of state business; and yet here his maj. hath commanded us to speak and debate only of the business of the Palatinate, which is state business; thereby taxing his maj. for commanding contrary matters, as though his maj. meant to insnare and take advantage of us. And he hath also, as it were, taxed his maj. by the fears which he propounded, as if, when we should have yielded to any thing, the king should take some causeless exception against the house, and so break off this parl.

Sir D. Digges saith, that he hath served the king with as faithful a heart as any one that sitteth about the Chair: that it hath ever been the misery of parliaments, that ill offices have been done betwixt us and the king; and it is so likewise of this parl. It is well known, that sir Ed. Sandys hath suffered; which if he knew it were for parl. business, he must, if he died, say, that of right we ought not to be punished for what we speak here, other than by the house: but, since there is a day prefixed for the great business of the State and Religion, which lieth a bleeding, he desireth that there may be an end of such speeches as are used, and that no exceptions or question may be made or taken of what any member of this house shall or hath said in the discharge of his conscience.

Mr. Mallory desireth, that sir Ed. Sandys's letter to mr. Speaker may be read again; for, as he remembereth, it is therein mentioned, that he had been confined, notwithstanding he was a member of this house; and, for aught we know, it may be for parliament business. He desireth also to know, for what business: Ed. Sandys was questioned.

Lord Clifford desireth, that, since sir Ed. Sandys doth not here complain of any thing for which he was confined, nor of his confinement, that we would return to the business of the house or state.

Sir Tho. Wentworth hath observed that this house hath ever used to debate with jealousy the Privileges of this house; but we have ever done it with loss of our Privileges rather than gain. He saith, he thinketh sir Edwin was questioned for matter of state; but howsoever he complaineth not here, and therefore he would not have us to take up the office of informers, and complain for him.—Sir E. Sandy's letter was again read.

Sir Rob. Crane thinketh this house will not meddle nor question any thing, if sir Edwin were confined for state business: but, because there is a murmur abroad, that he was committed for parliament business, he desireth it may be cleared, whether he were so committed, or no.

Mr. Secretary Calvert saith, that, though he hath no commission, yet, since he perceiveth the whole business of the house sticketh at that knot, he will assure this house, that sir Ed. Sandys was not committed for any thing said or done in parl. But the house will scarce believe mr. Secretary, but thinketh he equivocateth; and some say, they are not yet satisfied that sir Edwin was not committed for parliament business.—Sir Fra. Vane desireth, that mr. Secretary's protestation may be entered in the clerk's book: which accordingly was here entered.

Nov. 26. Sir D. Digges saith, he speaketh with a great deal of difficulty, and desireth that he may not be misinterpreted nor misreported.

That, though he be but poor, he is neither ambitious of honour, nor afraid to speak his conscience freely. He would have us now shew our affection to the king, so as the king may be encouraged to shew his love to his people. He divideth his speech into 3 points. 1. Concerning the state of the Business of the Palatinate and what the king hath done therein. That the king (as hath been told us) presently, on the overthrow of Prague, sent 30,000*l.* to keep the Princess of the Union firm to the Palsgrave: afterwards his maj. sent another message to comfort his children, and that was by sir Edw. Villars; whereby, and by the other carriage of his maj. in this business of the Palatinate, his maj. hath shewed himself a constant prince, in following still his pious course to effect by treaty a peace; and, seeing that cannot be effected, the king sent of late 40,000*l.* to keep the army, that is in the Palatinate under the command of count Mansfield, together. Now, though his maj. be not tied to give an account of his actions to any but to God, yet it hath pleased him to descend from his royal prerogative therein so low, as to acquaint his houses of parl. with his proceedings in this business; thereby endeavouring to enable himself to prepare for a war, to get that by force and the sword, which he cannot by treaty.—For the 2nd part, concerning the State of Christendom, he saith, that Spain and Italy are the strength and defence of the Roman religion, and these islands the centre of the true religion: that Germany, France, the Low Countries, Poland, and some other parts of Christendom have some of the true religion, but most there are of the Roman religion. In short, the truth of it is, that Spain is the head of the Roman religion; and our king is the head of the true religion: that our king seeketh by peace to maintain our religion; the king of Spain by war to bring all in subjection to his religion, and, as it is to be thought, to his crown: that our king goeth to effect his peaceable ends by a secret way, but Spain by a more open way, and discovereth himself to his friends. None can blemish our king's care in this matter of religion, to end differences by treaty without war, as his maj. hath shewed it to all the world at several times and places, as particularly in Poland not long since; and our king also reconciled the king of Sweden and Denmark, and ended the differences between the Low Countries and the king of Denmark: that there may be in good people much fear, and yet it may not proceed out of want of affection.—For the 3rd point, concerning what is here at this time principally to be debated, that he thinketh, that of necessity we must enter into consideration of the Defence of the Palatinate, and to maintain the king's intention therein of a war. His maj. it is well known, shewed his inclination to a peace, but now he is driven to a war; in which we are to resolve (as he thinketh) first, not only how to maintain those soldiers who are there, but also to make a war of diversion; without which, he thinketh, small good will be done.

Sir Benj. Rudyard saith, that our religion is battered abroad and moulders here at home: that he thinketh, there is none that values his soul at so low a rate, as that he will not give and spend his life and goods for the defence of it: that there is now a fair and thrifty way opened to us for the defence of our religion, and the recovery of the right and inheritance of our king's children. He desireth therefore, that this house will consider of a present supply of the army in the Palatinate, that that business and the dangers which may come thereby be not wound up on delays till they break, and so our supply come too late.

Sir Miles Fleetwood thinketh that this is the weightiest business that came into the house since he sat here: that our king's daughter and her husband and children are deprived of their inheritance, and he thinketh it hath been out of their too much confidence in princes, and in the arm of flesh. He saith, we are bound to supply this war: 1st, for the glory of God: 2, for the honour of the king: 3, for the peace of our country. For the 1st, that we cannot more glorify God, than in defending his religion: that, since we have defended our religion, this kingdom hath been a mirror of God's mercy, an honour and helper to our friends, and a terror to our enemies. 2ndly, for the honour of the king, that by this war we shall maintain the title of the king, who is stiled Defender of the Faith. He would not have us neglect the king, who is so dear to God, by neglecting his children, who are so dear to him. 3rdly, for the peace of this kingdom, that, if one or two of the king of Spain's five armies do come against the Palatinate, it may, without our help, ruin them, and endanger us: that we cannot better divert the projects of our enemies (who labour to sow dissention between the king and his people) than by giving the king content in this business, and to busy them with some war abroad. He would have us provide for a present and future Supply, and that we advise with the Lords both for the quantity of the Supply to be given for the war, and touching the manner and the governors of it.

Sir James Perrott would have us consider first, for the maintenance of religion in general; and then particularly, for that in the Palatinate. This kingdom hath heretofore vanquished France, supported the Netherlands, supplanted Wales, affronted and assisted Spain, and done many other noble actions; and therefore he holdeth it a great dishonour for our nation to sit down, and not shew ourselves for the defence and recovery of the Palatinate. But he would have us, in like manner consider what we are now: the country is poor, but the kingdom is not; for all the best part of the wealth of the kingdom is contained within the walls of this city: that here is 100,000*l.* per ann. spent in Tobacco, which would maintain a reasonable army almost a year. All the nobility and gentry of this kingdom come and spend their estates here on toys, jewels and clothes. The East India Company have 1,500,000*l.* in bank here: the usurers of this town have a million, at the least. He would have all the nobility and gentry of this town, who have no important business or employment here, to be compelled by a law to go and live in the country; and, though many say their wives draw them hither, yet laws will rule their wives, though their husbands cannot: that there is too much excess of plate in gentlemen's houses in the kingdom. He would have us consider, what will discharge the charge of a war; and, as we should provide for that, he would have us likewise look to ourselves at home, whether we want provision: 'Parva sunt arma foris, nisi sit consilium domi.' He thinketh a war of diversion is necessary. He would have us give as much for a present Supply as shall be needful, and for the future war as much as every man is in the Subsidy book; as, if he be 10*l.* he should pay 10*l.* fully. For his part he is very willing to give so much, and he doubteth not but that will discharge the war. Only he desireth, that we may have first safety at home; that we be not here supplanted by those of a contrary religion whose hearts are at the king of Spain's service; and they think they ought to be so, because he is the protector of their superstition and religion.

Sir Edward Sackville saith, that the passing bell now tolleth for religion and the state of the Palatinate; it is not dead, but dying. He would have us consider of 2 things: 1. What is fit to be done at this time: 2. What is unfit to now be talked of. 1st, That we should remember what we promised by our Declaration. He would have us bestow such a sum on the king, as will suffice for the present supply of the wants of those soldiers that are now in the Palatinate; and this is the business which is fit to be discussed of and done at this time. 2ndly, That it is unfit to speak or discourse of any thing else till this be effected.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that the necessity of the affairs now in hand and his duty calleth him up, and that he will speak with a loyal heart to the king and this state, and to the wants of the king's children: that the propositions now on foot are, 1. For a present supply for the Palatinate: 2. To make a thorough war: the one is needful, the other necessary: that the states who are likely to hinder us are the Catholic states; which consist of that great wheel Spain, and the little ones of Germany, both which now fight against us with a victorious sword. Those who are for us may be those of our religion in the Low Countries, the Princes of the Union, the protestants of France, and some few in other places; which is but small assistance. He prayeth that our sins have not been the cause that hath made the Princes of the Union fall from us; but he hopeth, they will be re-united when they shall see us stir again. For the Low Countries, though their forgetful pride hath made them neglect us, yet their business against the Spaniard will put them in mind of their fault, and, he hopeth, make them be as firm to us, as they are near neighbours to us; and he thinketh it needful and necessary, that they have dependancy on no state but our's. As for France, the protestants there are locked up by a civil war, so as there is no hope of help thence. It is true, that the king hath carried the affairs of the Palatinate wisely, and hath sought, out of his goodness and pious disposition, by treaty to make peace: but he hath therein been unfortunate, for, whilst we have treated of peace, they have still gone on with the war. It hath been told us, that the king of Spain is our friend, but every one knoweth, that he is the president of the council of that war which is made against the Palatinate; and, for aught appeareth, that war moveth not but by the wheel of Spain, who payeth all the soldiers there. As for the duke of Bavaria, he is but a petit prince. He would have us consider, first, the honour of this kingdom; for he is jealous of it, because he heareth how we are slighted by foreign states: that he thinketh, God is angry with us for not keeping the crown of Bohemia on the king's children's heads, and therefore he hath punished them and us with the loss of their own patrimony, to our shame, and their sorrow and dishonour. 2ndly. For the Ability of this kingdom, that at this time our Trade is decayed, and the letters and remedies administered by the lords of the council have wrought no good effects at all; so as there is small hope to do any good in trade but by good laws. 3dly. For our security at home, that all those papists, who are here amongst us, howsoever they live, their hearts and affections are subject to the king of Spain: that they are grown insolent; they call us already the protestant faction, and they dispute of their religion boldly, as if they had laws and liberty to defend the same publickly. He desireth, in this respect, that we may proceed with some course for our safety at home, that they, who are grown to such a head here, may not turn the wheel about, and so, when they have gotten us under, we mourn and repent our want of consideration and providence. He would have us consider what we can do at this time, and what we have already done. We have already given two Subsidies, and have not had any bill passed. He would not have us, at this time, to grant any Subsidy; but first to proceed with some bills to satisfy the country, and at our next meeting to grant Subsidies, which meeting he would have should be as soon as it shall please his maj.

Sir Edw. Giles would have us make a thorough war, but so as queen Eliz. did, to enrich ourselves, as well as to defend our right and ourselves. He saith, there was a Jesuit lately taken in the West Country, and is now at Exeter, who said, that there were 500 more Jesuits here in England at this time; and his boy said, that he heard his master say, that he hoped shortly to see a new king in England. He would therefore have a course first taken to secure the king, prince, and kingdom in these dangerous times, and confluence of papists; and that afterwards we should consider how to aid and give Supply for the Palatinate. He believeth, that we shall do no good by treaty, and would therefore have us treat with our swords in our hands. God hath hitherto done much for us; but we must not look for that help from him still, if we be so careless of his church and the true religion.

Mr. Sec. Calvert would have us remember, why the Princes of the Union disbanded, and left the king of Bohemia, which was only for want of a Supply; but, how or in what manner they did it, he will not mention. But, if the king resolve to enter now into a war, those princes will be, as it is hoped, and not unlikely, reunited, and the king of Denmark and other princes in Germany will also declare themselves for the assistance of the Palatinate; for our king's not declaring of himself heretofore in the war made these princes give over and forbear in that action: that the friendship amongst princes is as their strength and interest is; and he would not have our king to trust to the king of Spain's affection. As for the delaying of a Supply any longer, if we do it our supply will come too late. It is said, our king's sword hath been too long sheathed; but they, who shall speak to defer a supply, seek to keep it longer in the scabbard.

Sir G. Moore saith, we have already made a Declaration, that our hearts are ready to assist for the recovery of the Palatinate. He would now have us think what we are to do: if we do nothing, it will be a scandal to our religion, considering the desperate case of the Palatinate, and those of our religion in foreign parts; and it will be said, that the king is only rich in the promises of his subjects, but not in their performance of even needful supplies. He would have us have also consideration of the poverty of the country, which is to perform what we shall give; and would have us do it so, as that we lose not their affections, but something he would have howsoever done for the supply of the Palatinate.

Mr. Tho. Crewe desireth to be excused, if he dissent from a present given. We have heard with sorrow, that our king's good and peaceful intentions have had no good success. There is ever more lost by treaty, than gotten by the sword. He would have us therefore take our swords in our hands: but, if we consider our disabilities, our trade taken from us, and traffick decayed, we may think it a difficult matter to proceed in a war. He would have us consider, who maketh war against us, which is the Spaniard; and against him, as he conceiveth, we are to bend our forces, for it is he that giveth counsel and pay against us. There is no halting between two religions, and therefore he liketh not that the papists are so common and bold in England. He desireth, that we might know against whom we shall fight; and then he would say, that, though we give not now, we would give at our next meeting.

Nov. 27. Mr. Wylde saith, that it was a great disadvantage to Pompey, that he stood only on the defensive, and permitted his enemy to offend and assail: that the Spaniard is he, who only hath counselled and aided with his purse those who have gained the Palatinate: that there is no trust to be reposed in the promise of the Spaniard: those who are of that religion have dispensations for the breach of their faith. He would not have us defend only the limbs and branches, but to look to the trunk and body itself. He would not, that we desire to know only of the king the enemy against whom we should go to recover the Palatinate; but would have us let the king know, whom we take and hold to be our enemy, and then, as we shall see cause, to give a Supply; but, in the mean time, to provide for our safety at home.

Mr. Treasurer saith, that his maj. would not willingly break with the Spaniard, till he seeth, whether he (having made so many fair promises) will yet avow or disavow the actions of the emperor. He would not, that we should, by our discord, add grief to the common and general affliction wherein those of the protestant religion now are generally. He would have us constant to our promise by our declaration.

Mr. Neale acknowledgeth his disability to speak of the great business in hand, and will deliver only what he hath collected out of the speeches of those who have debated well heretofore: and 1st, of our doubt against whom we should make war, and who should be our enemy: 2ndly, from whom, and in what manner aid should be given. For the first, he saith, as the Trojan did, 'Timeo dannos et dona ferentes:' that the Spaniard hath ever won more by his pistolets than by his bullets: we know how the Spaniard hath gained by this means, and, being gained, no man dares question how he got it: 'Dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirit?' For the 2nd, from whom and in what manner this aid shall be levied, none shall be more forward and willing to give than himself. Those for whom he serveth here desire nothing more than a plain war, and therein they will venture their lives and estates; but those of the West Country are so poor, as at his coming thence the collectors of the last Subsidy said, they knew not how to levy the Subsidy behind. He desireth, that therefore in giving, the house will be pleased to consider, from whom the aid shall come, and that it may be levied from those who are wealthy, and not according to the ancient order, by the lands: that money is bought beyond sea at a higher rate than the mint here will give for it; and that is the reason, why so much foreign coin brought in hither is not kept here, as it would be otherwise: that the West Country is so oppressed and beggared with monopolies and new projects, as that they of that country are every year forced to be at the charge of coming hither to petition against it. He would have aid given, but that bills should be first prepared to pass.

Mr. Pymme saith, that, if we should not now give, we frustrate the king's expectation grounded on our own Declaration, and we lose assuredly the Palatinate and our reputation. On the other side, if we do nothing but give, we shall have the discontent of the people, and increase their fears of religion, and bring a disreputation to ourselves, having sat here so long and effected no bills. This is a ground that, where an obligation is laid originally, it ought to be performed; but we are to be excused, if by accident we are disabled to perform it. He saith, that the 1st part of the Proposition is to send a present supply for the army in the Palatinate; and the 2nd part is to send an army of our own countrymen thither to augment that army: that this war must be supplied by money, wherein we are too weak for the king of Spain: that we are disabled of some right, which belongeth to subjects, to proceed in this war; for it is a rule, that, if the subjects of one king do spoil the subjects of another king of their goods, the subjects so wronged have a kind of interest to right themselves on the subjects of the other king. He saith, that we are unfit to do any thing abroad, till we are more secure at home. He would have us labour for a sessions before Christmas; but would not have us have only bills, nor only give a Supply, but to do both together. He would have us frame an Oath of Association, to be ministered to, and taken by all our own nation and people; and that those, who should refuse the same, should not hold any office in the commonwealth.

Sir Rich. Grosvenor here out of his papers read the house a large lecture.

Sir James Perrott holdeth the question now to be an fit, and quid fit? He thinketh every one is resolved and obliged to give; but what shall be given he neither can nor will direct this house in: precedents may be created, where there is either urgens necessitas or evidens utilitas. There was an Oath of association in Elizabeth's time. He would have us be humble suitors to his maj. for the maintenance of our religion, that the laws may be executed against Recusants: 2ndly, that there may be a supply made of ships and munition for our safety at home, and that by his royal command every shire (according to the ability of it) may provide them with sufficient armour: 3rdly, that the general Pardon may be larger; for, as it hath been used to be granted, none or little good hath come by it to any body: 4thly, that his maj. will not punish those, who speak here freely their opinions and conscience; but that we may punish them here ourselves, if any shall speak disloyally, or not with due respect and duty to his majesty.

Sir Ed. Sackville doth not think this kingdom so poor and beggarly as it is said to be, neither would have us report it to be so; for he hopeth we have means to live, and do as much as our ancestors have done: it is the king of Spain that hath laid out his money to gain from us the Palatinate. He would have us give some present Supply towards the keeping of that which is left us in the Palatinate; and it will not be long before we discover plainly, whether the king of Spain be our enemy or no; which if he be, then will the king without question, understanding of our affections and inclinations, proclaim a general war against him, and then shall we have our desires.

Sir Tho. Wentworth would have us consider of the king and the people together and indivisibly: that the first proposition for the king is for a present supply: 2ndly, for an aid and supply to send into the Palatinate more forces to recover it, if occasion be. The first proposition of the people is their humble desire, that we may have a sessions before Christmas: the 2nd, that we may notwithstanding meet again in Feb. as was appointed: that there are 4 degrees for our proceeding herein: 1. That we should now answer the king's first proposition, that we will give a present Supply: 2. To desire that we might have an end of the sessions before Christmas: 3. To consider of the proposition of the Supply and the manner; wherein, he thinketh, we should do best to advise with the lords of the upper house by a conference: 4. That we declare our readiness to assist the king, if he shall declare an open war; but that we should expect till the king himself shall declare publickly an open war.

Sir Rd. Weston, chanc. of the excheq. thinketh, that there is a necessity that presseth us very near for to give a Supply: that the king hath done his part to procure by treaty a peace, and he would have us now, since a peace may not be effected by treaty, to do our parts for a war: that it is the constancy and reputation of this house, that, when in a time of peace we have engaged ourselves for a war, that we should not delay and be backward in it, when we see there is nothing but war to be thought on or effected. Our happiness hath been our misery; long peace hath made us unfit for war. There are 3 things considerable in the proceeding for war: 1. For a war of diversion (wherewith this kingdom hath been often sweetened) where to be: 2. For the scouring up of our old friends: 3. For the preserving of our own country; for he thinketh it a preposterous course to seek to gain other countries, and permit our own to be taken from us.

Mr. Solicitor saith, that there are 2 parts to be spoken to: 1. Whether we shall now resolve to give; and for this he will not so much doubt the affection of this house, as now to persuade or question it: 2. What the proportion shall be; how far for us to proceed, and how it shall be disposed. He desireth, first, that the former proposition be now put to the question, that we may not this day rise without (having heard so many good speeches of the fitness and necessity of a present Supply) resolving on some conclusion or determination.

Sir Edw. Cooke saith, that he hath here a book made by an Englishman Hispaniolized; which book scandals this state and also queen Elizabeth, and highly recommendeth the king of Spain; with whom, he saith, he will not meddle but se defendendo. This book is called "A Declaration of the Affairs of Holland." He saith, he will speak of 3 things. 1. He will shew that the laws against the Jesuits are just and merciful: 2. That God hath wonderfully protected those of our religion: 3. That God hath particularly protected and blessed our kingdom. For the first, that 2 Eliz. Pope Pius V. offered to that famous queen, that the Eucharist should be administered under both kinds and many other greater matters, so as she would acknowledge him to be the head of the church: that the said queen never did make laws against the Jesuits, till she was thereto provoked by themselves and their conspiracies: that in 13 Eliz. she made laws only against Bulls, because there were Bulls sent hither to discharge her subjects of their allegiance: 25 Eliz. she made the first laws against Papists; 26 Eliz. she made laws against Jesuits and Seminaries, because they practised to kill her: that in 1588, whilst our commissioners were in Spain treating of peace, there came hither the Grand Armada: that there was 30,000*l.* given to Lopuz, who read to the queen in philosophy, to poison the queen whilst he did read to her: and, a little before this should have been, there was sent a book hither called "Andreas Philopater," made, as it was thought, by the Jesuit parsons, to profess the people with an ill opinion of their prince, that so they might the easier effect their conspiracies: that the Papists afterwards practised to poison the pommel of her saddle, that so she, laying her hand on it, might be poisoned. Walsingham, a Monk, noteth, fol. 5. that the first rot (or scab) that came amongst our sheep was brought hither by one out of Spain; and every one knows, that Morbis Gallicus came first from Naples, which is one of the king of Spain's dominions. Whereby we may see, that there never came hither any thing from Spain, that did not either damage us, or endeavour it: that he is sorry there is so common access to the Spanish ambassador's house: that 15 men harboured within the walls of Troy did the Trojans more hurt, than 10 years siege did: the papists, our enemies, are here in our bosom, so as we are not in safety at home. He will not look to what we have already given, nor think on the Subsidy to be paid in May, but would have us think of something now to be done; but, before we do resolve to give any thing, he would have us go on with the business of the house.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that those princes are most protected by God, who rely most on his protection: that we have received 3 great blessings of God in the king for us, and us for the king. 1. The preservation of his maj. in Scotland (from Goury's Plot) for us: 2. Us for the king in 1588: and 3. The king and both houses of parl. from the Gunpowder Treason here in this place, that we may do him service: that Spain hath ever and will still make the Romish religion the great wheel or engine to effect his ambitious ends. He prayeth God, that we may be warned by our politic blazing star, (the Infanta) as we are by that natural blazing star. He would not now have us put it to the question, whether we will give a present Supply or no. If we give Subsidies now, they cannot possibly be levied to come so soon as the Supply is needful to be sent into the Palatinate. He would have us appoint a committee to consider hereof, and to ripen it for the house, that we may the better know, how money may be presently raised for a present Supply.

Mr. Alford saith, that, since the Powder Treason, the papists say, there hath been no practice against our king; and he wisheth, that now, on our loose with Spain, those who are about the king should look that he be not endangered. He would have us look on England as well as the Palatinate, and proceed with the business of the house and the Supply both together.

Mr. Serjeant Ashley saith, that he thinketh there may be a present Supply given, but he would have the business of the house go hand in hand with that of the Supply. He would have us give for a present Supply one subsidy and two 15ths.

Sir Jul. Caesar, master of the rolls, would not have it put to the question, whether we shall give or no. He thinketh the business will be best debated at a committee.

Sir Wm. Stroude thinketh, none but popish-hearted people will give with an ill heart to supply the army in the Palatinate; and would have a committee to consider of this business.

Sir Nath. Rich would have it cleared, whether we are bound or no by our Declaration to give; for he thinketh we are not thereby bound, and desireth to have it decided, because otherwise it may seem to take from the freeness of whatsoever we shall now give. He would have his maj. know of our proceedings here in this business before we resolve on giving a Supply, and would have a committee appointed for that purpose. He would have expressed some solemn declaration of our sorrow for the lamentable state of our religion, and that in this business we should begin with God. He would have a League confirmed between us and the Princes of the Union, by act of parl. according to ancient precedents: and then that we consider of our safety here at home, and next of war abroad.

Mr. J. Finch saith, that he taketh it, that we are now past all hope of peace; and then, a war being necessary, he thinketh we should debate and determine of what war; whether only of that in the Palatinate, or of a thorough war. He would have the Supply and bills go hand in hand.

Sir Dud. Digges would have it put to the question, what we have done here these two days; but it cannot be answered, for we have here only discoursed of our grief for the general afflicted estate of Religion and of the Palatinate, but have not yet ripened any thing for the question. He thinketh, we are not so strictly tied by our Declaration to give a Supply, as it is said abroad, and yet are we so obliged, as we cannot well discharge it without giving some present Supply. The question, he thinketh, is to be, whether we will give a present Supply for the preservation of the Palatinate or no. He would have us also appoint a committee, to debate of what Supply we will give, and how soon we are to give it; but what we shall agree to give, he would have given according to the ancient parliamentary course.

Sir Geo. Moore saith, that, there being in queen Elizabeth's time demanded here an aid for the Low Countries, it was referred to a committee to consider of, and it is a good thing to follow good and ancient precedents in such weighty causes and businesses.

Mr. Towerson saith, that a Supply cannot be returned by bills of exchange into the Palatinate, if it were provided, in less time than 2 months, whereof he desireth this house well to consider.

Sir Guy Palmes saith, that the country saith, that we have already given subsidies, but have brought them nothing. He would have us, first, to desire the Lords to go on with the bills that we have sent up into that house, and that we here proceed with others, and that the Pardon may be prepared; and then we will give cheerfully to a Supply.

Sir Fra. Seymour desireth, that a committee may be appointed to set down a course, how we should proceed in this business, for otherwise we shall but walk in a labyrinth: and that a course be taken in the mean time, that bills may be made ready for a sessions.

It was then, Resolved, "that a Committee of the whole house be appointed, to consider. 1. Touching the state of Religion, and for a Petition to his maj. for Execution of Laws against Jesuits, Papists, &c. 2. Of what Supply fit for the present, for the Palatinate, when, and of the manner. 3. And for a Petition to his maj. for passing Bills, and making an end of this session before Christmas."

Nov. 28. At a committee: the Speaker going out of the chair, and sir Edw. Coke being put into it,

Sir James Perrott saith, that, according to the order yesterday, we are first to debate of our Religion: that it is the practise of the papists to educate their children altogether with recusants: that himself had a youth commended to him by the will of his father, who was stolen from him by papists, and in one month was made a papist, and so continueth: that the papists labour also by persuasion to seduce those of our religion, and do it by their books; as we have seen of late by the book shewed here by sir Edw. Coke. He would have all papists to be banished the town during the parl. and a punishment to be inflicted on such as publish any books or send any youth to be educated beyond sea, or with papists.

Sir R. Phillips would have a select sub-committee appointed, for to set down some heads for a Petition to be by us presented to the king, to remedy these abuses, and wrong to those of our religion; and that the Petition may not only be for the making of new laws, but for the execution also of the old laws; and that such heads, as they should gather to this purpose, should be afterward considered of at this grand committee.

Mr. Pymme saith, that the king's affections are all good in him, but, through malice, the adverse party hath made ill use of them, and for his maj.'s and our disadvantage. God saw all things that he had made, and said, it was good; and yet the devil, out of malice to that good, did work the overthrow of man's salvation. He observeth 4 especial affections in the king, which, though they are all of them very good in his maj. yet are they abused. 1. The mercy of the king, out of the abundance whereof the king published in parl. that men's consciences ought not to be forced, nor any man ought to suffer for religion; out of this have the papists wrought their ill ends and brought divers dangers to this state. For remedy to this, he would have us, by petition, to let the king understand, that the execution of laws against papists, forces not their consciences, but prevents mischiefs; and therefore he would have the papists used like madmen, and have all dangerous weapons taken from them. The 2nd affection is the too much Lenity of the king, which hath made papists insult and grow too bold. He would have us desire his maj. to make himself the object of his lenity, and not the papists. The 3rd affection is the king's too great bounty; whereby, when the king hath for reward of service bestowed the forfeiture of any papist's estate on any of his maj.'s servants, the papists have presently got the same again at very easy rates. The 4th affection is his maj.'s friendship with other States; that other states, out of a pretence of friendship, have by importunity obtained many advantages against our religion, and gotten too large a liberty for the recusants here. He desireth, he may not be mistaken and thought to tax the king for these things; but he desireth only, that we should beseech his maj. not to admit papists to come so near him to work on his affections: that we should intimate to the king, that none can get greater popularity now than to be a friend and favourer of the papists.—He would have it offered to the king, that the incompatibility of the popish religion, of all other things, works most for the advantage of those princes who are of it, to effect the ends of their ambition. He would now have it made known to the king, that the pope hath blown over the fire of his Romish religion into this kingdom, and that the popish party here are as tinder ready to take fire: that it should be told the king, how the papists flock to the Spanish ambassador's; which is a thing in foreign parts not permitted, and whereof all are very jealous, even in kingdoms where all are of one and the same religion. He would have us beseech the king, that there may be a Commission from his maj. to some men (whereof he would have us desire that some might be of this house, and some of the upper house) to see the laws here of England duly executed against papists. And he would have these things offered to the king by some hon. members of this house.

The house being resolved into a committee touching the business of a Supply for the Palatinate; wherein is to be considered of, what is to be given, when, and in what manner,

Sir Nath. Rich saith, that it is to be considered by the committee, what or how much is fit to be given: and to know this, we are first to consider the state of the Palatinate, as it stands. And for this he would have us appoint a sub-committee of this house, of such as know the state of the Palatinate, and have been in the wars, and know best the charge of a war.

Sir Tho. German saith, we are now to consider of a present Supply, to keep count Mansfield's forces and our's in the Palatinate together, and not to consider of the maintenance of a long war.

Mr. Secretary saith, that the present Supply is to be given to our countrymen under sir Hor. Vere and to count Mansfield's army: and that which is now to be considered of is a present Supply to keep the forces in the Palatinate together, and not for a Supply of a long war.

Sir R. Phillips saith, that the present Supply to be given is but to maintain the army there for 2 or 3 months, whilst the king doth labour by mediation and treaty to get the Palatinate. He would have us give what we think fit to be given, in a parliamentary course; and he thinketh, one Subsidy will be enough for the present Supply, and therefore would have us now give so much, as shall make up that part of the Subsidy which is yet unpaid one whole Subsidy.

Sir E. Warder saith, that it appeareth by the books in his office, that the last subsidy was but threescore and eleven thousand pounds; and a 15th is usually 29,000*l.*: that the nobility's Subsidy was included in the threescore and eleven thousand pounds; but the Subsidy of the Clergy is a distinct thing, and did not this year amount to above 20,000*l.*

Sir Wm. Stroude would have but one Subsidy given; and he would have the papists to pay duly what by the law they have forfeited to his maj. and that they should also be taxed to give more than what their shares come to. He would have this subsidy levied only of the principal gentleman of the country and that the poorer sort should not be taxed at all.

Mr. Tho. Crewe would know, against whom we should give, that we might proportion our gift secundum majus & minus. He would have us take heed we give not a third Subsidy, to be paid within one year; for there is no precedent of it: but yet he would have a present Supply given, so as we might have some bills. He liketh that we should give a subsidy now, but would not have it to be paid within the compass of that year wherein we have already given two subsidies to be paid already; but the supply might be otherwise taken up, and what we shall here give may be an assurance for those who lay it out.

Sir Edw. Coke would have all convicted papists to pay double subsidies; for they are more strangers to our faith and the good of the commonwealth, than strangers who, by our law, pay double subsidies: and he thinketh, that this addition, if it be truly levied, will make the subsidy 100,000*l.*

Sir Henry Poole would have papists pay double subsidies; and he thinketh one subsidy to be enough for this time; and hopeth, that it, being given with alacrity, will give good content to the king, and supply well enough the present occasion and necessity.

Sir Geo. Moore saith, if we give not speedily, we diminish our affections to the good of the Palatinate; but he would have a committee of such of this house, as are skilled in warlike affairs, to set down a proportion what we should give.

Mr. Alford saith, that it belongeth only to the king to make war, and to us only to aid him in it, and not to us to make a war. He liketh that one subsidy be given, but would have expressed, in the preamble, the necessity and weighty occasions of our giving this third subsidy, it coming within the compass of one year, that it may not be drawn into a precedent for the like hereafter.

Sir Tho. Hobby would have the papists pay double subsidies, and would have power given to the justices of peace, as well as to the assessors, to assess the recusants, and that they should pay at their mansion house, wheresoever they dwell; for otherwise they will shift away, and have no certain place of abode. For the recusants now-a-days pay nothing at all to taxes or subsidies, nor are at the charge to find any armour or horse, as other subjects do; excusing themselves that their lands are all in the king's hands by the statute whereby two parts of three of their land is given to the king.

Sir John Strangeways saith, that he liketh that one Subsidy be given, and recusants to pay double; for they live here at a low rate of that other men do; for they never undergo the payment of any church taxes to the poor or others, nor the charge of being justices of peace, nor are ever made sheriffs, and are also free from divers other charges and taxes. And he would that all recusants, either convicted or known recusants, who take the profits of their lands, should also pay double subsidies.

Sir Nath. Rich saith, that the king hath not desired any thing this parl. of the house, wherein the house hath not shewed their affections, and, by the manner of giving or granting it, have exceeded the matter of the gift; and he would not have one negative heard in any thing we grant to this king, and therefore desireth the question may be put only for one subsidy.—It is, by question, agreed on by this committee, that one Subsidy shall be given for a present Supply of the Palatinate, and that papists convicted should pay double subsidies, and that this subsidy should be paid in February next.

Sir Geo. Chaworth moveth, that the house will now take mr. Towerson at his word, and in lieu of the 20 or 30 subsidies, which he said the merchant adventurers would give, that that company should lay out this promised subsidy presently, and that the country should pay it in order.

Mr. Secretary says, necessitas est extrema: there is a great necessity of a present Supply: that the king hath already disbursed 40,000*l.* lately, for the Palatinate, and before that so much as doth amount to the arrearages of the subsidy to come, and he is to pay it shortly; and, if this subsidy come not sooner than August, as is proposed, the king will not be able to take up any more.

Sir Hen. Poole would have the Subsidy paid in Feb. next.

Sir Tho. Wentworth would not have us capitulate with the king, not to give the subsidy on condition to have a sessions before Christmas; but would have us petition the king for a sessions, without hope whereof he would not have given this Subsidy.

On the Speaker's going into the Chair,

Sir Edw. Coke reported, "that the committee had resolved that two Petitions shall be drawn: the 1st for the Advancement of Religion; the 2nd for a Sessions before Christmas: that it had also resolved, to give one entire Subsidy, to be paid in Feb. next, for the Supply of the Palatinate; and that all papists convicted shall pay (as strangers) double subsidies, and also all who are known recusants, and that they shall be assessed by the commissioners for the subsidy, in the place of their mansion house, or where they have lands; and, if they have no mansion house, then where they abide, and for all those lands or leases, whereof they, or any for them take profits."

Dec. 1. Sir Hen. Poole rose and said.—Mr. Speaker: If we shall suffer the council table to call in question such as sit here for parliamentary business, then farewell England; that which mr. Secretary hath heretofore said in excuse of this matter, that sir Edwyn Sandys was not called in question for any thing he did or said in parl. satisfieth not me for these reasons: 1. Because that which was said or done was so done or said in private, whereas sir E. Sandys's commitment is voiced throughout all England. 2. Because mr. Secretary is a party, and therefore no fit person in this case. Therefore I desire that some members of this house may be sent to sir E. Sandys, to question him of the cause of his commitment.

Mr. Spencer. That sir E. Sandys be sent to, to send us word, whether he were committed for parliamentary matters in the house or not: for we are not only confined within these walls with our privileges, but in Westminster-hall.

Mr. Mallory. We are intrusted for our country. If we lose our privileges, we betray it. If we give way to this, we lose our privileges; and losing them, we deserve to be hanged. Let us not look upon ourselves only, but upon our posterities also. Those honourable persons that sit about the chair, know not whether their posterity shall be privy counsellors, or no. Neither are they sure that children shall not be so served. I have heard it delivered in former parliaments, That no member of this house, during the sessions, should be questioned, except it were for felony, murder, or treason. Therefore I desire, that sir E. S. may be sent for; and if he cannot come, that he be required to set under his hand, as he is a gentleman, for what he was questioned.

Mr. Spencer said, our privileges are broken, which are and ought to be dearer to us than our lives. Sir E. Sandys, a worthy member of this house hath been committed since the adjournment. The speech of that honourable person (mr. Secretary Calvert) that spake touching this matter, gave me no satisfaction. For he said, it was not for any thing done or spoken in the house; yet it may be for speaking of parliament business out of the house. I would gladly know, whether we are not as free to speak in Westminster-hall, as here: and whether we are a parl. in the forenoon, and not in the afternoon. Then farewell privileges, and farewell England!

Mr. Chancellor of the Dutchy saith, it is an easier matter to raise an inflammation, by the specious title of Privileges, than to allay it again: that the apprehensions of the king, concerning the commitment of sir E. Sandys were great; and king's hearts are inscrutable: that, since sir E. S. was innocent of what he was examined for, he desireth, we will not any farther stir in the cause of his commitment; it having been only for some apprehensions in his majesty.

Sir Hen. Witherington. I have heard this business hath been questioned 3 times before my coming up. Better never questioned, than receive no satisfaction. They told me in the country, you are as like to speak as any man: take heed, you see what is become of sir E. S. You are brave fellows whilst you are together; but what becomes of you when you are parted? My council is, to send for sir E. S.; and if he be sick, that he be required to make his declaration of the cause of his imprisonment.

Sir Samuel Sandes. If silence in time of necessity did not equally incur blame with too much loquacity, I should have kept silence at this time: but sithence this time and this cause doth seem to call me up in particular, I crave your patience to speak what I know in this business. Something hath been spoken by way of prevention of the king's justice. There is no man goes about to lay any imputation upon his maj.'s justice: but we know, princes judge not always by their eyes, but by their ears. In the 1st place, they have care of their own safety; and it beseems their wisdoms, upon jealousies, to enter into examination of such as they suspect. And in the 2nd place, though I am very near unto him, yet I know not for what my brother was examined, I know not one question that was asked him. We have liberty and privilege, but not to deny kings to be jealous of themselves, and upon such jealousies to examine such as they suspect. The state thought fit to examine him; and then it was fit he should be restrained, before he was examined, that so he might speak his own thoughts. He wrote unto me this week, that he was sick, and could not do that service to this house which he desired. My humble motion is, that the business may rest till he be able to come up, and then he may utter his own thoughts. And that in the mean time, you would not suspect or be jealous of those proceedings which are just.

Sir George Moore. That entry might be made in the book, that after we are once elected, we should maintain our privileges.

Sir Tho. Bellasis. That if he be not able to come, to signify if he were committed for parliamentary matters or no, or examined.

But the house would not be satisfied. It was ordered notwithstanding, that sir Peter Hayman and mr. Mallory should go to sir E. Sandys on Monday, to bring him to the house if he were able, if not to require him to send a declaration in writing, Whether he were examined or committed for any parliament business or no?

Dec. 3. Sir Edward Coke reported, that the committee of this house had met, and agreed on a Petition to be delivered to the King for the matter of Religion and for a Sessions; and repeated the effect of the petition before written.

Sir Edw. Sackville would not have the point of this Petition, concerning the Marriage of our prince with no catholick princess, &c. mentioned in the said petition; for it is the privilege of princes to marry where they list: and, since we are so careful of our own privileges, he would not have us seek to limit our prince. He would not have this house do as Phaeton did, take in hand the rule of a chariot which appertains not to us; lest it cause as great a confusion here, as the other is said an inflammation of the whole world.

Sir James Perrott saith, that there are 3 things which make us to mention that part of the Petition, concerning the prince's marrying with one of our own religion. 1. Former precedents: 2. Imminent peril: 3. His maj.'s promise. The precedents are many: the peril and inconveniences we see daily in private families, where man and wife are of contrary religions. He allegeth a lamentable falling out of one mr. Acton and his wife, after they had lived 6 years together, they being of different religions: that his maj. promised us, he would not match his son but for the glory of God, his church and the realm.

Sir Rich. Weston, chanc. of the excheq. desireth to know, whether ever from this house there began treaties of war, marriage and religion, that did succeed well, or were pleasing to the kings. He desireth therefore, that we may, in these things, be strengthened with good precedents; lest we, instead of a remedy, provoke his maj.'s displeasure, by dealing with things of so high a nature, without some warrant first received from his majesty.

Mr. Wentworth saith, that, for the question, whether the thing that we meddle with be not altum sapere; he saith, that in this business we meddle not, but with what is for the glory of God, and the king's honour; and God himself doth allow us to petition to him for any thing that may be for his glory and church. He would have the Petition qualified: he would not have us press the king to let us know, what he intended to do concerning these things. We mention them in our Petition, but only to express therein the causes of our fears, and the remedies; leaving it to his princely consideration, without desiring to know his purpose therein.

Sir Geo. Moore saith, it belongeth to us as parliament men to put the king in mind, what are the causes, as we conceive, that do or may increase the danger of our religion; and, amongst other things, to say, that the hope of the Match causeth the insolencies of the papists, to the danger and hazard of our religion: and so likewise for war, but to tell our opinions, and leave all to the king's wisdom and consideration.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that this our course being strengthened with reason and confirmed with his maj.'s invitation, he thinketh, that we need not to doubt of his maj.'s gracious acceptance. He saith, that the king invited us, by a speech at Whitehall, to speak freely of the Grievances of the kingdom: that there was never a question of a prince of England to marry with one of a contrary religion; and therefore he doubteth not, but we may create a precedent of it, if we have not any: that the Match with Spain, with Philip, and Mary, was debated in parl. and she said, she would desist in it, if the Match were not found convenient in parl.; and, if she had not blemished her reign with stains in other things, there had remained a better memory of her than now there doth. He would have the Petition go on, without desiring an Answer from his maj. but leave it wholly to his princely consideration.

Sir Hen. Fane desireth, that we should seek for precedents, whether that the marriages of princes have used to be treated of here, before it be sent hither by the king, lest we grasp more than we can hold fast.

Mr. Heneage Finch, recorder of London, saith, he knoweth nothing in the Petition, but that we may petition of to the king; though, he confesseth, it containeth the greatest matters, that ever came within these walls. But we proceed humbly by Petition, on the consideration of the king's speeches, that he will never marry the prince but so as shall be for the advancement of this church and realm: that, if the king should break off the match, on the petition of this whole kingdom, it will satisfy all the world of a good reason so to do. And, since we have proceeded in this Petition so far, he thinketh it were a deserting of our religion, as if we were careless, having taken it in hand, whether the prince did marry with one of our religion or no: that he thinketh, there is nothing in the petition, but what may, with humbleness, very well be presented to his majesty.

Mr. Brooke saith, that we prescribe, by our Petition, nothing to the king; but, for such and such reasons, humbly desire, that he will be pleased to think of some match for the prince, with one of our religion. To make war or peace belongeth only to the prerogative of the king; but we are invited to it by the speech we had delivered us by the command of the king, whereby we were told, that there was no hope of peace. On which proposition and invitation, we humbly beseech, by Petition, the king to consider of the best course for a war: and therefore, since these things originally proceed, not from us, but the king, he would have us proceed in it.

Mr. Tho. Crewe saith, it is a wonder to see the spiritual madness of such, as will fall in love with the Romish harlot, now she is grown so old a hag. There is a statute H. 8. that, if a priest did lie with his own wife, it was felony; but, if he committed adultery with another, it was not held as any great offence. It is an inherent prerogative of the king to make peace, war, call parliaments, &c. and to match his son, as well as any private father; but therein the subject hath an interest. It is one thing to assume authority or interest, and another humbly to shew, by Petition, what may be prejudicial to the king and state: that in the time of Rich. 3. an ill king, there were made the best laws for the good of the subject: that, in Elizabeth's time, the treaty of her marriage was here in this house, and the Petition of this house to her concerning it was by her lovingly accepted; because it did beseech her to marry without limitation; and so do we petition to the king for the prince, without limiting either time or person. There is a speech to parl. in print (see p. 703), wherein that queen doth express to the parl. her intent to marry in a convenient time. And we conclude nothing in our Petition, but leave all to the king's pleasure.

Sir Edw. Coke saith, 'melius est recurrere, quam male currere.' It is true, that the father, even amongst private men, should have power to marry his children. The indisputable prerogatives of the king are, to make peace, war, and marriages for his children: but this is a Petition of remembrance or grace, without desiring an Answer: that we have heard from the lords, that peace is denied the king, and that the voice of Bellona, not the turtle, must be heard; and that the king must either abandon his children or engage himself in a war, and that on a standing war. And this is a ground (coming from the king) to invite us to as much as is contained in the Petition, for the marriage of the prince, that we, by this Petition do endeavour to second our former Petition against recusants, and set down in this Petition, that the hope of this match doth make the papists insolent, and do humbly, by petition, without expectation of an answer, by way of remedy, beseech his maj. for the cutting off of their hopes, to marry the prince to one of his own religion, and this without any farther limitation: and this may serve as an answer, when his maj. shall be again solicited for the match. That Edw. 3. did confer with the Commons, for his marriage; but this conference moved from the king himself: that 42 Edw. 3. the king having a war with a foreign prince, and growing weary with bearing his armour, did treat for a peace, and he acquainted the Commons with the treaty: and the Commons, by petition, did beseech him, that he would take his sword in his hand; for a just war was better than a dishonourable peace. He sheweth a record of 4 Hen. 5. entitled, 'The safety of the Lords and the Commons,' where it is set down, That it shall hold for ever, that it shall be lawful for the Commons themselves to talk of the safety of the kingdom, and the grievances and remedies thereof: that the writ of summons sheweth, that we are called hither for the defence and state of the king and kingdom, and the religion. He thinketh the Petition to be good, and liketh it, in omnibus.

Mr. Noye saith, that, by the debate of this business, he is grown to some resolution, and yet he hath some doubt. He saith, that the growth and insolency of the papists doth lie within our cognisances, and we may treat of it. He liketh the form and manner of the Petition. His doubt is, and he desireth to be resolved, whether, if we petition for war against the king of Spain, we do not break the league with the Spaniard. He doth not conceive, that it is more lawful for us, by the law of nations, to invade any of the Spaniard's territories, because he hath aided the emperor; than for the Spaniard, during our truce or league, to invade any of our territories, because our king hath aided the Palatinate against the emperor. And he desireth herein first to be cleared of this doubt.

Mr. Solicitor saith, he will not enter into dispute of so high a point, as the doubt propounded by Mr. Noye: only thus much he saith to it, that we do, in the Petition, but deliver our opinion, and refer all to the king's judgment. He wisheth, that this doubt, being of so high a nature, may receive no debate here; but that we should give up our Petition as it is, referring all such like considerations to the king's wisdom. And he saith, if we are commanded by God to petition to him for such things as we desire, he thinketh, we may boldly petition to the king, his lieutenant. He would have to be inserted into the Petition expressly in words (to avoid all misinterpretations) that we do not seek to prejudice or blemish, in the least point, his maj.'s royal prerogative.

The Speaker saith, that this is not a Petition as concerning the matter of religion and the recusants, but only a mere remonstrance, and that it is a Petition for the sessions only.

Sir Tho. Wentworth would have the Petition go by itself, and the Remonstrance by itself.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that, as it now is, the Remonstrance and the Petition are something involved one in the other; and therefore he would have a committee to take it presently into the committee chamber, to make them more distinct; and would have, at the end of it, two or three words added, that we seek not to touch, in the least point, on the royal prerogative.

Mr. Glanville would not have added, to the end of the Petition, any clause, that we do not, by this Petition, seek to prejudice the royal prerogative; lest we thereby lose something of our own privileges, to treat in this manner of businesses of this nature.

Sir Dud. Digges desireth, that mr. Glanville's motion, for the privileges of this house, may not hinder the course and inclination of this house, to insert, in the end of the Petition, this clause, "That we seek not to make, hereby, any breach of the Privileges of the royal prerogative."

Petition and Remonstrance of the Commons against Popery—the Spanish Match, &c.] A Committee accordingly retired into the committee chamber, to insert those words, to avoid all scruples and misinterpretations; which being done, it was ordered, that the Remonstrance and Petition aforesaid, with this Addition, and the Petition annexed, shall be thus presented to the king:

"To the King's most Excellent Majesty,

"Most gracious and dread Sovereign; We, your maj.'s most humble and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, now assembled in parliament who represent the Commons of your realm, full of hearty sorrow to be deprived of the comfort of your royal presence, and the rather, for that it proceeds from the want of your health, wherein we all unfeignedly do suffer; in all humble manner calling to mind your gracious Answer to our former Petition concerning Religion, which (notwithstanding your maj.'s pious and princely intentions) hath not produced that good effect, which the danger of these times do seem to us to require; and finding, how ill your maj.'s goodness hath been requited by princes of different religion, who (even in time of treaty) have taken opportunities to advance their own ends, tending to the subversion of religion, and disadvantage of your affairs, and the estate of your children; by reason whereof your ill-affected subjects at home, the Popish Recusants, have taken too much encouragement, and are dangerously increased in their number and in their insolencies. We cannot choose but be sensible thereof, and therefore humbly represent what we conceive to be the Causes of so great and growing Mischiefs, and what may be the Remedies.

CAUSES.

"1. The vigilancy and ambition of the Pope of Rome and his dearest son; the one aiming at as large a temporal monarchy, as the other at a spiritual supremacy. 2. The devilish positions and doctrines whereon popery is built and taught with authority to their followers, for the advancement of their temporal ends. 3. The distressed and miserable estate of the professors of our religion in foreign parts. 4. The disastrous accidents to your maj.'s children abroad, expressed with rejoicing, and even with contempt of their persons. 5. The strange Confederacy of the princes of the Popish Religion, aiming mainly at the advancement of theirs, and subverting of ours, and taking the advantages conducing to that end upon all occasions. 6. The great and many armies raised and maintained at the charge of the king of Spain, the chief of that league. 7. The expectation of the Popish Recusants of the Match with Spain, and feeding themselves with great hopes of the consequences thereof. 8. The interposing of foreign princes and their agents, in the behalf of Popish Recusants, for connivance and favour unto them. 9. Their open and usual resort to the houses, and, which is worse, to the chapels of foreign ambassadors. 10. Their more than usual concourse to the city, and their frequent conventicles and conferences there. 11. The education of their children in many several seminaries and houses of their religion, in foreign parts, appropriated to the English fugitives. 12. The Grants of their just Forfeitures intended by your maj. as a reward of service to the grantees; but, beyond your maj.'s intention, transferred or compounded for, at such mean rates, as will amount to little less than a toleration. 13. The licentious printing and dispersing of Popish and seditious books, even in the time of parl. 14. The swarms of Priests and Jesuits, the common incendiaries of all Christendom, dispersed in all parts of your kingdom.

THE EFFECTS.

"And from these Causes, as bitter roots, we humbly offer to your maj. that we foresee and fear there will necessarily follow very dangerous Effects both to church and state. For, 1. The Popish Religion is incompatible with ours, in respect of their positions. 2. It draweth with it an unavoidable dependency on foreign princes. 3. It openeth too wide a gap for popularity, to any who shall draw too great a party. 4. It hath a restless spirit, and will strive by these gradations; if it once get but a connivance, it will press for a toleration; if that should be obtained, they must have an equality; from thence they will aspire to superiority, and will never rest till they get a subversion of the true religion."

THE REMEDIES.

"The Remedies against these growing evils, which, in all humility, we offer unto your most excellent maj. are these: 1. That seeing this inevitable necessity is fallen upon your maj. which no wisdom or providence of a peaceable and pious king can avoid; your maj. would not omit this just occasion, speedily and effectually to take your sword in your hand. 2. That once undertaken upon so honourable and just grounds, your maj. would resolve to pursue, and more publickly avow, the aiding of those of our religion in foreign parts; which doubtless would re-unite the Princes and States of the Union, by these disasters disheartened and disbanded. 3. That your maj. would propose to yourself to manage this war with the best advantage, by a diversion or otherwise, as in your deep judgment shall be found fittest; and not to rest upon a war in these parts only, which will consume your treasure, and discourage your people. 4. That the bent of this war, and point of your sword, may be against that prince, (whatsoever opinion of potency he hath) whose armies and treasures have first diverted, and since maintained the war in the Palatinate. 5. That for securing of our peace at home, your maj. would be pleased to review the parts of our petition, formerly delivered unto your maj. and hereunto annexed; and to put in execution, by the care of choice commissioners to be thereunto especially appointed, the laws already and hereafter to be made for preventing of dangers by Popish Recusants, and their wonted evasions. 6. That to frustrate their hopes for a future age, our most noble prince may be timely and happily married to one of our own religion. 7. That the children of the nobility and gentry of this kingdom, and of others ill-affected and suspected in their religion, now beyond the seas, may be forthwith called home by your means, and at the charge of their parents or governors. 8. That the children of Popish Recusants, or such whose wives are Popish Recusants, be brought up, during their minority, with protestant school-masters and teachers, who may sow, in their tender years, the seeds of true religion. 9. That your maj. will be pleased speedily to revoke all former licences for such children and youth to travel beyond the seas, and not grant any such licence hereafter. 10. That your maj.'s learned council may receive commandment from your highness, carefully to look into former Grants of Recusants Lands, and to avoid them, if by law they can; and that your maj. will stay your hand from passing any such Grants hereafter.—This is the sum and effect of our humble Declaration, which we (no ways intending to press upon your maj.'s undoubted and regal prerogative) do with the fulness of our duty and obedience, humbly submit to your most princely consideration the glory of God, whose cause it is; the zeal of our true Religion, in which we have been born, and wherein, by God's grace, we are resolved to die; the safety of your Majesty's Royal Person, who is the very life of your people; the happiness of your children and posterity; the honour and good of the Church and State, dearer unto us than our own lives, having kindled these affections truly devoted to your maj. And seeing out of duty to your maj. we have already resolved to give, at the end of this session, one entire subsidy, for the present relief of the Palatinate only, to be paid in the end of Feb. next, which cannot well be effected but by passing a bill in a parliamentary course before Christmas; we most humbly beseech your maj. (as our assured hope is) that you will then also vouchsafe to give life, by your royal assent to such bills, as before that time shall be prepared for your maj.'s honour, and the good of your people: And that such bills may be also accompanied (as hath been accustomed) with your maj.'s gracious Pardon which (proceeding from your own meer grace) may, by your highness's direction, be drawn to that latitude and extent, as may best sort with your maj.'s bounty and goodness. And that not only felons and criminal offenders may take benefit thereof, but that your good subjects may receive ease thereby. And if it shall so stand with your good pleasure, That it may extend to the relief of the old Debts and Duties to the Crown before the first year of your maj.'s reign; to the discharge of Alienations without Licence, and misusing of Liveries and Oustre le Maine, before the first summons of this parl.; and of concealed Wardships, and not suing of Liveries, and Oustre le Maine, before the 12th year of your maj.'s reign. Which gracious favour would much comfort your good subjects, and ease them from vexation, with little loss or prejudice to your own profit.—And we, by our daily and devout prayers to the Almighty, the great King of Kings, shall contend for a blessing upon our endeavours, and for your maj.'s long and happy reign over us, and for your children's children after you, for many and many generations."

We are told that when this Remonstrance was perfected by the Commons the king had a copy of it before the house had time to send their messengers with it. In which some things so highly displeased him, that, as will be seen by the Proceedings of the Commons, he instantly dispatched a Letter to the Speaker to forbid the sending of it.

The King's Letter to the Speaker.] Dec. 4. Mr. Secretary Calvert delivered to Mr. Speaker a Letter, even now received from his maj. directed to Mr. Speaker; which Mr. Speaker desired liberty first to read privately to himself: and was yielded unto. And then he read it, publickly, as follows:

"To our trusty and well-beloved sir Thos. Richardson, knt. Speaker of our Commons' House of Parliament.

"Mr. Speaker; We have heard, by divers reports, to our great grief, that the far distance of our person, at this time, from our high court of parl. caused by our want of health, hath emboldened some fiery and popular spirits in our house of commons, to debate and argue publickly on matters far beyond their reach or capacity; and so tending to our high dishonour, and to the trenching upon our prerogative royal. You shall therefore acquaint that house with our pleasure, that none therein shall presume to meddle with any thing concerning our government or mysteries of state, namely, not to speak of our dearest son's match with the daughter of Spain, nor to touch the honour of that king, or any other our friends or confederates: and also not to meddle with any men's particulars, which have their due motion in any of our ordinary courts of justice. And, whereas we hear, that they have sent a message to sir Edwin Sandys, to know the reason of his late restraint, you shall in our name resolve them, that it was not for any misdemeanour of his in parl. But, to put them out of doubt of any question of that nature, that may arise among them hereafter, you shall resolve them, in our name, that we think ourself very free and able to punish any man's misdemeanours in parl. as well during their sitting, as after; which we mean not to spare hereafter, upon any occasion of any man's insolent behaviour there, that shall be ministred unto us. And, if they have already touched any of these points, which we have forbidden, in any petition of their's, which is to be sent unto us, it is our pleasure, that you shall tell them, that, except they reform it, before it comes to our hands, we will not deign the hearing or answering of it. And, whereas we hear that they are desirous, that we should make this a session of parl. before Christmas, you may tell them, it shall be in their default, if they want it: for, if they will make ready between this and that time some such laws as shall be really good for the commonwealth, we will very willingly give our royal assent unto them. And so it shall thereby appear, that, if good laws be not made, at this time, for the weal of the people, the blame shall only, and most justly, lie upon such turbulent spirits, as shall prefer their particular ends to the weal of this kingdom and commonwealth. And so we bid you farewell. Given at our court at Newmarket, the 3d day of December, 1621.—The Letter being read,

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that this house hath had propositions and debate of great matters, but none of so great consequence as this, occasioned by this his maj.'s Letter. He wisheth the king knew our hearts; for the duty of all, or the best part of his maj.'s subjects, is now in question. He moveth, that we should send to stay the messengers appointed to go with the Petition to the king; and that now we would rise, and consider, till to-morrow, what to do in this great business, so nearly concerning us and our privileges.

It was accordingly ordered, "That two Messengers be sent by post, to recall those that have been sent."

Mr. Solicitor Glanville saith, he doubteth not, but, if we proceed by Petition, in an humble manner, to the king, that his maj. will hear us graciously: that he believeth, it is the labour of our adversaries to make a breach and misunderstanding between the king and us; and therefore prayeth, that, for God's cause, and as we tender our duties to the king and commonwealth, we will not rise presently on a discontent, which will but rejoice our adversaries.

Mr. Alford saith, that he hath ever respected the king as the head, and the commonwealth as the body: that in Elizabeth's time, in the matter of the Union, the parl. did rise and consider of it, before any man would debate thereof, it being a matter of a high nature and consequence. And so he would have us do in this business; rise now, and consider of it till to-morrow, that we may be the better able then to speak and debate of it. He desireth also, that the king's Letter may be here now read again; and that every one that will may have a copy of it, the better to consider till to-morrow what to say to it.

Sir Wm. Stroude saith, he thinketh that our thoughts being now disturbed by this message from his maj. we are not fit or able to debate of any thing, till we have considered of it and digested it; and therefore would have us now rise, and not so suddenly debate of this business, it being of the greatest consequence for our privileges, that ever came hither.

Sir Dud. Digges would have us go forward with that constancy, which hitherto we have always proceeded withal, in that great business of the Petition. He would that we should now rise but not as in discontent, but rather resort to our prayers, and then to consider of this great business.

Dec. 5. Mr. Delbridge rose up and said, that the trade in the West Country was much decayed heretofore by the great number of Impositions; and now, of late, they are almost all undone by pirates. But now he would have us lay aside all respects of trade, considering the miserable State of Religion, the lamentable estate of the king's children, whom every man loveth for the stock's sake, from whence they come. As for the privileges of this house, touching the Petition we prepared for the king, he had as willingly hang under the gallows, as fry over a faggot. And therefore, the State of our Religion standing as it doth, he would have us go to the king again and again with our Petition, as we do to God, and no doubt but his maj. will hear us at length.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that now is the time to justify the affection of the people to the king, and to defend the privileges of this house, which our ancestors have delivered us, and which we ought to preserve for our posterity: that his ground and anchor-hold is, the king's word for our liberty of speech, delivered here in writing by mr. Secretary: that his life and fortunes shall ever be at the king's feet and command; but, since we have broken our privileges in yielding our obedience to his maj.'s pleasure, in many businesses here handled, because his maj. interposed (as in that of Ireland) and only out of a tender respect not to distaste his maj. he saith, he knoweth not what hath caused this soul-killing letter from the king: he calleth it so in respect of the earnest desire of our souls in that Petition. He saith that the ground of our Petition was from the Lords' speeches to us saying, that the gates of Janus (having been long shut) must now be opened, and war must be. Hereupon we presently took into our consideration the causes, the dangers, and the remedies of our present estate; and, if we have touched on any prince, further than the king would have us, he thinketh, the fulness of our humility and loyalty should cover abundance of faults. He would, first, have us now endeavour to stand upright in his maj.'s favour and grace: 2ndly, justify, with humility, our proceedings here: 3rdly, defend the privileges, which were never so much struck at as now. And he desireth, that there may be a committee appointed to consider, what, on the like message from former kings, the house hath done: and to consider, what we may do to set us right in the king's favour, and to proceed without breach of our privileges and liberties, without which defence we are unworthy of our lives, and to look those in the face who sent us hither.

Sir Tho. Wentworth would have the Speaker go out of the chair, that we might debate this business at a committee.

Sir Francis Seymour saith, if we do now, out of fear, forego our privileges, we are unworthy of our liberties: that we could not expect better, when as, by the malice of the members of our own house, the king is misinformed; for we have been here threatened, by our own members, to be complained of, for speaking of our consciences freely. He liketh that we should sit as a committee of the whole house, for the debate of this business; but, because we may know who it is amongst us, that hath misinformed the king, he would, that every member of this House should make here a protestation, that he is clear from using any underhand dealing between this house and the king: that we should petition the king, either to hear our Petition, or else to give us leave to go home, or sit here and say nothing.

Sir G. Moore saith, that we now stand between the indignation of our king, and the privileges of our house, which are the spirit of the blood of the liberties of the commonweal. Whereas the king is misinformed, that we have meddled with things above our reach and capacity, we have not done otherwise than the Samaritane woman, who, out of her faith, did but touch the hem of Christ's garment; for which Christ did not blame her, but said, that her faith had saved her. And he hopeth, when the king shall be rightly informed, he will, seeing our humility, love, and care of his honour, encourage us to proceed. He would have us make another Petition to be annexed to that which we had prepared, and present them both to his maj.; and, for the preparing of this, that we should appoint a committee.

Mr. Hackwill saith, if good kingdoms were mortal, as are good kings, it might be thought a vanity to stand so curiously in the defence of our privileges. He hath known three the like storms in this house: the first in 5 Eliz. when this house did press her to know her successor, which she would by no means declare or have spoken of; yet, on a Petition from this house, her maj. did give us leave to treat of it: 2. that in the same parl. there was a Petition prepared as now, to beseech her to marry; and, though she was much offended at it, yet, by our temperance in that petition, and on a 2nd petition, she did give us leave to treat and debate of her marriage here: 3. that the king heretofore, though at first he sent a sharp message to this house, when it did begin to debate of Impositions, yet, on better information, he did give us leave to debate thereof. He would have us send a preparative Petition to the king, shewing, that we did not intend, by the former petition, which we had prepared, to touch on his royal prerogative; and that, when we have thus made our way to his maj. we may deliver our former petition, together with such a one as we shall make to prepare his maj. to receive it.

Mr. Alford saith, that we are now by the king's letter restrained of our liberty of speech. He would have us now, in this extremity, to proceed as we have done in former parliaments in the like cases; and to that end view, at a committee, all our proceedings in the business of our petition; and endeavour thereby to satisfy his maj. that we have done nothing tending to the breach of his prerogative, as his maj. hath been informed.—It was then ordered, that the Speaker shall go out of the chair, that the house may debate as at a committee.

Sir Edw. Coke saith, that the papists have no cause to rejoice at this our great grief; for in the king's letter there is no mention of any thing for them, or in their behalf. He thinketh, that we have done nothing but in the duty of the most dutiful subjects. He marvelleth, that any amongst us should dislike our proceedings in the Petition, since, when it passed in this house, there was not one negative. He wisheth, that those who disliked would have said No: that we had not treated of war but by intimation from the lords: that we are prohibited by the king's letter, to treat of any thing concerning the government of the state, or of any thing that hath its motion in any court of justice: that the king was once before incensed against this house upon a misinformation; but being told (though not from us) how he was misinformed, he did, of his own gracious goodness, send to this house to proceed in that business: but hereupon the house did, notwithstanding, proceed to justify their actions, and to claim their privileges. He would have us now seek out precedents and proceed accordingly.

Mr. Pymme saith, that the words of 'fiery, popular, and turbulent,' are laid by his maj. on the whole house; for, since we have not punished or questioned any such, but (as the letter saith) been led by their propositions, it is the act of the whole house. He desireth, a Petition may be from us to the king, to know, who his maj. hath been informed, those fiery turbulent spirits are; that we may justify ourselves, and clear the house of the taint of those words.

Sir Dud. Digges moveth, that, since we have gone farther, in the business of War and the Prince's Match, than hath been revealed unto us, that we may now go to the king, and shew so much by a Petition to his majesty.

Mr. Tho. Crewe would have every one of us to examine our hearts, and to consider, whether there be any thing in our Petition that is not fit to be presented to the king; and, if we find, that we have not touched therein on the prerogative, or on any thing unfit for us to present to the king, that then we would present the same (having first prepared way by another humble Petition) to the king. But, if any one find, that there is any thing in the Petition that doth dishonour the king of Spain, or toucheth affirmatively or negatively on any particular, he wisheth he would deliver his opinion to the house, and not conceal his dislike of the same: that, for himself, he hath said nothing, neither findeth any thing in that Petition, wherein he hath intended or aimed at any other end, than the safety of our religion, the king and kingdom: that the king said, he would not be ruled by will, where he could not be convinced by reason, in any thing concerning the treaty. He saith, that in 21 Ed. III. that great king, on the petition of the parl. (see p. 113,) did hear their petition, and ease them of a great Imposition, laid in a time of necessity on the subject. He desireth to be advised, whether our Petition be not, for manner and matter, such as we may present to his maj.; and, if it be, he would then have us be constant to ourselves, dutiful to the king, and careful of our liberties and privileges: and by another petition to go to prepare the king for the hearing of the former petition.

Mr. Wentworth would have us labour to satisfy the king; and therein, first, to set down, that we were induced to treat of the business of War by that which we heard from the Lords, and in this to think against whom the war should be, and how to cut off the sinews of the war against us; which we thought could not be, if we were allied by marriage to him, who maintaineth the war against us: secondly, by what reason of necessity we were led to treat of and petition in those businesses: thirdly, to seek forth some precedents, to see whether we have gone beyond our reach or no.

Mr. Sec. Calvert saith, that he believeth, that no man will now speak against any part of our Petition, it being the act and work of all of us. He thinketh, we are now to give satisfaction to the king, which is the thing now in question, and whether to proceed therein by excuse or justification. He thinketh justification is not the way, and would have us go to the king by way of excuse, and to shew the grounds of our proceedings, and how that we were therein deceived: for the king doth dislike the body of our Petition, and therefore to offer it again will but incense his maj. the more.

Sir Tho. Wentworth would have us shew the reason and grounds of our proceedings, and that precedents may be sought forth, to strengthen the same, and this is to be done by a select committee. He would have us forbear to mention, in our Petition, that point concerning the Prince's Marriage; because the king, in his letter, saith, that, if that point be in our Petition, he will not deign to read it: that, for that point of the king's letter, wherein he saith, that he will punish such as speak in parl. if they misbehave themselves, he would have the committee to consider of some precedents, to shew our privilege in this particular, and that we should fairly and humbly by Petition shew our liberty therein: that he would not have the bills and business in the house, for the good of the kingdom, stay or be delayed till we have the king's Answer, in these particulars, to our Petition.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, it becometh the duty of us to the king to proceed with due respect and care of his honour; and also it becometh the duty and honesty of every one of this house to stand on the defence of our privileges. It is now a question, whether we shall proceed by justification or excuse: that, if we proceed by excuse, it presupposeth an error; which he saith, he shall not readily confess. He would not have us proceed so, as to wound our proceedings with too much levity and rashness. Since there was never so much distemper in the members of this house, he would not have us meddle with any thing, till we had determined this great business. He thinketh it best to proceed herein by a select committee.

Sir Francis Ashley would have us consider, 1st how to proceed, that we may set ourselves right again in the king's opinion; and, the king being misinformed of us, he would have us rightly inform his maj. by Petition: 2ndly, whether we shall justify our actions or no: he would not have us excuse or qualify what we have done, but to tell his maj. that, if any here do offend against his maj. we are so careful of his honour, as we will punish it: that the papists are so insolent, that they say, they do not only hope for a toleration, but do hope also to bring their ends to such a pass, as we shall be glad to sue for toleration: that reasons and precedents may be the ground of what we shall say to the king: 3rdly, for the defence of our Privileges, he would have us alledge our precedents and inform the king, that none hath here touched on any thing, which may tend in the least manner to the dishonour of the king, but we have presently punished them, before they have gone out of the house; and to desire, that, if any member offend here, we may according to the ancient course of parl. punish them ourselves.

Mr. Alford would have us, 1. Endeavour to stand right in the king's opinion and favour: 2. For the Maintenance of our Liberty, and Privileges of parl.: 3. He liketh well, that we should consider of the annexing of the Petition to that which we have already prepared. He would have 3 committees severally to consider of these 3 points; and that we should not proceed with any bills, lest, in the debate thereof, we go too far in speaking of our consciences freely.

Sir Geo. Moore would have us, in our Petition, leave out nothing, but shew both all our petition which we have prepared, and also the causes and grounds of our proceedings therein.

A Select Committee was then appointed by the Grand Committee, to prepare a Declaration, to be sent to the king, of the manner of the proceedings of the house, in the Petition lately intended to be sent to his maj. and also concerning the Privileges of the house, and all things incident thereto. This committee to sit in the house, and every one that came was to have a voice.—A sub-committee of 12 was appointed by this Select Committee, to reduce into writing and form the Declaration, which was appointed this morning to be considered of by the Select Committee. This Sub-Committee was to meet in the Court of Wards, and to have the king's Letter, and the prepared petition, for their better assistance.

Apologetic Petition of the Commons to the King.] Dec. 6. The following Petition and Declaration, drawn up by the Sub-Committee of Twelve,* was read, as follows:

"Most dread and gracious Sovereign;—We your most humble and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens and burgesses, assembled in the commons house of parl. full of grief and unspeakable sorrow, through the true sense of your maj.'s displeasure, expressed by your letter lately sent to our Speaker, and by him related and read unto us: yet comforted again with the assurance of your grace and goodness, and of the sincerity of our own intentions and proceedings, whereon with confidence we can rely; in all humbleness beseech your most excellent maj. that the loyalty and dutifulness of us faithful and loving subjects as ever served, or lived under a gracious sovereign, may not undeservedly suffer by the misinformation of partial and uncertain reports, which are ever unfaithful intelligencers: but that your maj. would, in the clearness of your own judgment, first vouchsafe to understand from ourselves, and not from others, what our humble Declaration and Petition (resolved upon by the universal voice of the house, and proposed, with your gracious favour, to be presented unto your sacred maj.) doth contain. Upon what occasion we entered into consideration of those things which are therein contained, with what dutiful respect to your maj. and your service, we did consider thereof, and what was our true intention thereby. And that when your maj. shall thereby truly discern our dutiful affections, you will, in your royal judgment, free us from those heavy charges, wherewith some of our members are burthened, and wherein the whole house is involved.—And we humbly

* Wilson says it was reported, That, when the king heard of this second Remonstrance, he called for twelve chairs, saying, there were twelve kings a coming.

beseech your maj. that you would not hereafter give credit to private reports, against all or any of the members of our house, whom the whole have not censured, until your maj. have been truly informed thereof from ourselves: and that in the mean time, and ever, we may stand upright in your maj.'s grace and good opinion, than which no worldly consideration is or can be dearer unto us.—When your maj. had reassembled us in parl. by your royal commandment, sooner than we expected; and did vouchsafe, by the mouths of three honourable lords, to impart unto us the weighty occasions moving your maj. thereunto; from them we did understand these particulars, viz. That notwithstanding your princely and pious endeavours to procure peace, the time is now come that Janus Temple must be opened, That the voice of Bellona must be heard, and not the voice of the turtle. That there was no hope of peace, nor any truce to be obtained, no not for a few days. That your maj. must either abandon your own children, or engage yourself in a war; wherein consideration is to be had, what foot, what horse, what money will be sufficient. That the Lower Palatinate was seized upon by the army of the king of Spain, as executor of the Ban there, in quality of duke of Burgundy, as the Upper Palatinate was by the duke of Bavaria. That the king of Spain, at his own charge, had now at least five armies on foot. That the Princes of the Union were disbanded; but the Catholick League remained firm, whereby those princes, so dissevered, were in danger, one by one, to be ruined. That the estate of those of our Religion in foreign parts was miserable; and, out of these considerations, we were called to a war; and forthwith to advise for a Supply for keeping the forces in the Palatinate from being disbanded; and to foresee the means for raising and maintaining the body of an army, for the war, against the spring. We, therefore, out of zeal to your majesty and your posterity, with more alacrity and celerity than ever was preceded in parliament, did address ourselves to the service commended unto us. And although we cannot conceive, that the honour and safety of your maj. and your posterity, the patrimony of your children invaded and possessed by their enemies, the welfare of religion, and state of your kingdom, are matters at any time unfit for our deepest consideration in time of parliament: and although, before this time, we were in some of these points silent; yet being now invited thereunto, and led on by so just an occasion, we thought it our duties to provide for the present supply thereof, and not only to turn our eyes on a war abroad, but to take care for the securing of our peace at home; which the dangerous increase and insolency of popish recusants apparently, visibly, and sensibly, did lead us unto. The consideration whereof did necessarily draw us truly to represent unto your maj. what we conceive to be the causes, and what we feared would be the effects, and what we hoped might be the remedies of these growing evils; among which, as incident and unavoidable, we fell upon some things, which seem to touch upon the king of Spain; as they have relation to popish recusants at home, to the wars by him maintained in the Palatinate against your maj.'s children, and to his several armies now on foot; yet, as we conceived, without touch of dishonour to that king, or any other prince, your maj.'s confederate.—In the discourse whereof we did not assume to ourselves any power to determine of any part thereof, nor intend to inroach or intrude upon the sacred bounds of your royal authority; to whom, and to whom only, we acknowledge it doth belong to resolve of peace and war, and of the marriage of the most noble prince your son: but as your most loyal and humble subjects and servants, representing the whole commons of your kingdom, (who have a large interest in the happy and prosperous estate of your maj. and your royal posterity, and of the flourishing estate of our church and commonwealth) did resolve, out of our cares and fears, truly and plainly to demonstrate these things to your maj. which we were not assured could otherwise come so fully and clearly to your knowledge; and that being done, to lay the same down at your maj.'s feet, without expectation of any other answer of your maj. touching these higher points, than what at your good pleasure, and in your own time, should be held fit. This being the effect of what we had formerly resolved upon, and these the occasions and reasons inducing the same, our humble suit to your maj. and confidence is, That your maj. will be graciously pleased to receive, at the hands of these our messengers, our former humble Declaration and Petition, and vouchsafe to read and favourably to interpret the same; and that so much thereof as containeth our humble Petition concerning Jesuits, Priests, and Popish Recusants, the passage of bills, and granting your royal pardon, you will vouchsafe an answer unto us.—And whereas your majesty, by the general words of your letter, seemeth to restrain us from intermeddling with matters of government, or particulars which have their motion in courts of justice; the generality of which words, in the largeness of the extent thereof, (as we hope beyond your maj.'s intention) might involve those things, which are the proper subjects of parliamentary occasions and discourse.—And whereas your maj. doth seem to abridge us of the ancient liberty of parl. for freedom of speech, jurisdiction, and just censure of the house, and other proceedings there, (wherein, we trust in God, we shall never transgress the bounds of loyal and dutiful subjects) a liberty which, we assure ourselves, so wise and so just a king will not infringe, the same being our ancient and undoubted right, and an inheritance received from our ancestors; without which we cannot freely debate, nor clearly discern of things in question before us, nor truly inform your maj. in which we have been confirmed by your maj.'s most gracious former speeches and messages. We are therefore now again enforced, in all humbleness, to pray your maj. to allow the same; and thereby to take away the doubts and scruples your maj.'s late letter to our Speaker hath wrought upon us.—So shall we, your loyal and loving subjects, ever acknowledge your maj.'s justice, grace, and goodness, and be ready to perform that service to your maj. which, in the true affection of our hearts, we profess; and pour out our daily and fervent prayers to the Almighty for your maj.'s long life, happy and religious reign, and prosperous estate, and for your royal posterity after you for ever."

It was then ordered, that this Petition and Declaration, thus amended, shall be thus engrossed and sent unto the king. And that the former Petition and Declaration, which was prepared to be sent to the King, shall not be annexed to this new Petition, but shall be presented to the king, with an humble desire, that his maj. will be pleased to read over the same. And that the former messengers, appointed to go with the former Petition or Declaration, shall go with this new petition.

Dec. 12. Mr. Secretary Calvert was commanded by his maj. to deliver this message by word of mouth, which he did; but after, by appointment of the house, set it down in writing in these words, viz. "His maj. remembering that this house was desirous to have a session between this and Christmas; whereupon it pleased him to signify unto us, that we should have contentment therein, and that there should be a session, if we ourselves were not in the fault; taking now notice, that the house forbears to proceed with any bills, 'till the return of the messengers lately sent unto his maj. hath enjoined me to command the house in his name, not to lose time in their proceedings for preparing of good laws in the mean while, in consideration of this so near approach of Christmas; and that his maj. hopes they will not take upon them to make a recess in effect, though not in shew, without his warrant."

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that he would have us consider how we have walked these 8 days, and how our purpose of silence hath been grounded: That, if we proceed, on this message, with bills, we endanger all our liberties; for then we shall never hereafter proceed but in such and such businesses, and in such manner as the king shall still command; and we are, by this message, in such a dilemma, as we must either disobey the king's command, or for ever lose our own privileges. He would have a committee appointed to consider of the king's message, and to seek forth precedents, to see how this house hath used to proceed, when we have received such messages from the king; that thereby we may proceed without breach of our privileges, or disobedience to the king's command.

Mr. Tho. Crewe saith, that it is the duty of every subject to obey the king's command; and it is the duty of every member here to maintain the privileges of this house: That if his maj. had been truly informed of our proceedings here, he would not think we sat here idle; for we have been preparing of a Petition for his maj. and of an Answer to his maj. concerning the business of Gouldsmith and Lepton, and a member of this house: That there are good bills prepared already; but we hear nothing of the Pardon, without which a sessions cannot well be effected: That our thoughts are so distracted by these many sharp messages from the king, as we are not fit to pass any bills at this time; neither, if we would or could pass more bills, could the Lords, as we conceive, dispatch any more, than are already in their hands. If we receive a comfortable and gracious Message from the king, we shall go with such encouragement forward with the bill for Repeal and Continuance of Statutes, as we shall soon dispatch the same; and then we shall soon be ready for a sessions.

Mr. Glanville saith, that, if we now go on with this Message, and proceed hereupon with bills, then next we shall have command to go on with Grievances, and then with this and that bill, and then with that Grievance; and so hereafter we shall do nothing, but what the king commands, and proceed with no business, but we shall have a command for it from the king. He would have a committee to consider hereof, as sir R. Phillips moved; and he believeth, that this Message from the king proceedeth from a misinformation.

Sir Dud. Digges would have a committee to consider of this Message, how we should proceed and what we should do thereon: That there might be a committee to consider of the bills in the house, and that we may proceed therein accordingly. So may we proceed in business, and yet preserve our privileges.

Sir Geo. Moore saith, that, if we do proceed in this business, wherein in duty we are bound to proceed, we cannot (though the king command it) infringe our liberties: but, if the king had commanded us not to proceed in any business wherein we are tied to proceed, then we had, if we had given over, weakened our privileges and liberties therein. He would have this business committed to the consideration of a committee, but would have it first thoroughly debated here in the house.

Sir Nath. Rich saith, that this is as great a business as ever came into this house, and would have us proceed in it with great deliberation, and see what, on the like messages, hath been here done. He would have us stay till to-morrow, before we debate hereof by a committee.

Sir Edw. Coke saith, that we have received 3 commands from the king: 1. Not to deal with any matter of government: 2. Not to meddle with any business which had his motion in a court of justice: and now 3dly, to go on with bills: That he cannot speak freely his mind, till the clouds that hang over us, by his maj.'s displeasure and messages, be cleared. He would have a committee of the whole house, to consider hereof to-morrow.

Sir Ed. Giles saith, that the honest men the worse luck. He thinketh, there were never more loyal subjects sat in parl. than now: and it proceeds from the malicious dealing of some wicked men. And he believeth, that the end of the great enemy is near, that he so much rageth and laboureth to cross our honest purposes here.—It was then ordered, that mr. Secretary shall set down this last Message from his maj. in writing, against to-morrow morning, and deliver it to the house, and that then it shall be considered of by a committee of the whole house; and mr. Speaker to be present.

The King's Answer to the Apologetic Petition of the Commons.] Dec. 14. The Chancellor of the Exchequer reported the King's Answer to the Apologetic Petition of the Commons; as follows:

“His Majesty's Answer to the Apologetic Petition of the House of Commons, presented to His Majesty by a dozen of the Members of this House, by their direction.”

“We must here begin in the same fashion that we would have done, if the first petition had come to our hands before we had made a stay thereof; which is to repeat the first words of the late queen of famous memory, used by her, in answer to an insolent proposition made by a Polonian ambassador unto her; that is, ‘legatum expectabamus, heraldum accipimus.’ For we had great reason to expect, that the first message, from your house, should have been a message of thanksgiving for our continued gracious behaviour towards our people, since your last recess; not only by our proclamation of grace, wherein were contained six or seven and thirty articles, all of several points of grace to the people; but also by the labour we took for the satisfaction of both houses, in those three articles recommended unto us, in both their names, by the right reverend father in God, the archbishop of Canterbury; and likewise for the good government of Ireland, we are now in hand with, at your request: But not only have we heard no news of all this, but contrarily, great complaints of the danger of religion within this kingdom, tacitly implying our ill government in this point. And we leave you to judge whether it be your duties, that are the representative body of our people, so to distaste them with our government; whereas, on the contrary, it is your duty, with all your endeavours, to kindle more and more a dutiful and thankful love in the people's hearts towards us, for our just and gracious government.—Now whereas, in the very beginning of this your Apology, you tax us, in fair terms, of trusting uncertain reports, and partial informations concerning your proceedings: We wish you to remember, that we are an old and experienced king, needing no such lessons, being, in our conscience, freest of any king alive, from hearing or trusting idle reports; which so many of your house, as are nearest us, can bear witness unto you, if you would give as good ear to them, as you do to some tribunitial orators among you: And, for proof in this particular, we have made your own messengers confer your other Petition sent by you, with the copy thereof which was sent us before; between which there is no difference at all, but that since our receiving the first copy you added a conclusion unto it, which could not come to our hands, till it was done by you, and your messengers sent; which was all at one time. And if we had had no copy of it before-hand, we must have received your first Petition, to our great dishonour, before we had known what it contained; which would have enforced us to have returned you a far worse answer than now we do; for then your messengers had returned with nothing, but that we have judged your Petition unlawful, and unworthy of an answer. For, as to your conclusion thereof, it is nothing but protestatio contraria facto; for in the body of your petition, you usurp upon our prerogative royal, and meddle with things far above your reach, and then in the conclusion you protest the contrary; as if a robber would take a man's purse, and then protest he meant not to rob him. For, first, you presume to give us your advise concerning the match of our dearest son with some Protestant, (we cannot say princess, for we know none of these fit for him) and dissuade us from his match with Spain, urging us to a present war with that king: and yet, in the conclusion, forsooth, ye protest ye intend not to press upon our most undoubted regal prerogative; as if the petitioning of us in matters, that yourselves confess ye ought not to meddle with, were not a meddling with them. —And whereas ye pretend, that ye were invited to this course by the speeches of 3 honourable lords; yet, by so much as yourselves repeat of the speeches, nothing can be concluded, but that we were resolved by war to regain the Palatinate, if otherwise we could not attain unto it. And you were invited to advise forthwith upon a supply, for keeping the forces in the Palatinate from disbanding, and to foresee the means for the raising, and maintenance of the body of an army for that war against the spring. Now, what inference can be made upon this; that therefore we must presently denounce war against the king of Spain, break our dearest son's match, and match him to one of our religion, let the world judge. The difference is no greater, than if we should tell a merchant, that we had great need to borrow money from him for raising an army; that thereupon it would follow, that we were bound to follow his advice in the direction of the war, and all things depending thereupon. But yet, not contenting yourselves with this excuse of yours, which indeed cannot hold water, ye come after to a direct contradiction to the conclusion of your former petition, saying, that the honour and safety of us and our posterity, and the patrimony of our children invaded and possessed by their enemies, the welfare of religion, and state of our kingdom, are matters, at any time, nor unfit for your deepest considerations in Parliament. To this generality, we answer with the Logicians, that where all things are contained, nothing is omitted: so as this plenipotency of yours invests you in all power upon earth, lacking nothing but the Pope's to have the keys also both of Heaven and Purgatory: and to this vast generality of yours we can give no other answer; for it will trouble all the best lawyers in the house to make a good commentary upon it: for so did the Puritan Ministers in Scotland bring all kind of causes within the compass of their Jurisdiction, saying, that it was the Church's office to judge of slander; and there could no kind of crime or fault be committed, but there was a slander in it, either against God, the king, or their neighbour; and, by this means, they hooked in to themselves the cognizance of all causes: or, like Bellarmine's distinction of the Pope's power over Kings, 'in ordine ad spiritualair,' whereby he gives them all temporal jurisdiction over them.—But to give you a direct answer to the matter of war, for which you are so earnest: we confess, we rather expected you should have given us thanks for the so long maintaining a settled peace in all our dominions, when all our neighbours about are in miserable combustion of war; but, 'dulce bellum inexpertis.' And we indeed find by experience, that a number of our subjects are so pampered with peace, as they are desirous of change, tho' they know not what.—It is true, that we have ever professed, (and, in that mind, with God's grace, we will live and die) that we will labour by all means possible, either by treaty, or by force, to restore our children to their antient dignity and inheritance: and whatsoever Christian princes or potentates will set themselves against it, we will not spare any lawful means to bring our so just and honourable purpose to a good end: neither shall the match of our son, or any other worldly respect, be preferred to this our resolution. For, by our credit and intervention with the king of Spain, and the Arch-Dutchess, and her husband now with God, we preserved the lower Palatinate one whole year from any further conquering in it; which, in any eight days space in that time, might have easily been swallowed up by Spinola's army, without any resistance. And in no better case was it now, at our Ambassador the lord Digby's coming thro' Heidelberg, if he had not extraordinarily succoured it.—But because we conceive, that ye couple this war of the Palatinate with the cause of religion, we must a little unfold your eyes herein.—The beginning of this miserable war, which hath set all Christendom on fire, was not for religion; but only caused by our son-in-law's hasty and harsh resolution, following evil counsel, to take to himself the crown of Bohemia.—And that this is true, himself wrote letters unto us at that time, desiring us to give assurance both to the French king, and state of Venice, that his accepting of the crown of Bohemia had no reference to the cause of religion, but only by reason of his right of election, as he called it. And we would be sorry that such aspersion should come upon our religion, as to make it a good pretext for dethroning of kings, and usurping their crowns; and we would be loath that our people here should be taught that strange doctrine: no, let us not so far wrong the Jesuits, as to rob them of their sweet positions and practices in that very point.—And upon the other part, we assure ourself so far of your charitable thoughts of us, that we would never have constantly denied our son-in-law both the title and assistance in that point, if we had been well persuaded of the justice of his quarrel. But, to conclude, this unjust usurpation of the crowns of Bohemia and Hungaria from the emperor, hath given the Pope, and all that party, too fair a ground, and opened them too wide a gate for curbing and oppressing of many thousands of our religion in divers parts of Christendom.—And whereas you excuse your touching upon the king of Spain, upon occasion of the incidents by you repeated in that place, and yet affirm, that it is without any touch to his honour; we cannot wonder enough that ye are so forgetful both of your words and wits: for, in your former petition, ye plainly affirm, that he affects the temporal monarchy of the whole earth; than which there can be no more malice uttered against any great king, to make all other princes and potentates both envy and hate him: but, if ye list, it may easily be tried, whether that speech touched him in honour or not, if ye shall ask him the question, whether he means to assume to himself that title or no; for every king can best judge of his own honour. We omit the particular ejaculations of some foul-mouthed orators in your own house, against the honour of that king's crown and state.—And touching your excuse of not determining any thing concerning the match of our dearest son, but only to tell your opinion, and lay it down at our feet: first, we desire to know, how you could have presumed to determine in that point, without committing of high treason? and, next, you cannot deny but your talking of his match after that manner, was a direct breach of our commandment and declaration out of our own mouth, at the first sitting down of this parliament; where we plainly professed, that we were in treaty of his match with Spain; and wished you to have that confidence in our religion and wisdom, that we would so manage it, as our religion should receive no prejudice by it. And the same we now repeat unto you, professing that we are so far engaged in that match, as we cannot in honour go back, except the king of Spain perform not such things as we expect at his hands. And therefore we are sorry that ye should shew to have so great distrust in us, as to conceive that we should be cold in our religion; otherwise, we cannot imagine how our former publick declaration should not have stopp'd your mouths in this point.—And as to your request, that we would now receive your former petition: we wonder what could make you presume that we would receive it: whereas, in our former letter, we plainly declared the contrary unto you, And therefore we have justly rejected that suit of yours: for what have you left unattempted in the highest points of sovereignty, in that petition of yours, except the striking of coin? for it contains the violation of leagues; the particular way how to govern a war; and the marriage of our dearest son, both negatively with Spain: nay, with any other popish princess; and also affirmatively, as to the matching with one of our religion; which we confess is a strain beyond any providence or wisdom God hath given us, as things now stand.—These are unfit things to be handled in parliament, except your king should require it of you: for who can have wisdom to judge of things of that nature, but such as are daily acquainted with the particulars of treaties, and of the variable and fixed connection of affairs of state, together with the knowledge of the secret ways, ends, and intentions of princes in their several negotiations? otherwise a small mistaking of matters of this nature may produce more effects than can be imagined: and therefore, 'ne suitor ultra crepidam.' And besides, the intermeddling in parliament with matters of peace or war, and the marriage of our dearest son, would be such a diminution to us and to our crown in foreign countries, as would make any prince neglect to treat with us, either in matters of peace or marriage, except they might be assured by the assent of Parliament. And so it proved long ago with a king of France; who, upon a trick, procuring his states to dissent from some treaty which before he had made, was after refused treaty with any other princes, to his great reproach, unless he would first procure the assent of his estates to their proposition. And will you cast your eyes upon the late times, you shall find, that the late queen, of famous memory, was humbly petitioned by a parliament to be pleased to marry: but her Answer was, that she liked their petition well, because it was simple, not limiting her to place nor person, as not befitting her liking to their fancies; and if they had done otherwise, she would have thought it a high presumption in them. Judge then what we may do in such a case, having made our publick declaration already (as we said before) directly contrary to that which you have now petitioned.—Now to the points in your petition, whereof you desire an answer as properly belonging to the parliament. The first and the greatest point is, that of religion: concerning which, at this time, we can give you no other answer than in the general; which is, that you may rest secure, that we will never be weary to do all we can for the propagation of our religion, and repressing of popery: but the manner and form you must remit to our care and providence, who can best consider of times and seasons; not by undertaking a publick war of religion through all the world at once; which, how hard and dangerous a task it may prove, you may judge. But this puts us in mind, how all the world complained the last year of plenty of corn; and God sent us a cooling-card this year for that heat: and so we pray God, that this desire among you of kindling wars (shewing your weariness of peace and plenty) may not make God permit us to fall into the miseries of both. But, as we already said, our care of religion must be such, as, on the one part, we must not, by the hot persecution of our recusants at home, irritate foreign princes of contrary religion: and teach them the way to plague the Protestants in their dominions, with whom we daily intercede, and at this time principally, for ease to them of our profession that live under them; yet, upon the other part, we never mean to spare, from due and severe punishment, any papist that will grow insolent for living under our so mild government. And you may also be assured, we will leave no care untaken, as well for the good education of the youth at home, especially the children of papists, as also for preserving at all times hereafter the youth that are or shall be abroad, from being bred in dangerous places, and so poisoned in popish seminaries. And as in this point, namely, the good education of popish youth at home, we have already given some good proofs, both in this kingdom and in Ireland; so will we be well pleased to pass any good laws that shall be made, either now, or at any time hereafter, to this purpose.—And as to your request of making this a session, and granting a General Pardon; it shall be your defaults, if we make not this a session before Christmas.—But for the pardon, ye crave such particulars in it, as we must be well advised upon; lest, otherwise, we give you back the double or treble of what we are to receive by your entire subsidy, without fifteenths. But the ordinary course we hold fittest to be used still in this case, is, that we should of our free grace send you down a pardon from the higher house, containing such points as we shall think fittest; wherein, we hope, ye shall receive good satisfaction.—But we cannot omit to shew you, how strange we think it, that ye should make so bad and unjust a commentary upon some words of our former letter, as if we meant to restrain you thereby of your antient privileges and liberties in parliament. Truly, a scholar would be ashamed so to misplace and misjudge any sentences in another man's book. For whereas, in the end of our former letter, we discharged you to meddle with government and mysteries of state, namely, matters of war or peace, or our dearest son's match with Spain; by which particular denominations we interpret and restrain our former words: and then, after, we forbid you to meddle with such things as have their ordinary course in courts of justice; ye couple together those two distinct sentences, and plainly leave out these words, of mysteries of state: so as ye err, 'a bene divisio ad male conjuncta.' For of the former part, concerning mysteries of state, we plainly restrained our meaning to the particulars that were after mentioned; and, in the latter, we confess we meant by it sir Edward Coke's foolish business:

and therefore it had well become him, especially being our servant, and one of our council, to have complained unto us; which he never did, though he was ordinarily at court since, and never had access refused unto him.—And although we cannot allow of the stile, calling it, your antient and undoubted right and inheritance; but could rather have wished, that ye had said, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us; (for most of them grow from precedents, which shews rather a toleration than inheritance) yet we are pleased to give you our royal assurance, that as long as you contain yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties and privileges, as ever any of our predecessors were, nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative. So as your house shall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown; which would enforce us, or any just king, to retrench them of their privileges, that would pare his prerogative and flowers of the crown: but of this, we hope, there shall never be cause given. Dated at Newmarket, Dec. 11, 1621."

Mr. Chanc. of the Excheq. saith, that he hath to deliver, by word of mouth, 3 messages from the king to this house. 1st, that his maj. doth appoint Saturday sennight for a conclusion of the sessions, and commendeth particularly the bill of Continuance and Repeal of Statutes. 2, concerning the Pardon, his maj. is desirous that the lord treasurer himself and mr. Solicitor should peruse it, 'ne quid detrimenti rex capiat.' 3, that if Gouldsmith hath offended the house, he should be punished; if not, he thinketh it justice, he should be remitted.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, if the king's Answer to our Petition doth not strike the affection and soul of every member of this house, he knoweth not what will. He would have us defer, till tomorrow, the consideration of this his maj.'s Answer, that we may clear off from us the stain laid on us of rashness; and that we may not give up our privileges, as we desire not, in any wise, to touch on the prerogative of his majesty.

Sir Hen. Poole would not have us always dwell on the rocks of preserving our privileges: but would have us see the best bills, and proceed on with some of the most general of them, that we may not go now home again with empty hands.

Sir Dudley Digges saith, that he is much comforted to see so plain dealing from his maj. to this house: that his maj. doth so well understand our proceedings, that he doth leave it to our free election, to proceed with what business we will. He would, if any one be of opinion, that our privileges are yet touched, that we then first clear that: but his own opinion is, that our privileges are not touched; and would have us go on with bills and business, and prepare for a sessions.

Mr. Solicitor saith, that, as the stile of the king's Answer doth carry it in gravity and majesty, so doth it express, that the king is a father to us. He would have us meditate on it, and to-morrow resolve to go on with the business of the house.

Mr. Tho. Crewe saith, that he is much comforted, that it hath pleased his maj. to give us assurance of religion. For the present, he would have the Pardon prepared; and, for the rest, he would have the clerk to bring us a catalogue of all the bills that are sent up to the Lords, how many of them are come down passed, how many are here engrossed, and ready to be sent up; and then a message to be sent to the Lords, to dispatch the bills which they have.—It was accordingly ordered, that the clerk shall prepare, against tomorrow, the true state of all the bills.

Sir Tho. Wentworth moveth that no member shall go out of town till the sessions be ended.

Mr. Secretary secondeth the motion, by reason of the great business of the house; and desireth the Speaker to come more early than he hath been accustomed.

Dec. 15. Sir Geo. Moore saith, that our liberties are our freehold, and the fairest flower that groweth in the garden of the Commons: and, if they be once nipped, they will never grow again: that we have laboured but of duty (in the service of those who sent us hither) to defend our liberties, what we could: that his maj. did at first say and hath since reiterated his promise, that he would confirm and maintain all our lawful liberties: that he doubteth not, but his maj. when he shall consider, that we have done what hath been good, but that he will add (as God did to Ezekias, when he had prayed and said, that he had done what was good in his sight, 15 years to his age) a longer time to our sitting here. He would have a committee appointed to consider of all the Messages, sent us by the king, concerning our Privileges and his majesty's several Answers; that we may see, how the state of our liberties now stands.

Mr. Serj. Ashley saith, that we should not take any discontent at the words of the king's Answer; for we must leave kings to use their own phrase and language. His maj. assureth us for our religion; and, for his part, he will (and he hopeth the rest of the house will also) take his maj.'s word for a warrant, to execute the law on all papists. The king saith, that he will maintain our liberties, as far forth as any of his predecessors have done; but 'plus valet legalis consuetudo, quam regalis concessio.' He would have us take what bills we may, though we cannot have what we would; lest our adversaries rejoice to see, that we now again go home empty-handed.

Sir Francis Seymour saith, if we cast our eyes on his maj.'s Letter, on his maj.'s Message, and lastly on his maj.'s Answer we shall read, with grief, how our privileges stand, and in what case we stand; and he believeth, that there is no man's heart, which feeleth a guiltiness of that, which is expressed in his maj.'s

VOL. I.

Answer: that, though we now decline the farther disputing of the Match, the Matter of Religion and War, yet he would have it here expressed and declared, that the consideration of the religion of this kingdom, the safety of his maj.'s person and this kingdom, are not matters out of the cognisance of this house: that he thinketh the bills, which we may now pass, will not be worth our labour. He would have us consider, how to give the king satisfaction concerning that which he taxeth us for by his Answer; and take some course, how to settle our Privileges, as that we leave them not worse than we found them, when we came hither.

Mr. Chanc. of the Excheq. saith, that it is with us this day, as in a battle: we can err but once. He hopeth we shall not so much reflect on the manner of the king's Answer, as the matter: that the king, when he wrote this Answer, was extremely divided between his zeal to this house, and the jealousy of foreign princes, who had their eyes over his maj. to see what would be the success of our Petition. Seeing we have, as for our liberties, a full Answer; and, for the rest of our petitions, as much satisfaction, as his maj. with his honour, can (as things stand) give; that our longer complaining of our grief will be rather a discontent to the king, than otherwise: that his maj. (when he had dispatched this his Answer) parted from the messengers cheerfully, as if he thought, that, by this his Answer, he had both answered the expectation of this house, and prevented the jealousy of foreign princes. He would have us go on with as many bills as we can now dispatch; and hope for to effect the rest, at our next meeting after Christmas.

Sir James Perrott saith, that our religion is not so safe, as we desire it to be. He would have the king rectified in his opinion; for we do not blame his maj.'s care of religion, by complaining of the insolency of the papists; neither do we (as his maj. conceiveth) take on us a plenitude of power. He would have us justify, to the king, our love, duty and loyalty to his maj.; and to desire, for our Religion, that he would be pleased to send, from this town, all papists, to their houses in the country; for here they go to the houses of foreign ambassadors, where they not only exercise their religion, but give offerings, whereby, it is to be feared, that much of our money is transported beyond sea. He would have a committee appointed to consider of these things, and also of our privileges, if they are infringed.

Mr. Brooke saith, that we have our privileges and liberties by prescription, time out of mind, and not by toleration. He would have a Protestation entered in the house, that we claim our privileges as an inheritance, and not as granted from kings to us. He would have a short bill passed here, to continue all statutes that stand on continuance, till the end of the next sessions, for, if we go to pass the bill, it will ask more time than is between this and Friday; and also that we should pass another bill, to continue the state of the business of the house, as it now stands; and, by this means, we may have a sessions before Christmas. But especially he would have our claim of our privileges entered in the house.

Mr. Treasurer saith, that he findeth, that the house is much troubled, that the king hath written so angry a letter to us, which he wisheth we had not provoked him unto. His maj. saith, he will have a care of the propagation of religion; and therefore he would have us pray to God, for the continuance of such his care. His maj. saith, we have strained the words of his letter more against ourselves, than his maj. meant, or we could well do. He would not have us now dispute any farther, but resolve to carry down some bills with us; lest we draw infamy on ourselves, and discontent to the king and his people.

Sir Kob. Phillips saith, that, lest his silence at this time might be imputed to sullenness, he thought good to put himself into the dispute of the things now here in agitation: wherein, he saith, he will collect and frame observations on his maj.'s Letter; wherein we are to observe and consider the sense and opinion of the house, how we ought to proceed; on which he will render his opinion, what he conceiveth he ought to do. In the king's Letter we may note his maj.'s Reprehension, Declaration and Admonition. In the Reprehension his maj. is very quick with us; and he doubteth not, but, had his maj. heard our discourses, or could he, with a perspective, see our hearts, he would not have so misconstrued our actions. He would have us rather think how to get from his maj. a sweeter tune, than to irritate him by our farther dispute. In the Declaration, he believeth, that there is none here but will take great comfort to see, that so great a prince doth take care of our religion; and his maj. saith, that, to that end, he will pass any laws for the education of children. He would not therefore have us roll this stone further, seeing it is for point of state, that his maj. now spareth to have the laws against papists strictly executed. It comforteth him, and believeth it doth likewise comfort all his good subjects, to see his maj. so confidently to declare his resolution and care to gain the Palatinate. If we had known sooner, how far his maj. had proceeded in the Match of Spain, we should not (as he thinketh) have meddled with, or touched that string. As for our Privileges, since his maj. hath said, we hold our liberties by the grace of princes, and not by a right descended unto us, and that that question is stirred (which he wisheth had not been) he thinketh that we are now to do something more in this point, than to let them thus rest. And in so doing we shall do no more, than was disputed of in the first parl. of his maj. when the king said, we held our liberties by a toleration, not by right: whereupon there was here entered a public Declaration, that we held them by inheritance from our ancestors. He would have a select committee appointed for this purpose; and that we should go to the king, to Theobald's, to let him know, that we are sorry that we are so misinterpreted: that it is impossible to have a sessions now; for that which will content the country is not only bills: and, if bills would, yet we cannot pass such bills, as will give the wiser sort, in the country, any content; for they look to have some ease of Grievances, and some ease of Trade, as well as to have a few bills. As for the bill of Subsidy, it will be no great time lost, if we, at Christmas, adjourn the sitting, as we use to do at Easter; and then we may meet presently after Christmas, to proceed with the business of the house; and, in 5 or 6 weeks, he doubteth not but we shall dispatch such bills and business, as would give his maj. and the people good satisfaction: that it will be no infamy for us to alter our purpose, since the occasions are altered; for it is now 12 days since we desired to have a sessions; and since that time we have been troubled with business of another nature which hath been interposed by his maj.'s letters and messages.

Sir Tho. Wentworth would have a committee appointed to consider, whether we shall do well to go on with bills or no, and also how we hold our Privileges, whether by right, or by permission and toleration: and this of our Privileges, to be first considered. He saith, he will not speak, whether it will be best to have a sessions or no, till he seeth how our privileges and the business of the house standeth.

Sir Dudley Digges would have a committee appointed to consider how our liberties stand; for he must say still, that our Privileges are our right and inheritance, born with us. He would have us take heed how we say, we hold our privileges by custom or prescription; for, 'nullum tempus occurrit regi.' But he thinketh, that the king did but argue that our privileges are derived from the grace and permission of princes, and doth now say so directly.

Mr. Tho. Crewe saith, that, as we owe to the king our duty, our lives, and all we have, so do we our liberties and privileges to our posterity. The time being so short we have to sit, it will be lost labour now for us to go on with bills. Since the bill of Monopolies is cast away, and, for aught we hear, that also against concealments, and all the bills of Grace laid asleep with the Lords, he thinketh, it will not be worth our labour to have a sessions, which (if we might have had those bills) he should have been glad of. It cannot but be a great grief to us, to hear so wise a king to doubt the right of our Privileges, and would have us stile them a liberty derived by the permission of princes; and he thinketh this doth stir all our hearts: that he thinketh, the walls of this house would speak against us, if we should sit still and leave his maj. in dislike of our stiling our liberties our undoubted ancient right and inheritance: that, by Magna Charta, the liberties, rights, and privileges (as well as the lands) of the temporality and spirituality of the peers, barons, gentry, and commonalty of the kingdom, are renewed, confirmed and established unto us: that, if our law be our birthright and inheritance (as all know it is) then much more are our privileges and liberties of parl. He would have a general committee to consider of that which was here entered, on the like question of our Privileges, in 1 Jac. and to compare this with it, that we may go on now, as we did then; and, this being at a grand committee thoroughly debated, and brought to a head, then to appoint a select committee to frame what we shall think fit to be done herein.

Mr. Solicitor saith, that our liberties and privileges of parl. are our inheritance; but he would not have us stand so much on the manner, as the matter of his maj.'s Answer: that we should not be so much moved herewith; since the king doth conclude, we shall freely enjoy the same. He would have us enter here in the house our claim to the right of our privileges, according to the ancient parliamentary course, and that we once more petition his maj. though, he saith, he is sorry we are forced so often to trouble his maj. He would have us go on with this matter of our privileges at the committee; so as we neglect not to have a sessions. It is true, we have been diverted; yet, he thinketh, we may pass such bills, as will give the country good content: that he believeth, that 'invidius hoc fecit:' the devil, or his instruments, hath sowed his diversion amongst us: that he would have a sessions: and saith confidently, that what the king will grant and discharge, by his Pardon, will be more worth to us, than three Subsidies are to his maj.: that therefore he would have us go on with bills, and with the committee for our privileges.

Sir Edw. Coke protesteth before God, that he ever speaketh his own conscience, but he doth not ever speak his own things; for he, for the most part, ever speaketh by warrant of precedents. 'Omnis qualitas in principali subjecto est in summo gradu,' as 'lumen in sole:' and so are the privileges (which are the laws) of the parl. here in the parl. 'in principali subjecto,' and therefore 'in summo gradu:' that the liberties and privileges of parl. are the mother and life of all laws, and laws are in parl. 'in summo gradu;' whereas the king saith, he liketh not our stiling of our liberties our ancient inheritance, yet he will maintain and give us leave to enjoy the same; which indeed striketh at the root of all our privileges. 'Consuetudo regni' is the law of the kingdom. He thinketh, that that part of his maj.'s Answer proceeded only by the length of it; for it was at the end of his Answer that he wrote, he wished we had not stiled our privileges our ancient inheritance, but rather, that we had them by the permission of our kings, his maj.'s predecessors. He would have us stand upon the defence of our privileges in this point, and that a general committee should debate hereof. He would have us take account on Monday of the state of the bills of the house, and that then we may proceed therein; and that, according to a parliamentary course, we proceed likewise with Grievances.

Sir Wm. Spencer would have this general committee (appointed to consider of our privileges) to consider particularly of one point of the king's Letter, wherein he saith, that he taketh himself free and able to punish the misdemeanour of any member here in parl. as well sitting the parl. as after; for that we hold it for a liberty and special privilege, that no man, that hath here been cleared from saying or doing any thing that misbecometh him, should be afterwards punished for that fault.

Mr. Noye saith that our liberties and privileges are, by Magna Charta, confirmed to us, by 'libertates suas;' which sheweth, that they are anciently our's, and but confirmed (not originally granted) to us.

Mr. Secretary saith, that it was never in his maj.'s mind or opinion to question our privileges, but it was only the slip of a pen in the end of a long Answer: That he would have a Committee to consider hereof; for our Privileges ought to be dear unto us. As for that particular of our privileges, spoken of by sir W. Spencer, he would not have the committee to meddle therewith; for he thinketh it will ask a great dispute, and it will at last grow a question between the king and us, of our privileges therein.

Mr. Granville saith, that the king hath not the power of refusal of our just privileges, though we make our request for his permission of them: That he thinketh, the king meaneth by punishing of misdemeanours in parl. only matters of treason, or such as concern the head of a man, for we have not power to behead any man: and that his maj. intendeth not other misdemeanours in parliament.

It was then ordered that a Committee of the whole House shall take into their consideration all things concerning the Privileges of this house, or any thing incident thereto, and that it shall sit on Monday next.

The King's letter to Mr. Secretary Calvert.]
Dec. 17. Mr. Secretary Calvert acquainted the House that he had a Message from the King to this House. He then read the following Letter which he had received from his maj. viz:

"To our trusty and well-beloved Counsellor, sir George Calvert, Knight, one of our principal Secretaries."

"Jacobus Rex.—Right trusty and well-beloved counsellor, We greet you well. We are sorry to hear, that notwithstanding our reiterated messages to our house of commons, for going on in their businesses, in regard of the shortness of time betwixt this and Christmas, and of their own earnest desire, that we should now conclude a session by making of good and profitable laws, they continue to lose time; and now of late, upon our gracious Answer sent unto them, have taken occasion to make more delay, in appointing a committee tomorrow, to consider upon the points of our Answer; and especially concerning that point in it, which maketh mention of their Privileges. Our pleasure therefore is, that you shall, in our name, tell them, that we are so loth to have time mispent, which is so precious a thing, in the well using whereof our people may receive so great a benefit, as we are thus far contented to descend from our royal dignity, by explaining, at this time, our meaning in our said Answer touching that point; that all our good subjects in that house, that intend nothing but our honour, and the weal of the common-wealth, may clearly see our intention. Whereas in our said Answer we told them that we could not allow of the stile, calling it their ancient and undoubted right and inheritance; but could rather have wished, that they had said, their Privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us (for most of them grow from Precedents) which sheweth rather a toleration than inheritance; the plain truth is, that we cannot, with patience, endure our subjects to use such antimonarchical words to us, concerning their liberties, except they had subjoined, that they were granted unto them by the grace and favour of our predecessors. But, as for our intention herein, God knows we never meant to deny them any lawful privileges, that ever that house enjoyed in our predecessors' times, as we expected our said answer should have sufficiently cleared them; neither in justice, whatever they have undoubted right unto, nor in grace, whatever our predecessors or we have graciously permitted unto them. And therefore we made that distinction of the most part: for whatsoever liberties or privileges they enjoy by any law or statute shall be ever inviolably preserved by us; and we hope, our posterity will imitate our footsteps therein. And, whatsoever Privileges they enjoy by long custom and uncontrolled and lawful precedents, we will likewise be as careful to preserve them, and transmit the care thereof to our posterity; neither was it any way in our mind, to think of any particular point, wherein we meant to disallow of their liberties: so as, in justice, we confess ourself to be bound to maintain them in their rights; and, in grace, we are rather minded to increase than inringe any of them, if they shall so deserve at our hands. To end therefore as we began: let them go on cheerfully in their businesses, rejecting the curious wrangling of lawyers upon words and syllables; otherwise (which God forbid) the world shall see how often and how earnestly we have pressed them to go on, according to their calling, with those things that are fit to be done for the weal of our crown and kingdom; and how many various shifts have been from time to time maliciously found out, to frustrate us of our good purpose, and hinder them from the performance of that service, which they owe to us and to our whole kingdom; whereof when the country shall come to be truly informed, they will give the authors thereof little thanks. Given at our court at Royston, the 16th of Dec. 1621."

Mr. Secretary Calvert then said, that it was not strange, that the business of the house (which was so commonly spoken of abroad in the town) doth come to his maj.'s ear; and he thinketh, whosoever hath informed his maj. hereof, hath done a good office to the house. He desireth, that his maj.'s Letter may be entered here in the house; and that we may go on with business.—It was thereupon ordered, that this Letter from his maj. shall be here entered in the house; and that every one that will may have copies thereof.

Sir Edw. Coke saith, that we have now, by this last message, as he conceiveth, an allowance of our Privileges, which indeed are our's by law, by custom, by precedent, and by act of parl. That he thinketh, if we did set down our privileges and liberties, it would clear us of all those rubs. He wisheth, that himself were a sacrifice, so as there were a good and perfect correspondency and right understanding between the king and the house, as he hopeth there is: That one Walter Clerk, being a burgess for Chippenham, was fined for a riot in time of parl. at the king's suit; which encouraged also one Rob. Basset to sue the said Clerk, on an action of trespass; and also one John Payne sued the said Clerk to an outlawry, and laid him up in the Fleet: but hereupon this house of parl. would do nothing till they had their burgess again. Those of the king's side said then, that, for the king's suit, 'Non omittas propter aliquam libertatem;' and it was then also alledged, on the behalf of this house, that the king calleth the burgesses here for the service of the kingdom; and if one of them may be taken from us, all may likewise by the same right.

Sir Francis Seymour saith, that there are other points, as well as this which his maj. hath now by his message cleared, whereof he desireth, that we may be cleared also. One of them is part of the message, where his maj. saith, he taketh himself free and able to punish any misdemeanour in parl. as well sitting the parl. as otherwise. Another is, that his maj. saith, he will maintain our privileges so long as we deserve it, and the privileges which we have by uncontrollable precedents enjoyed: whereas he thinketh, there are but few precedents of our liberties, which have not been controlled, by some of our former kings. He desireth therefore, that a committee may go on to settle our privileges, and to let his maj. see precedents, how we have formerly enjoyed them, and our right to them; especially concerning those parts of our privileges, which his maj. hath mentioned in his messages and letters.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that he holdeth it a discommendable thing, for any man to lurk under the shifting ambiguity of equivocal words; but all ought to speak, when, by plain words, he seeth cause ministered: that the king's last Letter to the Secretary hath not yet satisfied; and he thinketh, there are some things in his maj.'s Letter, that dutifully may be considered of; and he would have us now only insist on the rectifying and settling of our privileges; for thereby shall we be able, at another time, to go on with businesses here the better, and with less rubs; and also give good satisfaction to the country, that we have left our privileges and liberties settled.

Mr. Recorder saith, that it is a great grace and favour, that the king hath so much descended to give us satisfaction, by an explanation of himself. And he believeth, that our privileges are now free, and is glad to hear the king say, that he taketh himself bound to maintain our privileges and liberties. That the king saith, we shall enjoy all our rights and privileges which we can claim; and that, of grace, he will add to it, if we shall deserve it. He would not have our privileges brought into writing; for then, if we leave out any thing, we exclude ourselves from the rest; for the king will say, if we had any more privileges, we would have claimed and expressed it in that writing. He would have a Protestation entered here for the better satisfaction and settling of our privileges. He would have us go on with bills for the good of the commonwealth, and that thereby we may unite and knit the affections of the king and his people.

Sir Nath. Rich would have those Privileges, which we conceive have been touched, and seem to have been infringed, during this parl. to be set down, that we may shew what right we have to them, and how we think they have been impeached, and to strengthen them by precedents or otherwise; and for this would have a committee appointed.

Sir Geo. Moore thinketh, the king hath given us good satisfaction for our privileges. And, since we have had so many adjournments, and yet no bills have been passed, he would have us enter here our protestation for our privileges, and then go on with bills, for the conclusion of a sessions.

Sir Edw. Cecil would have us go on with the bills and business of the house if it be but to shew our thankfulness to his maj. for his gracious message; but would principally have us appoint a committee to consider of our privileges. He is glad to see by a precedent, even now shewed by sir E. Coke that it hath been an ancient use, that on discontent, the house hath used to be silent, and it is now no new thing.

Mr. Tho. Crewe saith, that we have now more need of a committee to consider of our Privileges, than we had before; for, on so great a matter, he would not have us conclude any thing, till a committee hath considered of it. It may be, that some make themselves music without discord, and therefore he would have us do our best to establish a concord. He would have it entered here in the house, that our privileges are our undoubted right and inheritance, and this to be done by protestation. He would have a general committee appointed to clear us of those things we are charged by his maj.'s last Letter to mr. Secretary; wherein we are said to use "antimonarchical words, and curious shifts, maliciously found out, &c." and this, he thinketh, will further the business of the house.

Sir Dud. Digges would not have us to stick on the particular words of his maj.'s Letter; for that were to make the sovereignty of the king, and the privileges and duty of the subject to strike against each other; which we ought by all means to avoid. He would have us by our actions, in going on with business, give his maj. thanks for his coming so near to us, by this his last Letter, wherein he doth so graciously explain himself: and would have a select, but not a general committee to go on with the consideration of our privileges; but would also have us go on with bills and business.

Mr. Chancellor of the Dutchy protesteth, that the king's heart is righted to us (he saith, he speaketh what he knoweth, coming lately from the king) and that it is now in the power of us to make this the happiest parliament that ever was.

Mr. Glanville saith, that this last Letter to the Secretary is a very gracious letter, but withal it is a very wise and a very wary letter. He would have a Declaration made here in the house, that we have, and ought to enjoy, these particulars, (and so name in the Declaration those of our privileges, which have been laboured this parl. to have been impeached) and also to claim all our other privileges and liberties whatsoever in general words.

Mr. Secretary saith, that he thinketh, that the king's command for our going on with bills, was no ways restrictive, but that we should go on with bills amongst other businesses, and that this command was not any infringement of our privileges.

Mr. Solicitor saith, that we, in our Petition, desired the king favourably to interpret our words and petition; and he thinketh it fit, we should lay a law on ourselves, not to take exceptions at the words in his maj.'s Letter. He would have us, at a committee, recollect all those things, which were the occasions of our stop, and the reasons why we sopped on them; and then to set down, that, having received his maj.'s last letter, we are cleared thereof; and so to go on with other business of the house.

Mr. Serj. Ashley would have here entered a Protestation for our Privileges, as the house did in 1 Jac. and so to go on with bills and other business of the house, since the king hath so well explained himself.

Mr. Hackwill saith that the privileges of the house are the steps that bring us up hither; and here are our grievances to be heard, and here to be relieved: that it will be ill news when the country shall hear that we have lost the Privileges of this house. The Privileges of this house are called the Custom of the Commons of this house, and the Custom of England; the privileges which we claim, especially that for Freedom of Speech, are the very essence of a parl. There is a statute 2 H. 5. wherein it is written, that the Privileges of this house are the inheritance of the subject: that till 1 H. 4. the Commons did not make any Protestation, by their Speaker, for their Privileges. And it was after disliked, that any such Protestation was made, and so left off till 27 Eliz. when such a protestation, by way of petition, for our enjoyment of our liberties and privileges, and for freedom of speech, began again to be used by the Speaker of this house. But he would not have this house henceforth to use any such protestation, at the beginning of the parl. but have it left out, for we see the inconveniences that follow it; for that makes the king conceive, we hold it by the grace and permission of princes, and not as our inheritance. He doubteth, whether the precedent of the Protestation (made here in the house) for our privileges, in 1 Jac. be entered or no, and therefore he would have the committee consider of it.

Sir Wm. Sroude would have us send those of the council, to desire the king that we may be adjourned till after the holidays, and that then we may meet again (as soon as it pleaseth his maj.) after Christmas: for it is now impossible to have a sessions before Christmas.

Sir Edw. Coke would have us make a Protestation for our Privileges: That he can tell us when both houses did sit in parl. together, both the lords and the commons: That the demand of the privileges of this house, by the Speaker was after they began to be questioned: and, at first, when the demand of the privileges was made to the kings of this realm, it used to be done still at the first meeting of the parl.; and in this manner, that, if the house might not have their privileges and liberties, they would sit silent. He would have us make our protestation for our privileges, and then send the same to the king, that he may see it.

It was then ordered, that a Committee of the whole house shall consider of all the matters and things concerning the Privileges and Liberties of the House, and all things incident thereunto; shall sit tomorrow morning.

Sir Tho. Wentworth would have the house fall again into a parliamentary course, to avoid all scandals and imputations of sullenness laid on the house.

The King's Letter to Mr. Speaker.] Dec. 18. Mr. Speaker informed the House that he had received the following Letter from the King: viz.

"To our trusty and well-beloved sir Tho. Richardson, kn. Speaker of our Commons' House of Parliament."

"Mr. Speaker.—Whereas, at the humble suit of our house of commons, we condescended to make this meeting a sessions before Christmas; to which purpose we gave them time until Saturday next, in case they would seriously apply themselves to that end; and likewise since, out of our grace, and to take away all mistakings, by our letters directed to our secretary, we were pleased so fully and clearly to explain ourself, in the point of maintaining all lawful Privileges to our said house, which since we cannot hear hath had the wished effect, in making them spend this short time in preparing things most necessary for a sessions: We have thought good once more clearly, by this, to impart our mind unto them; which is, that in respect of the expectation, after this so long a meeting in parl. as also, that the generality for the most part rather judge things by the outward effects, than enter into the causes of them; We have an earnest desire to make this a sessions, to the end that our good and loving subjects may have some taste, as well of our grace and goodness towards them, by our free Pardon, and good Laws to be passed; as they have had, both by the great and unusual example of justice, since this meeting, and the so many eases and comforts given unto them by proclamation. And therefore, calling to mind, that the passing of the Subsidy, an act for Continuance of Statutes, and the Pardon, are the three most pressing businesses, to be effected before the end of the sessions, we wish them, that, as we have given order for the Pardon to go on, with all expedition, so they presently go in hand with the act for Continuance of Statutes. As for the Subsidy, though time presseth much, yet, if they find it can not now conveniently be done, we will not make that any way an impediment to the good, which we desire our people should feel by making this a session. Thus much we thought good to give them to understand; and withal to assure them, that, if they shall not apply themselves instantly to prepare the aforesaid things, for our royal assent, against Saturday next, we will, without expecting any farther answer from them, construe, by their slackness, that they desire not a sessions; and in such case we must give a larger time, for their returning homeward, to such of both houses, as are to go into their countries, to keep hospitality among their neighbours in this time of recess. Given at our court at Theobald's, the 17th of Dec. 1621."

Mr. Weston saith, that this is a most gracious Letter, whereby his maj. desireth a sessions, and relinquisheth his own profit, so there may be a sessions: That the Pardon will do as much good after Christmas, if this may be an adjournment. He thinketh it impossible to prepare the bill of Continuance against Saturday. He would therefore have us petition the king, that this may be an adjournment, and no sessions; and to set down the reasons of our delay, and not proceeding with bills.

Sir Rob. Phillips would have us remember where we stood yesterday, and what we appointed concerning our Privileges, and, if we then thought a committee fit to consider of our privileges, he would have it now stand, and that that committee may consider of our privileges accordingly, and also of this Letter from his maj.; that we may express with joy our humble thankfulness to his maj. for his gracious Letter, and our duty to the country for which we serve, by providing for our privileges.

Mr. Solicitor offereth a short bill for to continue all the statutes that depend on Continuances; because the bill of Continuance and Repeal of Statutes may, peradventure, ask too long a debate for so short a time. And he saith, the Pardon is also ready. He saith, he thought it his duty to acquaint the house with thus much, that it may consider thereof, and do, as in their wisdom shall be thought most fit.

The house then resolved, that this was a gracious Letter, and that the house held it fit to give his maj. thanks for it.

Mr. Tho. Crewe saith, that this Letter is full of oil, and 'non est dignus datis, qui non est gratus dandis.' He thinketh it will be good husbanding of our time, against our next meeting, if we now, by a committee, settle our Privileges: then we may go on, without interruption, with the bills which are here: That we cannot possibly pass the bill of Continuance of Statutes, in 3 days; for it will ask a day's labour for two good scriveners to engross it, and it will ask here some debate before it pass. He would have us go on with the committee for our Privileges.

Mr. Noye saith, it is impossible, that we should prepare, in so short time, the bill of Continuance. He saith, that there are many things granted away by patents and leases by the king, which his maj. in his Pardon, doth mention to pardon: but, being granted away before, they are not pardoned by the general pardon; and therefore he would have us (before the Pardon come here) appoint a committee, to see what is granted away, that was used to be pardoned, and that we may let his maj. see how his grace is forestalled by such patentees. He would have a committee to consider of our Privileges, and of our thanks to his maj. for his gracious Letter, and to set down therein the reasons, why we do not, or rather cannot, proceed for a sessions.

It was then ordered, that the former committee of the whole house, appointed to consider of the Privileges of the house, shall also consider of the best course to give his maj. thanks for his gracious Letter and satisfaction that we cannot go on with businesses for a sessions, at this time. Mr. Speaker, by order, went out of the chair, and the house sat as a committee, Mr. serj. Ashley in the chair.

Sir Rob. Phillips would have our humble thanks to his maj. to have place before that of our Privileges; and that a select committee should consider of it, so as we may end it against to-morrow morning.

Mr. Glanville would have our humble thanks to his maj. and our presenting to him the reasons, that we could not make a sessions, finished to-night and sent away; lest we give opportunity to the adversaries of this house, to suggest to his maj. some misinterpretation of the reasons of our not proceeding for a sessions, according to his maj.'s Letter.

Sir Edw. Coke would have our Answer to the king's Letter to consist of two points: 1.

Of our humble thanks for his gracious Letter: 2. To protest our loyalty and dutiful affection to his maj.: but would not have us touch any thing on misinformation or misinterpretation.

A Select Committee of four was accordingly appointed to go presently, to draw up an Answer to the king's Letter, with all expedition; and are to consider of the two points, whereof Sir Edw. Coke spake, and to set down some reasons, why the house should not go forward with business for a sessions. The rest of the Grand Committee, proceeded in the mean time, with the debate on Privileges.

Sir Rob. Phillips saith, that, if our persons be not safe after parl. but that we are committed for what we say in parl. we are not then in safety here, neither shall we speak freely our minds: that, if (as it hath been here vouched) our Privileges are our birthright and inheritance, then is his maj. bound to let us enjoy them, as we are bound to his maj.: that his maj. said, that there is a difference between an absolute king, and a politic king, as himself is: and his majesty taketh an oath, at his coronation, to maintain our privileges; and then his maj. said, he was bound to maintain our privileges. We are to be the more careful of our liberties, because they are easily lost, difficult to be kept, and almost impossible to be recovered. He would have us view all the king's letters and messages, whereby we conceive our liberties have been impeached; and also to search out precedents, to see, what hath been done in the like cases. He would have us set down both precedents, and the reasons of those privileges, which we conceive to have been violated or impeached: and would have us take some course to demonstrate the same to the king, by petition or otherwise; and that afterwards we make, and enter here our Protestation, both for those privileges, and all the rest of our privileges.

Mr. Noye would have us resort to the precedent of 1. Jac. which was made on a like impeachment of our liberties; and, if that be a remedy well enough done, then he would have us do the same again in this case; but, if it be not well done, that then we strengthen our's wherein the other was defective. He saith, that long arguing argues a doubt, and we are out of doubt of the right of our privileges; and therefore would have us go on briefly to recollect what we think hath been impeached, and then apply our remedies.

Mr. Mallet saith, that by the same reason, that the king doth command us to go on with bills, by the same reason may he command us not to go on with bills: that the king may punish any capital misdemeanours in parl. but not other inferior misdemeanours which are punishable by the parl.: the king may sue any privileged man in any of his maj.'s courts, notwithstanding his privilege; but it is otherwise, if his maj. sue a member of the parl. in time of parl. for it is the privilege of this house first to censure offenders here, if the offence be not capital.

Sir Tho. Wentworth would not have us debate, at this time, of the right and privilege which the house hath, to debate of matter of War, and the Marriage of the Prince; because we did, in our former Petition, decline the further meddling therein; but would have us stand on it that our Privileges are our right and inheritance, and that it is at our election, to go on with bills or other businesses.

Mr. Wentworth saith, that he never yet read of any thing that was not fit for the consideration of a parl.; and, if there be a negative bound, or ne plus ultra set in any matter of parl. then he wisheth it may be known, that we may know our bounds.

Petition of Thanks to the King.] Mr. Speaker going into the chair, Mr. Serj. Ashley reported the Petition of Thanks to the King; in hæc verba:

“May it please your most excellent Majesty;—We, your most loyal and humble subjects, the knights, citizens and burgesses of your Commons’ House of Parliament, having this morning, to our great comfort, heard your maj.’s Letter, sent to our Speaker, full of grace and goodness to us and all your people, have thought it our duty, forthwith, to return our most humble and hearty thanks to your sacred maj. for so royal a favour vouchsafed unto us. And we do humbly beseech your maj. to be truly informed from us, that, although we have been very desirous, in our duty to your maj. who called us to this service, and to our country, for whom we serve, to have some good laws now to have been passed; and that there might have been a sessions before Christmas, to which your maj. upon our humble Petition, was graciously pleased to give way; yet, entering now into a serious consideration of the nature of those things, which must of necessity be prepared for the finishing of a sessions, and the straitness of time, whereunto we are driven by some unhappy diversions, which have fallen upon us, to our great grief; we are enforced once again to fly to your maj.’s grace and favour, humbly submitting ourselves to your royal wisdom, what time will be the fittest for our departure, and for our re-access, to perfect those beginnings, which are in preparation with us; which time, by God’s grace, we resolve to spend with that diligence and care, as shall give good satisfaction to your maj. to our country, and to our own consciences, that we shall make good use thereof.”

This Answer, or Petition of Thanks, was then ordered to be engrossed presently, and sent to his maj. which being done, the Speaker again left the chair, and the debates on the Privileges of the house was resumed.

Mr. Alford would have a select committee appointed to consider of the points of such of our Privileges, as are impeached, and to draw a Protestation for the same Privileges, in particular, and also of all the rest, in general.

Mr. Tho. Crewe saith, that, though the calling of a parl. and the continuing, prorogation and dissolving of it be in the king’s sole power, yet, when we are called, we are, without limitation, to deal in what business ourselves think best; for otherwise shall we not be able to do their business, for whom we come hither, which is that of the country. He would not have this Committee to insist so much on particulars, as on the generality of our privileges.

Sir Edw. Coke would not have us here, at this time, in the handling and debating of our privileges, to meddle with War or Marriage; and would have a sub-committee appointed for this: and this sub-committee shall consider of all those matters, which are mentioned in the writ of parliament, and also of our Liberty of Speech, and of our power to punish those that speak too lavishly; and of our power to meddle and debate of what we shall, of ourselves, think fit.—The Heads to be considered of by the sub-committee for Privileges. 1. Concerning Freedom of Speech; and therein to treat ‘de arduis et urgentibus negotiis regni,’ according to the writ of summons, whether it be concerning the king, or otherwise. 2. Touching the Liberty of this House to punish the misdemeanours of any parliament man in parl. for things whereof this house hath cognisance, whether he ought not to be censured here by the house only. 3. Whether, when we receive commandment from the king, the house shall thereon desist, and not proceed, notwithstanding such command, in any business. 4. Whether our privileges be not our right and inheritance. 5. That the sub-committee shall consider of any thing else, incident to the liberty of the house. 6. Whether it be not fit for us, to make an expression here in the house, that it is an ancient Privilege of parl. that no member of this house shall presume to acquaint the king with any business in debate here, but by order from the whole house, or from the Speaker.

It was then ordered, that a sub-committee shall reduce all these Heads, which have been propounded, into the form of a Protestation; and that they shall render an account, and their reasons of such things, as they shall think not fit to be reduced into a Protestation; and the sub-committee is appointed accordingly, and is to sit this afternoon in the committee chamber. The Speaker being in the chair: it was ordered, that the Speaker shall attend the house at 4 of the clock, this afternoon; that, the sub-committee having drawn the foresaid Heads into the form of a Protestation, and made a report thereof to the grand committee, the house may (if occasion be) confirm the Protestation; because otherwise the king might command the house to be adjourned, before such Protestation be made in the house, and so endanger the validity of its privileges and liberties, in those points, wherein they have seemed to be impeached at this meeting; viz. in those Heads before ordered to be considered of by the sub-committee.

+ Protestation of the Commons concerning Privileges.] Dec. 13. p. m. Mr. Serjeant Ashley, from the sub-committee, presented to the house, the following draught of the protestation concerning the Privileges of the house: viz.

"The Commons, now assembled in parl. being justly occasioned thereunto, concerning sundry Liberties, Franchises, Privileges, and Jurisdictions of Parliament, amongst others not herein mentioned, do make this Protestation following:—That the Liberties, Franchises, Privileges and Jurisdictions of Parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England; and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the king, state, and the defence of the realm, and of the church of England, and the making and maintenance of laws, and redress of mischiefs and grievances, which daily happen within this realm, are proper subjects and matter of counsel and debate in parliament: and that in the handling and proceeding of those businesses every member of the house hath, and of right ought to have Freedom of Speech, to propound, treat, reason and bring to conclusion the same: that the Commons in Parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of those matters, in such order, as, in their judgments shall seem fittest: and that every such member of the said house hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment and molestation (other than by the censure of the house itself) for, or concerning any bill, speaking, reasoning or declaring of any matter or matters, touching the parliament or parliament business; and that, if any of the said members be complained of, and questioned for any thing said or done in parliament, the same is to be shewed to the king, by the advice and assent of all the commons assembled in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information."

The Speaker being in the chair: it was then ordered, that this Protestation shall be entered in the Journal of the house, and there to remain, as of record. And accordingly it was so entered, sitting the house, between 5 and 6 of the clock at night, by candle-light.

The King's Answer to the Petition of Thanks.] Mr. Chancellor of the Dutchy reported, in Answer to the Petition of Thanks and Excuse, which we yesterday sent by him and others to his maj. that he and the rest of the messengers yesterday attended the king, according to the command of the house, and had shortly after their coming to the court access to his maj. and that the king's Answer to the Petition was as followeth:—That he was sorry that this could not be made a session, according to the desire of this House, expressed in our late Petition preferred to his maj. to which he had most willingly assented: that the house knew there was no fault in his maj. who, observing the needless impediments, upon which we took occasion to stay our proceedings, had often admonished us not to lose time; first, by mr. Secretary Calvert, and afterwards by three sundry Letters and Answers. But, since the house conceived the straitness of time (which ourselves had drawn upon us) was such, as it would permit nothing to be done at this time, his maj.

said, he had given order to adjourn the parl. till the 8th of Feb. next, which was the first day his maj. had formerly appointed for our meeting together. His maj. likewise said, that he could not omit to tell us, that he expected other thanks from the house, than we sent him, at this time; namely, for his gracious promises, to be as careful to maintain our Privileges, as his maj.'s own sovereign prerogative; first contained in his Answer to our Petition, and afterwards as clearly explained and enlarged by his maj.'s next Letter to mr. secretary Calvert, as his wit, for our safety, satisfaction and advantage could possibly devise." Mr. Chancellor added withal, that the king seemed well pleased, and said, that our petition was a mannerly and well penned petition.

The King's Memorial on striking the Protestation of the Commons out of their Journal Book.] The above Protestation of the Commons concerning their Privileges was, as before stated, entered of Record in the Journals of the house. But how the king relished it will best appear, by his sending for the Journal book of the Commons, in Council, and striking out this Protestation with his own hands;* and by the following Memorial, which was published a few days after:

"His most excellent maj. coming this day to the Council, the prince his highness, and all the lords and others of his maj.'s privy council sitting about him, and all the judges then in London, which were 6 in number, there attending upon his maj.; the clerk of the commons house of parliament was called for, and commanded to produce his Journal-Book, wherein was noted, and entries made of most passages that were in the commons house of parl.; and amongst other things there was written down the Form of a Protestation concerning sundry Liberties, Privileges, and Franchises of Parliament; with which Form of Protestation his maj. was justly offended. Nevertheless his maj. in a most gracious manner, there expressed, That he never meant to deny the house of commons any lawful privileges that ever they had enjoyed; but whatsoever privileges or liberties they had by any law or statute, the same should be inviolably preserved unto them; and whatsoever privileges they enjoyed by custom, or uncontrolled and lawful precedent, his maj. would be careful to preserve. But this Protestation of the commons' house, so contrived and carried as it was, his maj. thought fit to be razed out of all Memorials, and utterly to be annihilated; both in respect of the manner by which it was gained, and the matter therein contained. For the manner of getting it, first, in respect of the time: for after such time as his maj. out of his princely grace, and to take away all mistakings, had directed his Letters to secretary Calvert, dated at Royston, 16 Dec. and therein had so explained himself, in the point of maintaining the Privileges of the house of commons, as that most of the said house rested fully satisfied, and freed from any scruple of having their liberties impeached: and after that, by his maj.'s Letters, directed to the Speaker, 13th Dec. being Tuesday, his maj. at the humble suit of the house of commons, condescended to make this meeting a session before Christmas, and for that purpose had assigned Saturday following: now, upon this very Tuesday, and while the messengers from the house of commons were with his maj. at Theobald's, to return thanks unto his maj. and therewith an excuse from them not to make it a session, in respect of the strait of time whereunto they were driven; which deferment his maj. admitted of at their desires, and thereupon gave order for the adjournment of the parl. until the 8th of Feb. next, which was the first day formerly appointed by his maj. for the meeting together of the parl.: and whilst their messengers were with his maj. and had received a gracious Answer to return unto their house; even that afternoon, a committee was procured to be made for taking their Liberties into consideration: and this afternoon a Protestation was made (to whom, appears not) concerning their liberties; and at six o'clock at night, by candle-light, the same Protestation was brought into the house by the committee; and at that time of night it was called upon to be put to the question, there not being the third part of the house then present; whereas in all matters of weight, their usual custom is, to put nothing of importance to the question, till the house be full: and at this time many of them that were present, expected the question would have been deferred to another day, and a fuller house; and some then present stood up to have spoken to it, but could not be seen or heard in that darkness and confusion.—Now for the matter of the Protestation, it is penned in such ambiguous and general words, as may serve for future times to invade most of the rights and prerogatives annexed to the imperial crown; the claim of some Privileges being grounded upon the words of the writ for assembling the parl. wherein some words, viz. Arduis Regni, are cunningly mentioned; but the word quibusdam, which restraineth the generality to such particular cases, as his maj. pleaseth to consult with them upon, is purposely omitted. These things considered, his maj. did, this present day, in full assembly of his Council, and in the presence of the judges, declare the said Protestation to be invalid, annulled, void, and of no effect: and did further, manu sua propria, take the said Protestation out of the Journal Book of the clerk of the commons house of parliament; and commanded an act of council to be made thereupon, and this act to be entered in the register of council-causes.—Whitehall, Dec. 30, 1621."

Having now brought down the Proceedings of the Commons to the end of this parliament, we shall shortly revert to what was passing during this period in the House of Lords.

Further Proceedings in the case of sir John Bennet.] It may be asked, What was become sir John Bennet's affair, which was entered into with so much warmth at the last sitting of parl. but we hear no more of it in this, than his making his appearance to save his bail, and being ordered to attend from day to day; which proved so tedious, that sir John petitioned the house either to be tried, or discharged from so close an attendance. This was not complied with, and he was obliged to wait, without any trial, till the 17th of Dec. on which day it being signified to the house, that sir John was so sick that he could not, without great danger of his life, make his personal appearance, it was agreed that the said sir John should stand upon his bail for his appearance, but not to incur any danger of forfeiture for his non-appearance, at this time, by reason of his indisposition. Thereupon the Lord Keeper acquainted the house, That many petitions were exhibited, every morning, against the said sir John, which were much called upon. It was agreed, 'That, lest the justice and care of this house, to question the said sir John for the same, may be doubted of, notice shall be given to the petitioners, that this time was designed for greater affairs, and too short now to proceed against him upon those complaints; but that the lords did resolve, at the next access, to proceed against him effectually.' As this next meeting never took place, in this reign, it is very probable, if sir John did not die of this illness, that he got off his trial and censure by the confusion of the times; for his bail would be discharged in course, at the dissolution of the Parliament.

Proceedings against sir J. Bouchier for aspersing the lord keeper Williams.] Sir John Bouchier, a Yorkshire knight, had presented a Petition to the Lords, on the 3d of Dec. complaining of some indirect dealing in the lord keeper of the great seal, for not giving a sufficient hearing to a cause of his in chancery, and refusing to re-hear the same. The Lords took this petition into consideration, for several days together; and, after examining several witnesses, pro and con, came, at last, to this Resolution on the question, That the lord keeper was freed from any precipitate or hasty hearing of sir John Bouchier's cause, as was alledged in his petition. And, on a second question, it was agreed, That the said sir John should receive some censure or punishment for the same.—Accordingly, Dec. 12. the Sentence against sir John was assented to, viz. "That he should make an acknowledgment, in their house, and in chancery, of his fault; and that he should be imprisoned." But the lord keeper saying, That the said sir John behaved himself well and temperately, at the hearing of his cause in chancery, and beseeching their lordships to remit the acknowledgment of his fault in that court, and likewise his imprisonment; the Lords highly commended the lord keeper's clemency, and remitted both. Then sir John being brought to the bar, and his Acknowledgment, ready drawn up, being delivered to him, he kneeling, said, "My Lords, in obedience to the Judgment of this House, I humbly submit myself;" and then read the same in these words: "Whereas, by the honourable Sentence of the lords spiritual and temporal, I stand convicted of a great misdemeanour, for taxing and laying an imputation on the lord keeper of the great seal of England; I do in all humbleness, acknowledge the justice of that their Sentence, and also mine own fault and offence, and am heartily sorry therefore; I do, therefore, crave pardon, both of your lordships, in general, and of the lord keeper, in particular."—Then, being commanded to stand up, the lord keeper told him, That, at his request, the Lords did remit the Acknowledgment to be made in chancery, and also his imprisonment: for which the said sir John most humbly thanked their lordships, and particularly the lord keeper. But, notwithstanding the mildness of this Sentence, for traducing the then principal officer of state, this man lived in the next reign, not only to vote the House of Lords out of doors, but also to embroe his hands in his sovereign's blood, as will be seen in the sequel.

The Lords propose a meeting with the Commons on the Supply.] Dec. 14. Things being in a confused state, already mentioned, between the king and the house of commons, and no likelihood of a Supply from that quarter, a motion was made in the House of Lords, by the lord Digby, to put the Commons in mind, "That this session was called to provide a present support for the Palatinate, as was delivered, by message from his maj. unto both houses, at the beginning thereof." His lordship likewise said, "That he had since received many advertisements of the great and present danger the Palatinate was then in; as well by the army of the duke of Bavaria, in pursuit of count Mansfield, as also by the army of that count, who came for the defence of the Palatinate, if he be not speedily supplied with means from hence to support it: because that country was not able to pay the soldiers, nor to feed so great an army; which must be in great distress for want of such relief. That divers terms of peace had been offered the count, very fair for himself; yet he would not hearken to any, so long as he hoped to be relieved from England, and might in any reasonable time, be assured thereof. Which advertisements of the danger and hope of the Palatinate, his lordship thought good, in discharge of his duty to the king, to acquaint their lordships with, that they might take the same into their consideration." The lords having duly weighed the matter, it was agreed, That there shall be a meeting with the house of commons concerning the narration made by the lord Digby. And it was also agreed, That, at the said meeting, the lord keeper shall first make an introduction, and the lord Digby shall proceed in his narration to the Commons. Then the lord Digby desired to be directed by the house, or a committee, in his narration; and it was ordered, That his lordship should put down the heads thereof in writing against the next morning: at which time it was again agreed, That it should be delivered as a narrative only.—But no message for this meeting was ever sent to the Commons; for, on the 18th of Dec. his royal highness the Prince presented a Commission, from the king, for the adjournment of this parl. to the 8th of Feb. ensuing.

Proclamation setting forth the King's Reasons for dissolving the Parliament.] But before the day arrived to which the parl. was adjourned, the King thought proper to issue a Proclamation, for the dissolution of it, containing his reasons for so doing. The following is a copy of the said Proclamation as given in Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xvii. p. 344.

"A Proclamation for dissolving this present Parliament.

"Albeit the assembling, continuing, and dissolving of Parliament, be a prerogative so peculiarly belonging to our imperial crown, and the times and seasons thereof so absolutely in our own power, that we need not give account thereof unto any; yet, according to our continual custom to make our good subjects acquainted with the reasons of all our public resolutions and actions; we have thought it expedient at this time to declare, not only our pleasure and resolution therein, grounded upon mature deliberation, with the advice and uniform consent of our whole privy-council, but therewith also, to note some special Proceedings moving us to this resolution; and that chiefly to this end, that as God, so the world may witness with us that it was our intent to have made this the happiest parl. that ever was in our time; and that the lett and impediment thereof being discerned, all misunderstandings and jealousies might be removed; and all our people may know and believe that we are as far from imputing any of those ill accidents, that have happened in parl. to any want or neglect of duty or good affection towards us by them in general, or by the greater or better number of parliament-men; as we are confident, the true causes discovered, they will be far from imputing it to any default in us, there having in the beginning of this late assembly passed greater and more infallible tokens of love and duty from our subjects to us their sovereign, and more remarkable testimonies from us of our princely care and zeal of their welfare, than have been in any parl. met in any former age.—This parl. was by us called, as for making good and profitable laws, so more especially in this time of miserable distraction throughout Christendom, for the better settling of peace and religion, and restoring our children to their antient and lawful patrimony; which we attempted to procure by peaceable treaty, at our own excessive charge, thereby to save and prevent the effusion of Christian blood, the miserable effect of war and dissension; yet, with full purpose, if that succeeded not, to recover it by the sword, and, therefore, as a necessary means conducing to those ends, the supply of our treasures was to be provided for.—This parl. beginning in Jan. last, proceeded some months with such harmony between us and our people as cannot be paralleled by any former time; for as the house of commons at the first, both in the manner of their supply and otherwise, shewed greater love and more respect than ever any house of commons did to us, or, as we think, to any king before us; so we upon all their complaints have afforded them such memorable and rare examples of justice as many ages past cannot shew the like; wherein, that we preferred the weal of our people before all particular respects, the things themselves do sufficiently prove, our justice being extended not only to persons of ordinary rank and quality, but, even to the prime Officer of our kingdom; and, although, after their first recess, at Easter, we found that they mispent a great deal of time, rather upon the enlarging of the limits of their liberties, and divers other curious and unprofitable things, than upon the framing and proponing of good and profitable laws; yet, we gave them time and scope for their parliamentary proceedings, and prolonged the session to an unusual length, continuing it until the 28th of May, before we signified our purpose for their recess; and then we declared that we would make a recess on the 4th of June next following, but only for a time, and in such manner as might be without disturbance to any of the business in hand; expressing out of our grace, though we needed not, the causes of that our purpose, which were the season of the year, usually hot and unfit for great assemblies; our progress approaching; the necessity we had to make use of our council attending in both houses, both to settle our weighty affairs of state before we went, and to attend us when we went our progress; the disfurnishing our ordinary courts of justice so many terms together; the long absence of justices of peace and deputy-lieutenants, whose presence was needful for making and returning of musters, and for subordinate government of the country: And therefore we appointed to adjourn the parl. on the 4th of June, giving that warning longer than usual, that they might set in order their business, and prepare their grievances, which we promised both to hear and answer before that recess; for presenting whereof we appointed them a time.—This Message, graciously intended by us, was not so well entertained by some, who in a short time dispersed and spread their jealousies unto others, and thereby occasioned discontentment in the house, for being adjourned without passing of bills; yet made not their address to us as was meet, but desired a Conference with the Lords, and at that Conference, the 29th day of May, under colour of desiring to petition us for some further time to perfect and pass some special bills, were emboldened not only to dispute, but to refel all the reasons that we had given for the adjournment; which being made known unto us, we again signified our pleasure to both houses, that on the 4th day of June the parl. should rise, but we would then give our royal assent to such bills as were or should be ready and fit to be then passed, continuing all other businesses in the state they were, by a special act to be framed for that purpose.—The Lords with all duty and respect submitted to our Resolution, passed the act, and sent it with special recommendation to the House of Commons; but they neither read it nor proceeded with business, but forgetting that the time was ours and not theirs, continued their discontent, as they pretended, for being so soon dismissed.—We, though it were strange to observe such averseness for our resolving, upon such weighty reasons, that wherein we needed not be measured by any other rule but our own princely will, yet were contented to descend from our right, to alter our resolution, and to continue the session for a fortnight more, wherein they might perfect such public bills as were esteemed of most importance; for which purpose, we ourself came in person unto the higher house of parl. and made offer thereof unto them; which being, in effect, as much as the Commons had formerly desired, was no sooner offered, but yielding thanks to us, the said Commons resolved, the same day, directly contrary to their former desire, to refuse it, and to accept our first resolution of an adjournment, but attending us at Greenwich presented no Grievances.—This inconstancy as we passed it by with a gentle admonition, so, for the matter of Grievances, as well of England as Ireland, we promised to take them into our own care, though not presented to us, and really performed the same so far as the time and the advice of our council of each kingdom could enable us; as is witnessed by our several Proclamations published in both realms, as, likewise, in granting, at the same time, those three suits which were propounded unto us by the archbishop of Canterbury, at the request and in the name of both the houses; but, in conclusion, the House of Commons making it their choice, we made a recess by adjournment of the parl. the 4th day of June; though, indeed, we must do them this right, that at the said recess, taking into their serious consideration the present estate of our children abroad and the general afflicted estate of the true professors of religion in foreign parts, they did, with one unanimous consent, in the name of themselves and the whole body of the kingdom, make a most dutiful and solemn Protestation, That if our pious endeavours, by treaty, to procure their peace and safety, should not take that good effect which was desired in the treaty, whereof they humbly besought us not to suffer any long delay; then upon signification of our pleasure in parl. they would be ready to the uttermost of their powers both with lives and fortunes to assist us, so as that, by the Divine help of Almighty God, we might be able to do that by our sword which by peaceable courses should not be effected.—But during the time of this long recess, having to our great charges mediated with the

emperor by the means of our ambassador, the lord Digby, and having found those hopes to fail which we had to prevail by treaty; we in confidence of the assistance of our people, thus freely promised and protested in parl. did instantly shorten the time of the recess, which we had before appointed to continue until the 8th day of Feb. and did re-assemble our parl. the 20th day of Nov. last, and made known unto them the true state and necessity of our children's affairs; declaring our resolution unto them of taking upon us the defence of our children's patrimony by way of arms, since we could not compass it by an amicable treaty, and therefore expected the fruit of that their Declaration, whereby we were invited unto this course.—Wherein, howbeit we are all well satisfied of the good inclination of most part of our House of Commons, testified by their ready assent to the speedy payment of a Subsidy newly to be granted; yet, upon this occasion, some particular members of that house took such inordinate liberty, not only to treat of our high prerogatives, and of sundry things, that, without our special direction, were no fit subjects to be treated of in parl. but, also, to speak with less respect of foreign princes, our allies, than was fit for any subject to do of any anointed king, tho' in enmity and hostility with us.—And when, upon this occasion, we used some reprehension touching those miscarriages, requiring them not to proceed but in such things as were within the capacity of that house according to the continual custom of our predecessors; then, by the means of some evil-affected and discontented persons, such heat and distemper was rais'd in the house, that, albeit themselves had sued unto us for a session, and for a general pardon, unto both which, at their earnest suit, we assented; yet, after this fire kindled, they rejected both, and setting apart all businesses of consequence and weight, notwithstanding our admonition and earnest pressing them to go forward, they either sat as silent, or spent the time in disputing of Privileges, descanting upon the words and syllables of our Letters and Messages; which for better clearing of truth, and satisfaction of all men, we are about to publish in print so soon as possible we can: and, although, in our Answer to their Petition, we gave them full assurance that we would be as careful of the preservation of their Privileges as of our own royal Prerogative, and in our Explanation after sent unto them by our Letters written to our Secretary, we told them that we never meant to deny them any lawful Privileges that ever that house enjoyed in our Predecessors times, and that whatsoever Privileges or Liberties they enjoyed by any law or statute should ever be inviolably preserved by us, and we hoped our posterity would imitate our footsteps therein; and whatsoever Privileges they enjoyed by long custom, and uncontrolled and lawful precedents, we would likewise be as careful to preserve them, and transmit the care thereof to our posterity; confessing ourselves, in justice, to be bound to maintain them in their rights, and, in grace, that we were rather minded to increase that infringe any of them, if they should so deserve at our hands; which might satisfy any reasonable man that we were far from violating their privileges.—And altho', by our Letters, written to their Speaker, we advised them to proceed and make this a session, to the end our good and loving subjects might have some taste, as well of our grace and goodness towards them by our free Pardon and good laws to be passed, as they had both by the great and unusual examples of justice since our meeting, and the so many eases and comforts given unto them by Proclamation; and although we had given order for the Pardon to go on, and that in a more gracious and liberal manner than had passed in many years before; and signified our willingness, that, rather than time should be mispent, they might lay aside the thought of the Subsidy, and go on with an act for Continuance of Statutes, and the general Pardon: yet all this prevailed not to satisfy them, either for their pretended Privileges, or to persuade them to proceed with bills for the good of themselves, and those that sent them. But as the session and pardon were by them well desired at first, so were they as ill rejected at the last; and, notwithstanding the sincerity of our protestations not to invade their privileges, yet, by persuasion of such as had been the cause of all these distempers, they fall to carve for themselves; and pretending, causelessly, to be occasioned thereunto, in an unseasonable hour of the day, and a very thin house, contrary to their own customs in all matters of weight, conclude and enter a Protestation for their Liberties, in such ambiguous and general words, as might serve for future times to invade most of our inseparable rights and prerogative annexed to our imperial crown; whereof, not only in the times of other our progenitors, but in the blessed reign of our late predecessor, that renowned queen Elizabeth, we found our crown actually possessed; an usurpation that the maj. of a king can by no means endure.—By all which may appear, that, howsoever in the general proceedings of that house, there are many footsteps of loving and well-affected duty towards us, yet some ill-tempered spirits, have sowed tares among the corn, and thereby frustrated the hope of that plentiful and good harvest, which might have multiplied the wealth and welfare of this whole land; and, by their cunning diversions, have imposed upon us, a necessity of discontinuing this present parl. without putting unto it the name or period of a session.—And therefore, whereas the said assembly of parl. was, by our commission, adjourned until the 8th day of Feb. now next ensuing, we minding not to continue the same any longer; and therefore not holding it fit to cause the prelates, noblemen, and states, of this our realm, or the knights, citizens and burgesses of the same parl. to travel thereabout; have thought fit to signify this our resolution, with the reasons thereof, unto all our subjects, inhabiting in all parts of this realm; willing and requiring the said prelates, noblemen and states, and also the said knights, citizens, and burgesses, and all others to whom, in this case, it shall appertain, that they forbear to attend at the day and place prefixed by the said adjournment; and in so doing they are and shall be discharged thereof against us: and we do hereby further declare, that the said convention of parl. neither is, nor, after the ceasing and breaking thereof, shall be, nor ought to be esteemed, adjudged, or taken to be, or make any session of parl.—And albeit we are at this time enforced to break off this convention of parl. yet our will and desire is, that all our subjects should take notice, for avoiding of all sinister suspicions and jealousies, that our intent and full resolution is to govern our people in the same manner as our progenitors and predecessors, kings and queens of this realm, of best government, have heretofore done; and that we shall be careful, both in our person, and by charging our privy council, our judges, and other our ministers, in their several places respectively, to distribute true justice and right unto all our people; and that we shall be glad to lay hold of the first occasion, in due and convenient time, which we hope shall not be long, to call and assemble our parliament, with confidence of the true and hearty love and affection of our subjects as either we, or any of our progenitors have at any time heretofore. Given at our palace of Westminster, the sixth day of January, 1621. Per ipsum Regem."

Several Members committed to Prison.] The "ill-tempered spirits" the king alludes to in this Proclamation, were several leading members of the house of commons; amongst whom, we are told, sir Edw. Coke and sir Rob. Philips, were committed to the Tower; and mr Selden, mr. Pymme and mr. Mallory to other prisons. Orders were given for sealing up the locks and doors of sir Edw. Coke's chambers, in London, and in the Temple, and for the seizing his papers. And the Council, debating about the general Pardon that should have passed this last parl. had considered about the ways of excluding him from that benefit, either by preferring a bill against him, before the publication of the Pardon, or, by exempting this eminent lawyer, by name; for which they said, they had precedents.—As a lighter punishment, sir Dudley Digges, sir Th. Crew, sir Nath. Rich, and sir James Perrot were sent into Ireland, joined in commission with others, under the great seal of England, for enquiring into sundry matters concerning his majesty's service, as well in the government ecclesiastic and civil, as in point of the king's revenues, and otherwise, within that kingdom. Sir P. Hayman, of Kent, was sent into the Palatinate; and, not long after this, sir John Savile, knight of the shire for the county of York, who carried all that country at a beck, and a powerful man in the house of commons, was made comptroller of the king's household, a privy counsellor, and, not long after, a baron. See Rushworth, vol 1, p. 55.

A new Parliament called.] The two succeeding years were almost wholly taken up carrying on the Spanish Match, and the Prince's Journey into Spain to effect it. The Prince and Buckingham being both returned to England from their fruitless expedition, and many exigencies of state requiring it; the king was advised to call a new parliament, notwithstanding his disagreeable parting with the last. Accordingly writs were sent out for one to meet at Westminster on the 12th of Feb. 1623, or the 21st year of this reign. But before we enter into the proceedings of this parliament we shall present the reader with a view of the State of the Peerage at this time:

The King's Speech at the opening of the Sessions.] The parl. being assembled on the 12th of Feb. they were, by commission, adjourned to the 16th, and from thence, by another commission to the 19th of the same month. On which day, being all met again and the Commons called up, the king was pleased to make the following speech :

"My lords spiritual and temporal, and you that are gentlemen of the house of commons of this present parliament :"

"It is a true saying and uttered by the spirit of God, 'that the glory of a king stands in the multitude of his people :' and I am sure it is as true, That the strength of a kingdom, stands next and immediately after God's protection, in the hearts of the people. That you may see and have a proof that I have not this only in my tongue, but have it likewise settled in my heart, (as God can bear me record every way) I have called you at this time to speak my mind freely to you ; for, remembering the misunderstandings between me and you before, I am now come hither with an earnest desire to do the duty which God hath called me unto by declaring unto you the verity of this which God hath put into my heart, and to manifest my actions to be true by my words. I remember very well, that it is a very fit similitude for a king and his people to be likened to a husband and wife ; for, even as Christ, in whose throne I sit in this part of the earth, is the husband to the church and the church his spouse, so I likewise desire to be your husband, and you should be my spouse ; and, therefore, as it is the husband's part to cherish his wife, to entreat her kindly, to reconcile himself towards her, and procure her love by all means, so it is my part to do the like to my people.—There are but two ways for a king to shew his love to his people ; one, in the constant good government of them during his life ; the other by his behaviour to their representative body in parl. For the first, God knoweth, I desire my government may be performed, with an honest, just, true and sincere heart ; and there is none of you that see or hear me this day but have found the fruit of it, one time or other. For the other part, belonging to the representative body, which is now the cause of calling you together, what greater evidence can there be to shew love between you and me, and between me and you, that are the representative body, in a right understanding, than, out of my own mouth and direction, to give you a taste of my love and care of you all.—The properties and causes of calling a parliament, (and so go the writs) are to confer with the king, and give him their advise in matters of greatest weight and importance. For this cause I have now called you together, that ye may have proof of my love and of my trust, and give me your advice, in the greatest matter that ever could concern a king ; a greater declaration of my trust in you I cannot give.—I have been these many years upon Treaties, as far as I thought (and God is my witness I never had any other intention) for settling a peace in Christendom and settling a peace at home. In these Treaties I went long on, but finding them to have slower success than I expected, or had reason to do, I was willing, (and especially in one thing concerning the estate of my grand-children) to see a good and speedy end. In this, finding as great promises as I could wish, and yet finding their actions quite contrary, it stirred up my son to offer himself to make that Journey ; and I thank God, having him now here, I have no cause to repent of it. For, being of full age and ripeness for marriage, he urged me to know the certainty, in a matter of so great weight, that he might not be put off with long delays ; for delays, in such a case, are more dangerous than denials.—In it I was content as a rare example, to grant his desire : and with him I only, sent the man whom I most trusted, Buckingham ; commanded him never to leave him nor return home without him. And I thank God for it, for it hath learned me wisdom ; for, in 'generalibus versatur dolus.' I had general hopes before, but Particulars will resolve matters, Generals will not ; and, before this Journey, things came to me as raw as if I had never heard of them before. I was as far disappointed of my ends as if I had been waked out of a dream ; now I have put it into a certainty ; and, whereas I walked in a mist before, I have now brought it to light.—Now, my lords, for the Particulars, they are gone so far as, both in the Treaty of the Match and of the Palatinate, that I know the utmost. I am resolved upon what I am like to obtain, and have had promises and projects, and some of them lately. But, to shew the trust that I put in you, I am content that my secretaries, from the information and assurance of my son and Buckingham, shall relate unto you all : and when you have heard all, 'super totam materiam,' I shall then entreat your good and sound advice, for the glory of God, the peace of the kingdom, and the good of my children. Never king gave more trust to his subjects than to desire their advice in things of this weight. For, I assure you, ye may freely advise me, seeing, of my princely fidelity, ye are intreated thereto. Never subjects had better hearts and experience to give me good advice than you; of which I make no doubt, for, if you love yourselves, you will give it me, your own felicity depending upon it.—One Particular I must remember you of, because it hath been much talked of in the country, that I should be slack in my care of Religion for other occasions.—My lords, and you gentlemen all, I pray you judge me charitably, as you would be judged; for, I never made public or private Treaties, but I always had a direct reservation for the public-weal and the cause of Religion, for the glory of God and good of my subjects. I only thought good sometimes to wink and connive at the execution of some penal laws, and not to go on so rigorously as at other times, but not to dispense with any, or to forbid or alter any that concern Religion. I never promised or yielded, I never did think it with my heart, nor spoke it with my mouth. It is true, a skilful horseman doth not always use the spur; but sometimes the bridle, and sometimes the spur: so a king, that governs wisely, is not bound to carry a rigorous hand over his subjects upon all occasions; but may sometimes slacken the bridle, yet so as his hands be not laid off the reins. And so much for that point, to be cleared upon all occasions.—Now albeit it be a great matter to require your advice, yet in this I pray remember the weight of the business. I cannot limit you hours nor days, but your own hearts must do it; for every man, by nature, thinks the time long here, according to his own occasions at home. Therefore consider the State of Christendom and the State of my Grand Children, my own Estate and the State of my kingdom, the Treaties and all, and then upon all you are to give me your advice.—My lords; It is not enough, altho' you are never so willing to give me your advice; for to plant will not serve the turn, if I, like a good gardener, as well as plant, do not weed away from the roots, and remove the obstacles that hinder your so good advice: of which, the whole weed and manifest hindrance that can be, is your jealousy of me: free me from that, and, for my actions, I dare avow them before God and his angels. But jealousy hath a deep sting, take away that, and nothing can do me harm: you are my wife, and jealousy is subject to a wife; therefore remove it, and be not jealous of me.—For matters of Privileges, Liberties, and Customs, be not over curious; I am your own kindly king. Ye never shall find me curious in these things: therefore do what you ought, and no more than your lawful Liberties and Privileges will permit, and ye shall never see me curious to the contrary. I had rather maintain your liberties than alter them in any thing. Show a trust in me, and go on honestly as you ought to do, like good and faithful subjects; and, what you have warrant for, go on with, and I will not be curious, unless you give me too much cause.—The next thing is, to beware that you take not in hand the maintaining of idle questions among you; which spoils good business. Remember, 'beware of genealogies and curious questions,' as St Paul speaks; and do you keep to the ground and gravity of the great business for which I call you; and next, for all other things that are for the great and good governing of the kingdom. Let not any stir you up to law-questions, debates, quirks, tricks and jerks; but continue yourselves in that honest modesty, whereby you may have my prayers to God for you, and procure the love of me, and an happy end to this parl.—God judge me, I speak as a Christian prince, never man, in a dry and sandy desart, where no water is, did thirst more in hot weather for drink, than I do now for a happy conclusion of this parl. I now hope, after the miscarriage of the last, that this may prove happy. I am neither curious nor captious enough to prevent it. Eschew all occasions of curious questions, which may hinder you in this great cause for which I have called you; and remember, That spending of time is spoiling of business. And I hope in God, and that by a faith in God, that, by your actions this parl. I shall clearly see your hearts; and that you are the true representative body of my subjects: for you know in your conscience, that of all the kings that ever were, I dare say never was king better beloved of his people than I am.—Therefore, be you true glasses and mirrors of their faces, and be sure you yield the true reflections and representations as you ought to do. And this doing, I hope you shall not only find the blessing of God; but also, by these actions, procure the thanks and love of whole people, for being such true and faithful glasses. And you shall never find me desire any thing of you, but what shall tend to the common good and weal of the kingdom."

His majesty having ended his speech, the Lord Keeper [John Williams bishop of Lincoln and dean of Westminster] by his commands, directed the Commons to repair to their own house, and choose a Speaker. The names of receivers and tryers of Petitions, being also read, the parl. was adjourned to the 21st.

The Speaker's Speech to the King.] Feb. 21. The Commons presented to the king sir Tho. Crewe, knt, sergeant at law, for their Speaker; whose excuse, for insufficiency, &c. being not allowed of, he was confirmed accordingly. Upon which he addressed himself to the throne, in hæc verba:

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—Since I can not bring an olive-branch in my hand as a sign of my peace; and that God, (in whose hands are the hearts of kings) without whose providence a sparrow doth not fall to the ground, whom no man can resist, hath inclined your maj. to cast your eye of grace on me, and to confirm me in this place: I am taught in the best school, 'that obedience is better than sacrifice;' and will only say with a learned father, 'da Domine quod jubes, & jube quod vis;' otherwise I have great cause to be afraid of such a charge, to be executed before so great a maj. and in so great an assembly; but that I hope your maj. will extend your sceptre of grace, as Ahasuerus did, to sustain me in my fainting.—Your maj. is princeps hereditarius, descended from both the Roses, and hath united both the kingdoms. At your first entrance you wrought a wonder in the tumult of our cares, and cloud of our fears, happening upon the death of the late queen, by the bright beams of your sunshine; which a poet elegantly express'd, 'Mira cano, sol occubuit, nox nulla secuta est.' There was a David in Hebron, and no Ishbosheth to disturb your peaceable entrance; but the acclamations of all your subjects and commons, concurring to express their great contentment. This was no sudden flash of joy, but a constant blessing, by the continuance of the Gospel and true religion, maugre the malice and hellish invention of those, who would have blown up all at once; but God laughed them to scorn, and they fell into their own trap. These things I leave to your maj.'s royal remembrance, as a duty to be practised, and to be expressed by our thankfulness to our holy God; for it is a good thing to be thankful: 'non est dignas dandis, qui non agit gratias pro datis.'—Since my designment to this place, I called to mind these statutes of late times, and find two of especial note: the first 32 Hen. 8. which was called 'Parliamentum doctum,' for the many good laws made for the settling of possessions. The other is 39 Eliz.; which, by a reverend divine, was called 'Parliamentum pium;' because the subjects were enabled to found hospitals without licence of mortmain, or ad quod damnum, and other charitable laws, which I omit, being not perpetual. And I likewise called to mind many glorious offers made by your maj. and other good provisions at the last two meetings. Now your maj. hath stretched forth your sceptre to call us to you again, and hath made declaration, that all jealousies and distractions might be removed, and the memory of parliament nullities might be buried. And my desire is, that your maj.'s influence may distil upon us, and we proceed in such a sweet harmony and conjunction, that 'righteousness and peace may kiss each other,' and that 'mercy and truth may meet,' and the world may say, 'ecce quam bonum & quam jucundum regem & populum convenire in unum.'—And, for perfecting this work, the good bills against Monopolies, Informers, and Concealers, may now pass, and receive strength, with general, liberal, and royal pardon, according to the bounty of the late queen; that so this parl. may be called, 'felix, doctum, et pium;' which will be good to your subjects, and no diminution to your revenue, or derogation to your prerogative; which, in your maj.'s hands, is a sceptre of gold; but, in other hands, is a rod of iron. I need not speak in the praise of the fundamental common laws; 'veritas temporis filia,' time hath sufficiently justified them. Monarchy is the best government; and of monarchies, those which are hereditary. The best Supply of your maj.'s wants is in parliament, where the subject is bound by his own consent; other courses of Benevolence come heavily. The subjects enjoy the gospel freely by your protection, and your maj. may be safe in their loyalty: other safeties are but as Ajax his shield, a weight rather than a defence. Their desire is, that the good laws for religion may be confirmed; and that the generation of locusts, jesuits and seminary priests, which were wont to creep in corners, and do now come abroad, may be, by the execution of these good laws, as with an east wind, blown over the sea. Our late queen Eliz. lived and died in peace: the Pope cursed her, but God blessed her: and so shall your maj. having God to your friend, find safety in the ark of true religion, and when you are old and full of days, land you in heaven; and then our hopeful Prince, which sprang out of your own loins, shall sway that sceptre, which you must leave to enjoy a crown celestial. And God, in his due time, will restore the distressed princess, her husband and royal issue, to that inheritance which is now possessed by the usurping sword of their enemies: whereof we are the more confident, because that country was heretofore a sanctuary in our distress, when religion was here persecuted. Cato was wont to say, 'hoc sentio, & Carthago destruenda est:' but I say, 'hoc sentio, & Palatinatus recuperandus est.'—The question was put to a Lacedemonian, Why their city wanted walls? who answered, 'Concord was their walls.' Your maj. under God, is a sole and entire monarch, whose walls are the Ocean without, and fortified within with a wall of brass, the bond of unity and religion; and happy is that place, of which it may be said, as of Jerusalem, 'It is a city at unity within itself.' Neither is your government confined within the limits of this kingdom, but extends itself to Ireland; where your maj.'s care and pains, in our late employment, gave divers provident directions for the setting forth of religion, the reforming of courts of justice, and the inflicting punishment on the disturbers of the public peace. And I am ocularis testis, that you have made these ample endowments of churches out of your own excheated revenue, as will be to your honour in all posterity.* But my desire is, as well in the beginning, as in all other our proceedings, our words may be 'vera, pauca, & ponderosa.'—Therefore with your gracious favour, accordingly to ancient precedents, we are humble suitors, that you would be pleased to allow our ancient Privileges;† and that, for our better attendance, our persons, goods, and necessary attendance, may be free from arrests; and that we may have Liberty of free Speech, not doubting but we shall confine ourselves within the limits of duty. And because this great business may give us occasion often to resort to your maj. that upon our public suit, you will be pleased to give us your own fit time of access; and that all our actions may have a benign interpretation, and a good acceptation and opinion.—Lastly, That I may not only be a Speaker, but an humble suitor, protesting by the great God, by whom kings do reign, that whatsoever I have said, hath proceeded from a loyal heart; I therefore desire that I may be covered with the vail of your gracious construction, or acquitted by your gracious pardon.”

The Lord Keeper's Answer to the Speaker's Speech.] The Speaker having finished his harangue, the Lord Keeper first conferred with the king, and then answered as follows:

“Mr. Speaker; his maj. hath heard your speech with no more patience than approbation; and as you have not cast it out into any general parts, no more will I: it is pity to pull down a frame which cannot be set up in so excellent a form again. A mathematician writes, That nothing can be so round, but that points and stops may be found therein; so I may observe, in your round and voluble speech, these distinct parts and articles.—You spoke something of yourself, something of the king, and something of the acts of parl. which are of two natures, some striving for life, others dropping into their graves: something of Common Law in general: something for the ordinary Supply of princes: somewhat of Benevolence: somewhat of the increase of true Religion: somewhat of regaining that which is lost to our enemies: somewhat of preserving our own: and somewhat of the reformation of Ireland. These were your materials; the formals were three. 1. Privileges from Arrests. 2. Freedom of Speech in your house. And, 3. a good interpretation of all when you have left the house.—I shall, from his maj. give Answer to them all, and shall proceed step by step: 1st. For yourself, mr. Speaker: his maj. hath not only stretched out his sceptre with Ahasuerus, but lifted up his voice, ‘quæ est petitio tua & dabitur tibi’; he hath granted all your Petitions, and doth assure you by me, of his especial favour: 2ndly. For the king; we cannot deny God’s blessing of us, and our blessing of God for his royal descent; his peaceable access to the crown; his miraculous preservation in this place; and our comfortable hope of the future. All these ‘ibunt in sæcula sæculorum’.—3dly. For those laws, for settling of possession, that were enacted 32 Hen. 8. which you call ‘Parliamentum doctum’; and those laws of Charity, made in the 39th of the late queen, which you call ‘Parliamentum pium’; and those statutes of grace, which were provided in the last convention, (which his maj. would have made ‘Parliamentum gratiosum’) and the Pardon, which may make this ‘Parliamentum munificum,’ his maj. will take such fit and convenient courses, as may preserve life in the one, and give life to the other; so that you do, ‘cito obstetricare,’ play the good midwife in their birth.—4thly. For the abortives of the late assembly, which you call Parliament-Nullities; ‘quem animus meminisse horret.’ A strange chimera, such as I never read of, but in the articles of the new creed, ‘credo Ecclesiam Romanam Catholicam.’ Parliaments naturally beget entities. God and the king are averse to nullities. The first parl. was the three persons consulting together, ‘faciamus hominem.’ God is a maker and not a destroyer. Every consultation is for some good. Others may commend former laws. You have kept the best law till now. In my opinion, ‘lex oblivionis’ is the best: let the memory of those abortions be buried in the river Lethe, never to rise again.—I will put you in mind of a story, which Tully relates out of Thucydides. The Thebans having overcome the Lacedæmonians, in memory thereof erected a brazen trophy. A complaint was made before the common council of the Amphictions, that, by that trophy, the memory of their discord was made eternal. Their judgment was, that it should be demolished, because it was not fitting that any record should be of discord between Greek and Greek. I leave the application.—5thly. For the Common Law, in general, it is of a convenient disposition, and fit for the climate; so far approved by his maj. that he would never allow any project which was not justifiable by common law.—6thly. For the ordinary Supply of Princes by parl. subsidies are most comfortable to the king and favourable to the subjects; because they issue from the heart, and are brought in by the hands of the people. Benevolence is but an anchor, and a help at a dead lift; because parliaments are a great body and of a slow motion. The king was averse to that way, and had never assented thereunto; but compelled by an intolerable provocation without, and invitation at home; and it was bestowed on that inimitable paragon, once of majesty, but now of patience;* that no man, without malevolence, can find fault with that Benevolence.—7thly. In the next place his maj. returned thanks to you for your care of Religion. Your house was antiently a Chapel; and it still may be said, ‘non domus est, sed templum’; so many men as ye are, so many churchmen. His maj. gives full assurance, that he esteems no estate nor dignity like to that inestimable jewel of Religion; and if any scandal hath been, it hath been taken, not given cause for: and he wisheth with Alphonsus, the great king of Arragon, That all his subjects were kings, that then they might understand and be satisfied. He never spared the execution of any law, but for a greater law, ‘salus reipublicæ’; all the rest are ‘finis sub fine.’ Our observation of any law is not for the written law, but for the commonwealth. All the laws are yet in force; no connivance but for the propagation of true religion. 'What knowest thou, O man! whether the believing husband may save the unbelieving wife?' You have heard his maj.'s simile touching a skilful horseman; which, in Zachariah, is God's simile. Kings are like riders, the commonwealth is the horse, and the law is the bridle; which must be held always with a sure hand, not always with a hard hand: but, 'aliquando remittit ferire eques non amittit habenas.' Yet, if Hagar grow insolent, 'cast out the bond-woman and her son,' his maj.'s resolution is, 'That the son of the bond-woman shall never inherit with the son of the free.' His royal maj. hath given leave to us, that are his chaplains, to put him in mind of this, God is ever careful of kings, and kings cannot be too careful of him. —His maj. giveth you thanks for your just feeling and relenting at the usurpation of that sweet princess from her jointure, and expelling her olive branches from their inheritance. A good cause makes good soldiers. 'Attollit vires militis causa.' It is impossible, by amicable means, to recover the Palatinate; therefore you do well to sort Cato's 'Carthago evertenda,' with 'Palatinatus deglutinanda;' it ought to be unglued again, and pulled out of the clutches of those enemies, who, by force and cunning treaties, usurp the same. The king knows, and we know, and would have all the world know, the care he hath taken in this business; 'Patrias deprehendere curas.' —In the next place, you observe very well the wooden walls of this kingdom, the Navy being his maj.'s special care; and as the carver, who beautified Diana's temple, though it was at the costs of other men, yet was allowed, in divers places, to stamp his own name; so it cannot be denied but that noble lord, who has now spent 7 years study, and is become a master in that art, may grave his name upon his works, yet a fitting distance from his master's. —Lastly; for the Reformation of Ireland. As Pliny said of Trajan, that his care extended not to Italy alone; he hath not only shewed his beams upon this, but upon other countries. His maj. shines upon them by his good laws; and though that kingdom adds little to his crown, it adds much to his glory. —And now, mr. Speaker, what Liberties, Privileges, and Access were ever yielded to any of your predecessors, his maj. now granteth fully and freely, without the least jealousy or diminution. I will only add, out of Valerius Maximus, 'quid Cato sine libertate?' quid libertas sine Catone? What is wisdom without liberty to shew it? And what is liberty without wisdom to use it."

The Lords desire a Conference concerning the Spanish Match and the Palatinate. After this harangue was ended, the house was adjourned to the 23rd of Feb. On which day, after the house was called, and several proxies admitted, the Lords took into consideration the Great Business for which his maj. had summoned this parl. and which he had imparted to them in that house. Their lordships agreed to desire a Conference with the Commons, for the expediting thereof, by the following Message:— "Whereas his maj. in his Speech, had said, 'That he designed the Prince and the duke of Buckingham to signify to both houses the Particulars of the last great Negotiation, and his secretaries to shew the Letters and Papers concerning the same.' Their lordships being desirous to expedite this Great Business, and hold fair correspondence with them, do pray, if their occasions so permit, a Conference to be had between both houses, in the Painted Chamber, to-morrow, at 2 in the afternoon, And if, upon doubt of any of the particulars then related, any of them move any questions, they shall be fully and clearly satisfied therein."

This Message being sent, the house highly approved of the Prince's own offer to assist the duke in his Relation to both houses; and also that the secretaries should attend with their Papers, and produce them as the Narration shall require. Answer to the Message. "That the Commons returned to their lordships hearty thanks for the good correspondence they desire to hold with them: they do most willingly embrace the meeting, as is desired, and will attend their lordships at the time and place appointed."

Feb. 24. On a motion of the Prince, another Message was sent to the Commons, importing, That the Painted Chamber being appointed for the intended Conference that afternoon, their lordships now desire that the said meeting might be in the hall, at Whitehall; that room being better accommodated for ease and hearing. Also to acquaint them with his highness's resolution to assist the duke in his Narration. The Commons readily assented to the first, and declared themselves much satisfied with the Prince's design.

The Lord Keeper's Report of the duke of Buckingham's Negotiations in Spain.— Feb. 25. The now Duke of Buckingham, seven earls, one viscount, and three barons, were introduced into the house of lords, to their several places, with the usual ceremonies. On the Prince's motion, the Report which was to be made this day, by the lord keeper, of the duke's Narration of yesterday, was deferred to the 27th. At which time the Lord Keeper removed from the wool-sack to his place on the earls bench, in order to make his Report; the said Narration having been made to a committee, and not to the house. This Report, which from its great length, would occupy too great a space in this work will be found in vol 3 of the Lords Journals, p. 220. The following are the heads of the said Narration. "The Lord Keeper reported to their lordships, 'That the duke of Buckingham began with a three-fold Preface: the 1st concerning himself. The 2nd concerning the Prince's Highness. And the 3rd concerning the subject whereof he was to treat. As touching the 1st he craved pardon of both houses, if, in the discharge of this great burden, which his maj. had imposed on him, he did not proceed in that order and method, (which left in the memory a sure dint and impression) which the business required; and desired them to consider how unusual it was for him to speak in so great and judicious an auditory. As touching the 2nd he did acknowledge, that, among many great ones, this was none of the least favours his maj. had laid upon him, to put him at this time under the wings and protection of the Prince his highness; without whose help and assistance, he was as unable to govern himself in the parts of the relation, as formerly in the passages of the negotiation. For the 3rd he noted his misfortune to fall upon a subject of such a nature as shall afford little honour to the relator, of what affection or disposition soever he be; for if he be well affected thereunto, and shall speak the truth, he must either blush or wrong his modesty; if otherwise, (as all true-hearted Englishmen must be affected otherwise) he is sure, by laying out all things in their true colours, to be taxed of malice and envy. However, the business being of the greatest importance that Christendom has afforded these many years; and that advice which the parliament was to give his maj. being to be founded in part upon this Relation, he would not be afraid to open so much as might perfectly inform both houses in the present business; but would spare, for all that, (as far as the nature of the Relation would give him leave) to dash upon the ministers employed from the one or the other king.—And this was the effect of his grace's Preface.—In the Narration itself his grace used indeed a close, but yet an exact and perfect method: a man might observe therein 6 distinct and several parts. 1. The Motives of the Prince's Journey to Spain. 2. The Treaty of Marriage, set a foot in Spain, severally, and by itself. 3. The Treaty of the Marriage, and Restitution united together by a reciprocal subordination. 4. The Prince's Return from Spain. 5. His majesty's subsequent proceedings in both the Treaties since the return. 6. The stating the Question, super totam materiam. And therein both the houses were to offer to his maj. their humble advice and counsel. Of these parts his grace spoke very distinctly and orderly." The Lord Keeper having concluded his Report, their lordships adjourned, ad libitum, to debate what they should advise the king to do in this business. And, because his maj. had required to have the advice of both houses, they thought it not fit to proceed further in it at that time; but to have a Conference with the Commons, and to consider, first, What to propose to them at their next meeting.

Feb. 28. The affair was again resumed relating to the Match with Spain and the Recovery of the Palatinate; and though the lords generally agreed, "That they cannot advise about one without the other; and, also, that they had so far declared themselves here, that it is not safe for the king to continue the Treaty on either, nor expect the Restitution of the Palatinate, by any other means than the sword; yet, their lordships do still think it not fit to deliver their single advise, but first to consult the Commons; and when the two houses have agreed thereon, then to deliver the same jointly to his maj." After which a long debate arose, what to propose to the Commons; and, at last it was resolved, That there was no necessity to treat of the Match and the Palatinate together. Also, their lordships were of opinion, That his maj. rely not upon any further Treaties; except they shall hear from the Commons better reasons for it at the conference. And a committee was appointed, of which the duke was the chief, to search for precedents of former treaties and Supplies to the king in matters of this kind. Also, the king's servants were to bring them all such Papers and Dispatches, out of Spain, as they should require.

March 1. The Lords were put in mind of their last Message to the Commons, touching the duke of Buckingham; and they thought good to explain themselves, by another message, on their resolution to give the king satisfaction that the duke is cleared and acquitted, by them, of that which the Spanish ambassador complained of. Therefore, a Message was sent to the lower house, to express their lordships doubt that their meaning was not fully understood; for that they do think it most proper, as the Narration was made to both houses, so both to join, if they so please, in their justification of it to his maj.—After some time, the Commons sent an Answer to the Message, That they were desirous to confer with their lordships about it, by a committee of both houses. The lords appointed the Painted Chamber, and the time to be presently. Accordingly the same day, the abp. of Canterbury made the following Report of this Conference to the whole house.

"That they had conferred with the Commons, about this Complaint of the Spanish ambassador against the duke for his Narration, and that the Commons were so much of one mind with them, as if both houses were twins. That they highly approved of what the duke had done; and that he delivered nothing in his said Narration, but what he was led unto by the matter itself; wherein his grace was so far from transgressing, that he deserved thanks and honour: That they were desirous to join with their lordships, by a committee of their whole house, to signify as much unto his maj. And added, how sensible they were that any unworthy person should relate their secrets abroad, and desired that, whoever it was, he might be discovered, if possible."

In the further proceedings of this day, the duke of Buckingham put the lords in mind of the Grand Affair; and that a speedy resolution was very necessary in it, because time was precious, which the enemy would not pretermitt; and, if they should lose the benefit of the spring, it would be irrecoverable: therefore his grace moved the house, That a committee should be appointed to inspect into the Stores of Munition, and to make such Provision for a Supply thereof as they should think fit. Accordingly, a committee was then appointed, to take a view of the magazines, stores, arms, and munition; to consider about the transportation of ordnance; of the ports of the land, and weakness thereof; of Ireland and of all other things incident to these; to present their opinions to the house of what defects they find, and the means to redress the same.

March 2. The Attorney General read a Letter to the King from the lord Digby, afterwards earl of Bristol, dated Madrid, Jan. 3. After hearing the contents of this Letter, the Lords began to deliberate on what should be delivered to the Commons, at a conference that afternoon, concerning the Grand Affair. And it was agreed, that the lord-keeper should begin with an Induction, out of the duke's Narration; and then acquaint the Commons, That the opinion of their house was to advise the king, 'super totam materiam,' 'That his maj. cannot, with the safety of his own honour, or convenience of religion and the state, proceed any further for the Treaty of the Prince's Match, nor rely any longer on that for the Recovery of the Palatinate.'—It was also agreed, that the lord-keeper should deliver unto the Commons, by way of supplement, first, concerning the Treaty of Marriage, That it appeared, by the earl of Bristol's Dispatch, of Nov. 3, 1624, that the first motion of it came from Spain, viz. from the duke of Lerma into England. 2. Concerning the Treaty of Restitution, That the king of Spain had promised assistance, by arms, in case a mediation should not prevail; though now he denied it again. This appeared out of another dispatch from the earl of Bristol. 3. Concerning an heroic saying of the Prince, 'That when it was noised he should be detained a prisoner in Spain, he sent word by Grymes to the king, That in case news should come hither of his detention, his maj. would think no more on him as a son; but reflect all his royal thoughts on his sister, and the welfare of his own estates and kingdoms.'

The Commons' Reasons for agreeing with the Lords therein.] March 5. The Archbishop of Canterbury made a Report, briefly, of what had passed at the Conference and delivered in the Reasons, in writing, from the Commons viz.;

"Reasons conceived by the House of Commons to fortify their Resolution to advise his majesty to proceed no further in the Treaties with Spain:

"I. It is observed, That the state of Spain, not content with their ordinary provisions for the exercise of the Roman religion by the Infanta and her family, which other princes, in like case, would have demanded, and which his maj. with great reason, might at the beginning of this Treaty, have conceived they would have been contented with, have, with great vehemency, upon the advantage of having the prince's person in their possession, pressed a general connivance for his maj.'s subjects of the Roman religion, to the great dishonour of Almighty God, in the sincerity of his service in this realm; and to the apparent diminution of his maj.'s sovereignty, by establishing a necessary dependance for protection upon a foreign king and state; and to the great derogation of the laws of this kingdom; and, lastly, to the grief and discouragement of all his maj.'s well-affected subjects, from whose general discontent they expected, as well appeareth, a consequence of no small mischief. II. It is observed, That during the continuance of this Treaty, and by reason of the same, the popish faction have exceedingly increased in this realm both in multitude and boldness; and whereas heretofore, they have been divided amongst themselves into the party of Jesuits depending upon Spain, and the secular Priests; otherwise they are generally, now, strongly united together, depending no less upon Spain for temporal respects, than from Rome for spiritual; which, considering the house of Spain hath been always a capital enemy to our religion, to encrease their own greatness, by extirpating the protestant party in all places where they can prevail, cannot but be of most dangerous consequence to the safety of the king and this realm, unless remedy be provided with speed for abating that party here at home; which cannot be during the time these Treaties are on foot. III. It is observed, that, by advantage of these Treaties, and thereby keeping his maj. in hope of general peace, they have contrarily, under pretence of assisting the emperor, oppressed by the protestant party in most part of Christendom, being the ancient allies and confederates of this crown, to the endangering not only of the whole state of the reformed religion, but also against the common safety of all the professors of the same. IV. During the time of these Treaties of Love with his maj. they have, with all kind of hostility, set upon his maj.'s son-in-law, the husband of his only and most royal daughter; invaded his towns and territories in all places; and, in fine, disinherited him, with all that royal offspring, of all his ancient patrimonial honours and possessions; to the great dishonour of his maj. and the extreme grief of all his well-affected subjects; and now also, at the last, when they should have come to make good the hope of restitution, they have laid new grounds for endless delays, and turned pretended difficulties into apparent impossibilities; not forbearing also to annex, as a condition to the weak hope of their uncertain and imperfect restitution, that the eldest son of the count Palatine should be brought up in the emperor's court: so restless are their desires to work the overthrow of our religion by all possible devices. Lastly, It is too apparent how many years, from time to time, they have deluded and abused his maj. with their Treaties; how small respect they have shewed to the Prince's greatness and worth; what indignity they have offered, again and again, to his highness, by importuning him, upon all advantages, to forsake his religion; contrary to the custom of all princes, and contrary to the ancient laws of honour and hospitality; who ought to have been used there with princely freedom, and pressed to nothing to which he was ill-disposed; considering withal, with what confidence, being so great a Prince, he had put himself within their power; although it pleased God so to guide and fortify his princely heart, that he constantly withstood all their attempts and machinations, to his own immortal honour, and the unspeakable comfort of all good people of his father's kingdom; whereunto may be added the infinite disadvantageousness and endless delays in their Treaties, inviting still to new treaties, and turning all to the advantage of their own particular ends; being true to nothing but their own grounded maxims, with which neither the Match nor Restitution of the Palatinate can possibly consist, but upon such terms as threaten to our estate an incurable mischief. And, for a further justification of the charge of insincerity in all their proceedings, these particulars ensuing, among many others, may be produced. 1. In that Treaty concerning Prince Henry; after many specious motions on their part, it was followed with disavowing their own ambassadors, and a scornful proposition to the king for that Prince's altering his religion. 2. In the Treaty of Brussels, wherein sir R. Weston was employed, he found nothing but delays and deceits; and, after divers peremptory commands from Spain, for his maj.'s satisfaction, they wrought no other effect than the Siege and taking of Heidelbergh; so that he was forced to return with a Protestation. 3. When baron Bascott came thither to continue their former Treaty, the first news we heard was, the translation of the electorate to the duke of Bavaria; of which both the baron and don Carlos protested ignorance, and that the king of Spain would let the world see how much he resented such an affront; yet it plainly appeareth, by the Letter of the count d'Olivares, given to the Prince, that the State of Spain both had intelligence of it before, and expected it to be effected at that diet. 4. When his highness was in Spain the count d'Olivares shewed him two Letters, by which it plainly appeared, that, till his coming thither, there was nothing really intended; which they were not ashamed directly to avow to the Prince himself, and that after the requital of so hazardous a journey, and such an extraordinary trust. When all articles were again concluded, they found a new shift, by a Juncto of Divines, to let the Prince come home without the lady; for whose person his highness had chiefly put himself to that hazard. Lastly, When upon his highness's happy return hither, we had just cause to expect the utmost they would do in restoring the Palatinate; the faithful promise of which was the only cause that the Prince yielded to that Juncto of Divines the Desponsaries being presently to follow; the Bergstat was to be delivered to the elector of Mentz, being won by the king of Spain's arms, and part of it then in possession of his own ministers, contrary to an express Article in the Treaty, concluded by don Carlos and the baron of Bascott; wherein it was particularly provided that no alteration was to be made in these Treaties till the general treaty was at an end."—These Reasons with the consequent Advice to the king annexed, being read, the Lords approved of them by a general vote of the house, nem. diss.; and a committee of the lords was appointed to join that of the other house, in order to go and present them to his majesty.

The Address of both Houses on that Occasion.]

March 8. The Archbishop of Canterbury reported to the house, That on the 6th inst. the joint committees of both houses waited on his maj. at Theobald's; at which time he delivered himself to the king as follows:

"May it please your Most Excellent Majesty, We are come unto you, employed from your most faithful subjects and servants, the Lords and Commons assembled in this present parl. And, 1st, They and we do give most humble and hearty thanks unto Almighty God; that, out of his gracious goodness, he hath been pleased, now at last, to dispel the clouds and mists, which, for so many years, have dimmed the eyes of a great part of Christendom, in the business whereof we do now consult. And, 2ndly, We acknowledge ourselves most bound unto your maj.; that you have been pleased to require the humble Advice of us your obedient subjects, in a case so important as this, which hitherto dependeth between your maj. and the king of Spain; which we jointly offer from both houses, no one person there dissenting or disagreeing from the rest. And it is upon mature consideration, and weighing many particulars of sundry natures, that, finding so much want of sincerity in all their proceedings, we, 'super totam materiam,' present this our humble Address unto your maj.; that the Treaties, both for the Marriage and the Palatinate, cannot any longer be continued with the honour of your maj. the safety of your people, the welfare of your children and posterity, as also the assurance of your ancient allies and confederates."

The King's Answer.] To this speech from the Archbishop, the King returned this immediate Answer:

"My lords and gentlemen all; I have cause first to thank God with all my heart and all the faculties of my mind, that my speech, which I delivered in parl. hath taken so good effect amongst you; as that, with an unanimous consent, you have freely and speedily given me your advice in this great business; for which I also thank you all as heartily as I can.—I also give my particular thanks to the gentlemen of the Lower House; for that I heard, when some would have cast jealousies and doubts between me and my people, they presently quelled those motions; which otherwise might, indeed, have hindered the happy agreement I hope to find in this parl. You give me your Advice to break off both the Treaties, as well concerning the Match as the Palatinate: and now give me leave, as an old king, to propound my doubts, and hereafter to give you my Answer.—First, it is true, that I, who have been, all the days of my life, a peaceable king; and have had the honour, in my titles and impresses, to be siled "Rex Pacificus," should be loth, without necessity, to embroil myself with war; far from my nature and from my honour, which I have had at home and abroad, in endeavouring to avoid the effusion of Christian blood; of which too much hath been shed, and so much against my heart: I say, that unless it be upon such a necessity, that I may call it, as some said merrily of women, 'malum necessarium,' I should be loth to enter into it. And I must likewise acquaint you, that I have had no small hope given me of obtaining better conditions for the restitution of the Palatinate, and that even since the sitting down of the parl. But be not jealous, nor think me such a king, that would, under pretence of asking your Advice, put a scorn upon you, by disdain and rejecting it: for you remember, that in my first speech unto you, for proof of my love to my people, I craved your Advice in this great and weighty affair; but in a matter of this weight, I must first consider how this course may agree with my conscience and honour; and next, according to the parable uttered by our Saviour, after I have resolved of the necessity and justice of the cause, to consider how I shall be enabled to raise forces for this purpose.—As concerning the Case of my Children, I am now old; and, as Moses saw the Land of Promise from an high mountain, though he had not leave to set his foot on it; so it would be a great comfort to me, that God would but so long prolong my days, as if I might not see the Restitution, yet at least I might be assured that it would be; that then I might, with old Simeon, say, 'nunc dimittis servum tuum, domine, &c.' Otherwise it would be a great grief unto me, and I should die with a heavy and discomfited heart. I have often said, and particularly in the last parl. and I shall ever be of that mind, That as I am not ambitious of other men's goods or lands, so I desire not to enjoy a furrow of land in England, Scotland, or Ireland, without Restitution of the Palatinate: and in this mind I will live and die.—But let me acquaint you a little with the difficulties of this Case. He is an unhappy man that shall advise a king to war; and it is an unhappy thing to seek that by blood, which may be had by peace. Besides, I think your intentions are not to engage me in war; but, withall, you will consider how many things are requisite thereunto.—I omit to speak of my own Necessities, they are too well known. Sure I am, I have had the least help in parl. of any king that ever reigned over you this many years. I must let you know that my disabilities are increased by the Charge of my son's Journey into Spain; which I was at for his honour, and the honour of this nation: by sending of ambassadors, by maintaining of my children, and by assisting of the Palatinate, I have incurred a great Debt to the king of Denmark, which I am not able yet to pay.—The Low Countries, who, in regard of their nearness, are fittest to help for the Recovery of the Palatinate, are at so low an ebb, that, if I assist them not, they are scarce able to subsist. The Princes of Germany, that should do me any good, are all poor, weak, and disheartened, and do expect assistance from hence. For Ireland, I leave it to you, whether that be not a back-door to be secured. For the Navy, I thank God, it is in a better case than ever it was, yet more must be done; and, before it can be prepared as it ought to be, it will require a new charge, as well for its own strength, as for the securing of the coasts.—My children, I vow to God, eat no bread but by my means; I must maintain them, and not see them want. In the mean time, my Customs are the best part of my revenues, and, in effect, the substance of all I have to live on; all which are farmed out upon that condition, That if there be a war, those bargains are to be annulled; which will enforce a great defalcation.—Subsidies ask a great time to bring them in: now, if you assist me that way, I must take them up before-hand upon credit; which will eat up a great part of them. This being my case, to enter into war, without sufficient means to support it, were to shew my teeth, and do no more. In the mean time, I heartily thank you for your advice, and will seriously think upon it; as I pray you to consider of those other parts.—My Treasurer, to whose office it appertains, shall more at large inform you of those things that concern my Estate. Thus freely do I open my heart unto you; and, having your hearts, I cannot want your helps; for it is the heart that openeth the purse, not the purse the heart. I will deal frankly with you; shew me the means how I may do what you would have me, and if I take a resolution, by your advice, to enter into a war, then yourselves, by your own deputies, shall have the disposing of the money; I will not meddle with it, but you shall appoint your own treasurers. I say not this with a purpose to invite you to open your purses, and then to slight you so much as not to follow your counsel, nor engage you before I have engaged myself. Give me what you will for my own means; but, I protest, none of the monies which you shall give for those uses, shall be issued but for those ends, and by men elected by yourselves. If, upon your offer, I shall find the means to make the war honourable and safe, and that I resolve to embrace your advice; then I promise you, on the word of a king, that although war and peace be the peculiar prerogatives of kings, yet, as I have advised with you in the Treaties on which the war may ensue, so I will not treat nor accept of a peace, without first acquainting you with it, and hearing your advice; and therein go the proper way of parl. in conferring and consulting with you; and, haply, the conditions of peace will be the better, when we be prepared for war, according to the old proverb, that 'weapons bode peace'—Your kind carriage gives me much content; and that comforts me, which my lord of Canterbury said, That there was not a contrary voice amongst you all; like the 70 Interpreters, who were led by the breath of God.—I am so desirous to forget all rents in former parliaments, that it shall not be in my default, if I am not in love with parliaments, and call them often; and I desire to end my life in that intercourse between me and my people, for the making of good laws, reforming of such abuses as I cannot be well informed of but in parl. and maintaining the good government of the commonwealth. Therefore go on cheerfully, and advise of these points, and my resolution shall then be declared."

The Lords consider the State of the Nation.]
March 11. The Lords took into consideration the State of the Nation; which the Lord Treasurer* first gave an Account of to the house: afterwards a message was agreed upon to be sent to the Commons, to this purpose: "That, according to his maj.'s command, a Relation of his Estate had been made by the lord treasurer unto them; and they imagine the like hath been done in their house, by some members of it there: therefore, as this is like to be the foundation of these endeavours, which must first arise from them, lest some doubts should be started in that house, as there had been among the Lords, (which by all means they do labour to avoid) their lordships desire a meeting, with all convenient speed: where the Prince will be pleased, in his own person, to clear such doubts as have arisen in this business." This was agreed to by the Commons; the place, to be the Painted Chamber; the time, immediately.

March 12. The Lord president of the Council, (the viscount Mandevile,) reported to the house what passed at the Conference, yesterday, with the Commons. He said, "That his royal highness's speech was fram'd upon two Doubts; one started in that house, and the second proposed by himself; and that he used an heroic speech at the last. His highness told them That the lord treasurer had delivered to the lords the present necessity of the King's estate. And a doubt arising amongst their lordships, what the king's end might be in this, his highness thought fit to give his own sense thereof; and, lest the like doubt might also have arisen amongst them, the lords had commanded him, as his highness was pleased to say, to declare thus much unto them: "That the king did not intend, by that Declaration, that we should presently enter into consideration of relieving the king's estate; but, to let us see and know, that he could not, of himself, and upon his estate, maintain the war that might ensue upon our advice; but intended that, in the first place, we should provide for the defence and safety of the kingdom; and when we had resolved upon that, then it should appear a thing of no great difficulty to settle the king's estate in his own due time." This was for the resolution of the first Doubt.—Another Doubt his highness moved of himself, That it might be some might fear and imagine, that, when these things shall be settled, the king would be slow to call us together again. For this his highness urged them to call to mind the latter part of the king's last Answer, "That it should not be his fault if he was not in love with parliaments; and that, having occasion lately to send unto the king, he found his maj. willing to call us often to meet in parliament. But 3 things his highness wished us chiefly to consider: 1. How far this business was gone on already. 2. How far the year was run on. And, 3. How far we have exasperated those whom we may conceive to be our enemies. Three good Items. Therefore it was fit to use expedition, and so to provide, that we might not only shew our teeth, and do no more; but also be able to bite when there shall be cause. One thing more the Prince added, as follows: but this he told them, they must take as spoken from himself: and certainly it was principe dignum, a most heroic speech; viz. Gentlemen. "I pray you think seriously of this business; take it to heart and consider it. First, my Father's honour, next mine; and more particularly mine, because it is my new entering into the world. If, in this, ye shall fail me, ye shall not only dishonour me, but bring dishonour upon yourselves: but, if ye go on with courage, and shew alacrity and readiness in this business, you shall so oblige me unto you now, that I will never forget it hereafter; and, when time doth serve, ye shall find your love and your labour well bestowed."—Which Report the lord president ended thus: This conclusion did so take us, that we all prayed God to bless him, as we had just cause to honour him.

When the Lords had heard the lord president's Report, they received a message from the Commons to this effect; That they had certain information of great sums of gold to be transported beyond seas, and, as they conjectured, by the Papists: Wherefore they thought good to acquaint their lordships, in whose power it is to redress the same, that they may take such order therein as their lordships think good. The Lords answered, That they would immediately enquire about that matter.—Soon after came another message from the commons, importing, That having taken into mature deliberation the king's Answer, given unto the Advice of both Houses on Friday last, the 5th of March, they have resolved, with great alacrity and unanimous consent, to give his maj. assistance: and, by reason of the correspondence between both houses they desire a conference; the number, time and place, at their lordships appointment. In answer to this the Lords named, presently, a committee of 6 from each bench to attend this conference, that afternoon, and, because some emergencies may happen which will

March 12, p. m. The committee of lords being returned from the Conference with the Commons, the abp. of Canterbury made the Report of it to the house, to this effect: "That the committee of the Commons acquainted them, That they were first commanded to return the hearty thanks of their whole house to the Prince for his highness's speech unto their committee, at their last meeting; wherein they took much joy and comfort; and to assure him, that they will be ever very tender of his highness's honour. That they had concurred, with one unanimous consent, to the assistance of his maj. whensoever he shall be pleased to declare himself touching the breaking off the two Treaties with Spain. That they had drawn up a model of that which they intend to present to his maj.; and, for good correspondency, they had brought the same to be allowed of here, with such amendments, in the introduction only, as their lordships should think fit."—Then the attorney general read the Declaration, and the Lords gave their consent to the substance of it, by a general vote of the house; but agreed to mend the same in the introduction, because it was in the name of the Commons only. This addition the other committee assented to; and, when it was all finished, it was agreed to be presented to the king, by a committee of both houses, at such time as his maj. would please to admit them to his presence.

The Journals of the Commons are very defective in their first account of this session called The Originals; but this is supplied by a subsequent Account, much fuller than the other: and, as those of the Lords are so prolix in the Trials, &c. now before them, we shall begin with the Commons at this period, to avoid repetitions. What we find most remarkable in them are these:

State of the King's Debts.] March 11. The Chanc. of the Excheq. reported some particulars relating to the King's present Debts, occasioned by some late expences, and particularly the long and deceitful treaties he had entered into, "That, from the year 1617, the king had expended 145,000l. in entertainment of ambassadors sent hither; charge of the naval expedition against the pirates; on ships for the Prince's Journey; money taken up by the prince in Spain, &c. That there was 80,000l. due to the king of Denmark, with interest. Towards all these  (Here is an hiatus for what had been given towards it.) And he next proceeds to acquaint the house what savings, in the public Expences, had been made; as, "That, for Ireland, an Establishment was begun there, both for church and commonwealth; which, pursued, would subsist of itself: for the Navy, besides the king's timber, it cost 50,000l. a year; reduced these last 5 years to 30,000l. and ten new ships built, besides many houses for magazines: for the Forts, a commission was given this last summer to two persons, who have made a certificate of the charge; which may be seen when the house pleases." The next that spoke was

Sir Benj. Rudyard, who proved, in the succeeding reign, a great orator in the house: he said, "That want of parliaments were the principal means of the growth of Grievances in the commonwealth: that the king's propositions to us now, were, how to make good that breach which we advise him to: to prepare for their own security: to intreat the Lords to join with them in a committee of a council of war, to devise the fittest means to secure Ireland, our forts, fit out our navy, and join with the Low Countries: also to present the king with some relief for himself to sweeten him, besides the provision for war."

There were many speakers besides, on these affairs, all tending to advise the king to dissolve the Treaties; and, at last, it was resolved, upon the question, "That, in pursuit of their Advice, upon his maj.'s Declaration to break the Treaties, they would be ready to assist him, in a parliamentary manner, with their fortunes and abilities." This was carried without one negative voice: but the result of all these Resolutions will appear in the subsequent Proceedings of the Lords.

The Declaration of both Houses to assist his Maj. upon his dissolving of the Treaties with Spain.] March 13. His royal highness acquainted the house, That his maj. was pleased the committees of both houses should attend him the next day, at Whitehall, at 2 in the afternoon, in order to deliver their Declaration. And a preamble to it being thought necessary by the Lords, the same was communicated, by message, to the Commons, and approved of by that house. Accordingly, March 14, the abp. of Canterbury (Geo. Abbot) who had been appointed to deliver these matters to the king, waited on him, at the head of the committee of both houses, and spoke as follows:

"May it please your sacred Majesty; We are come unto you again from your most faithful subjects and loyal servants, the lords and commons in this present parl. assembled. And, first, we humbly let your maj. know how much we hold ourselves bound to Almighty God, that he hath set a king to rule and reign over us, who is pleased, in the greatest and weightiest causes, to speak and be spoken unto in parl. by his good and loving people; which maketh a king to understand them over whom he beareth rule, and them again to understand him. It is a true bond that tieth the heart of a sovereign to a subject, and of a subject, reciprocally, to their liege lord and sovereign.—Next, we rejoice that your maj. has shewn yourself sensible of the insincerity of that people, with whom, of late, you have had a double Treaty, and of the indignities offered by them to your blessed son, the Prince, and to your royal daughter; and that your kingly heart is filled with an earnest desire to make reparation to her noble consort and herself of the Palatinate, their patrimonial possession; which is agreeable to justice, and unto all the laws both of God and man. For the effecting whereof, to testify with what alacrity, and with what expedition and uniformity of heart, both your houses of parl. in the name of your whole kingdom, have borne themselves unto your maj. with offer to give you their real assistance; we have digested it into writing, lest by the verbal or vocal delivery of any one person, it may miscarry, or the expression of our zeal be weakened and diminished; which we humbly pray your maj. to give me leave to read unto you."

"The Parliament's Remonstrance or Declaration to the King.

"May it please your most excellent Maj.; We your maj.'s most humble and loyal subjects, the lords and commons in this present parl. assembled, having lately received and taken into our consideration your gracious and prudent Answer, given to the unanimous and humble Advice presented to your maj. in the name of both houses, (that the two Treaties, one of the Palatinate, the other of the Marriage, might be dissolved), do, in all humbleness, render to your maj. our most dutiful thanks, that you have been pleased to take in so good part the manner of our proceedings in that weighty business; as, likewise, graciously to intimate your royal inclination not to reject that counsel which yourself was pleased to ask; and which, accordingly, hath been offered to your maj. in the name of both the houses.—And whereas, in your princely wisdom, you made known to us, That your own treasure, by reason of your extraordinary charge and expence at this time, is so much exhausted, that your maj. by your own means, cannot support a war, which, haply, may follow on the breach of these Treaties: we do therefore, most humbly and earnestly, beseech your maj. that neither that, nor any other consideration, may hinder your present resolution, for which you have our most chearful and universal advice; and we do, with dutiful and zealous affections, assure your maj. and hereby manifest and declare, That in pursuit of our advice, upon your resolution made to dissolve the said Treaties, (the deferring whereof may prove dangerous) we will be ready, in a parliamentary manner, with our persons and abilities to assist you."

The King's Answer.] To the foregoing Remonstrance, the King answered as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen all; I have nothing to say to the preamble of my lord of Canterbury, but that he intimated something in it which I never spoke: for whereas he said, 'I have shewed myself sensible of the insincerity of those, with whom I had lately to deal, and of the indignity offered to my children:' in this you must give me leave to tell you, that I have not expressed myself to be either sensible or insensible of their good or bad dealing: Buckingham hath made a relation to you, by my commandment, which you are to judge upon; but I never yet delivered my mind upon it. When Jupiter speaks, he uses to join his thunder to it; and a king should not speak, except he maintain it by action. As for the Matter of their Declaration unto my demands, which you have couched in that paper, which I now heard read unto me, I confess, it is without example, that any king hath had such an offer. And, with your favour, I need fear nothing in this world, having so much the hearts of my people. For the large offer of assistance, I hold it to be more than millions of Subsidies; and, indeed, it is an ample reward for the trust and freedom which I have used with you.—But, my lords and gentlemen, you must give me leave, on the other side, to consider the possibility of the action: for, in this case, I must do, as a man that maketh a fortification, which must have out-works and in-works; so I must not deal only with my own people, but with my neighbours and allies, to assist me in so great a business as the Recovery of the Palatinate. And in this case, it is not sufficient to have the hearts of my subjects, without the help of my neighbours and allies. On the other side, unless particular means be set down, it will neither be a bridle to our enemies, nor a comfort to my friends who shall join with me. General words will not carry it; therefore I must resort to particular means, and follow the counsel of our Saviour Christ in the gospel, before I begin a war, to see how I can maintain it. God knows it is a longsome work, yet I desire with Moses, as I said before, but to see the Land of Promise, though I live not till it be recovered. But unless particular means be discovered, it is little to the point: therefore, since you give me such fair general promises, I will deal freely with you, I will tell you, in particular, the way I will propose, either by way of Subsidies or otherwise; which being done in parliament, is a parliamentary way. I would require you to be pleased to bestow upon me five Subsidies, and two 15ths to every Subsidy, for the war; and, for mine own necessities, my crying Debts are so heavy, that no man can bear them with a greater grief of heart, and sting of conscience, than I have done, and do: and I now growing old, would be glad to see a means for the satisfying of my Debts before I go out of the world: and, for this end, I desire you would give me one Subsidy and two 15ths yearly, untill my Debts be paid."

[Here the Prince his highness taking notice of an objection made, that this might seem contradictory to that which his highness had told the committee of both houses, That the king's maj. would ask nothing for his own particular till the wars were provided for: the Prince said, That the duke of Buckingham, in his absence, hath moved this doubt unto the king. Whereupon the duke affirmed, that, speaking with the king about it, his maj. was pleased to say, If we would add one Subsidy, and two 15ths to make it up 6 Subsidies and twelve 15ths for the war, he was well content to quit that which he had asked for his own necessities.]—

The king proceeded: "If this may be done, or that I may see a fair way for it, I will follow your advice; for I would never have asked your advice to reject it, or to put a scorn upon you. For the levying of these Subsidies and 15ths I would have you to consider how to clear these two difficulties. If you levy them too suddenly, it may be heavy for the people; if you stay too long, it will not serve the turn: but this I leave to your consideration. And since I leave it to yourselves to receive the money, and expend it by your own committees of both houses, you may be the more secure. And yet I would not have you to be too hasty in the levying of it, that no extremity be shewed to my people by imposing too heavy a burden upon them, which God forbid. On the other side, the business will not suffer too long lingering about it. I told you before, I had, in this great business, to look to my conscience and honour, as well as to the means: for the means, I must have it from you; my conscience and honour is my own, of which I have thought, and do think daily, and how I shall be able to discharge them as a king ought to do. In this point I am already resolved in a great part; but, if any scruple shall remain with me I will acquaint you with it, and not only seek but follow your advice." [Here again the Prince said, he had spoken with his father, to know of him, whether he was satisfied in honour and conscience that he might in this case undertake a war; and that his maj. answered, "He was already satisfied and resolved therein; but, for the manner of publishing it, he would take your advice." Then the duke of Buck. said, "The reason why his maj. used these words, was, that having formerly spoken of his honour and conscience, if he should now have left them out, it might have been thought that money only had drawn him to it. But the king said he was already satisfied and resolved, yet would have our advice for the manner of declaring it."] The king again proceeded, "I told you before, that this was the way to make me in love with parliaments: and, to shew mine Inclination to continue them still, my resolution is to make this a session for the passing of as many good laws, as, in convenient time, may be prepared; and at Michaelmas, or within a few days after, to have a new session, and another at the spring. And, in the mean time, you may go down and acquaint yourselves with the grievances of my people, and you shall see my care to make good laws, and to reform abuses; that so my subjects may find the good fruits of parliaments and rejoice in them: and, I protest, as I have asked your advice in these points, which I needed not to have done, so I will never enter into any agreement or treaty of composition for peace, which is the end of war (else it is unjust and unchristian) without your advice: and I will help you myself, if we enter into a war, to make it allowable to the world, and honourable for me."

The Parliament's Address to the King upon voting a Supply.] March 22. The Lords received a message from the Commons, importing, "That, since they desired all expedition to be made in the great business of the two Treaties, and had taken into consideration his maj.'s last Answer, they have thought on a Proposition to be made to him touching those affairs; wherefore they desire a conference with the Lords about it. This conference was accepted by the lords; and, when their committee was returned from it, the Report was made by the abp. of Canterbury, That the Commons had delivered to them their Propositions in writing, and had left a blank for their lordships to be named with them, if they thought fit. Then they were read to the house, and the question being put, it was agreed, by all, only one lord dissenting, to fill up the blank. But afterwards, the Lords taking exception against one clause about religion, mentioned in the said Proposition, the Commons agreed to leave it out; but not without a division of their house. The proposal from the two houses therefore, as it was delivered to the king by the abp. of Canterbury, was in these words:

"Most gracious Sovereign; We your maj.'s most humble and loyal subjects, the lords and commons in this present parl. assembled, do first render to your most sacred maj. our most dutiful thanks, for that, to our unspeakable comfort, you have vouchsafed to express yourself so well satisfied with our late Declaration made unto your maj. of our general resolution, in pursuit of our humble advise, to assist your majesty in a parliamentary way with our persons and abilities.—And whereas your majesty in your great wisdom and judgment foreseeing that it will make a deeper impression, both in the enemies of that cause, and in your friends and allies, if they shall not only hear of the cheerful offers, but also see the real performance of your subjects towards so great a work, was graciously pleased to descend to a particular proposition, for the advancing of this great business; we therefore, in all humbleness, most ready and willing to give your maj. and the whole world, an ample testimony of our sincere and duriful intentions herein, upon mature advice and deliberation, as well of the weight and importance of this great affair, as of the present estate of this your kingdom (the weal and safety whereof is, in our judgments, apparently threatened, if your maj.'s resolution, for the dissolving of the Treaties now in question be longer deferred; and that provision for defence of your realm, and aid of your friends and allies, be not seasonably made) have, with a cheerful consent of all the Commons, no one dissenting, and with a full and cheerful consent of the Lords, resolved, That, upon your maj.'s public declaration for the dissolution and utter discharge of both the said Treaties, of the Marriage and of the Palatinate, in pursuit of our advice therein; and towards the support of that war which is likely to ensue; and more particularly for those four points proposed by your maj. namely, for the Defence of this your realm, the securing of Ireland, the assistance of your neighbours the states of the United Provinces, and other your maj.'s friends and allies, and for the setting forth of your royal navy) we will grant for the present the greatest aid which was ever given in parl. to be levied in so short a time, that is to say, 3 entire Subsidies, and 3 15ths, to be all paid within the compass of one whole year after your maj. shall be pleased to make the said Declaration; the money to be paid into the hands, and expended by the direction of such committees or commissioners, as hereafter shall be agreed upon at this present session of parl.—And so we most humbly beseech your maj. graciously to accept of these first-fruits of our hearty oblation, dedicated to that work, which we sincerely desire may prosper and be advanced, and, for the future, to rest confidently assured, That if you should be engaged in a real war, we, your loyal and loving subjects, will never fail, in a parliamentary way to assist your maj. in so royal a design; wherein your own honour, and the honour of your most noble son, the Prince; the ancient renown of this nation, the welfare, and very subsistence of your noble and only daughter, and her consort, and their posterity, the safety of your own kingdom and people; and the prosperity of your neighbours and allies, are so deeply engaged."

Morley and others punished for reflecting on the Lord Keeper.] March 23. One Tho. Morley, having presented a Petition to the Lords, highly reflecting on the lord keeper, for some indirect practice against him in the Star-Chamber; and, afterward, printing and dispersing many copies abroad: the said Morley was called before the house to answer the same; and, after a full hearing of his allegations, behaving himself very impudently at the bar, he was, by general consent, sentenced, "1. That the said Morley shall, for his great offence, be imprisoned in the Fleet during the pleasure of the house. 2. That he shall undergo to the king, a fine of 1000l. 3. That he shall stand, with his neck in the pillory, in Cheap, with one of the said Petitions upon his head, at 11 in the forenoon. 4. That he shall make his humble submission and acknowledgment of his fault here at the bar, and also in chancery, unto the lord keeper, the first day of next term."—One David Waterhouse, who had penned the said Petition for Morley, was also fined 500l. and imprisoned during pleasure, &c. The printer was likewise punished, but in a milder manner.

Both Houses present to the King a Memorial in Justification of the D. of Buckingham.] March 24. The Lords went upon a further Justification of the duke of Buckingham, against the complaint of the Spanish ambassador to the king. And there having been a Memorial presented to his maj. by both houses concerning it, according to an order of the 27th Feb. last and the first of March, the Report of it was made to the house this day, by the Lord-

"May it may please your most excellent maj.; Your maj.'s most loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, assembled at this time, in both houses of parl. being informed of a Complaint made to your maj. against the lord duke of Buck. that, in the Narrative which, by your maj.'s command, he made to both houses, the 24th of Feb. last past, he should let fall some passages grievous to the honour of the king of Spain, and inferred to be of so high a nature, as, if the like had been spoke by any subject of that king against your maj. it would not have been otherwise expiated, than with the loss of his head that spoke it: Taking this into their serious consideration, and conceiving that this accusation doth, in an oblique line, fasten an aspersion upon themselves also, do, in all submission and humility, make to your maj. a threefold representation: 1st, concerning that king, they do, unanimously, absolutely acquit and clear the lord duke from letting fall any words, at all, derogatory to the honour of that king. 2 For that concerns my lord, they do, in the like humility, attest unto your maj. That if my lord duke had omitted any matter represented unto them that day, he had for so much failed in the performance of that duty and fidelity which he oweth unto your maj. to the business, and unto both houses. 3. For what concerneth themselves, they make bold, in like humility, to represent unto your maj. That they do much honour my lord the duke for that Narration, and do render unto him all possible thanks for the fidelity and industry expressed therein; and so, without your further trouble, do humbly beseech your maj. to interpret fair of this their Representation, which they held themselves bound to offer unto your maj. for the clearing of so eminent a person; who, as they verily believe, hath, in this negotiation, well-deserved of your maj. and the common-wealth.

This ended, the Lord Keeper proceeded thus in his report. "Now, my lords, concerning his maj.'s Speech; it is not to be expressed or reported, because it is a speech of affection as well as of narration, not possible to be uttered, but in the same words it was delivered: therefore, unless a man had Myron's art, 'qui animos hominum depinxisse dicitur,' who could paint to the life the souls and affections of men, he cannot do this as it should be done; for, as Livy said of Cicero, 'ad laudandum Ciceronem, altero Cicerone opus est,' there had need to be another Cicero to undertake the commending of Cicero; so, surely, he ought to have as large a heart as our gracious king, that will report his powerful and gracious expressions. I will therefore crave pardon of the house for delivering it in writing, very near the words and syllables in which it was pronounced; and, first, to be read once or twice, if your lordships please, to the house, and then to be entered in the Journal Book, as a record of no small comfort and consequence to the public: for I may, without flattery, which, for ought I know, I have been ever free from, declare, That such servants as these, 'sunt instrumenta boni sæculi,' are tools and instruments to carve out a brave and happy world to ensuing posterity, as Symmachus writes in one of his epistles."

The King's Answer.] This said, the lord keeper read his maj.'s Speech, out of a paper, in hæc verba:—"My lords and gentleman all; I might have reason to speak nothing in regard of the person whereof you speak, but, in regard of your motion, it were not civil; for if I be silent, I shall wrong neither myself, nor that nobleman which you now speak of, because he is well known to be such an one as stands in no need of a prolocutor, or fidejussor, to undertake for his fidelity, or well carrying of his business: and, indeed, to send a man upon so great an errand, whom I was not resolved to trust for the carriage thereof, were a fault in my discretion scarce compatible to the love and trust I bear him. It is an old and true saying, 'That he is a happy man that serves a good master;' and it is no less truth, That he is a happy master that enjoys a faithful servant. The greatest fault, if it be a fault, or at leastwise the greatest error, I hope he shall ever commit against me, was his desiring this Justification from you, as if he should have need of any justification from others towards me; and that for these reasons: first, because he, being my disciple and scholar, may be assured I will trust his own Relation. 2. Because he made the same Relation unto me, which he did afterwards unto both houses; so as I was formerly acquainted both with the matter and manner thereof; and if I should not trust him in the carriage, I was altogether unworthy of such a servant. He hath no Interest of his own in the business: he had ill thoughts at home for his going thither with my son, although it was my command, as I told you before: and now he hath as little thanks for his Relation on the other part; yet he that serveth God and a good master cannot miscarry for all this. I have noted in his negotiation these 3 remarkable things, faith, diligence, and discretion; whereof my son hath borne record unto me; yet I cannot deny, but, as he thought to do good service to his master, he hath given ill example to ambassadors in time to come, because he went this long journey upon his own charges. This would prove an ill example, if many of my ambassadors should take it for a precedent. He ran his head into the yoke with the people here for undertaking the journey, and when he there spent about 40 or 50,000l. never offered his account, nor made any demand for the same, or ever will. I hope other ambassadors will do so no more. I am a good master that never doubted of him; for I know him to be so good a scholar of mine, that I say, without vanity, he will not exceed his master's dictates; and I trust the report not the worse he made, because it is approved by you all; yet I believe an honest man as much as all the world, and the rather, because he was a disciple of mine. I am glad he has so well satisfied you, and thank you very heartily for taking it in so good part, as I find you have done."

When this Answer was also read, and ordered to be entered in the Journals, the duke of Buckingham stood up, and gave unto the lords his most hearty thanks for the great favour they had done him; and professed to their lordships, "That they had absolutely engaged him for the time to come, to employ all the power and favour, which he had in his maj.'s service, for the public good, and for the service of every one of their lordships, in particular, who should have occasion to make use of him. Concerning his Journey to Spain, it did not cost him so much as his maj. was pleased to name; yet, whatsoever it was, he might very well expend it in his maj.'s service, being but the produce of his bounty and goodness towards him. And, if his maj. should extend his liberality to any one of his ambassadors, in so large a proportion, they would be very unthankful, if they did not do as much for him as he had done."—The duke further declared, "That it was his maj.'s intent to send a present dispatch into Spain, in order to break off the two Treaties of the Match and the Palatinate, as was required by parl. with the reasons moving him thereto."

The Lords no sooner heard this latter part of the duke's Speech, than they sent a message to the Commons to desire an immediate conference with them, in order to communicate this pleasing news to that house. And joyful news it was to all England, as well as to the parl. The city of London, Rushworth tells us, testified their approbation of it by bonfires, ringing of bells, and other demonstrations of joy: but, as it is common in those cases, for the mob to exult too much, and carry their zeal too far, so, in this, they exceeded their bounds, as appears by the following abstract from the Journals. The king had published a Declaration of this breach with Spain the day before, which occasioned the rejoicings. And, this day, the duke of Buckingham signified to the lords, "That the people making bonfires, yesterday for joy of the king's Declaration, some of the servants of the Spanish ambassador looking out at them, were very uncivilly used." Therefore his grace moved their lordships to take this into their consideration, and redress the wrong done to a foreign ambassador. The house approved well of the duke's motion, and agreed, That if they could, by strict enquiry, which they intended to make, find out the offenders therein, they would cause them to be punished, according to the king's late proclamation, forbidding any abuses to be offered to ambassadors. And they further agreed to signify this to the Commons at the next conference.

The King's declaration upon breaking off the Treaty with Spain.] March 25. Easter

now drawing nigh, the Lords agreed to a recess till April 1. In the mean time they appointed a committee to assist the king's secretaries, in that vacancy, in drawing up a Manifesto of this great affair; of which they also agreed to inform the Commons. The same day, a committee of Lords being returned from a conference with the Commons, the lord president read the king's Declaration, which he made two days before to a committee of both the houses; which was in these words:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; The last time I spake to you anent this great business, I told you what, in my opinion, was necessarily required for the beginning of it, the reasons whereof you have truly set down out of my last speech; wherein I shewed you what good it would do, and what harm it might free us from, to express particular aids at this time as well as general promises. It is true, I must confess, that how far you declare yourselves, is sufficient for the present entrance into the business, tho' a great deal short of what I told you it would require. But, as God bears me record, I never did stick for money, but only desired you to clear yourselves by particulars, that I may see how I may be able to go thro' so great a matter, at least to make a good beginning of the war; for what the end will be, God knows.—So, on the other part, I gave you thanks for your general offer, by which you did engage yourselves, in your lives and estates, which is more than forty Subsidies, if you had named them, and more worth than a kingdom; for the strength of a king, next under the protection of God, stands in the hearts of his people. And I must need say, in this particular, it is without example, that ever any parliament, for a beginning, gave to a king so great a Supply to be levied in so short a time. This may well serve for a preparation: and, for my part, first, considering your general offer, (which is ten times more to me than all Subsidies) and, next, considering that these particulars, coming from you, be as much as at once you are able to pay in so short a time, being within a year, and as much as may be well expected; therefore, with as much love, and as great thanks, as a loving and kind king can give to so loving and dutiful people, I thank you for your offer, and do accept it. I told you before, that I would never have craved your advice to reject it, and so put a scorn upon you: think me not that man.—It is true, I think no wise king can undertake so great a bargain, but he must well bethink himself before-hand: and I account it better that a king advise well before he take a resolution, than advise rashly, and after repent. Therefore I declare unto you, That as I am willing to follow your advice in the annulling and breach of the two Treaties, both of the Match and of the Palatinate; so, on the other part, I assure myself, you will make good what you have said, That what you advise me unto, you will assist me in, with your wisdom, and council, and forces, if need require.—I pray you have a charitable opinion of me, as you are to have

of a king who hath so long ruled and governed over you; and I may vaunt myself thus far to have done it with justice and peace: but, as I told you before, all my forbearance hath been for sparing the effusion of Christian blood, and as the most easy and probable way for recovering the Palatinate for my children. It is true I have been so long delayed and paid with generals, that I dare not longer trust unto them; which made me enjoin Buckingham to make a particular Relation unto you of all that business, (and I am sure such an Account was never before given in parl.) that thereby you may know what to trust to. I could, in this case, have resolved myself; but, I thought it could not but be both a strength and honour to me to have the advice of my people. My lords: In the late parl. I then declared it unto you, that I was resolved, without respect of friendship, or match, or whatsoever, to have the Palatinate one way or other. I hope you remember it.—God is my Judge and Saviour I never had any other end, and it is pity I should live to have any other end; and, for my part, except, by such means as God may put into my hands, I may recover the Palatinate, I could wish never to have been born. I am old, but mine only son is young, and I will promise for myself and him both, that no means shall be unused for the recovery of it. And this I dare say, as old as I am, if it might do good to the business, I would go in my own person, and think my labour and travel well bestowed, tho' I should end my days there: for if I should spare any means possible for the recovery of it, then let me be thought not worthy to reign over you; and, in good faith, I never resolved to live with other mind. And, I will say more, there was never any enemy of my son-in-law, with whom I talk'd of that business, or any that ever I spake with of the same, which did not say, and confess, I had reason to have the Palatinate, one way or other: And when they say that it is good reason, and themselves allowed it, it is a good spur to me to think on it.—My lords and gentlemen, thus far assure yourselves, I will go cheerfully about it, to prepare all things possible for it; and as you have given me the means, so will I employ them toward it.—In the next degree, I hope you will think of me; but that I leave to your own counsel and consideration: but, I protest to God, a penny of this money shall not be bestowed but upon this work, and by your own committees: and, I assure myself, you will think of me for a double reason, my Customs are likely to fall, by occasion of the war, and my Charges increase; but, undertaking the war, I must go thro' with it one way or other, tho' I sell my jewels and all. In the next session you will consider how this hath been husbanded, and, according to that, think what is next to be done; and it will spur you the more to enable me for the rest, whereof I speak to you before. I will clear you in some things (for I will not deal with you in any thing but fairly and clearly as a king): tho' I have broken the necks of three parliaments, one after another, I hope that, in this parl. you shall be so resolved of the sincerity of my heart, and of your duties and affections, that this shall be a happy parl. and make me greater and happier than any king of England ever was.—In my last speech I promised you, that if I accepted your offer, I would follow your advice, and would not after hearken to any treaty of peace, without first acquainting you, and requiring your advice; and I likewise promised nothing should be spent of your monies but by your own committees: but I desire you to understand, that I must have a faithful and secret Council of War, that must not be ordered by a multitude, (for so my designs may be discovered before-hand) and one penny of this money shall not be bestowed but in sight of your own committees. But where I shall send 20,000l. or 10,000l. whether by sea, or land, east or west, by diversion, or otherwise, by invasion upon the Bavarian or emperor, you must leave that to your king.—Assure yourselves my delay hitherto was upon hope to have gotten it without a war. I held it by a hair, hoping to have gotten it by a treaty; but, since I see no certainty that way, I hope that God, who hath put it into your hearts thus to advise me, and into my heart to follow your advice, will so bless it, that I shall clear my reputation from obloquy; and, in despite of the devil and all his instruments, shew that I never had but an honest heart: and I desire that God would bless our labours for the happy restitution of my children; and whosoever did the wrong, I deserved better at their hands.”

The Lords desire a Conference in regard to the Supply.] April 1. The duke of Buckingham informed the house, “That he had been to take a view of the Navy, according to his place of high admiral. He told them likewise that he had certain information from abroad, that the king of Spain had then in readiness a far greater and stronger navy than that in 1588: that, at Dunkirk, he had already built 100 flat bottoms: that they had taken many of our men upon our own shores, and out of our own harbours: Therefore he moved, “That since the two houses had agreed to give a Supply to the assistance of this great business in hand, tho’ the grant thereof be not yet passed into an act, that the same may be so handled as to be useful; which will not be, if the time be now neglected, or this month and the next overslipp’d: wherefore the duke further moved, That a meeting might be instantly prayed with the commons to propose to them, that certain monied men might be dealt with, to disburse such a sum as was requisite for the present use, the repayment of which to be secured by parl. out of the Subsidies intended in the grant, according to what had been heretofore done in the like cases. Concluding, That he doubted not but some would be found to disburse the same upon that security.” A message was immediately dispatched to the Commons to inform them, That the Lords had a business of importance to communicate to them, and therefore desired a speedy conference. Their Answer was, That they would attend their lordships pleasure.—The committee of Lords being return’d from the conference, the house received a message from the commons, importing, “That they had taken the proposition made to them, at the last meeting, into serious consideration; but, because many of their members were not yet come to town, and the matter is of such importance, they have deferred, for a time, to come to a resolution; but, as soon as possibly they could, they would attend their lordships with their Answer.”

Conduct of the Lord Treasurer, Middleser, aspersed.] April 2. The abp. of Canterbury reported, That, in a committee appointed to examine the Stores and Ammunitions of War, some speeches had past, the day before, which concerned the honour of a Lord of that House; and that the said lord desired examinations might be taken, upon oath, for the clearing thereof. Whereupon the house ordered, That a sub-committee should be constituted to take such examinations, and the witnesses to be sworn in court. Also, That the following officers of the crown should be sent for, to be examined on oath, relating to this affair, viz. sir Edw. Wardour, clerk of the pells, sir Rob. Pye, sir Tho. Mounson, sir Tho. Dallison, sir Rd. Morrison, sir John Keyes, sir A. Ingram, sir Tho. Cook, sir Tho. Morris, clerk of the ordnance, and sir John Male.

The Commons propose a Petition against Recusants.] April 3. The Lords received a Message from the Commons to this effect, “That they desired a conference with their lordships about a Petition they had drawn up to be presented to his maj. touching Popish Recusants, to which they desired the concurrence of that house.” Hereupon a committee was appointed, and, being returned, the Petition was read to the whole house; but their lordships took time to consider of it, before they would come to any resolution about it.

April 4. This business was resumed; and, to the end the Lords might more freely debate the matter, the house was adjourned ad libitum, the lord keeper removing to his due place, on the earls bench: and the preface to the Petition being again read, the Lords debated, Whether a short induction was not fitter to be used, that the reasons for the Petition might be a part by itself, and not delivered at all, unless his maj. demanded the same, as was delivered in the Advice to the king, the 5th of March last, to dissolve the two Treaties. The other parts of the Petition being also read, it was debated, Whether any more was requisite to be desired of his maj. than the execution of the laws now in force against Recusants, lest it should be noised they were beginning a persecution; but they came to no resolution about it at this time, only agreed to defer the further consideration of it till next day. The Petition itself, as drawn up by the Commons, follows in these words:

" May it please your most Excellent Majesty, We your maj.'s most humble and loyal subjects, the lords and commons in this present parl. assembled, having, to our singular comfort, received your princely resolution, upon our humble petition, to dissolve the two Treaties of the Match and of the Palatinate; and having, on our parts, with all alacrity and readiness, humbly offered our assistance to your maj. to maintain the war which may ensue thereupon: yet, withal, sensibly finding what seditious and traitorous positions those incendiaries of Rome, and professed engines of Spain, the priests and jesuits, infuse into your natural-born subjects; what numbers they have seduced, and do daily seduce, to make their dependance on the pope of Rome and king of Spain, contrary to their allegiance to your maj. their liege lord; what daily resort of priests and jesuits into your kingdoms; what concourse of Popish recusants, much more than usual, is now in and about the city of London; what boldness, yea, what insolency they have discovered out of the opinion conceived of their foreign patronage: what public resort to masses, and other exercises of the Popish religions, in the houses of foreign ambassadors there is daily, to the great grief and offence of your good subjects; what great preparations are made in Spain, fit for an invasion, the bent, whereof is as probable to be upon some part of your maj.'s dominions as upon any other place; what encouragement that may be to your enemies, and the enemies of your crown, to have a party, or but the opinion of a party, within your kingdoms, who daily increase and combine themselves together for that purpose; what disheartening of your good and loving subjects, when they shall see more cause of fear from their false hearted countrymen at home, than from their professed adversaries abroad; what apparent dangers, by God's providence and your maj.'s wisdom and goodness, they have very lately escaped, which the longer continuance upon these Treaties, upon such unfitting conditions, fomented by your own ill-affected subjects, would surely have drawn upon your maj. and your state; do, in all humbleness, offer unto your sacred maj. these their humble petitions following:—" I. That all jesuits and seminary priests, and all others, having taken orders by any authority derived from the see of Rome, may, by your maj.'s proclamation, be commanded forthwith to depart out of this realm, and all other your highness's dominions; and neither they, nor any other, to return or come hither again, upon peril of the severest penalties of the laws now in force against them; and that all your maj.'s subjects may hereby also be admonished not to receive, entertain, comfort, or conceal any of that viperous brood, upon penalties and forfeitures, which, by the laws, may be imposed upon them.—II. That your maj. would be pleased to give streight and speedy charge to the justices of peace in all parts of this kingdom, that (according to the laws in that behalf made, and the orders taken by your maj.'s privy council heretofore for policy of state) they do take from all Popish recusants, legally convicted, or justly suspected, all such armour, gunpowder, and munition of any kind, as any of them have either in their own hands, or in the hands of any other for them, and to see the same safely kept and disposed according to the law, leaving for the necessary defence of their house and persons, so much as by the law is prescribed.—III. That your maj. will please to command all Popish recusants, and all others, who, by any law or statute, are prohibited to come to the king's court, forthwith, under pain of your heavy displeasure, and severe execution of your laws against them, to retire themselves, their wives, and families, from or about London, to their several dwellings, or places, by your laws appointed; and there to remain confined within five miles of their dwelling-places, according to the laws of this your realm: and, for that purpose, to discharge all bypast licences granted unto them for their repair thither; and that they presume not any time hereafter to repair to London, or within ten miles of London, or to the king's court, or to the prince's court wheresoever.—IV. That your majesty would forbid and restrain the great resort and concourse of your own subjects, for the hearing of mass, or other exercises of the Romish religion, to the houses of foreign ambassadors, or agents, residing here, for the service of their several princes or states.—V. That where of late, in several counties in this realm, some have been trusted in places of lord lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, justices of peace, and captains of their countries, which are either Popish recusants or non-communicants, by the space of a year last past, or which do not usually resort to the church to divine service, and can bring no good certificate thereof, that your maj. would be pleased to discharge them from these places of trust, by which they have that power in the country where they live, as is not fit to be put into the hands of persons so affected.—VI. That your maj. would be pleased, generally, to put the laws in due execution, which are made, and stand in force against Popish recusants; and that all your judges, justices, and ministers of justice, to whose care these things are committed, may, by your maj.'s proclamation, be commanded to do their duty therein.—VII. That, seeing we are thus happily delivered from that danger which these treaties, now dissolved, and that use which your ill-affected subjects made thereof, would certainly have drawn upon us; and cannot but foresee and fear lest the like may hereafter happen, and inevitably bring such peril to your maj.'s kingdoms; we are most humble suitors to your gracious maj. to secure the hearts of your good subjects by the engagement of your royal word unto them, that, upon no occasion of marriage or treaty, or other request in that behalf from any foreign prince or state whatsoever, you will take off or slacken the execution of your laws against Popish recusants.—To which our humble petitions, proceeding from our most loyal and dutiful affections toward your maj. our care of our country's good, and our confident persuasion that this will much advance the glory of Almighty God, the everlasting honour of your maj. the safety of your kingdom, and the encouragement of all your good subjects, we do most humbly beseech your maj. to vouchsafe a gracious Answer."

The Lord Treasurer, Middlesex, complains of a Plot against him.] It now appears who the noble lord was whose conduct was objected to in yesterday's proceedings; for, some orders being made this day, relating to the sittings of the committee on Munitions, Stores, &c. we are told, by the Journal, that the Lord Treasurer stood up and said, "That he would desire no favour but expedition; and, when they had done, his lordship would shew a dangerous plot, conspiracy and combination against him; which, if it was suffered, no man would be in safety in his place."

The joint Petition of both Houses for Execution of the Laws against Jesuits, &c.—April 6. The lords and commons, after many conferences about it, at length agreed upon the following Petition instead of the former one: "May it please your most excellent maj. It having pleased your maj. upon our humble suit and advice, to dissolve both the Treaties, to our great joy and comfort, we, the lords and commons assembled in parl. do, in all humbleness, offer to your sacred maj. these two Petitions following: 1st, That for the more safety of your realms, and better keeping of your subjects in their due obedience, and other important reasons of state, your maj. will be pleased, by by some such course as your maj. shall think fit, to give present order, That all the laws be put in due execution, that have been made, and do stand in force against Jesuits and seminary Priests, and all others that have taken orders by authority derived from the see of Rome, and generally against all Popish Recusants; and as for disarming them, that it may be according to the laws, and according to former acts and directions of state in the like case: and yet, that it may appear to all the world, the favour and clemency your majesty useth towards all your subjects, of what condition soever; and to the intent the jesuits and priests, now in the realm, may not pretend to be surprized, that a speedy and certain day may be prefixed by your maj.'s proclamation, before which day they shall depart out of your realm, and all other your highness's dominions; and neither they nor any other, to return or come hither again, upon the severest penalties of the laws now in force against them; and that all your maj.'s subjects may be thereby also admonished not to receive, entertain, comfort, or conceal any of them, upon the penalties and forfeitures which, by the laws, may be imposed upon them: 2nd, Seeing we are thus happily delivered from that danger, which these Treaties, now dissolved, and that use which your ill-affected subjects made thereof, would certainly have drawn upon us; and yet cannot but foresee and fear least the like may hereafter happen, which will inevitably bring such perils into your maj.'s kingdoms, we are most humble suitors to your gracious maj. to secure the hearts of your good subjects, by the engagement of your royal word unto them, That, upon no occasion of marriage, or treaty, or other requisite in that behalf, from any foreign prince or state whatsoever, you will take away or slacken the execution of your laws against jesuits, priests, and popish recusants. To which our humble Petitions, we do most humbly beseech your maj. to vouchsafe a gracious Answer."

The King's Answer.] This second Petition was presented to the king by a committee of both houses, on the 23rd of April; and, the next day, the abp. of Canterbury reported to the Lords; That, after his maj. had heard the same read, he gave the following most gracious Answer:

"My lords and gentlemen; Although I cannot but commend your zeal in offering this Petition to me; yet, on the other side, I cannot but hold myself unfortunate, that I should be thought to need a spur to do that which my conscience and duty binds me unto. What religion I am of, my books do declare, my profession and behaviour doth shew; and, I hope in God, I shall never live to be thought otherwise; sure I am I shall never deserve it: and, for my part, I wish it may be written in marble and remain to posterity as a mark upon me, when I shall swerve from my religion; for he that doth dissemble with God is not to be trusted of men.—My lords, for my part, I protest before God, that my heart hath bled when I have heard of the increase of Popery: God is my judge, it hath been such a great grief to me, that it hath been as thorns in my eyes, and pricks in my sides; and so far I have been, and shall be from turning any other way. And, my lords and gentl. you shall be my confessors, that if I knew one way better than another to hinder the growth of Popery, I would take it; for, knowing what I do, and being persuaded what I am, I could not be an honest man and do otherwise. And this I may say further, That if I be not a martyr, I am sure I am a confessor: and, in some sense, I may be called a martyr, as, in scripture, Isaac was persecuted by Ishmael by mocking words; for never king suffered more by ill tongues than I have done, and, I am sure, for no cause; yet I have been far from persecution, for I have ever thought that no way more increased any religion than persecution, according to that saying, 'sanguis martyrum est semen ecclesie.'—Now, my lords and gentl. I will not only grant the substance of what you crave, but add somewhat more of my own; for the two Treaties being already annulled, as I have declared them to be, it necessarily follows of itself that which you desire; and therefore it needs no more, but that I do declare, by proclamation, which I am ready to do, that all jesuits and priests do depart by a day; but it cannot be, as you desire, by our proclamation, to be out of all my dominions; for a proclamation here extends but to this kingdom. This I will do, and more; I will command all my judges, when they go their circuits, to keep the same courses, for putting all the laws in execution against Recusants, as they were wont to do before these Treaties; for the laws are still in force, and were never dispensed with by me: God is my judge, they were never so intended by me; but, as I told you in the beginning of the parl. you must give me leave, as a good horseman, sometimes to use the reins, and not always to use the spurs: So now there needs nothing but my Declaration; and, for the disarming of them, that is already provided for by the laws, and shall be done as you desire: and more, I will take order for the shameful disorder of the resorting of my subjects to all foreign ambassadors: for this I will advise with my council how it may be best reformed: it is true that the houses of ambassadors are privileged places; and tho' they cannot take them out of their houses, yet the lord mayor and mr. Recorder of London may take some of them as they come from thence, and make them examples. Another point I will add concerning the education of their children; of which I have had a principal care, as my lord of Canterbury, and the bishop of Winchester, and other lords of my council, and, indeed, all my council, can bear me witness, with whom I have advised about this business; for, in good faith, it is a shame their children should be bred here, as if they were brought up in Madrid or at Rome, so I do grant not only your desire, but more. I am sorry I was not the first mover of it to you; but had you not done it, I would have done it myself.—Now, for the second part of your Petition, you have here given me the best advice in the world; for it is against the rule of wisdom that a king should suffer any of his subjects to be holding and depending on any other prince than himself; for what hath any king to do with the laws and subjects of another kingdom? therefore assure yourselves, that, by the grace of God, I will be careful that no such conditions be foisted in upon any other treaty whatsoever; for it is fit my subjects should stand or fall by their own laws."

PROCEEDINGS ON THE IMPEACHMENT OF THE LORD TREASURER, MIDDLESEX.

We now enter upon an affair of a very extraordinary nature, wherein one of the principal officers of the crown was charged with high crimes and misdemeanors. The whole of the proceedings on this important Trial are preserved at length in the 3rd volume of the Lords Journals, from which we have made the following faithful abridgment:

April 8. The Lords received from the Commons, the following message: That whereas they yesterday sent to desire a conference with them, for the better accommodating the bill of Monopolies, to be this morning at nine, which their house intended to have done accordingly: but, that now a great and weighty Affair, as ever yet came before them, intervening; and many of their committee being employed in the examination and enquiry thereof, who were formerly appointed to attend their lordships at this conference, they humbly desire to be spared at this time, and they will attend at any other which their lordships shall appoint."

April 9. The Lords being reminded of the words used by the Lord Treasurer, April 5. of "a dangerous plot, conspiracy, and combination against him;" and because the words were doubtful and generally spoken, his lordship was required to name the parties that had so conspired against him; for, otherwise, an imputation might rest upon that house, or some of the members, there being, at that time, a Committee on Munitions, &c. who had taken divers Examinations concerning his lordship as lord treasurer.—Whereupon his ldp. cleared the house, absolutely, from any combination against him; and further protested, that at that time, he did not name or mean any member of that house.

April 12th. A message came from the Commons in order to put off the intended conference again; because they said, That a lord of that house had desired to be heard, by his counsel, in theirs in the afternoon; which they had yielded to. On this a motion was made to consider, that it might trench deep into their privileges, for a lord of that house to answer an accusation in the house of commons, either by his counsel, or by sending his answer in writing. But, upon the humble request of the lord treasurer, the house gave him leave to send his Answer to the complaint of the Commons if he pleased. However, an order was made, "That no lord of that house shall hereafter without licence, answer any complaint in the house of commons, either in person or by his counsel." Then the abp. of Canterbury reported, That a committee being appointed to consider of the Stores, Munitions, &c. somewhat had happened in their examination thereof, which touched the honour of the lord treasurer. Whereupon the said lord desired, that the utmost truth thereof might be enquired into. Accordingly witnesses had been sworn here, and a sub-committee appointed to take their examinations; which, being reduced into writing, his grace delivered to be read. But, before that was done, the Lord Keeper signified to the house that he had received a Petition from sir Tho. Dallison, delivered unto him by a member of this house, who desired it might be read before the said Report. Which Petition was addressed. "To the right hon. the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled," and ran in these words:

"The humble Petition of sir Tho. Dallison, son of sir Roger Dallison, knt. and bart. deceased.

"Whereas there was an Examination, before a committee of your honours, concerning the lands of his said father, compounded for with my lord treasurer; whereupon there is an Account given to your lordships, by one Mayle, a scrivener, on his lordship's behalf, of 26,000l. or thereabouts, to be given by the said lord treasurer for the said lands, as Mayle reported; now, for that this petitioner and his mother were forced out of their estate therein by his ldp. for a very small matter, by colour of his maj.'s extent; and is able to make appear to your lordships that there hath not been much more than half the sum of 26,000l. really, either in money or money's worth, given for the same by his lordship; and for that the said lands are of far greater value; and this petitioner ought, in all equity, to have the benefit of compounding his father's debts, and the benefit that should accrue by the surplusage of the estate: he most humbly desireth your honours to stay the Report, and grant your petitioner a copy of the account before the same pass from the lords of the committee; and that your petitioner may be allowed to make such just exceptions thereunto, as to the honourable lords of the committee shall seem reasonable.—Tho. Dallison."

A motion was made, Whether by the orders of the house, the lord treasurer may be present when the Report is read; because the same concerns his honour? It was agreed, That he might be present, at the first reading, but not when the same shall be debated by the house.—Then the attorney general read the Report in hæc verba:

"The State of the Business referred to the Sub-Committee for Munitions, &c.

"On the 28th of May, 6 Jac. 1608, a privy-seal was directed to the lord treasurer and under treasurer of the exchequer, for the time being, for the issuing out such sums of money, not exceeding 6000l. per ann. as by quarter-books should appear to be due to the office of Ordnance for Wages or Provisions.—The allowance was duly paid until the 1st of April 1614; but then, or shortly after, by the default of sir Roger Dallison and the officers of the exchequer, sundry payments were unorderly made, whereby the office was unfurnished; and Dallison, who had received those moneys and not employed them as he ought, became indebted in great arrears to his maj.—Upon complaint whereof, in Nov. 1617, his maj. made a reference to divers lords of the council; who, in Dec. 1617, returned under their hands a proposition of Supply, estimated at 54,078l. 8s. 3d.—In February 1619, his maj.'s commission was awarded to the commissioners for the navy, whereof the now lord treasurer was one of the chief, to survey the Office of Ordnance: and they, in July 1620, made a Return hereof to the council, with their opinions how the Magazines might be furnished with a present supply of 13,640l. 14s. 2d.; how the ordinary allowance of 6000l. per ann. might be reduced to 3000l. and how by cutting off many unnecessary charges and other means, his maj. might have yearly near 10,000l. And those propositions made by them, in Michaelmas term 1620, received allowance from the lords, and, at last, from his maj. himself.—In Dec. 1620, the lord visc. Mandeville became Treasurer; and, in May 1621, a privy-seal was drawn by the officers of the Ordnance, for settling the said 3000l. yearly, and for payment of the said 13,640l. 14s. 2d. But the same, being considered of by the commissioners of the navy, was rejected, because it swerved from their propositions; and so, the lord Mandeville leaving the treasurership about Michaelmas 1621, nothing was done. In Oct. 1621, the earl of Middlesex became lord treasurer, and having continued in that place 2 years and 6 months, in all that time none of the three establishments, viz. that of 6 Jac. by the dormant privy-seal; that of 1617 by the lords; nor that of the commissioners of the navy in 1620, have been observed; whereas, if that of the commissioners of the navy (being the least chargeable to his maj. and in which the lord treasurer himself was principal agent,) had been observed, it is conceived, that the Stores had been in much better case, and a course had therein been settled to have retrenched a needless charge of near 10,000l. per ann. as aforesaid.—And whereas, in April 1621, a contract was made with mr. Evelyn, to serve his maj. yearly with 80 lasts of Powder, at 7d. per lb. the want of the payment of about 500l. a month, hath deprived his maj. of the benefit of that contract; which, for 20 months of the time since that contract, hath been forborn for want of payment; which 20 months proportion, if it had been served in, there would have been in store at this present above 260 lasts of Powder, besides 60 lasts of Salt-Petre, which would have made 80 lasts of Powder more: but, by the want of due payment, not only the store is unfurnished of so considerable a proportion, but his maj. it is conceived further, hath lost the benefit of 3d. in every lb. of 80 lasts, which hath been sold to the subject, amounting to 4050l. or thereabouts.—And whereas it was intimated, that the lord treasurer hath made other payments, less importing the public, to the said Office of Ordnance for old arrears; which have a dependency upon another point referred to the sub-committees, touching the lands and debts of sir Roger Dallison: It appears that 28 July 1621, which was about 2 months before the earl of Middlesex became treasurer, he made an agreement with the officers of the Ordnance for buying their extent and interest in the lands of sir Roger Dallison and sir Tho. Mounson, which they had by assignment from his majesty for a debt of 13,062l. and thereby his ldp. did agree, so soon as conveniently he might, to do his best endeavour to procure from his maj. a certain assignment and order for the payment of the sum of 8000l. to the use of the servants and creditors of the office of Ordnance, before the last day of Nov. next, for and towards the payment and clearing of all such sums of money, as, by the pay books of the said office, should appear to be due unto them, over and above the said 13,062l. and his ldp. was, before the same last of Nov. to pay them 1062l. and, at the Annunciation, in the year 1623, 500l. and afterwards, 500l. half-yearly, till the 13,062l. were paid: but his ldp. before the prefixed last of Nov. becoming lord treasurer, did not procure any such order or assignment from his maj.; but, by warrant of the first-mentioned dormant privy-seal of 6 Jac. did. in the first Michaelmas term after he became treasurer, and the two terms of Easter and Michaelmas following, (being all within a little more than a year after his becoming treasurer) pay to them 9131l. of arrears due to the office; and hath, at other times since, paid to them other sums; which make up the former payment of 19,034l. 8s. 11d. whereof was paid since the beginning of this parl. 2480l. 11s. 2d. And touching the payment, which, by the aforesaid agreement, his ldp. was to make unto them of his own money, it appeareth that, upon a second payment, those payments due from him were discharged; and, in lieu thereof, his ldp. assigned to them his part in the petty-farms of the Wines and Currants; which they estimated to be worth for the first two years 1000l. per ann. and for 7 years after 1400l. per ann. and odd pounds. It also appeareth, that about the same time when he made the said agreement with the officers, he bargained with sir Tho. Mounson for his estate in Dallison's lands; for which he agreed to give him 3000l. in money, the making of six baronets, and some fit suit from his maj. when sir Tho. could find it. This 3000l. was duly paid by his ldp.; and then it was agreed that the baronets were not to proceed, but, in lieu thereof, his ldp. gave way to a suit, which sir Tho. made to his maj. for the benefit of compounding with the copyholders of Wakefield, for reducing their fines to a certainty; which his ldp. did estimate at 2000l. and promised him further recompence; yet sir Tho. Mounson affirms, He had neither benefit thereby, nor further recompence.—In this bargain, nevertheless, there are some things favourable for the lord treasurer, especially two. 1st, That, by this bargain, his maj. is freed from all future demands from the officers of the Ordnance, concerning the debt of 13,062l. owing by Dallison; which his maj. upon the assigning those extents, had covenanted to satisfy, in case the incumbrances should hinder them of satisfaction; and this appeareth to be true. 2ndly, some intimation hath been, that this bargain was no bargain of advantage, but of loss to the lord treasurer; and therefore not probable that he should have undertaken, but for his maj.'s service, and the good of the office. And touching this point, it appears, by the good testimony of sir Tho.

Dallison, that, before the troubles of his father, the lands and leases being of about 60 years to come, bought by the lord treasurer, were rented at 1500l. per ann. or thereabouts; whereof the lease-lands are about 300l. per ann.: and that, besides the recompence given to the officers of Ordnance and sir Tho. Mounson, there is allowed to him and his mother, for clearing their interests, 200l. per ann. for their lives: but sir Arthur Ingram offereth to lett the whole, for 40 or 50 years, or any other reasonable time, at 1100l. per ann. And it appears, by the testimony of him and mr. Mayle that the lands were incumbered with an annuity of 200l. per ann. to mr. Beddingfield for life; for which, and the arrears, about 1200l. hath been given, by way of computation; and with 140l. to mr. Smith for life, for which, and the arrears, hath been given, by way of composition, about the value of 800l. and with an assurance, on the part of sir R. Smith and sir J. Davey, for which is to be given 3000l. besides many other incumbrances not yet brought in. But the certainty thereof appears not, nor that any of them, of any considerable value, are precedent to sir Roger Dallison's becoming officer."

This Report being read, the lord treasurer put the house in mind of the imputation laid on him by sir Rob. Pye, some time since, touching the extent of sir Roger Dallison's lands; and that therein they had desired witnessed to be sworn and examined, and he hoped he had fully satisfied their lordships in that cause. But, as for any other matter relating to the Ordnance, Munitions, &c. they never came into his thoughts, as yet, what Answer to make; wherefore he desired he might have a copy thereof, in writing, with liberty to examine his witnesses, and he would answer the same fully in writing. He also desired that his actions might not be examined by pieces, but totally and together; and then he doubted not but that his care, touching the Store for Munitions, &c. would appear to be such that their lordships will clear his honour therein. This being said, the lord treasurer left the house whilst the matter of the Report was in debate. After some time spent therein, it was agreed, That another committee should be appointed to draw up the Heads of a Charge against the lord treasurer, out of a brief of the last Report, and Examinations taken by the former committee.

April 15. A message was brought from the Commons to this effect; "That whereas they had received divers and sundry complaints against a member of that house, which are of a high and grievous nature, they desire a conference thereon to impart the same to their lordships. This was agreed to by the lords.

Report of a Conference between both Houses on a Complaint against the Lord Treasurer. [Ap. 16. The Lord Keeper reported the said conference held the day before, between the two houses, in this manner: At this conference, sir Edw. Coke, on the behalf of the Commons, shewed, "That in their inquisition the Commons had met with, what they scarce ever found before, many great exorbitancies and heinous offences, against a member of this house, the earl of Middlesex, the lord treasurer; and they found him guilty after a strange manner; for, in all their house, not one man said "No, but concluded against him nem. con."—Sir Edw. said further, "The house had appointed him to present 3 Enormities to their lordships, much against his mind; others being far more sufficient, as well in regard of his great years, as of other accidents; yet, he said, he would do it truly, plainly and shortly. There were two great offences in general, which they had distributed into two parts; one of which should be represented by him, and the other by his colleague. That which he should speak to was to consist of two charges. The 1st, gross and sordid Bribery. The 2nd, for procuring the good Orders of the Court of Wards to be altered: for that this was done by his principal procurement, to the deceit of the king, oppression of the subject, and the enriching of his own servants. He would begin with presenting to their lordships the Bribery. Here he craved favour if he should seem long in touching some circumstances; for circumstances to things, he said, were like shadows to pictures, to set them out in fuller representations; but herein he promised to observe seriem temporis.

"The first Charge against the Lord Treasurer for Bribery, opened by Sir Edw. Coke.

"By the lord treasurer's privity (for it concerned his skill properly which was merchandise) a lease of the subsidy and imposts of the French Wines, was lett to the farmers of the petty farm, 17 Jac. at 44,000*l.* yearly rent, and for 50,000*l.* fine; with a covenant from the king, that no more impost should be laid during their lease; because that they knew that the impost would overthrow their trade. Yet the farmers were not content with this covenant for their money and their trade, (for money is their plow, and trade their life) they desire the addition of the king's word for this covenant. Accordingly they had access to the king, and the covenant was confirmed and repeated by him, 'verbo regio,' in the presence of the lord treasurer. Then they thought themselves 'in tuto,' and that they did 'in portu navigare,' free from all storms and tempests. But behold anno 1621, the first thing my lord did in his office, was the laying of an extreme impost of 3*l.* per ton upon the French Wines, which the king, by reason of his covenant, could not, and, by reason of his word, would not surely do. This imposition was against justice, the covenant, and the honour of the king. The king, surely, had he been rightly informed, would never have done it. Upon this the trade sank, and they became suitors to his ldp. for relief, for 10 months together; but with no success. In Michaelmas, 1622, they petitioned his lordship that the trade was overburdened, and themselves quite undone. It is a rule, that a commodity overburdened enrich-eth not the king, but quite destroyeth the trade; but hereof they have no success.—Then they prefer a bill of right against the king in the exchequer, because of the breach of covenant: but to this they could obtain no answer in Michaelmas term. The king's attorney knew well enough of the bill, but could not for his heart devise an answer for it.—In December 22, 1622, the term is out, they are out of their money, and the trade is gone. They appeal, therefore to the fountain of justice, the king's maj. The king is very gracious to them, and said, God forbid that any man should lose by him. He knew nothing of this. It was the lord treasurer's act and device. And so his maj. allowed them a deduction of 9500*l.* to be made to them in 9 years time. Well, 'verba sunt hæc;' these were but good and gracious words, but filled not their purses: they must have a warrant from the lord treasurer to put this favour of the king's into a public act; and this they could not obtain from Dec. to the end of June. The men understand themselves very well, and look about them how this stay comes: one of them tells another, the business sticks, my lord looks for somewhat: and the man was in the right, for so the sequel proved. A 500*l.* Bribe was paid to Jacob for my lord's use, and straightway all was well; the warrant went current, and all was passing well.—One thing remarkable: This was taken out of the petty farms, set down in their monthly and yearly books, and called a gratuity 'speciosa-que nomina culpæ.' Some great space after this, there was a voice of a parliament (Oh! said sir Edw. parliaments work wonderful things). Then the lord treasurer began to cast a circle, and fall to his conjuring. He calls upon Jacob, and commands him to transfer it to the great farm. Here was observed, that 'suppressio veri,' is, in law, an argument of guilt. Here sir Edw. also observed, (in a parenthesis) That is a blessed thing of those that love parliaments; and that surely this lord, of all others, loved them not; because he cast himself into dark mists, when he should meet them; 'nescio quid peccati portat ista purgatio.' This argues much guiltiness.—Then he nominated his Witnesses; which, he said, were without exception. This bribe is proved by Hide, Daws, Bishop, and by Jacob: the last is a witness with a witness. For Jacob blanced this bribe as well as he could, and was taken in three notorious falsities. 1. Being charged, that the money was delivered to him by Hide, he vowed he had never received it; yet, being confronted with Hide, he confessed it: there was one. 2. He pretended he had received the money, but gave his bond for it. Hide affirming to his face, the bond was for other money, and no bond at all for this; then he likewise confessed this: there were two. 3. He said he never had any warrant to enter the same in the petty farm; yet, afterwards, he avowed he had: and this is the third falsity.—Here sir Edw. observed, That Jacob was my lord's necessary creature and petty chapman, and had a son that was his secretary; and, because he was a Jacob, that is, a supplanter, he desired their lordships to take good care of him.—About the beginning of this parl. my lord sent for this Jacob; asked him, if he had entered this money in the petty farm? he said Yea. Then said my lord, go about it presently, and see that the coquets, and all things else, be suppressed in the petty farms, and that this money be removed to the great farm; for I would have all hid and suppressed.—Here sir Edw. observed, That sordid Bribery is like Adam, and would fain get some fig leaves, if it could tell but where to gather them.—Upon the delivery of this Charge (as was desired by his friends) to the lord treasurer, they of the Commons expected an Answer of some rare wit; for so this nobleman was reputed in that house: but his ldp. deceived their expectation; for he declared it was utterly, in every point, he would not say false, but surely untrue. Four things he denied as he was a Christian; and these were all directly proved and made good against him. And so much was delivered against the first Bribe.—The second Bribe was of a strange strain: and both these bribes were received by him in the quality of a treasurer. The farmers of the Great Customs were to renew their farms, and put in security of 48,000*l.* rent, July 29, 1622. Here sir Edw. said he would not enlarge himself; for the business lay in a narrow room. The bribe is the point. My lord liked the sureties well; but some of them fell off, and he would not accept of the rest; and 7500*l.* of the rent was reserved for a year and a quarter. After delay of their lease, and 500*l.* in gold paid unto him by the hands of Jacob; then the security formerly rejected was now accepted: which act of his ldp. the knight confuted by this syllogism. The sureties were sufficient, or insufficient; if sufficient, the Bribe was too much, and the farmers oppressed; if insufficient, the Bribe was too little, and the king was cozened. The second Bribe was proved by Wolstenholme, Garraway, Williams and, if you please, Abraham Jacob; and so much of these two Bribes taken in the capacity of a treasurer.

“Now he comes to the Court of Wards, and shewed, That the lord treasurer's offences herein are of a rare strain. First, the knight noted, by way of preface, That ‘honos,’ the honour, must be given to him that deserved it. All the good artifice began under treasurer Salisbury. Then were Articles invented that helped the king to all his revenues, and tied the officers to their own fees and places. The king's revenues prospered well then: and these articles, by the advice of the judges, were confirmed under the great seal.—When this last lord came to be master of that court, (for now, saith the knight, he is not charged as a lord, but a master) he complained he had not elbow-room for those articles; he was too much bound by them; (and bound he was indeed) and therefore he projects new articles: and these new articles are charged with high extortion; for in them are raised double fees: one fee the surveyor formerly had, and still retains justly, another parallel fee to this my lord hath raised unjustly and oppressingly. For extortion is a grievous and consuming enormity in a commonwealth. It was the greatest evil the high God could foresee would befall the enemies of God. ‘Let the extortioner consume what he hath, and the stranger devour his labour.’ Psalm cix. v. 10.—In these Articles his lordship created a new officer, a secretary. The chief proceedings there go by way of petition. In the former articles these petitions were received by the court, and entered by the clerk without any fee, and so were to be found on record: but, in the new articles, this new officer is to receive these petitions, and may, for any rule to the contrary, suppress them; and for his fee he taketh what he pleaseth; and it is proved he hath taken 10*l.* 20*l.* 4*l.* 5*l.* three dishes of silver, and the like: he is altogether unlimited, unless, peradventure, his oath doth limit him.—Another Charge in this Court, is this Abuse, viz. The lord treasurer's place requires a whole man, and so doth the mastership of the Court of Wards; whereupon his ldp. was fain (as unable to wield those two great places) to invent a new device, a Stamp even with his own name, Middlesex: now this hand moves and guides the seal of the court, and therefore, being turned by the hand of a young secretary, may produce strange consequences. Never any king did suffer a subject to use a Stamp. Old lord Burleigh had a stamp, because of his gout, but never suffered it to be used but in his own presence. Henry 8. had also a Stamp; but, suffering it to be employed by another, an act of parl. was overthrown thereby.—Sir Edw. said, he would conclude with one example: if a ward be not found within one year, he is reputed concealed, and so falls within the dispose of the master of the Court of Wards: now, by the secretary's keeping of this Stamp and Petitions, he may so carry the matter, that any ward may prove concealed; and that is no remote possibility. He brought this instance, a posse ad esse. My lord's secretary hath put to, and used this stamp for, the deferring of an office for half a year; and it is possible it may be done for a whole year. The knight said he never knew any man before trust a stamp, in the hand of another man, to command the king's revenue. He concluded this point with this observation, That my lord was a man raised very high, and very lately, and for expectation of service: that the king had been very beneficial to him; and for him to be so supine in the king's revenue, and so vigilant in his own, was the highest ingratitude. ‘Et si ingratum dixeris, omnia dixisti.’—Sir Edward said, That all this he spake by command; and so he prayed their lordships to weigh it well with due consideration, and to give judgment according to the demerits of the cause.”

Sir Edwin Sandys proceeded to this effect. "The Commons had commanded him (undesirous of any such employment) to second this Charge to their lordships: That he was undesirous thereof, for he had rather defend the innocent than discover the culpable: yet he was the son of obedience, and must perform what, by that house, he had received in command. To decypher out this great lord, upon whom the Charge lay, he would give of him this character to your lordships. 'Nescia mens hominum est, catique ignara futuri, et servare modum rebus sublata secundis.'—The want of measure and moderation most men complain of in this great personage. That he would make his entrance with two protestations; which (as you know) are exclusions, not intended conclusions. His first Protestation, That in this crimination against new impositions, and impositions upon impositions, the Commons intended not to question the power of imposing claim'd by the king's prerogative. This they touch not upon now; they continue only their claim, and when they shall have occasion to dispute it, they will do it with all due regard to his maj.'s state and revenue.—For this time, he desired the word Imposition might be forbore, and the word Oppression taken up in lieu thereof; yet with a reference to the lord treasurer only, but in no means to the king. The second Protestation, That they intend to lay none, no not the least aspersion upon the council table, or any one member thereof, the lord treasurer only excepted. The Commons remain fully satisfied that he was the first proponer. These protestations premised, he branch'd the oppressions into three natures, used in the Wines, Sugars, and Grocery-Wares. And he promised to use this method to discover, first, some General matters, then fall to Particulars.—The Generals are two: 1. The Commons conceive, that my lord treasurer cannot be ignorant, that in the lay of the first Imposition, in the time of the earl of Salisbury, it was promised, That his maj. would never lay any more imposition upon commodities, without the consent of the people. 2. That my lord treasurer knew well that, in that assembly, of parl. complaint was made in the lower house, that the overburthening of trade was the destroying it; and that he was himself employ'd by the house to the king to negotiate for redress therein; and he promised there, that he would make it his master-work. 'Quid dignum tanto foret hic promissor.' The issue of all was this, for his ldp. to devise new burthens. These were the two Generals, from these the knight descended to Particulars, and began with the Wines. He put their lordships in remembrance, that the merchants had the king's covenant under seal, and promise by his royal word, to lay no further impositions: They had reason to desire it, for they paid a great fine and rent for the farm, which your lordships knew best; yet for all this, 19 Jan. 19 Jac. there issued forth a privy seal of imposing 3l. per tun on the French Wines: a grievous imposition in the matter, yet worse in the manner: for if it had been just, yet, in equity, it should have been laid before the voyage undertaken, and the vintage made; then it had been known, and, if known, the merchants had stay'd at home, deserted and given up trading. But this imposition was not laid till 2700 Tun of Wine were arriv'd in the Thames; and yet the lord treasurer gave command, that no entry thereof be made in the custom-house until security was taken to pay this intolerable imposition.—He left your lordships there to consider these circumstances. 1. Ships all laden with this perishing commodity. 2. Great and excessive leaking, by being upon the river, and abuse in the passage. 3. 30 shillings per tun formerly imposed by the Rochelers. 4. 20s. per tun laid by the merchants, for their several Apparel taken away by the Rochelers. 5. This 3l. per tun to fill up the measure of their afflictions.—Yet, instead of compassion in this extremity, such as refused to pay, were cessed at the double the imposts; others, who could not put in bonds, after asperity of language and petitioning to the king, were committed to pursuivants; yet the king's privy-council used the merchants honourably; for they sent for the vintners, and to help the merchants, they raised the wine a penny in a quart.—Notwithstanding this the merchants fell into the hands of customers, who used them rigorously, and they lost great part of their principal: first, they paid half of this new imposition in hand, and gave security to pay the other half; afterwards, the payment was divided into 3 parts, and secured by the merchants accordingly. On the 20th of Aug. following, another privy-seal was issued to determine the former; yet 40s. only of this imposition was taken off thereby, and 20s. laid on the French Wines partially and without limitation; viz. 20s. the tun for London, and 13s. 4d. for the out-ports, whereof the Londoner complained; and it was inserted in the privy-seal, to be at the humble and voluntary assent of the merchants; which is absolutely deny'd, for they only consented to pay 20s. the tun, until the remainder of the former imposition, so secured as aforesaid, were paid, and no longer; yet they were haunted by pursuivants till they had paid: and they complain they are undone, unless their bonds be delivered up. They further complain, That they do pay for their trade cent. per cent. and shew'd the particulars, viz. One merchant had paid 800l. to the king for his part in a short time, and now unable to pay any more.—Here the knight said, That he would willingly suppress what follows, for acerbity of speech is no breeder of good blood; but the Commons had commanded him to speak it, and to declare further, That the merchants compared their sufferings under these impositions, to the sufferings of the old Israelites in Egypt, when they were commanded to make brick with less straw; and generally confess, that they would drive twice as much trade, if their trade were not overburthened. Hereupon they thought they had sufficient ground to complain; this being dishonourable to the king and oppressive to the people, the king's promise, word, and covenant being violated; these impositions, double the value, being grievous to the subject and fearful to posterity; for besides the old imposition, by statute, upon Wines, there are three more upon one another, 'et quis erit modus,' of feeding upon trade." Here ended the Complaint touching the imposition on Wines.

Then sir Edwin proceeded to the Complaint of the lease of Sugars procured by the lord-treasurer, viz. "That whereas George Herriot held the Farm of Sugars, upon a rent of 10,000 marks per ann, the lord-treasurer procured him to surrender that lease, and obtained a new lease thereof unto two of his lordships servants to his own use, at 2000l. per ann. for the same. What merits had his ldp. in the great extreme want of money, as to draw from his maj. so great a reward as 4000l. per ann. for 21 years? but the Commons Complaint herein is of a higher nature. That the king having granted, that the merchants importing any merchandize, and paying the duties for the same, if they export the same within 13 months, their imposition is restored: This is observed in all other merchandizes, save that of Sugars. The reason is plain if your lordships know who is the farmer of it. The Commons further complained, That the lord-treasurer had turned the Composition for Grocery into an imposition; which his ldp. did, without any warrant, whereby he usurped regal authority. That the city of London had yielded to a Composition for Grocery, but the out-ports refused, and especially the city of Bristol; and that in the lord-treasurer Salisbury's time, 11 Jac. that city had a decree in the exchequer, that they should be freed from any such Composition, upon condition to yield to purveyance in kind, when the king or queen comes within 20 miles of their city; which purveyance cost them 800l. when the queen's maj. was there. Nevertheless the lord-treasurer had directed his warrant to levy a composition upon the merchants of that city and the other out-ports, against their wills, with commandment to stay the landing of their goods until it be paid. And this, he said, was the substance of their crying Complaint; what more can they say, but, with wise king Solomon, 'If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at it; for he that is higher than the highest regardeth, and there be higher than he. Eccl. v. 8.' Their Complaint is of an high lord, the lord-treasurer: but your lordships are higher than he; the king higher; and God higher than all; whose justice your lordships execute. This justice they, humbly and instantly, demand of your lordships against these oppressions."

This Report being ended, the lords took into their consideration how to proceed in the business, and then referred the Examination thereof to the sub-committee on Munitions, &c.

adding to the said committee the lord-keeper, the lord-steward, the bp. of Bath and Wells, the lords Wentworth and Spencer: and their lordships may divide themselves into several committees, if they please, for expediting this business; and may send for any witnesses to be sworn here in court, that may conduce to the Examination thereof.

April 24. The abp. of Canterbury reported to the house, That the Committee, appointed to examine into the Complaint against the Lord Treasurer, had met, and examined divers witnesses, who were sworn here in the house, and had made a collection of Part of the said Charge; which mr. Attorney read in form following:—

" Part of the Charge against the Lord Treasurer.

" I. The farmers of the Petty Farms of Wines and Currants, having sustained great loss in their farm, by an impost of 3l. per tun of Wines newly set, were long and instant suitors to the lord treasurer for relief; but finding none, exhibited their bill into the exchequer, and afterwards a petition to the king, for reparation of their loss; to which having received a gracious answer from his maj. the lord treasurer agreed with them upon a recompence of 9500l. to be defalked by 1000l. per ann. out of their rent; yet, after this agreement made, he protracted their warrant about six months, and, in the end, took of them a bribe of 500l. for their dispatch, which was set upon the account of the Petty Farms: but since the summons of the parl. the same was, by his lordship's direction, posted to the account of the Great Farms.—II. The lord treasurer being presented with a tun of Wine, by the farmers of the Petty Customs, was not contented therewith, but exacted money of them also; who were thereupon drawn to give him 100l.—III. The farmers of the Great Farm having, by their lease, covenanted to give security for the payment of their rent, divided their farm into 32 parts, appointing every partner to give security of 1500l. for every part. Five of the partners relinquishing their parts, the security fell short 7500l. Whereupon the 4 patentees, resuming those five parts to themselves, tendered their own security; which his ldp. agreed to accept, yet protracted about 3 quarters of a year, until they gave him 500l. for his dispatch. And whereas his ldp. pretends, by his Answer to the house of commons, that he had this 500l. and the other 500l. first mentioned in one entire sum, for four 32 parts of that Great Farm, it appeareth his ldp. had no parts at all in that farm.—IV. George Herriot having the farms of Sugars upon the rent of 1000 marks per ann. the lord treasurer procured Herriot to surrender that lease; and, to effect the same, gives order for the payment of 14,865l. due to Herriot for jewels; all which was paid between the 15th Dec. 1621, and 10th Jan. following. The lease was no sooner surrendered, but the said treasurer procures a lease to two of his servants, by indenture, dated Jan. 13, 1621, for 21 years, at 2000*l.* rent per ann.; which rent his ldp. paid so slowly, that there having only 4000*l.* thereof grown due since the lease, 3000*l.* thereof was paid on and since the 31st of Dec. last: and whereas the merchants, importing any merchandize, and paying the duties, are freed to export within the year, without any new payments; that custom was observed in all other farms, but denied in this, for the said lord treasurer's benefit.—V. The city of London having yielded to a Composition for Grocery Ware, which the out-ports, particularly Bristol, refused; upon long debate and advisement, in the time of the lord treasurer Salisbury, it was resolved they should not be pressed thereto: nevertheless, the lord treasurer hath given warrant to levy that Composition upon the merchants of the out-ports against their wills, or else to stay the landing of their goods; which hath been put in execution accordingly.—VI. In Dec. 1618, his maj. upon great deliberation and advisement, did set forth instructions, very fitting and necessary for the well ordering of the Court of Wards: the lord treasurer becoming master of the wards: and, for his own private gains, aiming at an alteration of those instructions, first procured a reference to divers of the council to consider thereof, yet after waved that reference; and, by his own power and greatness with the officers of the court, (though much against their wills) and by misinformation of his maj. (though much to the disadvantage of the king and subject) in the year 1622, procures new instructions; thereby taking the petitions from the clerk of the court, and appropriating them to himself and his secretary, who takes great rewards of the subject for procuring answers to the same; and, by colour of those new instructions, he doubles fees of continuance of liveries; and, having concealed the wardships to himself, he may easily make wardships concealed by the course of the new instructions.—Also he hath made a Stamp, and delivered the same to his secretary to be used; thereby, unlawfully, putting into the hands of his secretary the greatest part of the power and trust appertaining to the office of master of the wards. This the secretary hath used, stamping therewith, in the absence of the master, tenders, continuances, warrants to the great seal, grants of wardships and leases, indentures of liveries, &c. And whereas, by a privy seal of 6 Jac. there was an allowance settled for the ordinary of the Office of Ordnance; which, being put out of order in the time of sir Roger Dallison, in 1617, the lords, upon reference from his maj. set, under their hands, a proportion, both for present supply and future upholding of that office: but his ldp. being treasurer for the space of 2½ years, hath observed none of these proportions or establishments; whereby the stores are, in effect, wholly unfurnished.—And there being a Contract made with mr. Evelyn, by himself and other commissioners for his maj. for serving his maj. with Gunt-Powder, being a bargain of high consequence to have been kept, his ldp. hath also neglected and broken that bargain, to the hazard of the kingdom and prejudice of the king. He hath also made unlawful bargains for the lands of sir Roger Dallison; wherein, for compassing those lands, he has contracted to do his endeavour to procure payment of 8000*l.* of old arrears, (which he performed when he became treasurer) and to pay for the land with making of baronets and suits to the king; and, in particular, a suit, for compounding with his maj.'s copyholders of Wakefield by himself, worth 2000*l.* And, having agreed with sir Tho. Dallison and the officers of the Ordnance, he, to gain, indirectly, and by oppressive means, an estate which sir Roger Dallison had passed to sir R. Smith and sir John Davy, he setteth on foot an outlawry of sir Roger Dallison, and thereby disposseseth sir Rd. Smith and sir John Davy, who had been in possession, by a trial at law; using the power of his place, and countenance of the king's service, to wrest them out of a lease and estate of great value."

After the reading of this, it was ordered, That the said part of the lord treasurer's charge should be sent unto him to-day. And that he be warned to appear here at the bar, on the 28th inst. at 9 in the morning, to answer it. Likewise, if he had witnesses to be examined, he may present their names to the house to be sworn between this and the same day. And this is said to be Part of the Charge, because there are other things against him which are yet in examination; and, when reported to the house, he shall be charged therewith, if thought fit.

April 26. The messengers that were sent to deliver the Charge, &c. to the Lord Treasurer, declared they had done it; but he gave no other Answer to them than, "It is well."

April 27. A Petition from the lord treasurer to the House of Lords was read, in hæc verba:

"The humble Petition of the Lord Treasurer of England.

"Most humbly representing to this most hon. house the names of such persons (by the schedule annexed) as the lord treasurer humbly desireth may be sworn and examined for discovery of the truth, upon such Articles as he shall exhibit, touching the several matters contained in that part of his Charge, which has been delivered to him. For which purpose he humbly prayeth such warrant for calling in those witnesses, and such others as he shall give notice of to the clerk of the parl. as the form of this high court requireth. And, withal, humbly propoundeth to the consideration of this most honourable house, Whether your lordships will think fit to proceed to examination of witnesses to be produced on his part, before he hath made his Answer; whereby it may first appear to your lordships what things he will deny and what confess and avow, and in what manner he will avow the same;

upon which, as upon issue joined, he may particularly examine his witnesses, and, after copies of the Depositions taken both for and against him, the cause may be prepared for your lordships honourable judgments; which he protesteth to further, on his part, to a hearing with all possible expedition. Lastly, his most humble suit is, That, in respect of the nature and multiplicity of the matters objected against him, which do necessarily require the assistance of learned counsel, this most honourable court will be pleased to assign the following gentlemen to be of counsel with him, in this cause of weight so much concerning him; viz. mr. dr. Steward, mr. Rd. Hide, of the Middle Temple, mr. Wm. Hackwell, of Lincoln's-inn. MIDDLESEX.—Then follow the names of nearly 40 witnesses.

This Petition being read, the lords appointed a special committee to consider what Answer should be made to it, consisting of the lord president, lord Rochford, the bp. of Rochester, and the lords Wentworth, Howard, and Say. These lords having withdrawn themselves some time, and being returned, the lord president reported to the house the Answer agreed on, in these words: “1. That warrants shall be given for calling in of such witnesses, whose names shall be exhibited in writing, and thought fit by the house to be examined; the interrogatories and witnesses names to be sent to the house to-morrow in the afternoon, and the witnesses themselves to appear, that such of them may be sworn and examined as the house shall think fit. 2. The house sees no cause, when the witnesses names and interrogatories are sent in, why the examination of them should be deferred: but the day for his appearance and answer was to hold. 3. His lordship may use what council he pleases to advise for his defence; but it stands not with the orders of this house to allow council, at the bar, in cases of this nature.”—This Answer, being read and approved, was sent to the lord treasurer. A Memorandum is made, That the earl of Bridgewater, one of the committee to search precedents, &c. reported, That they could find none where a member of this house did answer, by his counsel, to a complaint exhibited against him: but that divers members of this house and others had answered in person and not by counsel; and that counsel was denied to Michael de la Pole, lord chancellor, 10 Rd. 2. when he required the same.

April 28. Another Petition from the lord treasurer to the house, was presented and read, in hæc verba:

“The humble Petition of the Earl of Middlesex, Lord Treasurer of England.

“Most humbly sheweth, That, according to your lordships' directions, in Answer to his Petition humbly presented yesterday, he had appointed the witnesses there named to attend the most honourable house this afternoon, to be sworn to answer such interrogatories as, on his behalf, shall be exhibited.—But, whereas your lordships did further direct that the said interrogatories should be presented this day; he most humbly desires your lordships to be truly informed, that, having neglected no time since he received his Charge to prepare his Answer, he finds the matters objected so many and of such divers natures, that he cannot yet, possibly, furnish the same, in such perfect and particular manner, as he ought and desires to do for your lordships' best satisfaction, and the clearing the matters laid to his Charge in all points. And therefore, his Answer being not yet ready, upon which all the interrogatories must properly be grounded, and without which your lordships' judgments of the pertinencies of the interrogatories cannot be rightly informed, he humbly beseecheth your lordships to respite them, and as soon as his Answer is finished he will forward them with all possible speed. And he doth, once again, humbly propound to the consideration of this most hon. house (because therein your lordships have not been pleased to give Answer unto his former Petition) whether your lordships will not, in your noble justice, permit him to have copies of the Depositions taken and to be taken in this cause, on both sides, without which he shall be utterly disabled to make that just defence, which a cause, of that importance to him, doth necessarily require.—Middlesex.”

The lords, upon reading this Petition, did all agree, “That it is against the order of this court, as well as of all other courts, for a delinquent to have Copies of the Examinations before he answers.” And, as to the rest of the Petition, the following Answer was agreed on to it: “The lords expected to be obeyed and not to have been directed; and hold for a disrespect unto the house, That witnesses should be produced and sworn, and no interrogatories sent whereon to examine them as was required. The Copies of Depositions already taken, for Proof of the Charge, was not directly prayed in the former Petition, therefore it was not precisely answered; but it is so unfit a desire that the lords think the petitioner ill-advised to make such a request. And, according to the former order of the house, the lords expect the lord treasurer's appearance to-morrow morning, to hear such Answers as he shall make.”

April 29th. Another Petition from the lord treasurer was presented to the house, and read in hæc verba:

“Most humbly shewing, That, besides the weighty cares of mind which now do lie upon him, by the Charge he hath received from that most hon. house, he is fallen into such an indisposition of body, as he is once more enforced to beseech your lordships, in your noble justice and favour, to grant him a farther day for presenting his Answer and Interrogatories, which fall out to be much longer than he himself expected. It being no small addition to his sorrows, that, in a case so nearly concerning him, he cannot conceive by their lordships former Answers to his former humble Petition, that they purposed to allow him Copies of the Depositions, whereby, after his Answer delivered in writing, he shall prepare himself for his just defence against the hearing.—Middlesex."

To back this Petition, the Prince moved "That in respect of the lord treasurer's great office, and sickness pretended by his ldp. he might have a longer day given him, and that day to be absolute. On which the following Answer to the Petition was agreed on. That the lords, only in respect of the lord treasurer's indisposition of health, are pleased to respite his appearance this day; but do enjoin that on May 1, at 9 in the morning, if his health so permit, he bring his Answer; if not, that then he send his Answer to his Charge in writing, and all such Interrogatories as he would have his witnesses examined upon. Likewise, the lords do peremptorily assign the 7th of May next, for his appearance in person, and for the final hearing and determining the cause." On the same day the Attorney General read the following Additional Articles to the Charge against the Lord Treasurer.

"I. He undertook the office of the Wardrobe, in the 16th year of his maj.'s reign, and continued in the service of that place from Michaelmas, anno 16, to the same time, anno 19. This office he took upon him under pretence of doing his maj. special service; and, for that purpose, obtained a certain assignment of 20,000*l.* per ann, or thereabouts, which was duly paid unto him by way of imprest. Instead of doing service, he hath brought that place into disorder and confusion; he hath not duly served the warrants which he should have served, nor paid the workmen and creditors; he hath neither kept orderly accounts, nor yielded any; but under colour of pretended service of great importance, hath procured gifts and discharges of great sums of money, which he received for the execution of that place, and for the queen's funeral. II. Whereas, in the former Charge delivered to his ldp. it is mentioned that merchants, importing Sugars have been denied to export the same without paying new duties: it appears, upon further consideration of that business, That the prejudice the merchants have sustained concerning their Sugars, is, that they have been denied, upon exportation of sugars, the imposts paid on importation; which is contrary to the direction given by his maj.'s letters patents 5 Sept. 8 Jac."

May 1. The lord treasurer sent another Petition to the lords, with his Answer to his Charge, and the Interrogatories to 4 parts of the same; which, being read, were referred to a committee, who were to report to the house what interrogatories they reject. The tenor of the Petition was as follows:

"The lord treasurer, with most humble thanks, acknowledgeth the honourable favour of this house, by their noble order made in this house on Thursday last; and doth most humbly take hold of the liberty thereby granted him, in respect of his indisposition, which yet continueth) most humbly to present to your lordships herewith all his Answer, in writing, as well to the Charge he received the 24th of April, as to the Additions thereto which he received the 29th of the same, together with as many of his interrogatories for Examination of Witnesses as he could possibly make ready by this time, which are full and perfect for four of the Articles of his Charge; most humbly desiring Monday morning at the sitting of the court for the bringing in the rest; and that your lordships will pardon the length of his Answer; the variety and multiplicity of the particulars necessarily requiring it, as well for the readier informing of your lordships judgments, as for relief of his own weak memory whom as yet you have been pleased to appoint to stand alone without counsel at the hearing: he doth withall humbly explain his meaning in the former Petitions, which were not to desire Copies of the Depositions before his Answer were put in, and all Witnesses for and against him fully examined; but when that shall be done, he hopes it will stand with the honour and justice of that most honourable house to allow him copies of the depositions on both sides.—Middlesex."

The tenor of the Lord Treasurer's Answer to his Charge followeth.

"The humble Answer of the Earl of Middlesex, Lord Treasurer of England, to the part of the Charge which was delivered him from the most honourable Court of the higher House of Parliament, on Saturday the 24th of April, 1624.

"To the 1st and 3rd Articles concerning the two pretended Bribes of 500*l.* a piece. His Answer is, that no such several sums were ever paid unto him, nor any money at all for any of the causes mentioned in the said Charge; but he acknowledgeth that, the 27th of June last past, he, by his servant, did receive at the hands of Jacob, one entire sum of a 1000*l.* in consideration of his interest in four 32 parts of the great Farm, which he had formerly reserved unto himself, upon settling the new lease thereof; and for no other cause, as he hath truly alledged in his Answer to the Commons: and, for better satisfaction of this most honourable house therein, he hath here set down a true and particular Declaration of the state and carriage of that business, as followeth:—He is very well assured that as his general course, in all bargains of the like nature for the king, hath been to look to his own duty and the king's service, as the husband of his maj.'s estate; so in this particular, touching the 9500*l.* allowed to the Petty Farmers in recompence of their losses, he carried himself so carefully and strictly for the king, as he could no ways expect so much as thanks, much less any gratuity or reward from them: for though, at first, they demanded of his maj. a very great sum, pretending, that the interruption they complained of was 10,000*l.* disadvantage to them in their first year only; yet upon good reasons, shewed by the lord treasurer, on his maj.'s behalf, they were brought to accept of 9,500*l.* whereof, though they earnestly pressed to have present satisfaction, yet he over-ruled them to take it in 9½ years, (which was not worth more than 5000*l.* in hand) and that, also, to be in full satisfaction of all their demands, not for one year, but for the whole term of 9½ years; so, as, in that particular, the lord treasurer was so far from doing them favour, that he thinks, they have maliced him ever since, rather for holding them so hard to it, than for any regard to the king's service.—And for the Great Farm, the said treasurer saith, That the old farmers becoming suitors to renew their lease, propounded to leave the Silk-Farm upon his maj.'s hands; and, withall, to have an abatement of the rent they then paid for the Great Farm: whereupon the lord treasurer, finding how much that offer tended to his maj.'s disadvantage, desired sir A. Ingram, by himself and his friends, to get a better offer made to the king, which was done accordingly; and thereby his maj.'s rent was not impaired (as at first was proposed) but increased 4000*l.* per ann.; and the Silk Farm Rent was also made good; which otherwise, to have been lett by itself, would not have yielded the old rent by 5, or 6000*l.* per ann.; so that the bargain was better to the king than the old farmers first offered by 9, or 10,000*l.* per ann.: notwithstanding, it was thought fit by his maj. that the old farmers, coming to the rate offered by others within a 1000*l.* per ann. should have the preference of the bargain. But withall, the lord treasurer, to gratify those, who, by the said offers, had done the king service, by advancing the rent as aforesaid, did, at the instance of sir A. Ingram, on his and their behalf, reserve certain parts of the said Farm, with no other intention but to dispose the same among them; and then gave order for the lease to proceed to the patentees, who were named, in trust, for themselves, and all the partners.—And, afterwards, the said lord treasurer did dispose of the said parts, reserved to the said sir A. Ingram and others, according to the first intention; 4 of which parts, the parties which had them did afterwards, at several times, give up to the said lord treasurer, and left the same at his disposing. Some months after, sir Philip Carey, who had one of the lord treasurer's parts, and some others placed by the farmers, upon some mislike of carriages of that farm, did also relinquish and give up their parts; upon occasion whereof, the lord treasurer, being put in mind by sir A. Ingram of the said 4 parts, which were returned unto him by those to whom he had formerly disposed them; and being asked what he would do with them, did, upon Jacob's next coming to him, ask him, How the farmers meant to use him for his four 32 parts of the farm? He answered, That because his ldp. had formerly signed a warrant, for the king's security of all the 32 parts, and said nothing of those 4 parts, they thought his ldp. had waved them: but he would speak with the partners about it, and then give him a full answer. Within few days after, Jacob returned to him, and very freely offered a 1000*l.* for his parts, according to the rate which, he said, they had lately given to mr. Chancellor for his: which the lord treasurer was contented to accept: and within 4 days after he told mr. Chancellor what bargain he had made with the farmers, for his interest in four 32 parts of the Great Farm, viz. That he had sold them to the Farmers for a 1000*l.*—This Agreement being thus made with Jacob, and the 1000*l.* paid accordingly; it falls out, by that which was since discovered, That he and his partners, which shared those 4 parts, agreed together, to ease themselves of that money, (which should have been properly born upon their own private accounts,) by laying the same upon the general accounts of the Great and Petty Farms; (themselves being farmers in both) and thereupon, the 1000*l.* as is since discovered, was by them divided into two parts; the one half entered upon the books of the Petty Farmers, and the other upon the general account of the Great Farm, as gratuities to the lord treasurer; who little knew of their unjust proceedings, both with himself and their partners, until about Christmas last; when he had first intimation of some such Charge laid upon the Petty Farms, not hearing then that which was done upon the Great Farms account: hereupon he presently sent for Jacob, and was much offended with him, that he should suffer any such unjust thing to be done; who, at first, denied it; but, the next day, confessed it; and said, it was ill done; and said, he was over-ruled in it; and promised to set all straight again, according to the truth and right of the case; which, the lord treasurer understands was done accordingly; not by posing the 500*l.* from the Petty Farm's Account to the Great Farm's but by discharging both unjust charges out of both accounts; the patentees returning back the money which they had taken off the Petty Farmers, upon the lord treasurer's just exception thereto; and also making like restitution, of their own accord, to their partners in the Great Farm, whom they had likewise wronged; whereof the lord treasurer heard nothing till of late: so, he hopes, the proofs of this cause will make it evidently appear, that all this scandal hath fallen upon him, by this underhand working of the patentees for their own private gain; by wrongfully charging their partners in both farms, to ease themselves, without the lord treasurer's privity or knowledge: and though the patentees, to make their own tale good, have lately denied that the lord treasurer had any part in the farm; yet it will manifestly appear upon proof, by the oaths of men of good reckoning, that themselves have acknowledged, that his ldp. had reserved part of that farm at his disposing.—For the 100*l.* and the tun of Wine, alledged, in the

2nd Article, to be received: the truth is this, That Jacob being with the lord treasurer about other business, told him, That the Farmers of the Petty Farms, had, or did intend, to present him with a tun of wine, for a new year's gift. The lord treasurer then answered him merrily, That other lord treasurers had been better respected by those farmers, and that he would have none of their wine; and shortly after, Bernard Hyde brought him an 100l. for a new year's gift only, and for no other cause.—To the 3rd Article, concerning Herriot's Reckoning and the Sugar Farm, the lord treasurer makes this Answer, That in 1620, a lease was granted to Herriot, of the Impost upon Sugars for 3 years, not at the rent of 10,000 marks per ann. as is alledged in the Charge, but at less by a 1000l. per ann. viz. 5666l. 13s. 4d. rent. Afterwards, the 17th of Nov. 1620, in the time the lord Mandeville was treasurer, Herriot obtained a privy-seal of assignment, whereby he had power to pay himself out of the Sugar Farm-Rent, by way of retainer, a debt of 13,089l. 16s. formerly due to him, viz. for his free-arrear in the exchequer 187l. 10s. and upon six privy-seals for jewels, formerly bought of him, 12,902l. 6s. in which privy-seal of assignment, there was one special clause, That if the said 3 years rent would not suffice to pay the whole debt, by reason of defalcations which might fall out upon the farm, the rest should be made good out of the exchequer; and afterwards, in May and Aug. 1621, in the visc. Mandeville's time, Herriot obtained two other privy-seals, for two other debts due to him, amounting to 1962l. 15s. which, being added to the former debts by privy-seal, makes up the great sum of 14,865l. mentioned in the lord treasurer's Charge.—And whereas it is alledged, that this whole sum of 14,865l. was paid to Herriot by the now lord treasurer's order within the space of 26 days: the truth is, There was not one penny paid at all in money, but Herriot being indebted to his majesty 7799l. upon account of the rents and profits of the Sugar-Farm until Christmas 1621, the same was allowed in discharge of so much of his debt of 14,865l. viz. 5666l. 13s. 4d. which he had power to pay himself, by virtue of the said privy-seal of assignment; and 2132l. 6s. 8d. which was done by him upon his account before the lease of the Sugar-Farm began. And whereas he might, by the said privy-seal of assignment, have paid himself the other 7066l. within less than 15 months; the lord treasurer did, by Herriot's consent, transfer the same to be paid out of the Tobacco Farm, viz. 4000l. at Michaelmas 1622, and the rest at Michaelmas 1623, which was a longer time and more advantageous assignment for the king than the former was: so, although there were several orders signed, as if the money had been paid immediately out of the exchequer; yet that was done, of necessity, to enable the striking tallies, for the tellers charge and discharge, as the form of the exchequer required, without issuing any money at all: so that it will appear upon record, this Charge upon the lord treasurer is wholly mistaken; and that he was so far from paying so much ready money as he is charged with, that he paid no ready money at all, but by assignment; which he made at longer days, than it was formerly settled in his predecessor's time. And thereupon Herriot, having his debt thus settled and paid to his content, did surrender up his lease; which, he had procured to no other end, but to secure the payment of the debts owing to him by the king. Afterwards, it is true, his maj. granted a new lease of the Sugar-Farm to the lord treasurer's use, at the rent of 2000l. per ann.; in the granting whereof his maj. was truly informed of the state of the same, and particularly made acquainted, That the said Farm of Sugars might be improved to 6000l. per annum, though Herriot had it but at 5666l. 13s. 4d. it being his maj.'s pleasure, out of his own grace and goodness, to grant the same, in form aforesaid, to the lord treasurer, for his many services, and for considerations best known to himself.—For the slow paying his rent, it is true, that one of the 3000l. was paid 3 or 4 days after the rent-day, and the other two half-years rents were forborne in respect of some private disbursements of his lordship's for the king; upon bills of exchange to the commissioners for Ireland; and other engagements for his maj.; which his ldp. intended should be discharged and cleared by the said rent.—And, lastly, The liberty of transporting Merchants' Sugars, formerly imported, remaineth now in the same estate and condition, without any alteration, since the lord treasurer's lease, as it did at any time before; neither is there any such restraint or denial made by him, or under him, to the merchants' prejudice or his own profit, as is alledged in the Charge.—To the 4th Article, touching the Composition for Grocery-Wares in Bristol and the out-ports; the lord treasurer saith, That complaint being made unto him on his maj.'s behalf, That the said Composition-Money being no less due in the out-ports than in the port of London, no certain course was settled for the receiving of it, or bringing it to account for his maj.'s use, so as little or no benefit thereof came to the king: he thereupon thought fit to send a general warrant to the out-ports, to authorize Jacob to take care of that collection; and receive such duties of that nature, as had been formerly used to have been paid; to the end the whole collection thereof might come in upon one man's account; with no intention to raise a new charge upon the subject, but only to settle the collections of the king's duties in order: and, as soon as the said lord treasurer had notice, That the citizens of Bristol had formerly yielded to furnish his maj.'s household with grocery in specie, upon purveyance, at the king's coming into those parts; and, thereupon, had obtained an order in the exchequer, to exempt them from the payment of the composition; the lord treasurer did presently discharge the former warrant sent thither before, and referred the merchants (who acquainted them with it) to sir Simon Harvey, one of the officers of the Green Cloth, who certified his lordship, that he had agreed with them to their good contentment.—To the 5th Article, concerning the business of the Court of Wards, the lord treasurer makes this humble Answer, That in Dec. 1618, his maj. did set forth instructions for the ordering of the Court of Wards; which orders were set forth by the procurement and solicitation of some of the officers, without the privity of the lord Wallingford, then master, and some other of the council of that court, and near about the time of his lordship's leaving the place: divers of which articles tended to the abridgement of the antient authority and profits of the master's place, and for the profit of others of the officers of the court.—Whereupon the lord treasurer, being made master, was an humble suitor to his maj. to restore him to the former rights of the place, by altering the said Instructions in some points, not prejudicial to his maj.'s profits, nor grievous to his subjects; upon which it pleased his maj. to refer the same to some privy counsellors, as is mentioned in the Charge: after which time, and before any thing was done, upon the humble motion of the lord treasurer, his maj. was pleased to direct, That the master and officers should first confer and agree (if they could) among themselves, and resort to the referrees, if they agreed not: Whereupon the master and all the officers, upon sundry meetings and debates, agreed among themselves for the new Instructions, and thereupon voluntarily subscribed their names. There was no misinformation used to his maj. neither are the points contained in the new Instructions disadvantageous to the king or subjects more than the former, and, in some points, of much more advantage both to the king and subject. Touching the taking Petitions from the Clerk of the court, and appropriating them to himself and the secretary, who is charged with taking great rewards for procuring answers to the same, he saith, That, until the said Instructions of 1618, all Petitions were delivered to the master; which, by the said instructions of 1618, were (to the great prejudice of the subject, and delay of his maj.'s service) delivered to the clerk of the court, who was to present it at the sitting of the Council, which could be only in term time; whereas, by the former antient course, and by the last Instructions, the Petition being delivered to the master, he only giveth order for finding and returning an office, which must also be entered with the clerk; and, the office being returned, the grant is made by the master and council, at the council table. By this course the suitor hath expedition at all times, and the master no profit at all; and the secretary neither hath taken, nor exacted, any reward of the subject for procuring Answers, to the knowledge of him the lord treasurer. Touching the doubling fees for Continuance of Liveries, by the new Instructions, he saith, That, ever till the Instruction of 1618, the suitor might continue his livery, either with the master, or surveyor; and the master's fees for such continuance was ever 10s. The Instructions of 1618 appropriated the continuance only to the surveyor, which was an encroachment by the surveyor upon the master; now the new Instructions enjoin the continuances to be with both, for which the master taketh no other fee than 10s. which was the antient fee for continuances taken by all masters before him: and, for tenders, the master doth now take but 5s. whereas the antient fee is 10s.—By the Continuance before both houses, men are rather forced to sue out their liveries to the benefit of the king, and good of such as have cause to sue against them. Touching the having of concealed Wardships, and, to that point, that the master may easily make wardships concealed by the course of the new Instructions, the lord treasurer saith, That altho' he hath the disposing of concealed wardships, yet the benefit of them is to the king's own use; and it is not in his power to make a concealed wardship: for if the petition should be suppress'd, or not answered, yet it is no concealment, by the new Instructions, if any suit be made for it within a year after the death of the tenant; neither is the lord treasurer charged to have done, or so much as to have attempted any such act.—Touching the Stamp, which he is charged with having delivered to the secretary, he doth humbly acknowledge the same; but, withall, desireth your lordships to take into consideration, that the whole purpose and scope of doing thereof was only for the present dispatch of suitors in ordinary matters of course; and for such business as could not be effected by the Stamp alone, without the assistance or joining of other officers therewith, either before or after putting the Stamp: and the lord treasurer was rather induced to give way thereto, because he had understood that the lord Burleigh, when lord treasurer, made use of the like; and for that Stamps are in use in other offices at present: yet, if the lord treasurer had ever conceived, or been informed, that it had been unlawful or unfit, he should not have used it: also he directly affirmeth, That, by the use thereof, neither his maj. nor the subject, hath hitherto any charge or prejudice, but much ease in their dispatch.—And as to Dallison's unsettling the Office of Ordnance, that fell out 8 or 9 years since; and the supply set down by the lords, in 1617, was 4 years before the lord treasurer was in office; neither did the commission of the treasury, nor his predecessors, pursue any point thereby directed; but it lay wholly neglected, and now only revived against the lord treasurer, who never saw it but in this parliament: and for the Book made up by the commissioners of the navy, in 1620, for supplying the Stores and future upholding of the Office of Ordnance, (tho' being the last of the three settlements mentioned in the Articles, it might be sufficient to suspend both the former) it was so far from being an establishment to govern the office by, that all the officers have, and still do oppose it, and protest against it to this day; so as there being only propositions without resolutions, and no settled rule of establishment and direction, why should the lord treasurer be bound to keep it? or why the breach thereof be made his fault now, when it was broken and neglected in his predecessor's time, who was then the only proper officer to have put it in execution, the now lord treasurer being but one of the propounders of it.—Notwithstanding, he humbly conceives, and hopes to prove clearly, that there hath been no such wilful negligence as is alledged; for tho' it be true, that the officers of the Ordnance, always opposing that Book of the commissioners, would never sue out the two warrants thereby required, the one of 13,640l. 14s. 2d. for Supply of the Stores, and the other of 3000l. per ann. for the Ordinary; yet there have been other privy seals of the same nature sued out, whereupon hath been issued to that office, since that book of the commissioners, was delivered, as follows, viz. for the supply of the Stores, 11,096l. 17s. 6d. which sums want not much of the commissioners preparations, considering that the ordinary quarter-books are yet unpaid for a year and a quarter; all which argue no wilful negligence in the payments, howsoever the officers have disposed of the monies; nor any great unfurnishing of the stores, which, if they have less proportion of some stores of provisions than were set down in the commissioners books, yet they have more of other stores of provisions, which have since been thought more useful and more necessary.—As to what concerns neglecting the supplies for Gun-powder, the lord treasurer saith, 'That the bargains with Evelyn were made in the lord Mandeville's time, who continued in the office the first 5 months after; in which time Evelyn served in Powder for the first 3 months; but, getting no money for it, made a stop of his delivery, according to the liberty of his contract: so that the same was broken in the lord Mandeville's time, and left wholly in distraction to the now lord treasurer, with a debt for 3 months powder, delivered as aforesaid; his predecessor not paying one penny upon that contract in all that time.—Neither did that bargain with Evelyn suffer any small interruption, by the continual complaints stirred up against him by Mr. Sadler, and new propositions made by him for settling the powder-making otherwise; whereby Evelyn's contract stood under question, and both the lord treasurer, and Mr. Chancellor, and the commissioners of the navy, had several times the trouble to examine the same; the lord treasurer having a purpose to bring Evelyn to account for the profit, made by him, of the surplusage of the price of the powder put to sale: by this means, and by reason of other mishaps, of blowing up the powder-mills by fire, Evelyn grew discouraged; and the service was neglected, till Sadler's suggestions were found frivolous, which was near a year's interruption of the service.—Besides, when the lord

treasurer entered, he found in the Stores but 116 lasts odd hundreds of powder; and, the 20th of March last, he left in store above 141 lasts, notwithstanding the great expence of powder, upon extraordinaries, in the now lord treasurer's time, which also might have been 194 lasts, if the lord Mandeville had settled and maintained the contract in his time, by addition of his 5 months provision, and the 3 months which he left the now lord treasurer to pay for; whereas the whole proportion of Gun-Powder, assigned by the commissioners of the navy's book to be in store, was but 143 lasts of powder; and good reasons given wherefore there should be no more.—Lastly, It will appear, by comparing the quantity of Powder, paid for by the now lord treasurer, with the time before, that his ldp. had paid for as much, in this short term of 2½ years, as hath been paid for in the next 7 years before; so as never, in the king's time, were the Stores so well furnished with powder for quantity and goodness, as they are now; and yet never more want of money in the exchequer these 20 years, than hath been in the now lord treasurer's time.—To the last Article of the Charge, about the bargain for the land which was Sir Roger Dallison's, the lord treasurer saith, 'That he hath not made any unlawful bargain for the lands of the said Dallison; neither hath he paid for the said lands with making of baronets, or freeing copyholders, or any other suit to the king, as by that Article is pretended; but hath really paid for the same in money and money's worth, out of his own estate, to the full value of the lands and more: and, for more full declaration of the truth, he saith, That the said Sir Roger being indebted to the king in 13,062l. 4s. 10½d. whereof Sir Tho. Mounson, his surety, was found debtor 3100l. the said Dallison's lands were extended for 9962l. 4s. 10½d. thereof, and the said Sir Tho. Mounson's lands for the said 3100l. and these so extended, together with the said several debts, were granted by his majesty's letters patent the 20th of July, 18 Jac. unto Francis Morrice, and other officers and creditors of the Ordnance, for 13,062l. owing to them by his maj.; with a special command to the lord treasurer and chanc. of the exchequer, to make out such writs and process for the said debts as should be required; and, with a covenant on the king's part, that if, by reason of incumbrances, they could not receive the same in convenient time, then it should be paid unto them out of the exchequer.—These lands of the said Sir Roger were so incumbered by former charges, that the said officers and creditors of the Ordnance could not raise, by the said extent thereof, near so much as the bare interest of the said 9962l. 4s. 10½d. parcel thereof; and therefore did not conceive how it could give satisfaction unto them for the said 9962l. due debt, long forborne; but that they must of necessity have recourse to his maj. again for their better satisfaction, according to his maj.'s covenant contained in the said lease, made unto them in that behalf; and yet there was nothing allowed to relieve the poor distressed lady of the said sir Roger Dallison and her son: whereupon the now lord treasurer, in July, 1621, being then but one of his maj.'s commissioners for his debts, was made acquainted by the said Francis Morrice, and other the said officers and creditors of the Ordnance, of their intent and purpose; and, being willing to do his maj. the best service he could therein, after divers conferences, did come to an agreement with them for their interest in the said extents, and to make them payment of the said 13,062l. for the same, as follows, viz. 1062l. before the last day of Nov. following 1621, and the rest by 500l. every 6 months, at and after the Annunciation, 1623: after which agreement made for the extents, he not perceiving how he could make any use thereof, unless he compounded also with such as had the inheritance and other estates in the said Dallison's lands, did deal with some of them for the same; and then came to a second agreement with the said Francis Morrice, and the rest of the officers and creditors of the Ordnance, to convey to them an estate, which he then had for 9 or 10 years to come, in the Petty Farms of Currants and Wines, of the yearly value of 1400l. (and worth 7000l. and more, to be sold) which he did grant, and they did accept in full satisfaction of the said 13,062l. 4s. 10½d. and for their interests in the said extents accordingly.—Not long afterwards, the lord treasurer, being desirous to free himself of any further trouble or care, by reason of many other the incumbrances which were upon the said lands, did, in or about Nov. 1621, agree with sir Arthur Ingram, to deliver the said lands, with other lands then of him the said lord treasurer in the county of York, unto the said sir Arthur, in exchange for other lands of his, and to give unto him 9000l. in money, for the compounding and freeing the said estate and incumbrances, which were upon the said lands, late Dallison's, and of a lease he had of one Anthony Meers, of other lands, intermixt with the said Dallison's lands, esteemed of the yearly value of 400l. per ann.; of which 9000l. the said lord treasurer, afterwards, in Feb. and March 1621, by the consent of the said sir Arthur, did pay unto sir T. Mounson, for his interest in Dallison's lands, the sum of 3000l. besides the freeing of his the said sir Tho. Mounson's own lands of the said other extent, for the said 3100l. and all the residue of the said 9000l. he the said lord treasurer hath paid and satisfied, as it hath been required by the said sir A. Ingram accordingly; which said several sums of 7000l. and 9000l. amounting together to 16,000l. are more than the said lease and lands are worth, at and from the time of the said agreement for the exchange so made between the said lord treasurer and the said sir Arthur: and thereupon the lady Dallison, and sir Tho. Dallison, her son, upon a composition made with them by the said sir Arthur, did, in Feb. 1621, make an assignment of the said lease, to certain persons named by the said sir Arthur in trust for his use; and, since the said agreement and that time, the lord treasurer had no more to do therein than as the duty of the place requires, and (as he hath been advised by his maj.'s learned council) convenient and fit to be done on his maj.'s behalf: and therefore, as touching the rest of the said last Charge, That the lord treasurer having agreed with sir Tho. Dallison, and the officers of the Ordnance, he, to gain, indirectly, and by oppressive means, an estate which sir Roger Dallison had passed to sir R. Smith and sir John Davey, did set on foot an outlawry of sir Roger Dallison's, and thereby dispossessed sir Richard Smith and sir John Davy, who had been in possession, by a trial at law, using the power of his place, and countenance of the king's service, to wrest them out of a lease and estate of great value, the lord treasurer saith, The same is wholly mistaken; and that the truth is, That the said sir Rd. Smith, having a conveyance of all the freehold lands which were the said sir Rd. Dallison's, in Scotten, as a mortgage for payment of 1300l, and the said sir John Davy having an assignment of the said lease, as a mortgage for the payment of 600l. by year, for 10 years, upon a very hard contract for money, he the said sir Rd. Smith, long before the said treasurer had any thing to do with the said lands or lease, was dispossessed of freehold lands, by virtue of the said extent, for the king; and, after such time as the said lord Treasurer had so bargain'd and agreed with the said sir A. Ingram, and had left the said whole business to him as aforesaid, it was found that the said sir Roger Dallison stood outlawed, after judgment, at divers several men's suits, whereby the same lease and interest was in his maj. by means whereof some difference grew between the said sir Rd. Smith, sir John Davy, and the said sir A. Ingram, which the said treasurer used the best means he could to reconcile; and, to that end, endeavoured to have the same arbitrated and ended by sir Tho. Savage and sir Nich. Fortescue: but their travel therein taking no effect, after some suits in the prerogative court, the exchequer, and common pleas, between sir Rd. Smith, sir John Davy, and sir A. Ingram, in conclusion (by and with the consent of all parties) the said differences were heard and ended by sir Hen. Hobart, lord chief justice of the common pleas, and by the rest of the justices of the same court; by whose mediation and order, there is to be paid to the said sir Rd. Smith and sir John Davy, in satisfaction of their estates and interest in the said lands and lease, over and besides other great sums of money by them formerly received, the sum of 3000l. And touching the Charge of the Contract, about paying the 8000l. old arrears, the lord treasurer saith, That all the 8000l. was not old arrears, as is pretended, for that 3800l. thereof was then newly due by quarter-books, for certain quarters ending at Midsummer, the next before the said year 1621. And also saith, That his promise therein was made before he became lord treasurer; and that promise was but to do his endeavour to get the 8000*l.* paid; the same being a just and due debt owing to about 100 poor families, whose pressing necessities would have forced him, after he came to the place of treasurer, to have given them satisfaction, if he had made no such uncertain promise before; and the said debt was paid at 13 several times, by several portions, as money could be best spared, between March 1621, and May 1623; and the king was so far from being prejudiced by the lord treasurer's dealing in this bargain, that his maj. was thereby eased from the repaying of the said 13,062*l.* 4*s.* 10½*d.* according to the said covenant: and, to make it appear that no oppression or power was used in this purchase, for any private benefit, or otherwise, nor that the same was paid for by making of baronets, and suits to the king, as is pretended, the said treasurer will undertake, and freely offereth, that the lands shall be conveyed again to whom this hon. house shall appoint, upon payment of the said 9000*l.* and reassuring of his said leases and interests in the said Petty Farms, with repayment of the monies received upon the same. It being also apparent by his declaration, That if any such suits, oppressions, or other hard measure, had been offered touching the said lands or lease, as is alledged in the said Charge, the same were no way done by the lord treasurer, or by his privy or direction, or whilst the said lands remained in his hands, which was not for above 5 months; so as the same can in no manner concern the lord treasurer, neither doth he know of any thing done therein by any other, but what hath been just and lawful.—And as to the Baronets, the same nothing at all concerneth this matter; but was a grace of his maj. (upon the suit of a nobleman, who was assisted by the lord treasurer) which he was pleased to confer upon sir Tho. Mounson, in regard of the loss of his office of Hawkes; and the same taking no effect, his maj. upon the said sir Tho. Mounson's late Petition, was pleased, in lieu of the Baronets formerly intended him, to grant another suit for the compounding with certain of the copyholders in Wakefield, for the value of 50*l.* by the year; whereof as yet he hath received no fruit at all.

“The humble Answer of the said Lord Treasurer to the Addition of his Charge received from the most honourable court of the higher House of Parliament, on Thursday the 29th of April, 1624.”

“To that part which concerns him, as he was master of the Great Wardrobe, the said treasurer saith, ‘That he held that office for the 3 years mentioned in the Charge, and that, within that time, he did receive the ordinary assignment of 20,000*l.* per ann. or thereabouts; wherein, he conceives, he did no ill service to the king when he did reduce the vast charge of that office to 20,000*l.* per ann. and, by 3 years experience, to shew his maj. the means how that 20,000*l.* might be again reduced to 12,000*l.* which, he conceives, is no argument that he hath brought that place to any disorder or confusion, as, in a generality, is objected.—It is true that he made no account, for his time, neither for the Wardrobe, nor for the queen's Funeral; neither was there any cause why he should so do, for that, by his maj.'s contract with him for the Wardrobe, he was to discharge the ordinary charges thereof for 20,000*l.* at his own hazard; and, for the said Funeral, having warrant, by privy seals, to receive 20,000*l.* he received but the sum of 13,500*l.* and yet saved some part thereof, besides what he yearly saved upon the ordinary allowance of the Wardrobe: with all which savings he, from time to time, truly and particularly acquainted his maj. not being willing to gain so much by the same as he found he did, without his maj.'s privy and gracious allowance; who, being rightly and truly informed of all the particulars, did, upon the said lord treasurer's voluntary surrendering of that beneficial Contract for the Wardrobe, for advancement of his maj.'s service, having therein an estate for his life, grant him a general release and pardon, by indenture under the great seal of England, for all matters concerning the said Office of the Wardrobe and Funeral aforesaid.”—He further saith, ‘That in the time of his being in that office, he paid divers extraordinary sums, which were not within his bargain, upon several warrants and privy seals; as, 3000*l.* to the earl of Carlisle, about 2000*l.* for new-furnishing Ely house for the Spanish Ambassador, above 1000*l.* for a new rich barge-cloth, and other extraordinary disbursements of about 1000*l.* more; for all which, amounting to 7000*l.* or thereabouts, he never yet received, or demanded, any allowance; and, if any man hath any thing owing to him, in the time that the said lord treasurer was officer, (as he is well assured there is none, except some small remains upon the foot of some private reckonings) the same are no way chargeable upon the king; the said lord treasurer being their proper debtor, and bound by that indenture, to discharge the same, which he hath been ever ready, upon their demand, to do accordingly; it being acknowledged by the creditors of the wardrobe, that they have been better paid and used in his time, than either before or since. And, concerning the Charge of his not duly serving the lord chamberlain's Warrants for Supplies, it may well be that some few parcels, in some warrants, which could not then be suddenly provided, were, upon that occasion, or by some fault or negligence of his servants trusted in that business, left unserved: but that neither hath been, is, or shall be, any loss to the king; for he acknowledgeth it to be just and fit, that he should provide and furnish the same at his own charges: tho' the neglect of that little is no great matter, considering he has disbursed so much for his maj. in extraordinaries, as aforesaid, for which he never yet had any allowance.—To that explanation of the former Charge, concerning his not repaying the merchants the Imposts due unto them, upon the exportation of Sugars formerly imported, according to his maj.'s letters patent, of the 5th Sept. 1610, the lord treasurer saith, That the usage in that particular is such now, as hath been ever since the Impost was first laid, without any alteration by him, or any for him, in his time: neither did any merchant bring his certificate, and make his demand for that allowance, according to the form prescribed by these letters patent, as the lord treasurer is informed by those that farm the impost of him; and therefore there could be no denial when there was no demand made. And, besides, this is so far from being a matter of benefit to the lord treasurer, that the farmers of the impost under him, (who should have that profit, if there be any) have been, and are willing to give the merchants content in their desire, if they will petition his maj. and sue out a privy seal to warrant it; without which, it hath ever been understood, it could not be done in respect to the king's interest therein, and in regard it never hath been allowed heretofore.—All which the said lord treasurer doth aver to be true in all points, and shall be ready to justify and maintain the same, in such manner as this hon. court shall award.—MIDDLESEX."

After these affairs were all read, the Lords received a Message from the Commons, importing, "That they desired a conference with their lordships, on the subject of two bills, then before them; and, at the same time, they presented a Petition to the house from divers Merchants, whole names are thereunto subscribed, containing a Complaint against the Lord Treasurer, for an Imposition on Hops; which complaint they humbly referred unto their lordships, and compared the same with the Imposition laid on French Wines, even when their merchandize was in the river of Thames: and affirmed that this had doubled the oppression on the merchants; for that the archduchess, out of whose country the Hops came, did thereupon lay new impositions upon the manufactures of this land. Lastly, The Commons conceive, that this new Imposition on Hops was laid, without any other warrant than the lord treasurer's letter."

This Petition from the Merchants was ordered to be read, and was as follows:

"The humble Petition of sundry Merchants whose Names are here under subscribed.

"Most humble shew, That whereas, in the reign of the late queen Eliz. continually, and until the 2nd year of the king's maj.'s reign that now is, Hops were rated for the Custom thereof at 12d per every cwt. Afterwards, in the time when the earl of Salisbury was lord treasurer, there was imposed on Hops 6d. upon every cwt. which was done by consent of the merchants; which said custom and impost hath continued so until Oct. 1622. At the time, when your petitioners, and others had brought into this kingdom, and into the river Thames, great quantities of Hops, the now lord treasurer wrote his Letter to the Custom House. That no Entries of any Hops should be taken till farther order from him; so that your Petitioners Hops, lay long in ships and lighters, to their great charges, and damage of the said hops; which was done without your petitioners knowledge, they nothing mistrusting any such composition; so that before your petitioners could be suffered to take up their goods, they were forced to pay 10s. for every cwt. of Hops, over and above the duty and impost aforesaid.—That divers strangers of Flanders, and others, have received up their goods upon bonds by reason of the archduchess's ambassadors; but divers of them have not yet paid their monies, nor entered to pay, as they themselves have given forth in speeches; notwithstanding the petitioners, most of them, were forced to pay in their monies, without any favour, to their great and intolerable loss and hindrance; and others have entered into bonds for the same, which are yet in force.—That, by reason of the said impost, so exacted from the petitioners, and others, as aforesaid, there was a great Impost laid on in Flanders, in the archduchess's country, from whence the said Hops came, upon Rustians and other of our native commodities; which have been to the great loss of the petitioners, and to the great hurt and prejudice of the commonwealth in general, and of no benefit to his maj. for the present; for that, since this great imposition, there hath not come hither the 20th part of those commodities as formerly.—The Petitioners humbly intreat the hon. assembly to take consideration of the premises, and to be a means unto his maj. that the said Petitioners may be repaid the said money so exacted; and that the imposts upon the Hops as aforesaid, which are still continued, may be reduced unto the former rate of 18d. upon every hundred weight of the said Hops; whereby your Petitioners may be the better enabled to continue their trade, which otherwise they must of necessity desert. And further, that their bonds, formerly entered into, may be re-delivered unto them to be cancelled."

May 5. The house waited upon his maj. at the Banqueting House at Whitehall, and on the 7th, the Lord Keeper made a report to the Lords of his maj.'s speech to them: but because the said speech, he said, was inimitable, his ldp. desired that he might read the same, which he did in these words:

"His Majesty's Speech at Whitehall, to the upper House of Parliament, May 5, 1624, concerning the Lord Treasurer.

"My Lords! Of mercy and of judgment both, my lords, my speech shall be unto you. There is a great officer of mine shortly to come before you, accused of divers misdemeanors. I am the judge in whose room you are to exercise judgment; for as I am under God in this throne, so you are under me: therefore I have been desirous that I might open myself unto you, anent this matter and occasion; and, as I have once said in a parl. before to you, so will I promise to shew you, as in a chrystal, my heart out of my mouth, in such sort as no false heart or tongue shall be able to blemish what I shall represent unto you.—It is my judgment, next under God, which you are to exercise at this time; and therefore, as a judge instructs the jury before the prisoner departs from the bar, so it becomes me to tell you how to carry yourselves in this great business; and the cause hereof is this, because I am bound in conscience to be careful of your carriage herein; for, if your judgments should fall contrary to my approbation, I protest to God it would be a great misery to me, and a greater grief unto your hearts.—Before the last parl. I never saw any precedent of this nature: in the last, against another great officer of mine (lord Bacon) there needed no admonition from me, because ye had ‘reum confitentem’; in this the party stands upon his justification; and therefore ye have more need to take and examine it well. There is no doubt at all of your doing justice; you are most of you nobly born, the rest are noble by their places; you are the most honourable jury of England; nor do I intend further to instruct you, than to give your eyes, many eyes see more than one, some light into this matter. No king is the worse for the advice of his council, nor shall you be for receiving my advice and instruction.—In all matters of trial where are denials, two things are specially to be considered, the verity of the fact and greatness of the guilt. For the 1st, you cannot be too diligent in the search of the verity of the fact; for ‘satiusest reum dimittere quam innocentum damnare.’ For the 2nd, You are to consider duly the quality of the offence; for, if your punishment be far inferior to the crime, it is an invitation to commit new offences. And, if it be over and above the offence, it is plain injustice and tyranny; therefore your punishment must be ever bounded in measure and moderation, according to the quality of the offence. You will do, I am sure, what a jury doth, for you have taken a greater oath than they; you have sworn, upon your honour, to me; by your conscience, towards God.—And here I shall give a touch of two things; 1st, I shall speak of the Person of the Man, and then of my Opinion of the Course which you are to hold in your judicature at this time.—For the Person of the Man; the first acquaintance that I had with him was by the lord of Northampton (who is with God) who often brought him unto me a private man, before he was so much as my servant. He then made so many projects for my profit, that Buckingham fell in liking with him, after the earl of Northampton’s death, and brought him into my service. For I profess it here openly, and I am glad he is not by to hear me, That, besides him, I never saw young courtier that was so careful for the king’s profit, without any respect, as Buckingham was. He found this man so studious for my profits, that he backed him against great personages and mean, without sparing any man. Buckingham laid the ground and bare the envy; he took the laborious and ministerial part upon him, and thus he came up to his preferment.—I was deceived if he was not a good officer; he was an instrument, under Buckingham, for reformation of the Household, the Navy, and the Exchequer; Buckingham setting him on, and taking upon himself the envy of all the officers. And he himself protested many a time to me, That he had not been able to do me any service, in the ministerial part, if Buckingham had not backed him in it. Hereupon I thought him the fittest man for this place; he had seen before the Abuses in the Exchequer, in the Navy, and in a thousand other particulars.—I must therefore put you in mind of one thing, and justice forceth me so to do: he cannot but have many enemies; all Treasurers, if they do good service to their masters, must be generally hated, as M. Rozeay was in France. And a Treasurer cannot oblige me more, than when I find suitors beg from me, and pray me not to send my reference to the Treasurer, because he gives them no good Answer. Two kinds of people are continually hated in court, Treasurers and Ushers; because this latter must of necessity put disgraces upon men, and the treasurers must keep the king from importunity of many suitors. I pray judge not by the affections of the people, nor by the hatred of the people; you must avoid both these; and therefore judges of old were painted blind.—The 2nd thing I recommend to your consideration is, That you look upon a sound trial, so that the Offence be clear; and, in the next place, when you find a cause of punishment, let it be within and not without the limits of his desert.—Now I shall recommend to you some Generals; not for his respect or particular, but my own, my son’s and posterity’s, and your own, my lords, whose part God knows when it may fall unto. Let no man’s particular ends bring forth a precedent, that may be prejudicial to you all and your heirs after you; precedents there are none of many years, before this and the last sessions. The informers are the Lower House, and the Upper House are the judges. If the accusation come in by the party wronged, then you have a fair entrance for justice; if by men that search and hunt after other men’s lives, beware of it, it is dangerous; it may be your own case another time. No man can stand upright before God and man, if every act of his should be enquired after and hunted out by every man, though it concerns him not.—The main ground in an information is this, The party complaining should say, This wrong he hath done me; if he hath corrupted judicature in judgment, or taken a Bribe to the hurt of the innocent; if, in Extortion, he hath wrested, by violence, from the party; here is a just ground for an accusation. But for every busy fellow to turn inquisitor is a thing insufferable; how far it falls thus, in this particular, I know not. Bribery, as I would define it, is where a judge receives a reward against the innocent; Extortion is done, when money is wrung from the subject by the greatness of a man's power, and by the denial of justice; Misdemeanor is, when a man abuseth his place, and oppresseth the poor subjects. I have discussed this point, and I do not doubt but, when he comes before you, you will hear him with temper and patience.—Now, my lords, I speak for justice; if this party have done so, after such an example shewed the last session, his fault is double; for he came in upon a reformation, and he discovered the corruptions of others. This I would say to you, if I was to die this hour: errors by mistaking, God forbid that you should be rigorous in censuring them; but errors that are wilful, spare them not.—Some curious men may say, peradventure, he might, in some points, have done better; but this is not criminal in him: but if, by deceit and cozenage, by helping himself, he hath hindered my estate, he is worse than a devil. Treasurers cannot be barred from suing, and the king's liberality no man can controul. If he hath helped himself, with the king's loss, I speak not for him.—Lastly, there are divers things laid to his charge, which were done with my knowledge and approbation; let him bear no charge for that, for that is mine, and I must bear it. For if you question him for any such thing, you punish me; if any thing touches upon him in that kind, either meddle not with it, or stay and know the verity from me. I love my servants, God is my witness, but it is only for virtue's sake; and he is an unhappy master that doth not love a faithful servant. But, if there appear in any of them falshood and treachery, and deceit under trust, my love is gone. If, of an angel, he become a devil, I will never excuse him: I will never maintain any man in a bad cause: 'Et sic finitur fabula.'

The Report of the King's Speech being made, the lord keeper observed further, "That his maj. said, he did not deliver this speech out of any suspicion of their lordships, but only in discharge of his duty and conscience." Which the house ordered to be entered.—The Lord Treasurer being to appear this day at the bar, it was first agreed, That when his ldp. came he should kneel. And being brought to the bar, by the gentleman usher, not having his staff in his hand as lord treasurer, he kneeled until the lord keeper willed him to stand up.

The Attorney General opens the Charge against the Lord Treasurer as Master of the Wardrobe.

Then mr. Serjeant Crewe came to the clerk's table, and opened the Charge against him to this effect:

"The Commons of England, being the general inquisitors of the sores and grievances of the kingdom, have presented their Complaint against this great lord and officer; whereof, and of other misdemeanors, their lordships have before taken cognizance. That he is to charge him, the Lord Treasurer, with Violation and Breach of Trust, in defrauding the king who trusted him; and with Bribery and Oppression.—That he would begin with his lordship's misdemeanors in the office of the Wardrobe; and shew, That, heretofore, that office being very expensive to his maj. by reason of the charge and provision of his maj. for the queen, for prince Henry, the queen of Bohemia, and the prince's highness that now is, he, the said lord treasurer, informed his maj. of the greatness of his charge, and that he would save his maj. a great part thereof; whereupon he procured the office to himself; but he stood charged with nothing, save the ordinary provision for his maj.—He is made Master of the Wardrobe, Sept. 14, 16 Jac. And, Dec. 26, 18 Jac. the king reciting, "Whereas we had certain notice that sir Lionel Cranfield, in the execution of the said office, hath so directly and carefully performed the said trust, in that behalf committed to him, as that, by the small time of his service there, great sums of money have been, and are likely, yearly, to be abated, in comparison of former expences therein for some years past: and also that, by the continuance of his care and good endeavours in the said service, our former great yearly expence of the Wardrobe hath been reduced within the sum of 20,000*l.* and yet with the maintenance of the former state thereof: and that of 20,000*l.* assigned for the queen's Funeral, he had received 15,500*l.* and no more; and that the said sir Lionel by his discreet and careful performance of that trust, hath, with the said 15,500*l.* discharged the said Funeral honourably, and in such sort as was requisite, and hath brought the said charge within the sum of 15,500*l.* and yet there were black cloths and stuffs to the value of 2000*l.* or thereabouts, and some part also of the said money saved:" the king, thereupon, grants him all that he had saved of 20,000*l.* for the year ended at Michaelmas, 1619, and for another year ended at Michaelmas, 1620, the ordinary charges deducted; for which sums he agrees to discharge the ordinary charge of the Wardrobe; and the king grants the black cloths, stuffs, and monies unto the said sir Lionel, remaining of the said 15,500*l.* for the Funeral, for his disbursements for the ordinary of the Wardrobe, for which he was to account; but not for the surplusage which he saved of the 20,000*l.*—Dec. 27, 18 Jac. the king makes the same Recital, 'ut supra,' and, having given the surplusage for 2 years before, doth now continue it for life, yearly at Michaelmas, upon his account, for the Wardrobe, the necessary disbursements deducted, and gives him the surplusage without further account.—Jan. 11, 19 Jac. the lord treasurer surrenders his Patent. Note, He got, in these last 3 years, 8000*l.* per ann. and had 6000*l.* given him at his farewell. In toto, 30,000*l.*—Jan. 18, 19 Jac. the king pardons him all sums of money received by him for the Funeral or Wardrobe; and he covenants to discharge the king of such debts as were due by him for the Wardrobe,

By this it appears how the king trusts the lord treasurer, being master of the Wardrobe, and what expectation the king had of his extraordinary service; that the expences should be much abated and diminished, and yet the state of the Wardrobe maintained by competent and sufficient supplies, and that what the supplies were, should appear upon account; and thereupon the account was directed by the patent.—And now see, my lords, how the Wardrobe is brought into confusion, and how far it is from the old state thereof; which, by the patent of my lord, should have been maintained. And, in this, will appear unto your lordships plainly, Breach of Trust and Fraud.—The warrants to be served for the Wardrobe, came from my lord chamberlain, from the master of the household, and from the groom of the stole. The warrants and emptions thereupon were usually, heretofore, entered in the clerk of the Wardrobe's books, that the provisions and particulars supplied might appear; but, in my lord treasurer's time, no warrants are brought in or entered; no emptions entered, nor book of expences kept by the clerk, as it ought to be.—The clerk should have surveyed the parcels; but could not, through my lord's default; neither is there any Account made as ought to have been: and all this is contrary to the patent, to the prejudice of the king, and of the officers and workmen in the Wardrobe. And, to the end his proceedings in that office might not be discovered, this ensued further upon it, that the warrants were served short, and many not served at all; those that were served, were base and ill, stuffed with great delay and long suit; and yet the suitors for the same were slighted by my lord and his officers.—And although my lord had his money impressed to him, yet he made slack and slow payments, with great abatements of the prices formerly allowed. And, at my lord's departing from the office, in Jan. 19 Jac. he gets a pardon for all he hath received, without any Account, and obtained a lease of the Sugars, for a recompence of his surrender of that office."

Mr. Serjeant Crew having thus far opened the Charge; the clerk by his direction, read the Depositions of Witnesses taken to prove the same: which depositions will be found at length in the Lords' Journals vol. 3, p. 345, after which the lord keeper moved, That the lord treasurer might answer his particular Charge touching the Wardrobe. His ldp. thereupon demanded Ink and Paper, and had it.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer as to the Wardrobe.

Then the lord treasurer answered, "That his maj. used his service in many particulars touching his estate; as, in the Navy, the Household, and Wardrobe. That he found the expences of the Wardrobe of a vast sum; every one made what bills they would, and did set what prices they would. When he was master of that office, he sent for the artificers, and, told them, That he would not look upon what was past; but that hereafter, the prices should be reasonable, and the king's money should be ready, and they duly paid. That there were many ices to be quarterly paid in the Wardrobe; all which were duly paid. As for Canning and Pulford, he gave them 2s. in the pound more than another would have sold for: he bought little of those of the Wardrobe, but chiefly much of the merchants; and had a good merchants shop in the Wardrobe, and bought of the best.—That Pulford complains not of a hard price, but that he had not the ancient price.—As touching the not serving of divers warrants, That his business being many, he referred those to his servant Colebeck: That not above the value of 7 or 800l. remained unserved; whereas he hath laid out 6 or 7000l. upon the Extraordinaries of that office; as, for furnishing Ely house for the Spanish ambassador, a rich barge cloth for the king, and many other things; and that he gave the earl of Carlisle, his predecessor in that office, 3000l.—As touching the baseness of the Stuff served in, he desired they might be compared with those formerly served in; and affirmed they were much better.—And whereas some complain they were slighted, when they were suitors for the warrants to be served, his ldp. desired they might be examined, whether they were slighted by him or no.—As touching the Account, his ldp. answered, That, by the patent, which was read, he was to account; but that he had another patent, if he be not deceived, without account; which his ldp. delivered: and the clerk read the same; and also his maj.'s explanation upon the lease of Sugars, granted to the lord treasurer, upon his surrender of the Wardrobe."

Then mr. Serjeant Crew observed to the Lords, out of both those, "That his ldp. was to account for the ordinary disbursements of the Wardrobe."—The Lord Treasurer answered, "That he conceived he was not to account: That he first reduced that office from the vast charge he told the king of; and whereas he was allowed 20,000l. per ann. for the same, he told the duke of Buckingham, 2 years since, that he got too much thereby; and that it might be defrayed for 12,000l. per ann.; and that he, having reduced that office from 30, nay 40,000l. per ann. unto 12,000l. is a good account.—Hereupon divers lords presently affirmed, That the duke of Buckingham had acknowledged, that the lord treasurer, when he was to surrender the wardrobe to the earl of Denbigh, did acquaint his grace with the greatness of gains in that office; but, to the end he might have a great recompence, first he named 4000l. per ann. and afterwards 8000l. and that this drew on the lease of Sugars to his lordship. Then mr. Serjeant Crew observed, That the Charge against the lord treasurer is upon proof; his lordship's Answer upon averment; which he humbly referred to their lordship's consideration. And thus ended the Charge touching the Wardrobe." And then the lord treasurer was withdrawn.

"The Lord Keeper removed to the earls bench, to satisfy the house touching the lord treasurer's speech," That the duke of Buckingham knew of his gains in the Wardrobe; and told their lordships, That he well remembers, that when the duke of Buckingham moved his maj. to place sir Lionel Cranfield treasurer, (which he desired, though afterwards he seemed unwilling) that then the king required the surrender of the Wardrobe to the earl of Denbigh. That when the lord treasurer heard of it, he magnified the profits of the place; first to the duke, that it was 4000l. per ann. 2ndly to the king, that it was worth 6 or 7000l. per ann.; whereby he got the Lease of Sugars at 4000l. per ann. less than they are worth; and his successor, the earl of Denbigh, had 4000l. per ann. less than his ldp. for disbursements of that office of the Wardrobe. That the duke being moved at this, the lord treasurer then told his grace, that his gains in that office had been 8000l. per annum; nay, more than he could well tell; and, till then, his grace knew not of the great gains of that office; and if his grace, who hath been ever careful for the king's profit, had known of it sooner, the lord treasurer had not held that place so long; for his grace is 'amicus usque ad aras.—Then it was ordered, That the lord treasurer be warned to be here again, at 2 in the afternoon at the bar."

May 7, p. m. The lord treasurer being brought to the bar, as before, kneeled not until he was remembered thereof by the lord keeper; then he kneeled, and the lord keeper willed him presently to stand up. The king's attorney being commanded to open the second Charge against the lord treasurer, his ldp. said, "He was unprovided in the morning for the Wardrobe; and besought their lordships to take into their consideration, that he is denied counsel to speak for him, being charged with great matters, for it may be their own case; and he hath precedents, as he is informed, that he might have counsel allowed him: that, however, he would speak out of his own strength; but desired their lordships, that, if he forget any thing, no advantage be taken against him," unto which their lordships agreed.—The lord treasurer made two other requests; the one "for that his witnesses have not fully answered touching the Wardrobe, that he might have a re-examination upon the same interrogatories." This the house denied, as not usual to be granted in other courts, after publication, for that it might produce perjury. His lordship's other request was, "That he might produce his proofs, or records, that the workmen of the Wardrobe were paid:" which was also denied; for that the non-payment of the workmen is but an accident to his Charge.

The Attorney General proceeds on the Charge of Bribery.

Then mr. Attorney was willed to proceed: and he proceeded in this manner, viz.—"The second Charge wherewith the Lord Treasurer is charged, is for 3 several Corruptions; two of them disguised under the shadow and pretext of a bargain; and the third of a new-year's gift. Concerning the two former: it cannot be denied, That, Feb. 6, 17 Jac. his maj. did lease unto sir Nich. Salter, and others, the customs and imposts of French and Rhenish Wines, from Michaelmas, 1622, for 9½ years; and did covenant with the lessees not to lett any new imposition upon the wines, during the continuance of that lease, without the assent of the lessees. And, Jan. 19 Jac. the king made a lease unto sir John Wolstenholme, and others, for divers years, of the great customs; in which lease there was a covenant, on the part of the farmers, that they should put in security for the payment of their rents; and, for performance of this covenant, they were to have the allowance and warrant of the lord treasurer, without which the king's remembrancer would not take their bonds. Jan. 14, 19 Jac. a new impost of 3l. per tun, was set upon the Wines; and the same being done without the consent of the farmers, and to their great damage, they were to expect recompence for the same upon their covenant. Upon these two occasions, the farmers of the several farms were necessarily occasioned to become suitors to the lord treasurer; the one for recompence and reparation of their loss, the other for allowance of their security, and his warrant to accept it.—The farmers of the Wines began their suit to the lord treasurer about Jan. or Feb. anno 19 Jac. and continued it with much instance until Dec. anno 20 Jac. 10 or 11 months together without success; whereupon they found means to have access to the king himself, and represented their grief by an humble Petition; which his maj. answered most graciously, and gave strait charge to the lord treasurer to give them a speedy dispatch, and conclude with them upon such a recompence, as in honour and justice was fit. And thereupon, Dec. 31, 1622, the lord treasurer did agree with them, that they should be allowed 9500l. to be defalked in 9½ years out of their rent, after the rate of 1000l. per ann. This being agreed on, they were to have his lordship's warrant to the king's attorney, for drawing a book according to the agreement; which warrant was speedily prepared and drawn by his lordship's secretary; but delayed from Dec. 31, an. 20 Jac. until June 24, an. 21 Jac. And the farmers of the Great Customs having divided the farms into 32 parts, every of which part was to give his maj. security of 1500l. for payment of their rent, they presented their security to the lord treasurer, who allowed and gave warrant to the king's remembrancer to receive it; but the parties unto whom five of these 32 parts were allotted, falling off and relinquishing their parts, the four patentees of the farm resolved to resume those parts to themselves; and thereupon tendered the lord treasurer their own security for those five parts; which he agreed to accept, yet protracted them till June, an. 21 Jac.—The business of both farms thus delayed, and it being conceived that money was expected, the farmers of the Wines resolved to present the lord treasurer with 500*l.* and they of the Great Farm resolved of the like sum; and mr. Abraham Jacob being a partner in either farm, was entrusted severally by the farmers of each farm, viz. 500*l.* a-piece, to be presented to the lord treasurer; which he paid in one entire sum of 1000*l.* to mr. Catchmay, the lord treasurer's steward, June 27, an. 21 Jac. by the lord treasurer's appointment; and thereupon the business of both farms had a dispatch by the lord treasurer's means.—But to palliate and disguise these two corrupt gifts, the lord treasurer then pretended to have 4 parts of the Great Farm divided into 32 parts; and, in his Answer touching these Corruptions, justifieth the taking of 1000*l.* by way of bargain for those 4 parts from the farmers of the Great Customs: this Answer being disproved, and it being made plain that he had no part in that farm, it must needs follow that the money was taken corruptly, for the dispatch of the farmers business and, for manifestation hereof, it stands proved.—That upon the treaty of the bargain for the Great Farm, the lord treasurer propounded to the farmers to have some parts in the farm, not for his own benefit, but to dispose of amongst his friends; but this was rather a proposition than any settled resolution or conclusion: for the farmers doubting, lest, by this pretence, some partners might be put on them with whom they were unwilling to join, desire the lord treasurer, that they might make choice of their own partners, and, if their farms prospered, they would be thankful unto his lordship.—This thankfulness was afterwards performed on their part, for they raised his usual new-year's gift from 1000 marks to 1000*l.* and, upon this request of the merchants, the lord treasurer waved his proposition of having the disposal of any parts in the farm; which appeareth not only by the plain and express testimony of many witnesses, but by these proofs following, viz. 1. The lease of the Great Farm bears date, Jan. 1, an. 19 Jac. between which time and April 29, an. 20 Jac. the farmers divided the whole farm into 32 parts, allowing to each man his part, and reduced the same into writing, expressing therein the sum of the security which every man was to give, without mentioning therein any parts reserved to the lord treasurer, or his friends; and this writing, being tendered to the lord treasurer, April 29, 1622, was by him allowed, and warrant signed by him to the king's remembrancer to take security accordingly. 2. When the partners, to whom 5 of these parts were allotted, fell off, and would not give security, the patentees resolving to take those parts to themselves, tendered their own security to the lord treasurer, and he agreed to accept it; and, though he protracted it long, yet he did not, in that long time of delay, challenge any parts until about June, 1623. 3. The farmers resting secure about that proposition, did, after the 29th of April, 1622, divide the whole farm by indentures, allotting to each man his due part, without reserving any for the lord treasurer. 4. At Christmas, 1622, the first year of the farm ended; and this year's profit was, by account, in April 1623, divided among the partners reserving no share to the lord treasurer. 5. But the truth is, That all this time the lord treasurer rested quiet, and neither did nor would challenge any parts; the farm being of that small expectation of benefit, as 5 partners gave over their parts, rather than they would give security; but, about June 1623, the farm being grown more hopeful by the return of some East India ships, the lord treasurer having in his hands the business of both farms, which he had so long delayed, meaning to make this a veil and cover for taking those corrupts gifts, then pretended to have four 32 parts, which he had waved so long before. 6. The lord treasurer appointing Catchmay, his servant, to receive the 1000*l.* of Jacob, which was received the 27th June, 1623, forbade him to give any acquittance for the money, but to leave that to himself and Jacob; which, had it been paid upon a plain bargain, he never would have done. 7. This money was entered into the Accounts and Books of the said Farms; for in the Journal books of the Petty Farms, July 31, 1623, there is 500*l.* entered to be paid and presented to the lord treasurer, by the hands of mr. Jacob, for a gratification of his favour in accommodating an allowance of 1000*l.* per ann. to be abated of their rent for the time to come; and the like entry was made in the ledger of the same farm. And, Dec. 20, 1623, upon the general Account of that Farm, this 500*l.* is put to account, as a gratuity given to the lord treasurer, and is borne rateably by all the partners of the farm, of which account many copies were given out to the partners; and, for the other 500*l.* there is extant a warrant, dated July 29, 1623, subscribed by sir John Wolstenholme and Henry Garraway, two of the farmers of the Great Farm, directed to Williams, the cashier of that farm, to pay to mr. Jacob 500*l.* given by him, by order of the farmers, to the lord treasurer, for a gratuity, and to put it to the account of the farm; which was done accordingly: and these Accounts stood in this manner till Feb. last, after the parliament was summoned; and then the lord treasurer caused Jacob to procure the 500*l.* that was set upon the Petty Farms, to be altered from thence, and to be charged upon the farmers of the Great Farm; and satisfaction to be given to the partners of the Petty Farms of their proportionable parts they were charged with for that 500*l.* upon the aforesaid Account of the 20th Dec.; and as many as could of the dispersed copies of that account to be gotten in. He also procures Jacob to write a letter to his ldp. and to antedate the same in June before; by which Jacob did intimate, that the 1000*l.* was given his ldp. for four 32 parts of the Great Farm; and himself made an acquittance to Jacob with the like antedate, acknowledging that 1000l. to be received for those four parts; which indirect courses of changing the accounts, and antedating the said acquittance and letter, manifesteth that the former proceedings were not sincere, but were to be converted and blanced with these devices. Touching the said Corruption, shadowed under pretext of a New-Year's-Gift, it stands proved, That, at Christmas last, 1623, the farmers of the Petty Customs presented the lord treasurer with a tun of wine, intending to have added to it a pipe of Canary wine, or the best sack; but the lord treasurer misliking the smallness of their present, urged them to a further gratuity in money, and thereby obtained from them, besides the wine, 100l. in money."—The Charge being thus opened by mr. Attorney, the clerk read the proofs, which will be found in vol. 3, p. 352, of the Lords' Journals.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer to the Charge of Corruption.

The Lord Treasurer answered, "That the greatest part of these proofs swear not that they of the Petty Farm gave him the 500l. That it is true the great farmers paid it to his ldp. and laid it on the Petty Farm, and deceived them and abused his ldp. thereby. He denied that the petty farmers were suitors to his maj. at such time as is affirmed; but they complained to his ldp. and he directed them to exhibit their bill into the exchequer chamber, and ordered mr. Attorney to answer it: That they liked it not; but, by some powerful means, delivered a Petition to the king (a very scandalous petition against his ldp.) which the king referred to the chancellor and himself: That they demanded an allowance of 10,000l. to be presently made, and he allowed them but 9500l. to be paid in 9½ years; for which he deserved no bribe: that his warrant to the attorney was delayed for these two causes: 1. For that his ldp. propounded to buy in their farm for the king. 2. For that their warrant was not drawn as it ought to be."—Touching the Great Farm, his ldp. said, "He would make it appear, that he had reserved four 32 parts therein for himself and his friends; and alleged, That those farmers have confessed that, their farms prospering, he thereupon did demand a recompence for his part." Here his ldp. read the Heads of his Proofs out of a paper, and then required that the examinations taken on his part might be read; which were read accordingly by the clerk.—See Lords' Journals, v. 3, p. 358.

Then the lord treasurer made a brief repetition of his proofs of his interest in some 32 parts of the Great Farm; and took exception against the testimony of Jacob, for it varied in time of payment of his 1000l. from the testimony of Hyde. And his ldp. affirmed, "That the 500l. was misplaced by him, the said Jacob and two more, on the farmers of the petty farms; whereas he received the same only for his interest in four 32 parts of the Great Farm." And as touching the antedated letter, and the antedated acquittance, his ldp. said, "That they were so done, lest Jacob should die, and so his testimony be lost." Unto which mr. Attorney replied, "That it is sufficiently proved, that the said lord treasurer, neither when he received the 1000l. nor long before, had any right to the said 32 parts: and thereupon he stated the case as before, and rehearsed the 7 reasons by him formerly alledged, to prove that the lord treasurer had waved his proposition of having the disposing of any part in the Great Farm. And, as touching the lord treasurer's exception to the testimonies of Jacob, for that it varied in time from Hyde, mr. Attorney shewed, that Jacob deposeth, That he paid the money to the lord-treasurer on the 27th of June, 1623, by direction from the farmers, and Hyde swears, That the money was delivered to Jacob the 31st July, 1623; which was by way of allowance back again, so no contradiction between them.

Then the lord treasurer protested, "That, as he shall answer it at the fearful day of Judgment, he received that 1000l. for no other consideration than for his share in the four 32 parts." And as touching the third Corruption, by way of a New-Year's-Gift, he said, "That nothing belongs to the lord treasurer's place but 20s. per diem, the sale of the places when they fall, and the new-year's-gifts; and denied, That he urged them to any certain sum." All which, he said, he would humbly leave to their lordships honourable consideration; and, withall, requested their lordships to forbear his further attendance here till Monday next, because he had spent his spirits so far, that his cause might otherwise suffer thro' his weakness." And so withdrew himself.—The Lords granted his request, and commanded the gentleman usher to signify so much to his lordship; and further ordered, that he should attend their lordships here again on Monday next, at eight in the morning, at the bar. An order was signed by the clerk accordingly, and sent to the lord treasurer.

May 8. The Lords received from the Commons this message 'That the Commons do humbly desire to know, what time their lordships will please to appoint for a conference touching the bill on Monopolies. They do also desire a conference touching some Accusation against the lord bishop of Norwich, unto which his ldp. has not yet been heard; humbly leaving the time and place to their appointment. And they do earnestly recommend to their lordships consideration, that general peace-maker of England, the bill of Concealments. Answ. The Lords have appointed a conference concerning Monopolies this afternoon, at 3 in the Painted Chamber. They have not yet resolved of a time for the conference touching Accusations against the lord bishop of Norwich; for that divers of the lords are now absent: but, as soon as they can conveniently appoint a time for the same, their lordships will send to them by messengers of their own. As touching the bill of Concealments, their lordships have taken the same into their serious consideration; and it is only deferred for that all the king's council, who are appointed to attend the same, are, at this time, otherwise employed: but their lordships do promise all possible expedition therein.

Proceedings against the Lord Treasurer on the Lease for Sugars.

May 10. The lord keeper put the house in mind of the Business concerning the Lord Treasurer, to be proceeded in this morning. And his lordship being brought to the bar, mr. Serjeant Crew opened the charge against him on the Lease of Sugars, in this manner:

"Quarto Decembris, 18 Jac. The king leaseth to George Herriot the impost on Sugars, to hold from Christmas following, for 3 years, at the rent of 5666l. 13s. 4d. per ann. payable at Midsummer and Christmas. Duodecimo Jan. ano 19 Jac. The lord treasurer procures Herriot to surrender that lease; and, the next day, takes a lease thereof from the king, unto Nicholas Harman and Tho. Catchmay (two of his servants) unto his own use, at 2000l. rent per ann. and lets the same unto the farmers at 6000l. per ann. and, to effect this surrender, gives order, in a time of scarcity of money, for the payment of 14,365l. due unto the said Herriot for jewels, which was paid, between the 15th of Dec. 1621, and the 10th Jan. following, in this manner, viz. 7000l. odd money, out of the arrears of the said Herriot's rents, and 7000l. odd money, out of the Tobacco Farm, by way of anticipation.—The crime objected against the lord treasurer herein is this: had Herriot's lease continued, Herriot's debt had been paid out of his rent; and the said treasurer has not only caused the said lease to be surrendered, and procured a new lease thereof unto his servants, to his own use, at a far less rent; but hath laid 7000l. of that debt upon the Farm of Tobacco: and this he hath done in a time of scarcity of money, even then when he caused the impositions to be laid on the wines for a supply for the Palatinate: and further, he hath paid the smaller rent of 2000l. per ann. very slowly unto the king; an arrear of 3000l. thereof being paid since the 31st of Dec. last, after the summons of this Parliament. And whereas, for the advancement of trade, the merchants, upon the exportation of their merchandizes, are repaid their custom, which they formerly paid upon the importation: this is denied upon the exportation of Sugars, to the damage of the merchants, and for the lord treasurer's private gain." Then the clerk read the proofs; see Lords Journals v. 3. p. 364.

The Lord Treasurer's Defence.

As to this part of the Charge, the lord treasurer confessed, "That the lease to Herriot was at the rent of 5666l. 13s. 4d. and the lease to his own use, (upon the surrender) at 2000l. rent, and that he hath let the same at 6000l. per ann. and affirmed, That his maj. was first acquainted with it, and well allowed thereof. Hereupon the lord keeper signified to the house, that the king had commanded him to tell their lordships, That his maj. understood that the lord treasurer should gain by his lease 4000l. per ann. So there was no further proceeding in that point of the charge.—The lord treasurer also confessed, "That he paid Herriot 14,000l. odd money; but affirmed, "That it was a just debt, and that Herriot had a power to pay himself, by a privy seal, out of his rent." His ldp. denied, "That he paid 7000l. of that debt out of the Tobacco Farm, by way of anticipation; and said he only transferred it from the Sugars to the Tobacco, and justified the same; for that the king's meaning was, That he should have 4000l. per ann. out of the impost for Sugars, presently upon his surrender of the Wardrobe: and the king lost not by it, for he, the lord treasurer, had, for the disbursements of the Wardrobe, 20,000l. per ann. which he hath now settled at 16,000l. per ann. and yet the king's state therein maintained and a noble gentleman rewarded."—Touching the slow payment of his rent, he denied it not; but said, "He had disbursed as much or more, before-hand for the king in other matters."—As touching the impost not returned upon the exportation of Sugars, his ldp. denied, That it was ever demanded of him; and affirmed, that if it be due, then the farmers are tied by his lease to them to repay it; but if they be not so tied, that then he will pay it all, both for the time past and to come." And thus ended the Charge for the Sugars.

The Charge as to Groceries.

Then mr. Serjeant Crew opened the Charge against the lord treasurer, touching his lordship's warrants to levy compositions for purveyance of Groceries in the out-ports, after this manner, viz. "That the city of London did compound with the king for Groceries: but the out-ports refused, especially Bristol, and yielded to purveyance in kind; and that Bristol had an order for this in the exchequer, in the time of Robert earl of Salisbury, late lord treasurer: yet, notwithstanding this, the lord treasurer directed his warrants to levy this composition; and, altho' it was not due to the king, nor any such composition entered into the compting-house, his ldp. commanded their goods, then in the ports, to be stayed, and not entered, till it was paid, or bonds given for it; and thereby constrained some ports to pay it, and the merchants of Bristol, who denied it, to attend his ldp. ten weeks together, to be discharged; and yet bonds were exacted from the merchants of Bristol for the payment thereof, after the lord treasurer was acquainted with the said order in the exchequer, even till the summons of parliament; for which mr. Serjeant Crew charged the lord treasurer with oppression and extortion, contrary to his lordship's oath, 'To do right to the poor and rich in such things as concern his office.'—Then the clerk read the proofs. See Lords Journals, vol. 3. p. 365.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer.

The lord treasurer answered, "That herein he did but his duty; and that if he had neglected it, he had not done his duty: that he required nothing to be done, by his Warrants, but what was accustomed in queen Elizabeth's time, and in all the king's time: that his Warrants were according to the usual form, and general to all the ports, not knowing that Bristol was exempted by the order in the lord treasurer Salisbury's time, until afterwards: that when knew of it, he yielded to their request, and Guy went away well satisfied with his Answer: and that none had benefit by the composition, but the king only."—The Clerk read the Examinations taken on his lordship's behalf, after which.

Mr. Serjeant Crew replied, "That there is no table in the Custom-House, to shew any composition for the out-ports; and caused the Clerk to read the Examination of John Guy, on the part of the lord treasurer, taken May 1st, 1624, which agrees, in effect, with his former Examination, taken for the king; and that after he, and others of Bristol, had long petitioned the lord treasurer to have their bond cancelled and delivered, which they had entered for the payment of the said composition, they could not obtain any thing, save some good hopes and fair words from sir Simon Harvey; and that their bonds are yet detained."

The Lord Treasurer affirmed to the Lords, "That himself knew this Composition to be paid by the out-ports, and that his warrant was only to levy the same, as formerly it had been paid; and promised to send Barret's books and some notes out of the compting-house, to prove the payments thereof heretofore by the out-ports."

The Charge as to unlawful bargaining for sir Roger Dallison's lands.

May, 10 p. m. Mr. Attorney General proceeded to the Charge concerning the Office of the Ordnance, and the unlawful Bargain for sir R. Dallison's Lands, in this manner, viz. "That another Charge whereof the lord treasurer is accused, is concerning the Office of Ordnance, and the unlawful Bargain for Dallison's Lands; in which will appear that the lord treasurer, for his own private benefit, contrived and prosecuted divers unlawful bargains; and in the mean time neglected wholly that which concerned the public, which was the furnishing the Office of Ordnance with emptions and stores, for the safety of the king and his kingdoms.—Concerning the Bargains, it stands proved, That sir Roger Dallison, being lieutenant of the Ordnance, became indebted to the king in 9962l. for monies impressed for that office, but not employed: and that sir Roger Dallison and sir Tho. Mounson were indebted to the king by bonds to the value of 3100l. which bonds were forfeited for not bringing certain stores to that office; both which debts amounted to 13,062l. and the Lands of Dallison were extended for 9962l. and the lands of Mounson for 3100l. And that July 20, 18 Jac. the king assigned these extents to Francis Morrice, clerk of the Ordnance, and others in trust for the officers and creditors of that office, towards satisfaction of so much of their debts.—The lord treasurer, being a commissioner for his maj.'s debts, July 28th, 1621, bargained for those extents; and by the articles under his hand agreed to give for them 1062l. in hand, and 12,000l. more, by 1000l. per ann. for 12 years, beginning at Lady-Day, 1623; and also to do his endeavour to procure payment of an arrear of 8000l. more, due to that office from his maj. but, before this bargain was performed, at Michaelmas following, he became lord treasurer; and when they expected payment of the 1062l. and security for the rest, he propounded that, in lieu of the 12,000l. to be secured, they should have his part in the Farms of the Petty Customs for 9 years, valued to be worth 1000l. per ann. for the two first years, and afterwards 1400l. per ann. which, according to that rate, would yield in 9 years 11,800l. but cost his ldp. only 3750l.—He being then lord treasurer, on whom they must depend both for the payment of the arrears, and for future favours, they accepted it; not meaning to lose their 1062l. payable in hand, but it was then again directly agreed they should be paid their 8000l. arrear out of his maj.'s coffers.—In 1621, Assurances were prepared, and the creditors required to seal, being promised to have at the sealing their 8000l. arrears, and expecting their 1062l. from the lord treasurer, whereof they never conceived a doubt; but so soon as they had sealed, they were sent away without any money, being promised to receive their 8000l. within 3 or 4 days after, which was not performed in so short a time; but was, after, paid in divers several payments out of his maj.'s money: but the 1062l. which was to have come from himself was absolutely denied, the lord treasurer affirming, that as well that 1062l. as the other 12,000l. was all concluded and recompensed by the interest in the Petty Farms; whereupon a new difference grew against them: but in the end they were enforced, in lieu of that 1062l. to accept of a further interest, which his ldp. had in the Petty Farms, for an half-year after the 9 years were expired, esteemed worth not above 400l. to be sold: and it was then further agreed that his ldp. should then pay them out of the king's money 4000l. due to the office over and besides the former 8000l. of which 4000l. his ldp. hath since caused to be paid 3303l. But whereas the Petty Customs were valued to them to be worth for the first 2 years 1000l. per ann. it appeareth that, in the two first years, it yielded them but 1419l. 7s. 7d. being all the money that grew due to them out of the profits of those farms at Michaelmas last; whereas if they had kept their extents of Dallison's and Mounson's lands, they should have received by Lady-day last almost 7000l. for part of their debt.—In which bargain, (besides the oppressions and extremities put on the poor creditors and officers of the Ordnance, that might ill undergo a bargain of so much disadvantage and loss) are observed two corruptions; the one, in bargaining to pay the 8000*l.* arrears, for though that was agreed before he was lord treasurer, yet he then was trusted as a commissioner for the king's debts; and, being after lord treasurer, performed that corrupt agreement made before.—The other Corruption was, in agreeing to pay the other 4000*l.* for as it is a corruption in a treasurer to pay the king's due debt for money given unto himself; so it is to pay the king's debt, for gaining to himself a bargain by which he either had or did expect advantage; and though the lord treasurer, in his Answer, doth pretend he is a loser by Dallison's lands, it is certain that whatsoever his gain or loss prove upon the other bargains for the inheritance of the lands, this bargain with the officers, taken by itself alone, was beneficial; and if it were not, it is all one: for if a judge, or treasurer, bargain for a Bribe, though he never receive it, he is corrupt; for it skills not what he had, but what he aimed at and expected.—About the same time that the lord treasurer bargained for the extent aforementioned, viz. 28 July, 19 Jac. he contracted with sir Tho. Mounson, for the inheritance of the same lands.—For sir Roger Dallison, after he became lieut. of the Ordnance, conveyed the inheritance of his lands to secure sir Tho. Mounson of divers great debts and engagements; so as the inheritance of those lands, after the king's extent, was in the dispose of sir Tho. Mounson, who bargained for it with the now lord treasurer; and upon that bargain, the lord treasurer agreed to free sir Tho. Mounson's own lands of the 3100*l.* debt, to pay in 3000*l.* in money, and to procure the making of him six baronets and some other fit suit from the king; and when the baronets could not be obtained, the number being full then, the lord treasurer procured him another suit of 2000*l.* value, as his ldp. esteemed it, viz. For compounding with the king's copyholders of Wakefield, to reduce their fines to certainty, for which suit the lord treasurer was a referee from the king; and, for accomplishment of this bargain made for his own private gain, he gave way to that suit, whereby so much was to be taken for his maj. yet there rested another bargain to be made, for sir Tho. Dallison, the son and heir of sir Roger Dallison, pretended title to those lands by an old entail; and the lady Dallison, widow of sir Roger Dallison, claimed to have the third as her dower; and the lord treasurer having entered into treaty with them, and finding their demand not suitable to his desires, he, to make them the more complaint, threatens them by his extent, to keep them without any thing for an 100 years; to lay upon sir Tho. Dallison certain forfeited bonds, which, upon the agreement with the officers of the Ordnance, were transferred to him; and he sends for sir J. Wolstenholme, whose son had married sir Tho. Dallison's sister, and rebukes him as an hinderer of his lordship's proceedings with Dallison:

and by these and other like means, for an annuity of 200*l.* per ann. procures a release of their title; and whereas sir Roger, being possessed of a lease of great value, had assigned the same to sir John Davis, for security of money owing to him and sir R. Smith, which lease, for non-payment, had been long forfeited, and the possession gotten by sir John Davis upon a trial and recovery at common law, which possession had continued divers years; the lord treasurer, by this agreement, with sir Tho. Dallison and his mother, by way of unlawful maintenance and champarty, bought their title to this lease; and having hedged in those lands and the title to this lease, exchanged the same with sir Arthur Ingram for other lands; and then to gain the possession of those lease-lands from sir J. Davis, and sir R. Smith, and to make good this exchange, an old outlawry against sir Roger Dallison, before the assignment made by him to sir John Davis, is sought out, the debt being many years past satisfied; by colour of which outlawry, and the power and countenance of the lord treasurer, this lease was seized into the king's hands, and sir R. Smith and sir John Davis thrust out of possession; whereupon they endeavoured to reverse the outlawry in the common pleas, and the better to effect it, they procured an administration of the goods of sir Roger Dallison to be taken by one Camben a creditor of sir Roger's, to the intent the said administrator might sue to reverse this outlawry; but the lord treasurer to prevent them therein, interposeth in the king's name, and in his maj.'s behalf, to revoke that administration; and the better to countenance the business, sends a case to the king's attorney grounded upon other matters without mentioning the outlawry, which was the chief thing in question; and having obtained his opinion in that case, sends a warrant to the king's advocate, to proceed in the ecclesiastical court as for the king; and in a matter much touching the king, to proceed for reversal of the administration; and in the end, by his means the administration was revoked; and afterwards, the matter coming in question in the Common Pleas, there also he interposed himself; and sent to the judges of that court, whereby sir R. Smith and sir John Davis were at last enforced to accept of a composition: now, in truth, this matter no ways concerned the king, for this lease was never extended for Dallison's debt; and before the lord treasurer interposed in the ecclesiastical court he had caused a petition to be made in the name of sir Tho. Dallison and his mother to the king; and a reference thereupon to himself for this lease, among other things; it being secretly agreed between him and Dallison, that the whole benefit of this lease, when his maj. should be pleased to pass it, should be at the dispose of the lord treasurer.—And whereas the lord treasurer would excuse those proceedings, as being after he had transferred all to sir Arthur Ingram: it is evident that the lord treasurer thus interposed; which must be either for his own benefit, to support his own bargain, or meerly by way of maintenance; and, either way, his doings are most unwarrantable, to use such rigour in the king's name, either for himself or sir Arthur Ingram."—Mr. Attorney having thus opened the former part of this Charge, the clerk, by his directions, read the Proofs.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer.

The Lord Treasurer said, "It is true that he, being a commissioner for the king's debts, did advise the said officers of the Ordnance to accept of a lease of the lands of sir Roger Dallison and sir Tho. Mounson, extended for the king for 13,062*l.* viz. Of sir Roger Dallison's lands, extended for 9962*l.* and of sir T. Mounson's lands for 3100*l.* and they did accept of them for payment of 13,062*l.* due to them by the king, with a covenant to resort to the king, if they were interrupted in the possession of those lands. And that he did then find, that there was due unto the said officers by the king, about 20,000*l.*—That the said lands of sir Tho. Mounson were worth 1600*l.* per ann. and were extended but at 200*l.* per ann. sir Tho. Mounson hoping to have had the benefit thereof for himself: but, by sir Edw. Coke's rule, it was passed over to the creditors. That sir Tho. Mounson often petitioned the king, and his maj. referred sir Thomas to the lord president and him: that they treated with the officers, who answered, That they relied on sir Tho. Mounson's lands, for that sir Roger Dallison's lands were so much incumbered, that they would yield little; yet the Exchequer Chamber would have relieved sir Tho. Mounson, if he had paid the debt for which the lands were extended; and then the officers must have resorted to the king for recompence: and that if his ldp. gained in that covenant, by his bargain with the said officers, so it was beneficial to his maj. And his promise to the officers to help them to their 8000*l.* arrear, being a just debt, was before he was treasurer; and that it is Heathen-Greek to him, how this should be prejudicial to the king."

To this mr. Attorney replied, and affirmed the bargains to be unlawful as before; and that there was not 8000*l.* arrear due by the king before his lordship was treasurer; and then proceeded to the reading of the other Proofs.—These being read, the lord treasurer again affirmed, "That his bargain with the officers of the Ordnance was beneficial for the king, for it gained in his maj.'s covenant of resort from the officers." And said further, "That it was not prejudicial to the officers; for if his second bargain be not as beneficial to them as the first should have been, he is to make it good. And that sir Tho. Dallison, and his lady mother have relief thereby, and himself a great loser, at least 4000*l.* having taken up 16,000*l.* for it, for which he pays interest at this day."—And his lordship denied, "That he drew the case, delivered to mr. Attorney, touching the Administration of Dallison's goods;" and said, "He deserved to be hanged that drew it."

And, having spoken as much as he could, the clerk read the Heads of the Examinations taken on his part; and mr. Attorney confessed them, and avoided them all; wherewith his lordship seemed to rest satisfied, for he did not require any thing else to be read: but said further, "That he had paid arrears to the officers of the Navy, as well as those of the Ordnance; which shews he did not pay them by way of a bargain only." And then saying, "He would add no more," he was withdrawn.

The Lord Treasurer's Petition for further Time, on account of Sickness.

May 11. A Petition of the Lord Treasurer to the Lords was read, in hæc verba:—

"With most humble and thankful acknowledgement of your lordships honourable patience, in hearing those parts of my Cause which are already opened, I am now most humbly to beseech your pardon of mine appearance before your lordships this day; finding myself so distempered in my body, and my spirits so weakened and spent, as, out of necessity, enforceth me to be an humble petitioner unto your lordships for this little respite of time; my end and desire herein being to enable myself to obey all your commands, and to hasten the end of this Cause of mine; whereof I doubt not but your lordships, in a true and noble sense of my Cause, will honourably consider accordingly.—Middlesex."

The house having considered of this Petition, appointed the earls of Southampton and Essex, the bp. of Coventry and Litchfield, the bp. of Bangor, lord Cromwell, lord Say and Seale, to go presently to the lord treasurer's house, and to take a physician with them; and to signify to his ldp. the displeasure of the house, for that he hath first taken leave of himself to be absent, and now craves pardon for it; whereas his ldp. ought first to have craved leave to be absent. And also to signify unto his ldp. (unless they shall see cause to the contrary by reason of his sickness) that the pleasure of the house is, That his ldp. appear here this afternoon, at 2 of the clock; and that if his ldp. shall fail to come accordingly, that the house will proceed, as well touching such parts of his Charge as are already opened, as for the rest of his Charge also.—These lords being returned from Chelsea, where the lord treasurer then lay, the earl of Southampton reported, That they delivered the said Message unto his ldp. whom they found in his bed, but not sick, for ought their lordships or the physician could perceive; neither did his ldp. pretend any sickness. And their lordships having delivered their message unto him, he excused his not asking of leave first to be absent; "for that he had not warning to be here this morning until after the house was risen the last night; and since the pleasure of the house is such, he will attend this afternoon, if he hears not, by some Message from their lordships, that they will be pleased to respite him till tomorrow morning."—And the earl of Essex made this further Report, viz. "Having this day delivered to the lord treasurer the Message we were commanded by the house, his ldp. (besides the Answer that hath been returned to the house) did let fall these speeches in substance; "for a man to be thus followed, morning and afternoon, standing 8 hours at the bar, till some of the lords might see him ready to fall down; two lawyers against him, and no man of his part, was such proceedings as never were heard of; and he knew not what it meant, for it was unchristian-like and without example; and desired they would deal with him as he would deal with one of them; for it was his case to-day, and might be their's to-morrow." This Answer was signed by these lords, viz. H. Southampton, Ro. Essex, Tho. Cov. and Litch. Lewis Bangor, Tho. Cromwell, W. Say and Seale,

The Charge as to Munitions.

May 11, p. m. The lord treasurer being brought to the bar, as before, the clerk read that part of the charge against his lordship that concerned the Munitions. The lord keeper moved that mr. Attorney do keep himself to that Charge. Mr. Attorney then proceeded in this manner, viz.

"As in the bargains and proceedings (which were opened yesterday) the lord treasurer was over much attentive to his own private profit, so in the Supply of the Office of Ordnance (a matter of high importance for the safety of the king and his kingdoms, and in a time when all Christendom besides ourselves was in a combustion) he was wholly remiss: For whereas, by a privy seal in 6 Jac. there was a private establishment of 6000l. per ann. for the Office of Ordnance, which being put out of order in the time of sir Roger Dallison, about 12 Jac. the lords of the council, in Nov. 1617, upon reference from the king, set down a proportion of Supply, amounting to 54,078l. 2s. 8d. and the standing allowance of 6000l. per ann. to continue. And after in Feb. 1619 there being a commission awarded to the commissioners of the navy to survey the Office of Ordnance, the said commissioners (the lord treasurer himself being a chief man among them) set down a proportion of supply amounting to but 13,640l. 14s. 2d. and a yearly allowance of 3000l. retrenching it to that rate from 6000l. and did set down a course that this being observed a needless charge of about 10,000l. per ann. should be cut off, and this was allowed both by the lords and by the king himself.—The earl of Middlesex becoming treasurer about Michaelmas 1621, and having continued in that office about two years and a half, did observe none of these establishments; whereby the office is at this present both unrepaired and unsupplied, and the kingdom of Ireland destitute of any considerable quantity of arms and munition: for it appears by the records of the king's receipt, That all the monies which the lord treasurer in his time issued for a supply of the ordinary of the office of Ordnance, was but

13,034l. 3s. 11d. of which 8000l. and odd pounds was for old arrears, 3300l. more grew due of latter time, but were paid, not out of duty, or care of the public, but by bargain and contract: and most of these monies issued (besides old arrears) were for wages and allowances of officers, and little or nothing for stores and provisions. For upon the quarter-books paid by his ldp. beginning at the quarter-book ended ultimo Junii 1620, unto the quarter-book ended ultimo Decembris 1622, there being about 5500l. paid, 4600l. and odd thereof went to the officers, but the stores and provisions amounted to but 900l. and odd pounds: a weak supply in so long time.—And whereas in April 1621, a contract was made with mr. Evelyn, for serving his maj. with 80 lasts of Powder yearly, by monthly proportion, at 7d. the lb. which proportion being kept would have yielded a plentiful supply into the office of Ordnance, and the overplus might have been sold at 3d. the lb. profit to his maj. The lord treasurer (though he was continually solicited by Evelyn) did not make the payment, which should have been made upon that contract; whereby Evelyn, according to the liberty that was allowed by his contract, sold his powder to others; and, in 35 months after that contract, served into the stores but 15 months proportion; and upon breach of this contract did ensue these inconveniencies, viz. That the stores which, for the service of all his maj.'s kingdoms, might have had in readiness 266 lasts of powder, and 60 lasts of salt-petre, which would have really made 80 lasts of powder more, (in all 346 lasts) are greatly injured by this neglect: for upon a late survey, there were in all but 130 lasts in the stores, and yet Ireland wholly disfurnished: and besides, his maj. by sale of the overplus of the powder alone (above the proportion thought fit to be kept by the commissioners of the navy) might have gained 3d. in every lb. which would have amounted to 4050l. and above, all which his maj. lost by this default of the lord treasurer. And whereas his ldp. excuseth these things by pretence of Sadler's complaints, it appeareth that those complaints grew by occasion of Evelyn's selling of powder to others, not to the king; which had never been if he had had due payment: and the lord treasurer was warned, both by the lord Crew and by the commissioners of the navy, to have special care of these points, to save the contract, it being of high consequence."

The Proofs being read, the lord treasurer answered, "I had need, in the first place, to pray for patience, so much pains being taken by mr. Attorney to make me appear a faulty man." Unto which the lord keeper replied, "That the lords conceive that these words are a wrong done unto them; and he conceived, that they are a greater unto his ldp. the lord treasurer who being a judge, makes no difference of a charge. The lord treasurer answered, 'That he is injuriously dealt withall, and that no peer hath been charged in this place before by the king's counsel.'—And being demand by the lord keeper, wherein he is injuriously dealt withall, he answered 'by mr. Attorney's opening the proofs by parcels, and by directing parts of the depositions to be read, which should have been done wholly and together.'—The Lords conceived themselves to be wronged by these words, for that mr. Attorney had done nothing but as attendant to the house, and by their direction; and therefore the Prince his highness willed him (the lord treasurer) to clear mr. Attorney, or else this aspersion will light very heavy upon him. And the house did acquit mr. Attorney for any thing he had said or done herein.

Then mr. Attorney opened the heads of the Charge again, viz. The 1st Settlement of the Office of the Ordnance, anno 6 Jac. The 2nd Settlement by the lord treasurer Salisbury, an. 1617. And the 3rd Settlement by the commissioners of the Navy, 1620. And that the lord treasurer had observed none of them.

The Lord Treasurer answered, as touching the second settlement, 'Nothing hath been done upon it to this day; and yet it was made 4 years before he was treasurer.'—As touching the 3rd Settlement, 'It was propounded only, and opposed, but never allowed; if allowed, it was 13 months before he was treasurer, and yet nothing done in it, as by Cook's own oath: That he had no privy seal for it. And how then can he be charged for the breach of that settlement which was never settled? but he will not give that for Answer.' And then his ldp. affirmed, 'That the Stores are furnished, and that he had paid all the said ordinary of 3000l. per ann. save 300l. though no privy-seal was issued out upon that book presented by the commissioners of the Navy; and paid divers other sums of money for Provisions of the Stores; whereof his ldp. recited the particular sums: and whereas that office was unsettled by sir Roger Dallison, he, being a commissioner for the king's debts, found due to the officers 18,000l. and caused 13,000l. of it to be paid by Dallison's lands, and the rest to be paid also afterwards; so that a small sum will now settle that office, which was then so unsettled.'—As touching the Powder, 'That when he came to be treasurer, he found but 116 lasts of powder, whereof 21 lasts, delivered by Evelyn, were left unpaid for; and that he paid him 2000l. arrears: though 60 lasts of Salt Petre be not in the king's stores, yet there is so much in Evelyn's warehouse; and then it is the king's. Neither can the king receive such detriment or loss; for when Evelyn is paid, he is to make allowance of the Powder by him sold.' And affirmed, 'That he had paid more for powder than was paid for 7 years before.'

The Charge as to the Court of Wards.

Mr. Serjeant Crew next opened the Charge of the Court of Wards. viz. "That whereas, in Dec. 1618, Instructions for the Court of Wards were set out, (upon great advisement with the lord chancellor of England, the two lord chief justices, and the officers of that court) the lord treasurer, by his importunity and power with the officers, and by his misinformation to the king, (waving a reference to divers lords of the council) procured those instructions to be altered, to the prejudice of the king, and oppression of the subject.—For, by the former Instructions, anno 1618, petitions for Wardships were to be delivered to the clerk of the court, who was to enter them without fee: but, by these instructions, anno 1622, the petitions are first to be delivered to the master, to the end he may subscribe his directions, and then the master's secretary to make entry thereof the same day it is delivered, and return it to the suitor, who is to present it to the clerk, and the clerk to enter it without fee.—So the clerk of the court stands still restrained by these latter Instructions to take any fees for entering of petitions, but the master's secretary is not restrained; and, being unlimited, he hath taken great fees for entering of these petitions.—And whereas, by the former Instructions, anno 1618, all Tenders and Continuances of liveries were to be made unto the surveyor of that court: now, by these latter Instructions, they are to be made to the master first, and afterwards to the surveyor; whereby the fees for Continuance of Liveries are raised from 10s. the term, to 20s. the term.—And whereas, before, no ward was esteemed a concealed ward, unless no suit had been made within 3 years after the death of the tenant: now, by these latter Instructions, the master hath power, alone, to dispose of Wardships concealed but one year; so that the master may make any a concealed ward, by concealing the petition, and not entering it with the clerk; the petition being hereby appointed to be delivered to the master first.—And that the master of this Court of Wards, the lord treasurer, hath committed unto his secretary a Stamp of his name, and hath hereby put his own power into the hands of his secretary: for his secretary hath used his Stamp, in the absence of the master, for signing of tenders and continuances for warrants to the great seal for liveries; and warrants to find offices for grants of wardships, leases, indentures, and the like; and for expediting of judicial acts in the court: and that this Stamp may be a ready way to make concealed Wardships, and may take away mean processes due to the king for want of livery; and may antedate tenders, continuances, and petitions; by reason whereof the king may be prejudiced great sums, by preferring one before another by wardships."

This being said, the clerk was directed to read the Proofs. And for that, in opening of this Charge, the lord keeper delivered to the lords a message from the king, viz, "That the alteration of these Instructions was debated before his maj. at Wansted, by the master and officers of that court; and that his majesty understood that the alteration was for the honour and profit of the master, and intended that the master should enjoy that office as amply as the earl of Salisbury, or the lord Wallingford: but if any new fees are exacted since, his maj. disavows that; and if the master hath used the new Instructions to the prejudice of the king or subject, he disavows that also; but allows his precise knowledge of the alteration of the said Instructions."—Therefore no Examinations were read to prove the lord treasurer's importunity and pressure to have those Instructions altered.

The Lord Treasurer's Answer.

After the other Examinations were read, the Lord Treasurer answered unto this Charge, "That he is not to be blamed for putting his office into such plight as it was before an encroachment. As touching his secretary's fees, as he is not restrained, so nothing is allowed; and if he hath exacted any thing, his ldp. will be the severest censurer of him. He never heard of any till now. That the secretary to former masters received whatsoever any man gave voluntarily, so it was lawful for him.—As touching the Fee for Continuances, Why should he lose any thing due for a favour to the subject? by this means there be fewer Continuances; and so the king has his money the sooner, and the party is free for the subjects suit the sooner.—As for concealed Wardships within a year, It is beneficial to the king; otherwise, within 3 years, the ward might die, and the king lose the wardship. Neither hath the master such power, alone, therein by these new Instructions: he is only trusted with the direction unto whom the concealed wardship shall be granted; the composition is left to the council-board: but it is not shewed that he ever made one concealed wardship. They say this may be done, but do not shew what was done amiss."—And his ldp. justified, "That these new Instructions were more beneficial to the king and subject than the former, and not prejudicial; for as touching the petitions, if the ward happen in a vacation, the petition must be delivered within a month; if to the clerk, perhaps he is out of town: now they are to be delivered to the master first, and he may direct the finding of the office in the interim; but it is of no force till the petition be afterwards entered by the clerk, and composition is made by all the officers. Indeed the officers yielded, hardly, to the new Instructions; because they had, by the former, shared the master's power and authority among themselves." His ldp. confessed, "That he yielded to have a Stamp made by the precedent of the lord Burleigh's Stamp: which, he said, he could not prove but by hear-say: and Stamps are used in the Subpoena Office and the Outlawries. And that it is no more prejudicial to commit a Stamp to his secretary, than it hath been heretofore to leave the seal with the clerk. Neither is it shown that this Stamp hath been to the prejudice of any man, the same things that were stamped, being to pass other officers either first or last."

Before the lord treasurer was withdrawn, the earl of Carlisle remembered their lordships, That the lord treasurer, the other day, had charged him with 3000l. given him; whereas, about 12 months after the lord treasurer was made master of the wards, his ldp. paid the earl of Carlisle 3000l. in part of 20,000l. given him by the king. And whereas the lord treasurer spoke of the vast expences of the wardrobe in former times, the earl of Carlisle said, That the expences grew so great by reason of the extraordinary charges then happening; as, by the queen of Bohemia's Marriage, which came to 60,000l. alone; for furnishing divers of the king's houses: for many rich presents sent to foreign states; for the king's voyage to Scotland; and the like.

And the earl of Denbigh, now master of the wardrobe, shewed, That he cannot get any allowance for the extraordinaries of that office from the lord treasurer.—Whereunto his ldp. answered, "That the king referred unto him the earl of Denbigh's demands of the extraordinaries, wherein his ldp. was unwilling to meddle, for he could not conceive how they could amount to the sum demanded." And as touching the earl of Carlisle, "If he had said that he had given him that 3000l. he did his ldp. wrong, for he had warrant from his majesty to pay it."

And then the lord treasurer desired he might be heard to clear some words that might pass from him this day, where it is reported that his ldp. should say That he had unchristian dealing: "He meant it not by their lordships, whose dealings he acknowledged to be to him both just and honourable; but he meant it by the king's counsel, who have dealt so unchristianly with him, as to make white black, and black white:" and humbly desired, "That this his acknowledgment of the justice of the house might be accepted of him, and to be understood only of the king's counsel." And said further, "That he had precedents, that he ought not to answer in this place, (at the bar) and that he ought to have counsel; and prayed that the next might not suffer by his example."

The Lord Treasurer being withdrawn, the house agreed, That he should appear here again to-morrow at 9 of the clock; and Mr. Maxwell, the gentleman usher, warned him to appear accordingly.—The lord keeper cleared the proceedings of the king's counsel in their several Charges against the Lord Treasurer; and the house gave them thanks for their fair carriage therein.

The Lord Treasurer's general Defence against the whole Charge.

May 12. The Lord Treasurer being at the bar, and being admitted to speak in his own Defence, his ldp. first repeated the several heads of the matters wherewith he is charged, viz. 1. Touching the Wardrobe. 2. Touching two Bribes received of the Farmers of the Customs. 3. Compositions of the Out-Ports for Grocery. 4. The Officers of the Ordnance.

And, 5. The Court of Wards.—As for the first, “That his omission of an account in the Wardrobe did neither add to nor diminish the charge the king was at; and that, altho’ his ldp. omitted to serve some of the lord chamberlain’s warrants, amounting to a matter of 700l. yet he had laid out, in the Extraordinaries of that office, (which he was not bound to do) about 6000l. and that the good service which he had done his maj. in that office is well known. Touching the two Bribes, termed ‘disguised Corruptions,’ howsoever the farmers of the customs presented the same, he could not know their thoughts but by their words and deeds. And his ldp. protested, That he received the same no otherwise than for his interest in four 32 parts of the Great Farm of the said Customs.—As touching the Lease for Sugars, he will say no more than formerly he had spoken. Nor, for the Compositions for Grocery, save only, That his ldp. had sent Barret’s son unto mr. Serjeant Crew, to satisfy him that Barret had formerly collected the said compositions, by virtue of the warrant of former treasurers.—As touching the Office of the Ordnance, His ldp. would speak no more touching the provision for arms and gun-powder, than he had done.—But, as touching Dallison’s business, his ldp. said, It began originally before he was treasurer; he therein settled the king’s debt unto the officers, and hath parted with that estate, which he had from them in Dallison’s lands, within a month after he was treasurer; yet, if the second bargain made with these officers prove not as beneficial to them as the first should have been, they have his word to make it as good; which he would perform. And his ldp. further profered, That any one should have Dallison’s lands again at a far less sum than they cost him.—Then he desired their lordships to take into consideration his disability to answer, and the ability of those that did oppose him; and, if he had been as well able to speak for himself, as they that spoke against him, he doubted not but that he should have given their lordships very good satisfaction.—His ldp. spake much in excuse for those matters complained of against him as lord treasurer, saying, That the king’s necessity and want of money was the cause of much thereof.—He acknowledged, That the king had been a good and bountiful master unto him; and avowed, That he had been a good and faithful servant unto his maj. not for impositions, for (those two only excepted, which are presented by the commons) he ever stood against them, deeming them a partition-wall between the king and the subject. That his service has been in reformations, viz. Of the household; of the navy; of the wardrobe; and of the kingdom of Ireland: which are things of that nature that they beget enemies: and if, in doing service to his maj. he hath procured to himself many enemies, their lordships will not impute that to him for a fault.—His ldp. also affirmed, That he had done his maj. good service in the Palatinate, by advancing the exchange of the king’s money thither, wherein he saved the king 60,000l. And affirmed, That he had advanced the profits of the crown at least 80,000l. tho’ not by Impositions; these he meddled not with, the other two excepted, and they were agreed unto by the council-board. The ships indeed were in the river, but the vintners were sent for, and made to pay what was imposed on the merchants. That he offered to pay the arrear due for Ireland, a third part from the one deputy, and the one half from the other; wherewith he acquainted his maj. and turned it all to his maj.’s profit.—That he hath been a judge these 8 years, and no complaint brought against him for Corruption or Bribery; which he hoped would weigh much with their lordships.”—And as for the offence taken yesterday against him, touching the king’s counsel, (whom he ever loved well) “He knew them to be of that loving nature, that he doubted not but that they would impute it to his rashness, and forgive him. Then he craved pardon of their lordships, if he had omitted any thing, or spoken ought that might discontent them; and so, with humble thanks for their favour to him, he concluded his speech.”

The lord treasurer having ended his speech, he was answered by the lord keeper, “That the council-table disavowed the Imposition on Wines to begin from them: it came from his ldp. as belonging to his place of lord treasurer; the matter was his alone; the manner also was contradicted by the rest of the council, for that the merchant ships were then in the river; only they gave way to it, upon his lordship’s undertaking that the merchants would yield thereunto, and that they should be no way prejudiced thereby.” Whereunto the lord treasurer replied, “That this was no part of his Charge.”

The Lords take into Consideration the several Articles of the Charge, and the Lord Treasurer’s Answers.

The lord treasurer being withdrawn, and the house adjourned, ad libitum, mr. Attorney general read that part of the Charge against the lord treasurer which concerned the Wardrobe. And the Lords having duly considered of the crimes objected against the lord treasurer, for not entering into a book of Accounts the warrants and emptions, as he ought to have done, whereby the settlement and antient institution of that office is altogether broken; and for not serving the warrants directed unto him for the king’s own person, though he was often urged thereunto; nor paying divers of the creditors for such stuff as they served in, altho’ he received 20,000l. per ann. by way of imprest, for the ordinary charge only of that office; which a far less sum would have fully defrayed; And for that he had not performed that good service, which he pretended unto his maj. but, under pretence thereof, had procured to himself great and large gifts from his maj. and pardon of divers great sums of money. And the king’s counsel having satisfied their lordships, That the said pardon to the lord treasurer did not pardon his lordship's not accounting; the house was resumed, and the question put, "Whether the lord treasurer, for his carriage in the office of the Wardrobe, be censurable, or no?" and it was agreed, nem. diss. "To be censured."

May 12. p. m. Mr. Attorney read that part of the Charge against the lord treasurer which concerned his taking of 500l. of the farmers of Wines and Currants for a Bribe, and 500l. of the farmers of the Great Customs, for a Bribe; and for exacting 100l. of the said farmers of Wines and Currants. And their lordships took into their consideration the lord treasurer's Answer unto the said two Bribes, viz. "That he accepted of 1000l. paid him, at one entire payment, by the farmers of the Great Customs, upon a bargain of his four 32 parts of the Great Farm." And it appeared plainly unto them, by the examination of divers witnesses, as well of those taken 'ex parte domini regis,' as of those taken 'ex parte domini thesaurarii,' that 500l. of the said sum was given to the farmers of the wines and currants, called the Petty Customs, to procure his lordship's warrant for defalcation of 1000l. per ann. of their rents, for 9½ years, in recompence of their loss, according to his lordship's farther agreement with them on the king's behalf, upon his maj.'s reference unto his ldp. and that the other 500l. was given, by the farmers of the Great Customs, to procure his lordship's warrant unto the king's remembrancer, to take security for payment of the rent to his maj. of the 4 patentees of that farm, in lieu of 5 partners who had relinquished their parts therein: and that his ldp. had not reserved to himself any parts of the said Great Farm, as his ldp. pretends: and if he had, it had been a great deceit unto his maj. for the lord treasurer of England to contract with others for his maj.'s customs, and secretly to reserve parts therein unto his own benefit: and when, as his ldp. affirms, that he received the 100l. of the Farmers of the Wines and Currants, for a new-year's gift, it appeared also by the examinations, That the said farmers did present his ldp. with a tun of wine for his new-year's gift, and his ldp. exacted the 100l. of them afterwards; which divers of their lordships conceive to be extortion.—All which being fully discussed, the house was resumed, and the question was put, "Whether, upon this whole Charge, the lord treasurer be censurable, or no?" and agreed generally, "To be censured."

The house being again adjourned ad libitum, mr. Attorney General read that part of the Charge against the lord treasurer, which concerned his procuring of Herriot to surrender his lease of the farm of Sugars, which he held at the rent of 10,000 marks per ann. to the king, and for procuring a new lease thereof immediately to two of his lordship's servants, to his own use, at 2000l. per ann. and for denying the merchants, upon their exportation of sugars, the imposts paid therefore upon the importation, as his ldp. ought to have done by the directions of his maj.'s letters patent of the 5th of Dec. ann 8, Jac.—Upon reading whereof the lord keeper signified to their lordships, That he had received a message from the king touching this Charge, viz. "That his maj. did freely give unto the lord treasurer 4000l. per ann. out of the said lease of Sugars, the same to begin presently after the date thereof."—Their lordships taking into consideration, that this was the king's free gift, they did not think it fit to censure the lord treasurer for the same; although his ldp. had unduly informed his maj. of good services done in the office of the Wardrobe, which his ldp. performed not, for which this lease of Sugars was given him. Neither did his ldp. inform his maj. (for ought appears) that a debt of 7000l. was installed upon that lease; the which his ldp. transferred to the Farm of Tobacco.—And as touching the denial of the impost unto the merchants, upon the exportation of Sugars, for that his ldp. affirms, That the under-farmers of the said sugars from him are liable to the re-payment of the said imposts, if any be due, their lordships did not think it fit to censure the lord treasurer for the same.—And the house being resumed, the question was put, "Whether the lord treasurer shall be freed from any censure in this particular Charge, or no?" And generally agreed, "To be freed."

The house was again adjourned ad libitum, and mr. Attorney General read that part of the Charge against the lord treasurer, which concerns the Composition for Grocery Wares in the city of Bristol, which city had refused to yield unto any composition for the same; and yet the lord treasurer had given warrant to levy the same against their wills, and to stay the entering of their goods until the same was paid accordingly.—But for that it appeared, that the lord treasurer Dorset's letter, dated 1610, for levying the same composition, agreeth with the letter written by this lord treasurer; and for that divers of Bristol had paid the like composition; and for that it did not appear that the lord treasurer did thereby seek any benefit to himself, the lords did not think him fit to be censured for the same. Wherefore the house being resumed, it was put to the question, "Whether the lord treasurer shall be free of censure, in this Charge of Grocery, or no?" And agreed, "To be freed."

The house being again adjourned ad libitum, mr. Attorney General read another part of the lord treasurer's Charge, viz. the Charge against him by the Officers of the Ordnance. And their lordships having fully discussed the great neglect of the lord treasurer to issue the king's money for the furnishing of the king's stores of Munitions, with armour and powder; and that yet he paid the arrear of debts to that office for his own particular profit upon a contract with the said officers: and having considered his lordship's great misdemeanors in the bargains for the said lands of sir Roger Dallison extended for that debt; and his lordship's pro-pounding, for part of payment thereof, the making of baronets and a suit for compounding with his maj.'s copyholders of Wakefield. And his lordship's Answer, "That he preferred this suit unto the king, in pity of sir Tho. Mounson's estate, a man heretofore of good account in his country, and now decayed;" which their lordships thought most sordid, for a lord treasurer to make use of to his own benefit: And it appearing unto their lordships, That the said lord treasurer had set on foot an old outlawry, upon a debt long time since paid by the said sir Roger Dallison; and that his ldp. upon pretence of a debt to the king where there was none, procured a revocation of letters of administration granted of sir Roger Dallison's goods; and had written his letter to the judges of the common pleas for the countenancing of this indirect course, to wrest the said lease from the said sir Rd. Smith and sir John Davy, formerly granted unto them by the said sir Roger: All this being fully debated, the house was resumed, and it was put to the question, "Whether the lord treasurer be worthy of censure in regard of this whole Charge, both for the three bargains, and for not supplying the office of the Ordnance?" and generally agreed "To be censured."

The house was again adjourned ad libitum, and mr. Attorney read the rest of the Charge against the lord treasurer touching the Court of Wards. And their lordships considering, that it was not proved by the examination of witnesses, that the secretary was appointed to take any fees for the said petitions, either for himself or for the lord treasurer; nor that the lord treasurer had made any benefit to himself for concealed wards by virtue of the said new instructions: Therefore their lordships thought his ldp. not censurable for those two points of his Charge. But as touching the doubling of fees of Continuances of Liveries, they thought his ldp. worthy to be censured both in respect of the grievance of the subject, and of his lordship's Answer unto the same, viz. "It is the king's grace to the people, let them pay for it." And for that he delivered a Stamp unto his secretary, whereby he committed the great trust, reposed in him by his maj. unto his servant, not deigning to sign the petitions, liveries, and warrants, to the great seal, with his own hand, their lordships thought him worthy to be highly censured for the same. And thereupon the house being resumed, the question was put, "Whether the lord treasurer deserves a censure upon the whole Charge or no?" and agreed, nem. diss. "To be censured for the same."

May 13. The Lords ordered the gentleman usher and the serjeant at arms, attending on that house, to summon the earl of Middlesex, lord treasurer of England, to appear presently before their lordships. The house being adjourned ad libitum, the clerk read the heads of the six Charges against the lord treasurer, and the six several votes of the house which were yesterday past upon the same. And their lordships having duly considered upon the proofs of bribery, extortions, oppressions, wrongs and deceits, objected against the lord treasurer, found the same to be most apparently proved. And, as to the allegations of the lord treasurer of his good and profitable services to the king; in the reformation of the king's household, of the navy, of the wardrobe, and the kingdom of Ireland, their lordships entering into debate thereof, it was made manifest to them, by many particulars then declared, That, as touching the reformation of the king's household, wardrobe, Ireland, he, the lord treasurer, had deserved very ill of his maj. and, as touching the navy, though his ldp. was but a commissioner with others, who where more skilful, and did more good than he, yet, he assumed to himself the whole glory thereof; and his manner was so to do, in all other business wherein his ldp. and others were joined.

The Lords also considered of the lord treasurer's allegation of his advancing the exchange of the king's money, sent to the Palatinate, for payment of the king's forces there; and it appeared unto them plainly, That his services therein deserved no such respect, as his ldp. assumed unto himself; the soldiers of Frankendale being yet unpaid. Then the house being resumed, the first question was put, 1, "Whether the lord treasurer, in regard of these misdemeanors proved against him, shall lose all his offices which he holds in the kingdom, or no?" it was unanimously agreed, "That he should lose them all." 2, "Whether the lord treasurer shall for ever, hereafter, be incapable of any office, place or employment, in the state or common-wealth, or no?" Agreed, "That he should be incapable of them all." 3, "Whether he shall be imprisoned in the Tower of London, during his maj.'s pleasure, or no?" Agreed, "For Imprisonment." 4, "Whether the lord treasurer for these offences shall pay a fine to the king, or no?" Agreed "to pay a fine."—Then the house was adjourned ad libitum, that the lords might more freely discuss what fine to impose on the lord treasurer. And, being resumed, the fifth question was put by the lord keeper, 5, "Whether a fine of 50,000*l.* be sufficient to be imposed on the lord treasurer, or no?" Agreed to this article. 6, "Whether he shall, hereafter, sit in parliament, or no?" Agreed, "That he shall never sit again in parliament." 7, "Whether the lord treasurer shall come within the verge of the court, or no?" These questions being all put and agreed to, the whole censure against him was drawn up in form, read by the lord keeper, and passed by a general vote of the house.

Sentence against the Lord Treasurer.

Then a message was sent to the Commons, That the Lords were now ready to give Judgment against the Lord Treasurer, if they, with their Speaker, will come and demand the same. Ans^r. That they will attend, presently, as the manner is. Accordingly, the Lords being all in their robes, to the number of 62, the Lord

Treasurer was brought to the bar, by the gentleman usher and the serjeant at arms; when his ldp. making a low reverence, kneeled, until the lord keeper willed him to stand up. The Commons came in with their Speaker, and the serjeant attending him let down his mace, when the Speaker addressed himself to the lords as follows:

"The knights, citizens, and burgesses in this parl. assembled, have, heretofore, transmitted unto your lordships several offences against the right hon. Lionel, earl of Middlesex, lord high treasurer of England, for Bribery, Extortions, Oppressions, and other grievous Misdemeanors committed by his ldp.; and now the Commons, by me their Speaker, demand Judgment against him for the same."

The Lord Keeper answered, "This high court of parliament doth adjudge, That Lionel earl of Middlesex, now lord treasurer of England, shall lose all his offices which he holds in this kingdom; and shall, hereafter, be made incapable of any office, place, or employment in the state and commonwealth. That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower of London during the king's pleasure. That he shall pay unto our sovereign lord the king a fine of 50,000*l.* That he shall never sit in parliament any more, and that he shall never come within the verge of the court."

May 14. A committee of lords was appointed by the house to attend the king, and to acquaint him with the Judgment awarded by the lords against the earl of Middlesex, and to desire his maj. to take away the staff and the seal of the Court of Wards from him.—Ordered also, "That the king's counsel do draw up a bill, and present the same to the house, to make the lands of the earl of Middlesex liable unto his debts; unto his fine to the king; unto accounts to the king hereafter; and to restitution to such whom he had wronged, as shall be allowed by the house." Which bill afterwards passed into a law.*

* Lionel Cranfield, earl of Middlesex, who, from a low beginning, was, for his eminent qualities in mercantile affairs, raised to that title, and to one of the highest posts in the kingdom, was son of Tho. Cranfield, esq.; but was no more than a London merchant himself; and being bred up in the Custom House, was looked upon as a fit instrument to detect the frauds in those officers. The king, in his last speech to the lords, has given us an account how he was introduced to court, and by what steps he rose to the height he so suddenly fell from; and, by what his maj. hints, in that speech, there might probably be much malice and envy in his prosecution. Mr. Rapin charges the prince of Wales and duke of Buckingham with a conspiracy to ruin the lord treasurer, for refusing them, at times, the exorbitant sums they demanded when in Spain: that they made use of their credit with the parliament for that purpose, and caused him to be accused, by their creatures, of mismanagement in the dis-

The same day the bishop of Norwich besought the Lords to remember the Message from the Commons, on the 8th instant, for a conference touching some accusation against his ldp. which their lordships then deferred, by reason of the thinness of the House; and desired them to appoint a time for the same, with what expedition they conveniently may; whereupon a committee was then named for that purpose.

Articles of the Charge against the Bishop of Norwich.] May 19. A Report was made by the abp. of Canterbury, of a conference with the Commons, touching a Complaint against the bp. of Norwich, to this effect. That the Commons had received a Complaint exhibited against the said lord bishop, by the citizens of Norwich: and to shew, that it was ordinary for the Commons to complain against the governors of the church, divers records of parliament were cited; Annis, 18 Ed. III. 35 Ed. III. 50 Ed. III. 17 Rich. II. and the 11 Hen. IV. which were cited to satisfy tacit objections for their meddling with a cause of this nature.—That the Charge against the said bishop consisted of six parts. I. That he inhibited or disheartened preachers on the Sabbath day in the forenoon. II. That images were set up in the churches, and one of the Holy Ghost fluttering over the font; that a marble tomb was pulled down, and images set up in its room, and the bishop blessed them that did it. III. That he punished those who prayed not towards the east. IV. That he punished a minister for catechizing his family, and singing of psalms. V. That he used extortion many ways. VI. That he did not enter Institutions, to the prejudice of patrons.—To the 1st Article it was said, That there were 34 churches in Norwich; and in those parishes 80 or 40,000 charge of his office. This hint our author has strongly improved from Wilson and lord Clarendon: the former says, "The duke of Buckingham, remembering how the lord treasurer repined at the monies spent in Spain, and his comportment to him since his return, resolved to bring him down from that height he had placed him in." And the latter, "That the king was against the prosecution of the treasurer, by an Impeachment; because he foresaw, that those kinds of parliamentary proceedings would shake the royal authority, in the choice of his own ministers, when they should find that their security did not depend, solely, upon his own protection; which breach, adds the noble historian, upon his kingly power, was so much without a precedent, that, except one unhappy one, made three years before, to gratify likewise a private displeasure," [lord Bacon he means] "the like had not been practised in very many years. The king told the duke, 'That he was a fool, and was making a rod for his own breech;' and the Prince That he would live to have his belly full of parliamentary Impeachments." See History of the Rebellion, vol. I, fol. edit. 1702. p. 20.

people: That the lord bishop sent for the preachers, by the apparitors, and told them, There was no need of preaching, on Sunday in the forenoon, except in the cathedral church; although 2 or 3000 could only hear there; many dwelling three quarters of a mile off, and many were old, and not able, for their age, to come so far. That this inhibition was when the king had commanded more preaching. That his lordship connived at Recusants, all which was the disheartening of the good professors. It may be objected he allowed of catechizing; ergo, no preaching necessary: but he commanded to ask bare questions, and nothing else; ergo, no instructions.—That this is done against the canons of the church, and that there is no obedience without knowledge. The outward man is not confirmed, unless the inward man be reformed; and cited the canon, 'quicumque contristaverit doctorem veritatis peccat in Christum;' with the canon, 1 Jac. c. 45, for commanding preaching.—For the 2nd touching the setting up of Images. It was said to be against acts of parl. against the canons of the convocation, the book allowed in the time of Hen. 8. 28 Hen. 8. c. 30. against Images, Pilgrimages, &c. against the 3 Ed. 6. and the Homilies approved, anno 1 Eliz. forbidding images in churches.—The 3rd, for prayer to the east. Which Gratian affirms came by tradition, pars 1, diet. 11. and that it is superstitious, 'Linwood in the Glosses, lib. 2. Tit. de Feriis, non refert si versus Orientem, &c.' That the bishop excommunicated many, and enjoined penance unto divers, for praying to the east; and some did their penance with a withy rod in their hand; the proof thereof is under the bishop's hand.—The 4th. One Peck, a minister, catechized his family, and sung psalms, his neighbours coming in, of a Sunday after evening prayers. The bishop enjoined them to do penance, for this their resorting to catechize and sing psalms, and to say, 'I confess my errors, &c.' which acknowledgement is under the bishop's hand. They who refused, were excommunicated, and paid 7l. charges. And it was particularly observed by the Commons, that this Peck was a conformable preacher.—5thly, Touching Extortion. It was shewn, That, in the Table of Fees is set down, for Institution 24s. 8d. whereof to the bishop 10s. That this lord bishop is register also, and now himself, taketh, for institution, 3l. 5s. and, for united churches, double; and that, 'communibus annis,' there are an hundred institutions. For Admission into sacred Orders, nothing should be taken; if any, it is simony: yet this bishop taketh now 29 or 30s. the bishop and register being all one. To serve cure, 5s. is due; he takes 6s. 8d. To teach school, 3s. 4d. is due; he takes 6s. 8d. and, if of ability, 10s. For every consignation of a decree 4d. which comes to 80l. per ann. for which there should be nothing paid; no consignation being in the table, but set down in abp. Whitgift's time, in another hand.—6thly, Touching the entering of Institutions. That the institutions to benefices are not registered; which overthrows the patronages, if it be returned 'scrutatis archivis non invenitur,' when the right comes in question; yet the fees are greater than before.—The Commons concluded with these two remembrances. 1st, "That they received this Complaint before Easter last; yet they proceeded not in the examination thereof till they received a certificate from the mayor of Norwich. 2nd, That none shall be punished for complaining in parliament.

The Bishop of Norwich's Defence.] This Report being ended, the bishop of Norwich stood up in his place, and answered the same to this effect: "1st. His ldp. confessed the Charges in the said Complaint to be so great and grievous, that, were he guilty thereof, he would desire, himself, to be punished: but whether he be guilty or not, he will leave to their lordships exact and severe examination; wherein he desired them not to spare him, and he would ever acknowledge and commend their justice and honour.—His ldp. protested he was no way guilty of the first part of this accusation; if he were, then he was unworthy to bear the name of a clergyman. He shewed the unworthiness of such as should dishearten preachers from preaching the word of God. His ldp. shewed also (desiring first that he might not be taxed with ostentation) his own practice in preaching, whilst he was vicar and parson: that he preached every sabbath in the morning, and catechized in the afternoon; and that he continued the like preaching whilst he was bp. of Chichester: that in Norwich he never missed the public place, and ever preached there against popery; though he had been unprofitable, yet he had not been an idle servant; which was now his only comfort.—As touching Preaching and Non-residence, he had been reckoned more than half a puritan: he told them of his manner of living, and his leaving the archbishop of Canterbury's service that he might go to his cure. He wondered why he should be thought a papist; he thought it might be owing to his disputations, and his sermons at Paul's Cross, on predestination negative, unadvisedly preached by him; for which he was checked by abp. Whitgift, and commanded to preach no more of it; and he never did, though dr. Abbot, late bp. of Sarum, hath since declared in print that which he then preached to be no popery. That popery is a fire that will never be quiet, he hath preached a thousand sermons; and nothing of popery can be imputed to him out of any of them.—That there were divers obstacles to keep him from popery. 1. The Usurpations of the pope of Rome. His ldp. affirmed, That no power on earth can touch a prince; and therefore he abhorred the usurpation of the pope over princes. 2. Their Religion is dyed in Blood. 3. The practice course of their religion is all by juggling and feigned miracles; of which his ldp. had writ a book against them, which was never as yet answered. That he never spake with priest or jesuit, nor never invited a known recusant to his table; for they never say Amen to our prayers. 4. That their equivocations are the last; worse than which nothing can be; his ldp. held it much better to take on with the devil than with such. Then he professed himself to be a true member of this church, and acknowledged the church of England to come nearest to the primitive. That we fetch not our reformation from Wickliff, Huss, and Luther of latter times, but from the first 400 years next after Christ.—I. As touching the first part of the accusation. His ldp. confessed, That 6 or 7 of the abler sort of ministers in Norwich used to expound, in their own churches, before the sermon began in the cathedral church; and many resorted from other places to these expositions, (for all the churches have not preachers) and in the afternoon to their sermons. The preachers themselves found fault with this, being willing to be rid of the pains, for they were to preach in the afternoon and on the week days, and shewed him many disorders therein, which they pretended; as the cutting off part of the prayers, or their beginning so early, that many could not come to the common prayers, and the like; and they besought his lordship to remedy it, because they, being stipendary men, were loth to do it, for fear, belike, to lose their stipends; whereupon he sent for them by an officer, and willed them to omit these expositions in the forenoon; and yet he had since taken order for the erecting of 3 sermons in the most remote parts of the city from the cathedral church; and he also had erected many lectures in several places of the country. II. As touching the Images in a Church. What was done was done without his knowledge, it was meant by st. Peter's church: that he never saw that church till one evening as he came by; and being informed of much cost done upon it, he went in, and kneeled down to his prayers, as his use was. When he rose up, and perceived that they had bestowed very great cost, and not seeing or knowing of any image at all set up there, he said, 'God's blessing on their hearts that had bestowed such cost on God's house.' III. As touching prayers to the east: he never enjoined it, nor heard of it till now. IV. For the 4th part of his Complaint: he perceived that he had been sifted through the whole course of his life; that this Peck was sent to him by the justices of the peace, for keeping an assembly late at night at his house; his catechizing being but a colour to draw them thither. That this Peck had infected the parish with strange opinions; as not to kneel when they came to church; that the name of Jesus is no more than a common name, and that it is superstition to bow down at it. His ldp. affirmed, that this Peck had formerly been convicted of nonconformity, annis 1615 et 1617; also, for simony and conventicles in his neighbour's house, as appears by an act in the register. And that an. 1622, he was taken in his house with 22 of his neighbours, at a conventicle; that he was then bound over by a justice and brought to his ldp. and his sentence against him was, only, that he should confess his fault. The others, mentioned in this part of the Charge, were punished for their opinions also; making no difference between an alehouse and the church, till the preacher was in the pulpit. He said, he must confess his fault, That in the penance which he enjoined, he caused them to confess their errors, omitting their resort to conventicles, which he did at their own earnest suit. V. His ldp. absolutely denied that he imposed any Fees, and affirmed that he had not any of those fees which were complained of; only the fees for Institution, which he took as his predecessors did. If therein he had committed any error, 'erravimus cum patribus;' and denied that he had ever seen that Table of Fees which is spoke of by the Commons. VI. His ldp. affirmed, That he had registered all the Institutions."

When the bishop had ended his Defence, h. r. h. the Prince stood up and told him, "That he had not answered concerning the Paraphrase of the Catechism which he had taken away." To which the bishop replied; "That the preachers used to chuse a text from the Creed, &c. and to ask the child some one question, and then to dilate very long upon it, but never descended to the capacity of the child. That he did not forbid the explanation, but ordered that it should be done catechetically."

Thus ended the bishop of Norwich's Answer to the said Complaint. Immediately after which an Order is entered in the Lords' Journals, "That in respect to the shortness of time and the multiplicity of business, now depending to be determined, the Complaint of the Commons, against the bp. of Norwich, shall be referred to the High Commission, to be examined by them; and they to make report thereof to the house, and then the house will judge of it."

The Bp. of Norwich's Complaint against one Tho. Stokes] The same day the bishop of Norwich exhibited a Complaint to the house against one Tho. Stokes, clerk. "That whereas the said Tho. Stokes had preferred a Petition to the Commons against his ldp. for excessive fees, pretended to be taken by his ldp. and for other grievances therein mentioned. He acknowledged the proceedings of the said Stokes to be legal, and humbly submitted himself to an examination and strict trial. However, he complained that the said Stokes had sent his lordship this message: 'That if he would suffer a judgment in the court of common pleas for him, the said Stokes, to be archdeacon of Norfolk, that then Stokes would prosecute no further against his ldp.; otherwise, he would smoke him with more Complaints.' Moreover, that the said Stokes reported that his ldp. did drink a health to Spinola, and refused to pledge a health to the prince of Orange, for that the said prince was a general unto traitors. And that Stokes affirmed his ldp. did take 30l. of every one of the archdeacons when he came first to his see. All which his ldp. affirmed to be false."

This Complaint, with the witnesses the bp. produced to prove it, was referred to the examination of the abp. of Canterbury, who was to make report thereof to the house for their judgment of the matter. But we hear no more of this, or the former affair, in the Journals or elsewhere; for neither Wilson nor Rushworth mention one word of it.* But to return to our proceedings,

The Commons desire a longer continuance of the Session.] The same day, still, a message was brought from the Commons to the Lords, by sir Edwin Sandys and others, to this effect: "That the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in the house of Commons assembled, understanding that his maj.'s pleasure is to put an end to this session on Saturday next, the 22d instant, within which short time, neither that house nor their's can perfect those businesses which are begun; they do humbly desire their lordships to join with them in petition to his maj. for a longer time: 1st. For that the king permitting them to name their own treasurers for the Subsidy this parl. much longer time hath been spent in that bill than usual, because they had no precedent for the same; whereby many good bills were delayed. 2ndly. For that the business of Free Trade, which had been long disordered, had brought many general complaints unto them; not only by the merchants, but by the clothiers and those of the meaner sort. Which, if they have longer time, they hope so to accommodate, that it shall be advantageous, to the king's profit, and give content both to the poor and to the rich. 3rdly. The bill for the Subsidy of the Clergy was but newly come into their house, and their own bill of Subsidy is yet to have another reading. 4thly. For that they understand that their lordships have so many bills, and other matters of weight, as yet depending, that they doubt whether they can perform them in so short a time. Wherefore, and to hold that fair correspondence, which hath hitherto continued between both houses, they make this earnest request; not intending to entertain any new matters, but those, only, which are begun and ready to be finished."

The messengers being withdrawn, his highness the Prince signified unto the house, "That at his coming from the king, his maj. told him that he was determined to end this session on Saturday next; and commanded his highness so to answer them who should move to have that time prolonged. But what his maj. would do therein, when he shall hear these reasons, his highness said he knew not." Whereupon,

* This bp. of Norwich was Samuel Harsnet, who Le Neve tells us had been guilty of several scandalous practices, whilst he was master of Pembroke hall in Cambridge. He came into high favour, at court, in the next reign; for in 1628, he was made abp. of York.

the house humbly besought the Prince to move his maj. to give a longer day.—The messengers then were called in and answered, "That the Lords do take in good part their willingness to hold good correspondency with them, and have weighed the general and particular reasons expressed, for a longer day of continuance of this session: but they have received such absolute directions from his maj. for the end of this session, at a day now so near at hand, that they cannot give the Commons any hope of obtaining a longer. Yet, considering that his maj. knew not of these reasons, their lordships have entreated the Prince to move him for a longer day. What this will produce they know not; wherefore their lordships will hasten the dispatch of their own business, against the day which his maj. hath limited, as much as they can, and they doubted not but the Commons would do the like."

May 20. The Lords received the following Message from the Commons: "That they desire a conference with their lordships, touching a Petition to the King for removing all justly suspected Recusants from their offices of trust." Answer was returned, "That they would meet them presently; but, before the Lords went to this conference, the Prince acquainted the house, That his maj. was content to prolong this session unto Saturday, May 29, so that his highness would engage himself that neither of the two houses would entertain any new matter in the mean time; and that he should know, first, the minds of the Commons therein." It was agreed, "That this should be intimated to them at the meeting."

The Commons' Petition against Recusants.] The same day a report was made by the abp. of Canterbury of what passed at this conference; he told the house, That the Commons produced an humble Petition to the king, desiring the lords to join with them in it, as heretofore. Which Petition was read in these words:

"We your maj.'s loyal and faithful subjects, the Commons, (by your royal authority and commandment called to and assembled in this present parl. out of all the parts of your kingdom of England and dominion of Wales) do, in all humility, give your maj. most humble thanks, that you have so religiously and openly published, that your laws and acts of state against Popish Recusants should be put in due execution. And now we hold it our bounden duty (amongst other the important affairs of your realm) to inform your maj. of the growth of this dangerous sort of people within this your kingdom, and of their insolency and boldness in all the parts thereof, insomuch as many of them (unknown to your maj.) have crept into offices, and places of government and authority under you, to the disheartening of your good subjects, and contrary to your maj.'s laws and acts of state; whose names (in discharge of our allegiance and duty, without respect of persons) we, in all humbleness, present to your majesty. [Here follow two Lists, containing,

1. "The Names of all such Persons as are certified to have Places of Charge or Trust, in their several Counties, and are themselves Popish Recusants or Non-Communicants, that have given overt suspicion of their ill-affection in Religion, or that are reported or suspected so to be." 2. "The Names of all such Persons who are certified to be in Places of Charge or Trust, in their several Counties, and that have wives, children, and servants, that are Popish Recusants or Non-Communicants, or that are suspected or reported so to be."—

"Now, in consideration of the great countenance hereby given to Popery, the great grief and offence to all your best affected, true, and loving subjects, the apparent danger of the whole kingdom, by putting the power of arms into such hands as, by former acts of your maj.'s council, are adjudged persons justly to be suspected, and themselves fit to be disarmed. Your said loyal and faithful subjects do most humbly beseech your maj. graciously to vouchsafe that the said lords and gentlemen above named, for these important reasons, and for the greater safety of your maj. and of your realm and dominion, may be removed from all your maj.'s commissions of great charge and trust, commissions of lieutenancy, oyer and terminer, and of the peace, and from all offices and other places of trust."

This Petition being read, the lords deferred the debate thereon, for that time, because the day was far spent; but gave an Answer to the messengers who attended for the same, That they would consider of the Petition, and would send them an Answer when they were resolved of it. The Commons returned the lords thanks, and said, their house had made an order to receive no more bills, or entertain any more new business this session. The same order was made by the lords.

May 21. The Petition of the Commons, for displacing Popish Recusants, was read a 2nd time; and, after some debate, an Answer was resolved on to be given to the commons about it. Accordingly a message was sent by the lords to desire another conference; and, in the mean time, the Answer was put into writing, and read to the house in hæc verba: "That we take great contentment in the concurrence which has been between the two houses, from the beginning of this session, and which we doubt not but shall continue to the end. That what hath been desired in your Petition, concerning Popish Recusants, is wholly allowed and approved of; our hearts do go along with what is propounded by the commons. But that our way in judicature, as they know, is, to proceed upon oath, and to hear the party's defence, which the shortness of time in this case, can by no means permit. That if we should publicly go in a committee of both houses to the king, we should strike deep into the reputation of the parties concerned, and give his maj. and the whole world, occasion to think; That we did both judge and condemn before we had heard. Notwithstanding, we do incline, if they like of it, to move his highness the Prince, privily to acquaint his maj. with this as with a matter of state; not doubting but that his maj. will take it into his grave and prudent consideration; so that such effect, as we trust, is like to follow, as will give us all good contentment."—This answer was approved of by the other house, at the conference; who rendered their most humble thanks to the Prince, "That he was pleased, as of himself, to intimate their requests unto his maj.; and that they hoped it would receive a gracious Answer."

The Judges Opinions on some Clauses of the Subsidy Bill in point of Privilege.] May 24. The bill for granting an aid to his maj. of 3 entire Subsidies, and three 15ths and 10ths, was sent up by the Commons; and, the next day, on the 2nd reading, before it was committed, the Judges were appointed by the house to consider of some points of judicature in the said bill, and to deliver their resolutions about it.—May 26. The lord president reported to the house, That the Judges had given in their Resolutions, concerning some questions arising on the bill of Subsidies; which was read as follows:

"Resolved, by general consent, That, upon the perusal of several parts of the act of Subsidy, they do not conceive that there is any thing therein, which may impeach or blemish the privilege or power of the higher house, or add to the privileges of the lower, in any thing; save, in the particular case in question, and in no other case, of the like or other nature; and that for these reasons: 1st. Because the judicature, in this particular case, is not assumed, by the way of privilege, to beget a precedent, but, by way of an act; which taketh effect, not only by themselves, but by the lords, and by the royal assent of the king. 2nd. Because the ground of this act proceeded, originally, from the gracious proposition of his maj. himself, and that proposal is mentioned in the act itself; so that there is nothing to be drawn from this act to ground the like on hereafter, unless it be upon the same proposition from the king, with the consent of the lords, who must fully assent unto it. 3rd. The words, 'That the lords shall have power by virtue of this act,' are not privative to any former power of the lords, and are convenient in this particular case, where the offence is new; for, before this act, there was neither punishment for this offence, nor the offence to be punished. 4th. The reserving the punishment of those, who, at this time, are assistants to the higher house, is no derogation to that house; for they have no inherent right of being assistants, as the lords have of being members of the house; and this is done by bill wherein the lords join. 5th. For that the lords are joined with the commons in the commission, the account is to be joint; and therefore it is not possible to sever them from the commons, because the account would be lame and imperfect.—All which the Judges humbly submit to their lordships judgment."

The Protestation of the Lords in consequence thereof.] These Resolutions were approved of by the house; but the lords thought fit to enter a protestation in their Journal Book, before the Subsidy bill was read a third time; which was to this purpose: "Forasmuch as this present act of Subsidy from the temporality, is, in many things, different from the antient usual form of a Subsidy bill; and because something contained in the said act, may, in time to come, be construed either to lessen the jurisdiction of the one house, or add to the jurisdiction of the other, more than hath been used, or heretofore admitted: therefore the lords spiritual and temporal, in the higher house of parl. now assembled, do hereby declare and pronounce, and cause this protestation to be entered on record in the rolls of this parliament. That no words, matter, or thing, in this act contained, shall hereafter be taken or construed to give or take any jurisdiction, power, privilege, or authority to or from either of the said houses of parliament; but that either of them shall, severally and dividedly, hold, use, and enjoy such and the same liberties, privileges, powers, and jurisdictions as heretofore, they, or either of them, respectively had; any thing in this act to the contrary notwithstanding."

Debate on the Subsidy Bill in the Commons.] It may not be amiss, in this place, to look back into the Journals of the Commons, this session, for the first motions of a Supply in that house. We are told that the king's demands to support the state, in case of a war with Spain, &c. on the breach of the treaties, was a supply of 6 Subsidies and 12 Fifteenths. On the 19 March, the Commons went upon this demand, and the heads of a long debate is entered in the subsequent Journal of this session. In one speech of sir Edw. Coke's, is a calculation what the whole sum of such a grant would amount to. He estimated that one Subsidy from the laity would come to 70,000*l.* and a fifteenth to 30,000*l.* a Subsidy from the Clergy to 20,000*l.* the total of which, multiplied by the number of them demanded, would amount to 900,000*l.* almost a million, which was more, he said, than all England could raise, with any conveniency.—After almost two days debate the house came to the following Resolution upon the question, without one negative voice, "That after his maj. shall have been pleased to declare himself for the utter dissolution of the two Treaties, for the Marriage and the Palatinate; the house, in pursuit of their advice given to his maj. and towards the support of the war which is likely to ensue; and, more particularly, for these four points proposed by his maj. namely, the defence of this Realm; the securing of Ireland; the assistance of our neighbours, the states of the United Provinces, and other his maj.'s Allies; with the fitting out of his maj.'s royal navy, will grant, for the present, 3 Subsidies, with 3 Fifteenths and Tenths, to be levied in such time and manner as they shall be pleased afterwards to appoint; and to be paid into the hands, and expended by the direction of such commissioners, as shall hereafter be agreed on in this present session of parl." and, by a subsequent resolution, nem. con. the same day, it was agreed, "That these 3 Subsidies, Fifteenths and Tenths, shall be paid within the space of one year after the king hath declared himself." Upon the delivery of this proposition to the king, it was agreed to by him; afterwards the Treaties were broke, as hath been mentioned, and the Commons went upon framing a bill to raise the Supply and name commissioners to be the managers of it: which being a thing hitherto unprecedented, and what no crowned head ever granted before, occasioned the dispute in the house of lords before related.—But to proceed with the Lords Journals.

Resolutions of the Lords as to Matters of Privilege.] May 23. The Earl Marshal, from the committee for searching precedents to sustain the privileges, &c. of the house, made the following Report;

"How far the Privileges of the Nobility do clearly extend, concerning the Freedom of their Servants and Followers from Arrests.

"To all their menial servants and those of their family, and also those employed, necessarily and properly, about their estates as well as their persons.—This freedom to continue 20 days before and after every session; in which time the lords may conveniently go home to their houses in the most remote parts of the kingdom.—That all the lords, after the end of this session, be very careful in this point, and remember the ground of this privilege; which was, only, in regard they should not be distracted, by the trouble of their servants, from attending the serious affairs of the kingdom; that therefore they will not pervert that privilege to the public injustice of the kingdom, which was given them, chiefly, that the whole realm might, in this high court, draw the clear light of justice from them. In which case, every one ought rather to keep far within, than any way exceed their due limits.—That hereafter, before any person be sent for in this kind, the lord whom he serves shall, either by himself or by his letter, or by some message, certify the house upon his honour, that the person arrested is within the limits of the privilege before expressed.—And, for the particulars, they must be left to the judgment of the house, as the case shall come in question; wherein the house wants no means, as well by oath as without, to find out the true nature of the servant's quality in his lord's service. Thereupon, if it be adjudged by the house contrary to the true intent, any member whatsoever must not think it strange, if in such a case, both himself suffer reproof, as the house shall think fit, and his servant receive no benefit by the privilege, but pay the fees; because the justice of the kingdom must be preferred before any personal respect, and none to be spared that shall offend after so fair a warning."—Ordered to be observed accordingly, with this alteration, viz. "This freedom to begin with the date of the writ of summons, and to continue 20 days after every session of parliament."

Order of the Lords concerning Judicature.] The Earl Marshal also reported, That the lords of the committee had thought this order proper concerning Judicature, viz. "The lords of the high court of parl. do hold it fit to consider of some Orders for the trials of such persons as shall hereafter be brought before them, and come to Judicature: but the session being soon to end, at this time, their lordships think it fit to declare now in general, That as this court is the highest from whence others ought to draw their light, so they do intend the proceedings thereof shall be most clear and equal; as well on the one side, in finding out offences where there is just ground, as, on the other side, in affording all just means of defence to such as shall be questioned. For the particulars, they do at this time order, That in all cases of moment the defendants shall have copies of all depositions, both pro & contra, after the publication, a convenient time before hearing, to prepare themselves: And also that if the defendants shall demand it of the house in due time, they shall have learned counsel to assist them in their defence, whether they be able, by reason of health, to answer in person or not, so as they chuse council void of just exception; and, if such council shall refuse them, they are to be assigned as the court shall think fit. This their lordships do, because in all cases, as well civil, criminal and capital, they hold that all lawful helps cannot, before just judges, make one that is guilty avoid justice; and, on the other side, according to his majesty's most gracious speech, 'God defend that an innocent man should be condemned.' Likewise for calling a member of this house to the bar, their lordships hold it fit to be very well weighed, at what time and for what causes it shall be; and therefore the time being now short, precedents are to be looked out, and this to be considered of at the next meeting."

Petition of the Commons to the King, complaining of divers Grievances.] The following Petition to the King, from the House of Commons, complaining of divers Grievances occasioned by Monopolies, &c. is taken from a Collection of Speeches, &c. in 1623 and 1624, communicated by the Rev. Dr. Zachariah Grey to the Editors of the "Parliamentary or Constitutional History of England." This Manuscript, apparently in the hand-writing of those times, the Doctor calls "Capt. Wingate's Manuscript."—The Petition is without date; but it seems to have been presented to the King just before the conclusion of this session, because his Majesty's Speech, as the reader will perceive, is, in some measure, an Answer to it.

"Most Gracious Sovereign, We your most loyal and loving subjects the Commons, by your royal authority assembled out of all the parts of your realm of England, in this present parl. as well out of duties and zeal to your majesty, as out of the sense of that just grief wherewith your subjects are generally afflicted, do, in all humility present the Complaint of the Commons of your realm against those Grievances ensuing to your gracious view, humbly and instantly praying due redress thereof.

"FISH.—Whereas upon divers suggestions, and to set forward the plantation in New-England, your maj. did grant your letters patent, bearing date the 3rd of Nov. in the 18th year of your reign, unto sir Ferdinand Gorges, and other patentees, whereby your maj. prohibited all your subjects to visit the coast, without the licence of the patentees; and, by pretext thereof, your maj.'s subjects have been interrupted to fish in the main sea upon the same coasts: in which letters patent it is further contained, 'That if any of your subjects should offend contrary to the same, they should forfeit their ships and goods, the one moiety thereof to your maj. and the other moiety to the patentees.' Now, in respect the trade of Fishing is a most beneficial trade to this realm for the increase of shipping, navigation, and mariners, and the bringing in of bullion and victuals to a very great yearly value and supply; and yet the free exercise thereof is restrained by the said letters patent, contrary to law, and to the general damage of this realm; and forasmuch as the said Grievance was complained of, and examined by and before the Commons in this present parl. and the said sir F. Gorges who undertook the defence thereof, for himself and other the said patentees, being called hereunto, and at several days deliberated and fully heard therein, by himself and his learned counsel, could not defend the same; and yet the premises, notwithstanding your loving subjects may be hereafter vexed as heretofore they have been, by colour of the said patents, so far as they concern the prohibition of free fishing, and the incidents thereunto, and the confiscation of ships and goods, and all restraints and penalties therein contained, concerning free Fishing, and which may hinder the same, to be utterly void and against your laws, and never hereafter to be put in execution."

"GOLD WIRE-DRAWERS.—Whereas, within the city of London, there was an ancient art and trade of Gold Wire-Drawing, exercised by divers, being members of the corporation of goldsmiths of London, whereby they maintained not only themselves and their families, but also set many other persons on work, until one Matthias Fowle and others (men never bound apprentices in the said trade according to the law) obtained from your maj. letters patent, bearing date 14th of June, in the 21st year of your reign; whereby they were incorporated by the names of Gold Wire-drawers of the city of London, the governor, the assistant, and commonalty, upon suggestion that they would import from foreign parts, to be converted into current coin of this kingdom, so much foreign gold and silver coin and bullion, as should countervail the bullion they should use in making Gold Wire and other manufacturers; and also the same Gold Wire should be of a sufficient goodness, and sold at the like or cheaper rates than the same was before the said new corporation: and, by the said letters patent, the said Gold Wire-Drawers, anciently brought up to and using the said trade, were prohibited to use or exercise the same any more. And further, your maj. by the said letters patent, at the prayers of the persons so newly incorporated, did impose 6d. upon every ounce of gold wire that should be made or sold by them within this realm. The humble Petition of your subjects is, That your maj. will be graciously pleased to publish and declare the same accordingly, and that the said letters patent should never hereafter be put in execution."

"CONCEALMENTS AND DEFECTIVE TITLES.—And whereas your maj. of your blessed disposition, taking care of the quiet and ease of your subjects, who had been intolerably vexed by comptrollers or overseers of defective Titles under your great seal, forbid all men to propound or offer to sue for any such lands, for that in your royal judgment they were things fit to be measured by the rules of your maj.'s own conscience; yet sir John Townshend, knt. not regarding your maj.'s royal commandment, hath, by colour of his letters patent, obtained since your maj.'s said prohibition, of 15 hospitals employed for the furtherance and relief of old, poor, and impotent people, and many other lands and tenements in divers counties and parts of your realm, in the possession of your subjects, extremely vexed by unjust suits in your maj.'s name; and otherwise the governors and poor of the said hospitals, and other your maj.'s subjects, to their great charge and hindrance, and almost undoing. Our humble Petition to your maj. is, That the said letters patent, for the causes aforesaid, may be called in, and cancelled; and that the said sir John, and all claiming under him, may be by your maj. prohibited to vex or trouble any of your maj.'s subjects, by pretext or colour of the same."

"BRIEFS.—And whereas licenses under the seal, to gather monies of your subjects, to persons pretending losses by fire or otherwise be against the statute in that case made and provided, are grown to such excessive numbers, that many mischiefs and inconveniences thereupon ensue, in all parts of your realm. Our suit to your maj. is, That the statute in that case made may be observed, and that no such licenses may be hereafter granted."

"APOTHECARIES.—Whereas the Apothecaries of the city of London have been anciently members of the company of grocers of the same city; and whereas the said grocers did, and do, far exceed the number of Apothecaries, and did even buy and sell all manner of drugs as well as apothecaries, which drugs at several times of the year, were, by the president and censor of the college of the physicians, searched and viewed whether the same were useful or not; and whereas as well the said grocers as others did use to distill all kinds of waters, a great part whereof was transported beyond the seas, to your maj.'s great and yearly benefit; the said Apothecaries, without consent of the said grocers, obtained letters patent, bearing date 6th of Dec. in the 15th year of your maj.'s reign, whereby the said Apothecaries are incorporated and divided from the company of grocers; by colour of which said letters patent, the apothecaries have appropriated to themselves the whole buying and selling of all drugs, and the whole distillation and selling of all waters within the said city and 7 miles thereabout; which dividing of the apothecaries from the grocers without their consent, and the appropriating of the distillation of the said waters unto the apothecaries, and the sole selling thereof by them, is against the law, to the impoverishing of many persons and their families. Your loyal subjects, therefore humbly pray your maj. graciously to be pleased to declare the said letters patent to be void, and that the same shall not hereafter be put into execution."

"WINTERTONNESS LIGHTS.—Whereas by an act of parl. power and authority to erect beacons, marks, and signs for the sea, was given to the master, wardens, and assistants of the Trinity House, as to men skilful and expert in that behalf; and whereas, at the earnest request of the seafaring men passing by the coasts of Norfolk, they, at their own costs and charges, erected a sign for the sea, commonly called a Light House, of stone, at Wintertonness in Norfolk, and agreed to take, and did take, but 6d. for every 20th chaldron of coals of ships passing that way. So it is that sir John Meldrum, upon suggestion that there was want of a light-house at Wintertonness, obtained of your maj. letters patent, to erect a light-house there, which letters being made upon that consideration, were void in law; for that there had been a light-house there by the space of half a year, or thereabouts: and though it were true, as sir John pretended, that he had petitioned to your maj. for erection of a light-house, before the said light-house of stone was erected, yet the said letters patent are void in law, for that they of the Trinity-House, having authority as is aforesaid, by act of parl. did, before the said letters patent, erect a light-house as is aforesaid; where they of the Trinity did take but 6d. for every 20 chaldron of coals, the said sir John by colour of the said letters patent, for every 20 chaldron of coals, hath taken 3s. 4d. and will not suffer the ships to make their entries, or take cocquets, before they pay the said excessive duty of 3s. 4d. to the intolerable damage and loss of your subjects, he hath taken after the rate of 3s. 4d. of divers seafaring men, that sail not that way, nor in their course could take any benefit of the said light-house. Our humble Petition is, That your maj. will be pleased to publish the said letters patent to be void in law, and to command that they be no more put in execution."

"SIR SIMOND HARVY.—The said sir Simond Harvy, of his own authority, made warrants to divers constables of the county of Hertford for taking malt for your maj.'s provision; which, by colour thereof, was taken accordingly, and paid not such prices for the same as, if the taking had been lawful, they ought to have received. He, in your maj.'s name, likewise caused to be taken of Quested, a fishmonger of London, a great quantity of lings for his maj.'s provision, where he ought not to have taken the same, and yet paid not therefor, as if the taking had been lawful, he ought to have done. He hath, wittingly and willingly, over-charged divers counties, as Hertfordshire, Essex, and Hampshire, with carriages for your maj. he not finding any or proportionable carriages for such counties as had compounded; whereby your maj.'s subjects were grievously oppressed. Whereas the words of composition and covenant for purveyance of oxen, &c. be, 'That all undertakers should have their monies immediately upon the delivery of their provisions, the undertakers of Buckinghamshire, Berkshire, Herefordshire, Gloucestershire, Lancashire, Cheshire, Yorkshire, Wiltshire, and many other counties, having delivered good and serviceable oxen, &c. and so allowed by your maj.'s officers, and going to sir Simon, with a debenture for money, was answered, 'That they could have none;' to the extreme hinderance of all, and the utter undoing of some of them; whereas, before sir Simon became officer, they were duly paid according to the said composition.—It hath been testified unto us, that 2000l. will not set your hon. household in so good case and order as it was before he came to intermeddle with the same; for before his time, your maj. had usually in store 500 quarters of wheat, 200 oxen, 2000 muttons, 5000l. in hay and oats, and other provisions; whereas now your maj. hath none, or very little; for he takes this course, that he selleth the good and fat oxen and muttons, and buying meat from the butchers, many times your household hath been very ill served, to the great dishonour of your maj. And, to shew the bad disposition of this needy person, the said sir Simon hath, cunningly and treacherously, cozened and cheated Liekland, one of your maj.'s servants, of 530l. We your humble subjects that are ever, and shall be, sensible both of your maj.'s honour and profit, thought it our bounden duties to inform your maj. of these particulars, not having time to examine any more, to the end that the said sir Simon may (to terrify others offending in the like) receive condign punishment, according to the merit and justice of his cause."

"GAOLS.—Whereas, by the common laws and statutes of this realm, the custody, rule, keeping, and charge of every of your maj.'s common gaols, prisons, and prisoners, in every county within this your realm of England, doth belong to the sheriff of the said county, as incident to his office; and the said sheriff only, and no more, is accountable and answerable, as well to your maj. as to all and every of your subjects, for all prisoners committed to the said gaols, and is to pay and satisfy all the debts and damages, for which any prisoner is thereunto committed, if he, by any means, escape out of the same; and therefore all grants of the custody of such gaols made by your maj.'s predecessors, kings or queens of this realm, have heretofore, in the time of queen Eliz. by the resolution of the judges, been declared to be void. And whereas, also, in your maj.'s counties of York and Lancaster, and other counties of this realm, where common gaols have not been erected by statute in other places, then your maj.'s castles, the common gaols of every county have been kept in some of your maj.'s own castles, of which castles, as well as of the gaols therein, the sheriff of the said county for the time being hath had the custody under your maj. or your predecessors, kings or queens of this realm, as belonging to his sheriffwick; and therefore all letters patent, and grants of the custody of any common gaol in any county of this realm, made to other person or persons for life or years, than the sheriff of the said county, in the time of Hen. 7. have been declared to be utterly void. Therefore your maj.'s most loyal subjects of your commons house of parl. most humbly beseech your maj. that it would please your highness, out of your zeal to public justice, to revoke and make void all letters patent and grants of the custody of any common gaol, in any county of this realm, made to other person or persons than the sheriff of the said county for the time being. And that, of your royal grace, it would likewise please your maj. that the sheriffs of the said counties of York and Lancaster, and of all other counties where the common gaol of the county hath been usually heretofore, and still is, kept in some of your maj.'s castles in the said counties, may have the custody of these castles, as belonging to their office, for the necessary service of your maj. and general good of the commonwealth, for the due keeping of all prisoners in the said counties."

"SEA-COALS.—Whereas it pleased your maj. the 22nd day of Sept. in the 21st year of your happy reign over us, to grant unto sir Rob. Sharpleigh, knt. and Alex. Hetley, esq. a patent of surveying ships of Newcastle Coals, with a fee of 3d. upon the great chaldron; and whereas, likewise, it pleased your maj. by sir John Sucklyng, knt. comptroller of your maj.'s household, and a member of our house, to intimate unto us your gracious intention to have the said letters patent considered upon by your privy council, between this and the next session of parl. according to a clause in the said letters patent contained; and thereupon, out of your princely care, to provide against any inconvenience that might grow to your subjects thereby, we your maj.'s most loyal and dutiful commons, with all humble thankfulness, acknowledging your maj.'s most princely grace and justice, and accounting it a singular happiness to live under the govt. of a king so just, and ready to hear the grief and complaint of his poor subjects, have nevertheless thought it our duties, and agreeable to the fundamental rights and liberties of parl. more fully at this time to make known unto your maj. the just grievance of your people, by and upon occasion of his patent, whereof your maj. can no ways be so properly, truly, and thoroughly informed as your commons assembled in parl. May it therefore please your maj. to take notice that this patent is not only in itself unlawful, as being grounded upon many untrue suggestions, and burdensome unto your people in laying a new charge upon them without common consent; but tends also to the great decay of the navigation of this kingdom, and to the great diminution of a profit which your majesty receiveth upon Newcastle Coals; the trade whereof, by occasion of this new office, hath been, and is like to be, interrupted; and we do plainly find that this patent, in consequence, is of a very dangerous nature, and reacheth to the subversion of the property, which your subjects, by the laws of your kingdom, have, and of right ought to have, in their goods and estates, amounting, in effect, to an imposition upon a native and necessary commodity to be expended within this realm, which your maj. hath been pleased, in open parl. to disclaim any right at all unto, and graciously to protest, that you did abhor either to express or claim any such power; it being the undoubted right of your subjects, that no burden of this kind be laid upon them without their own voluntary consent in parl. Wherefore, in all humbleness, we do, upon this occasion, present unto your sacred wisdom, our most just complaints and fears; herein, most humbly and instantly, beseeching your gracious goodness to secure the hearts of your loving subjects against this and the like in time to come, by being pleased to take such a course for the calling in of that patent, as to your princely wisdom you shall think most fit; and we are full of hope, that, out of your further grace, you will be pleased to make known to your whole kingdom, your just indignation and displeasure against such as shall presume to offer to your maj. any suit of this nature."

"POPISH BOOKS.—That whereas your most excellent maj. at the humble petition of your lords and commons in this present parl. assembled, (see p. 1410), hath, to the great comfort of all your religious and well-affected subjects, by your proclamation, banished all Jesuits and Priests out of these your dominions, at a day certain, not to return under such pains as, by the laws now in force, are justly to be inflicted; that, nevertheless, it is apparent, that the said turbulent and ill-affected persons, the better to insinuate themselves, and those of their faction, in the favours and good opinion of such as, of meaner judgment and meaner capacities, have of late, more than heretofore, taken the boldness to divulge and disperse sundry popish, seditious, and pestilent Books and Pamphlets throughout all the parts of this your kingdom, whereof there is a catalogue extant in print of 150 at the least, printed and published here within this 2 or 3 years, besides no small number of that kind daily imported from parts beyond the seas, and ordinarily sold and vended amongst us; by means whereof they endeavour not only to corrupt the youth of this realm, to deprave and scandalize the true religion here established, and to advance the power and authority of the see of Rome; but, as much as in them lieth, to withdraw the hearts of your faithful and loyal subjects from their due obedience to your royal maj. May it therefore please your maj. at the humble suit of your Commons in this present parl. assembled, in a cause so highly concerning the glory of God, the preservation of your maj.'s person, religion, and estate, that such speedy course may be taken for the suppressing of all such seditious and Popish Books and Pamphlets, and to prevent the printing and importing of any such as, in your maj.'s royal judgment, shall seem most meet and convenient; and that the laws in force against the offenders may be put in execution."

"BUILDING.—Whereas your maj. amongst many of your royal favours and gracious promises, offered your loyal subjects, upon consideration of a Petition of Grievance presented to your maj. in the 8th year of your happy reign over us, by the commons then assembled in parl. was pleased to promise that such proclamations as were then past should be reformed, where cause should be found; and that, for the future time, none should be made, but such as should stand with the former laws and statutes of this kingdom, and such as, in cases of necessity, your royal progenitors had used in times of the best and happy govt. of this realm. Nevertheless, some of the said proclamations, then complained of, stand in force, and have been oftentimes since (by other proclamations touching the said former proclamations) precedents to warrant the latter; amongst which we present to your princely wisdom the several proclamations concerning Buildings; which is a great grievance to the freedom and state of the subjects, in that they cannot repair or amend their houses in London, or within the distance of 5 miles of any of the gates of the said city, being their inheritance, without the licence and allowance of certain of your maj.'s commissioners, under danger of the censure of the Star-Chamber, as appeareth by divers proclamations made in that behalf; and, namely, by one dated the 17th day of July, in the 18th year of your reign.—And the grievance at this time is so much the greater, by reason that the state of the city generally is poor, and hath now many payments to your maj.; and this great restraint will in a short time be a great cause of their further impoverishing; and many men that are able to repair, and are not able to build, and some that have intended to build part of their houses have been enforced to pull down the rest, and new-build the rest, to their utter undoing; whereas the same, with small reparations, would have continued many years.—And your subjects further shew, That many carpenters, plasterers, smiths, and other handicraft men, are in great distress for want of work, and divers of the said workmen have been taken from their work, and committed to prison, and so forced to leave their wives and children to parishes: and that thereby the subjects are debarred the common law of this land between the landlord and tenants, which are now censured by the Commons who have set down what charge the lord and tenant shall be at in building and repairing their houses. We therefore, your maj.'s humble subjects, the Commons in this parl. assembled, do humbly desire your maj. to declare your royal pleasure, that the said proclamations, and commissions thereupon, concerning Buildings, and repairing of Buildings, be void, and shall no farther be put in execution."

"DR. ANION.—Whereas complaint hath been made to his maj.'s Commons, now assembled in parl. against dr. Anion, president in Corpus Christi college, in Oxford, of sundry misdemeanors in governing the said college, and other erroneous and scandalous offences, unworthy of his degree, calling, and place; which, upon examination before them, have appeared in the greatest part, to be true. Forasmuch as nothing can be more agreeable to your maj.'s great wisdom and knowledge, than to have the particular care of the advancement of learning; nor to your goodness, to have a special regard of the government of youth in your two famous Universities, as well for religion, as for other important employments in the state. Your most dutiful Commons, in all humbleness, beseecheth your most excellent maj. that some course may be taken, according to your princely justice and wisdom, for removing the said dr. Anion from the place of president in that college."

"COURT OF WARDS.—Whereas your maj. the 11th of Dec. 1618, by your commission under the great seal, with instructions and directions to the master and council of the Court of Wards and Liveries, of your royal and special care for the good of your subjects, and the true answering of your revenues concerning wards of idiots and lunatics, established divers orders, by advice of your principal judges and counsel of the said court; so it is that the earl of Middlesex, late master of the wards and liveries, procured the said good orders, instructions, and directions to be revoked, and others, in lieu thereof, to be made and published, concerning many inconvenient clauses, tending to the diminution of your maj.'s revenues, and raising a great increase of fees and other charges of the subject. Our humble suit to your maj. is, That you of your grace and goodness, will be pleased, for the better answering of your said revenue, and the good ease of your subjects, to revoke your said late instructions, and to re-establish or regulate the former, as in your princely wisdom you shall think fit."

sion.] May 29. His majesty being placed on the throne and the lords in their robes, the commons, with their Speaker, sir Tho. Crew, were admitted into the royal presence. The Speaker came up with great reverence and low obeisance to the king, and being at the bar, delivered, say the Lords' Journals, a learned Speech. Only the heads of it are preserved in that work, but the MS. just quoted has it at length, as also the Lord Keeper's Answer: the Speaker's speech was as follows:

"Most Gracious Sovereign; The great and mighty God, who is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end of all things, hath, by his good providence, brought his hopeful entry into this parl. to an happy period and conclusion, and hath manifested to the Christian world a blessed unity and conjunction between the head and the members in one heart. In the building of the Temple there was not an hammer heard, but all was smoothed, and wrought, and prepared by the cunning hand of the workmen before they were laid.—God, the author of peace and concord, who makes choice of a house in the mind, hath so united the hearts of both houses in one desire and correspondency, that in the great and weighty business, wherein your maj. was pleased to discern and ask their advice, they have all concurred without a negative voice; and your grace and goodness hath broken forth like light, that have been pleased to follow and approve the same, imitating the precept of the wise king, Prov. xv. 22. "Without Counsel purposes are disappointed; but in the multitude of counsellors they are established."—In the interim of our debates of that important subject, we neglected no time, but husbanded it in penning and passing of bills, and especially those that concern the publick good, and will remain to posterity as a memorial of the honour of your time, and the weal of your people. It is the highest pitch of a true monarchy, and greatest of height of your outward happiness, that you rightfully reign and rule alone, and yet that your commonwealth is so compounded by the sound laws of the same, that your people have their voice and suffrage in making and altering of laws, which are the sinews of your govt. that holds the body together; and their equal composition and impartial execution is a principal means, under God, to secure your royal person, and to support the state. It is the nature of man to be in love with its own child; and by this parliamentary way, the people are left without excuse, and have their mouths closed up, who else might take occasion not to be so well satisfied. The bulk of these petitions, as some of them have proceeded from your own grace, so now all of them return to your gracious acceptance.—But these Petitions, be they never so fitly framed, or judiciously digested; yet, for the part, they are but as speculations (yea, that I may use the phrase of mine own profession) as 'Infante in ventre sa metre,' of whom it may be truly said, That the children are come to the birth, but have no strength to be delivered, till your maj. breathes life into them; yea, they are but as shadows till the royal assent make them a body. In the ranking of these Bills, the first place is assigned to that which first past, and is to prevent and repress disorders in that day which God hath set apart for his own service and worship; 'à Jove principium.' Others, to punish and redress profane Cursing and Swearing, and the loathsome sin of Drunkenness. Another, an Explanation of the statute of the 3rd of your maj.'s happy reign, to disable Leases of your own two parts of convicted Recusants' lands, made to the benefit of the recusant, contrary to the true intent of the former law, and to revest the interest to your maj. the rather to reduce them to conformity and obedience, that have been long sick of a spiritual drunkenness.—Other Bills of Grace descending from your own goodness, that have been graciously pleased, as it were, to let fall some leaves from the flowers of your crown, for the ease and benefit of your people, and yet the flower continues fresh and entire. One or other hath moved from the goodness of our hopeful Prince, to clear doubts that might arise upon his highness's leases of the possessions of the Dutchy of Cornwall land, and to ratify the same the more to encourage his tenants to build. Another, the Continuance and establishing of divers Laws useful, that were but probations and repeals of divers more, that were as snares for greedy informers to work upon. Others are new remedies for such mischiefs as time hath discovered to need redress. These public bills are accompanied with some private ones, as colleges, hospitals, naturalizing your subjects and servants, the public bills expecting the joyful voice, 'Le Roy le veult;' the private bills attending, 'Soit fait come ce desire.'—Neither let it seem strange to your maj. that in a commonwealth so well compounded, there is yet some explanation of laws, alteration of some, 'Multa dies variusque labor, mutabilis qui vetulit in melius.' And the memory still lives of your famous progenitor king Edw. I. who, after his conquest of Wales, in his parl. saith of the laws and customs of that country, 'quasdem, &c.' 'Stability only attends the better life, but in all earthly things there is mutation and change.' And as in the first motion of the heavens there daily arise new aspects and conjunctions that alter the inferior planets; so, in kingdoms and commonwealths, new inconveniences are discerned, and might be dangerous if that they be not prevented. And as new diseases in the body require new medicines, so new diseases in the state must be cured by the remedy of good laws. Yea, in the commonwealth of Israel, which were God's people; and he gave them the law, the doubts arising were cleared from God's own mouth by Moses; as that for the punishment of the blasphemer, the gathering of sticks on the sabbath day, and the like.—And now, dear and dread sovereign, we the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parl. with bended knees of our hearts, do render all possible thanks to God, and to your maj. his lieutenant, for the blessing we enjoy in the continuance of the Word and Gospel amongst us, and our conservation in true religion: and it is our exceeding comfort that no jealousy nor mistaking hath bred any rupture or distraction amongst us, nor given cause to tell any thing in Gath, or in the tents of Ascalon, whereby the Philistines of Rome may rejoice, or the uncircumcised priests of Baal triumph; but that the true believers at home, and our neighbours and confederates abroad, may rejoice and sing a new Song of Joy, in seeing this happy turn to the affairs of Christendom, since our hopeful Prince's return, God having wrought light out of that darkness. 'It is the Lord's doing, and let it be marvellous in our eyes.'—But that we might be so happy to see the kingdom quiet, and those locusts the Jesuits and seminary Priests, that are enemies to monarchies, and wait for opportunity to do mischief, whose chief point of learning consists in flattery, and dividing of unity; and if this city that is your royal chamber, and other parts of your dominions were clear swept, and these Babylonish Achans taken out of the tents, your person and state would be more secure, and peace would be upon the Israel of God, and your subjects, laying aside 'de Tristibus,' might be more cheerfully sent home, with that good father st. Hillary in their hearts.—We do further acknowledge, with all humbleness and thankfulness, your maj.'s great favour to us, in the enjoyment of our antient Privileges, free Speech, and Freedom from Arrests and troubles. And that your maj. hath been graciously pleased, at our humble suit, to give often Access to your royal person; and by your own mouth made so clear an expression, of a benign interpretation of our proceedings.—And we further do most humbly acknowledge your gracious favour, that have, according to the latitude and bounty of your royal heart, and suitable to your own greatness and goodness, enlarged your general free Pardon beyond all times, whereby to some, who were dead by the justice of the law, a new charter of life and mercy is sealed; to others that be outlawed, and forfeited their goods, a restitution of grace is granted, old debts discharged, and the scores and reckonings cleared, cancelled, wardships ensuing, and not suing of liveries, and autre-le-maynes freed. And generally to all relaxation from many pains and penalties, to which, by errors and negligence, they were fallen.—And here, we do, in all humbleness, present to your maj. a free gift of 3 entire Subsidies and 3 entire Fifteenths, granted by the temporality, and a confirmation of Subsidies granted by the Clergy, which we have given with alacrity to those ends to which your maj. first propounded; and I hope God will direct your maj. to make your sword your shrieve to put your son-in-law in possession of his antient patrimony, or to make execution by way of Withernam of another as valuable. God is on our side in a good cause, 'Frangit et attollit vires in milite causa.'—I am out of my element, but the zeal and affection to the honour of my sovereign, and support of a branch of the royal blood, transports me, and will excuse me; which points of Supply no sooner came in proposition, but passed, not one dissenting. 'Hilari manu, celeri manu;' and, I may say, 'plena manu,' considering the speedy payment in this time of decay of trading, and the disvalue of the royal English silver mine of wools.—Accept, in some sort, dear sovereign, this present for the present, as a pledge of our unfeigned and loyal duties, and a testimony, as well of the professed service of our bodies, as of the entire subjection of our hearts. And now that your maj. hath given a liberal and large Pardon to all your people, give me leave to interest myself therein, and, with bended knees, to fall down at the foot of your favour for a particular pardon, and (quietus est) that may cover and quit my errors and defects; since, by the free choice of the house, and your maj.'s approbation, I underwent this charge. And that whatsoever, by my insufficiency and inabilities, hath given disadvantage to your service, may, by your goodness, be forgotten; and the faithful endeavours of your humble subject receive a gracious acceptance."

The King's Answer.] The King's Answer to the above Speech is very much curtailed in Rushworth, and only the heads of it are entered in the Lords' Journals. It has, however, been recovered from an old Manuscript Collection of parliamentary proceedings in this and the following reign, communicated by sir John Napier, of Bedfordshire, bart. to the Editors of the "Parliamentary or Constitutional History of England;" and is as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, and you the Gentlemen of the Lower House; I will begin with the end of Mr. Speaker's Speech, which was a presentation of the Subsidies, and the Thanks he gave me for allowing you your Privileges and Liberties, together with the free pardon of his own weakness. The Subsidies are granted to my grand-children, whose case, I must confess, is somewhat desperate: I pray God I may see that good end thereof that I wish, for I know not how it may please God to dispose of those things, whether peaceably, or by force, it may please him to repay unto me the wrong done unto them. But, as I said at first, so I pray again, I desire not to live; nay, I wish to God never to have been born, rather than such a blot should lie on me, as not to hope to see a restoration of the Palatinate, or at least a possibility of it, before God close up mine eyes. And I have sworn, that all you have allowed for the business, shall only and wholly be employed for that end; and, as God shall judge my soul, I never had any other meaning, if I had not been bound and limited thereunto. But as, on the other side, I assure myself, that, as yourselves will confess, here is nothing given for the relief of my estate, which all parliaments were wont to consider of; especially one that has lived in that necessity, and has had less supply from my people, than any of my predecessors, I know not how many hundred times before: so I assure you on the other side, you shall have a new session in the beginning of next winter, that then you may meet together, and consider how to supply my particular wants; and if you will be careful in this, as I assure myself you will, I will only employ it to the advancement of such government among you, as shall become a king, and to the increase more and more of the service of God, and restoring the patrimony of my children.—For the other point, I have reason, and truly, without compliment I do it, to thank you for my own person, and your particular behaviour to me at this time; concerning which I must needs say, that in all this session, neither in any days was it heard of; and, I think it is without example, that ever Lower House sat with that continual obedience to my person and honour; for in all your actions, you have given more true demonstrations hereof, than ever was given heretofore by Lower House: and for matter of scandal, it was no sooner moved among you, but it was dashed; avoided; all occasions that might be a blot of offence between me and my people; for which, as I said before, so now again, I thank you, without further compliment; and if it shall please you, when you shall return, to go on this way, this parl. shall be crowned with the greatest happiness that ever was held by a king.—But I must admonish you of some few things, and that I pray you take in good part. And that as touching Grievances, Mr. Solicitor made mention of some yesterday, when I was present, as I said to some of you; so now speak I to all of you, that you be not too ready to hunt out Grievances, where there is no cause; for I may say this, and say truly, that I never saw parl. that had lesser and smaller matter of grievances than you have had; I find most of them to be slight ones, which indeed makes my heart jovial. Now, as concerning your Grievances, be careful to present such as shall be general touching the commonwealth, trading, and corporations; and as it lies not in your power to raise and create Grievances, but upon just cause; so again you ought not to conclude or determine, and remedy, without first letting me have the hearing and allowing of it. I will go through all your Grievances, and weigh them fully; and, when I have done, you shall have a clear Answer to them, such a one as shall be agreeing to justice, and convenient to meet with the present necessities of my people. No Courtier's particular good shall be preferred to the subjects requests in general; and herein I will not take advice of myself, but I will canvass the business with the help of my privy council, and the judges counsel of the law. But now, amongst other grievances, I must tell you some of my grievances: one is concerning the manner and form of Buildings here in London; you have made a Grievance of it, and I am justly grieved at it; for, I protest to God, it hath been my only aim ever since I came into England, to make the city of London, the metropolis, the mother city of England; that I may say with the emperor, I had it straminium, but I leave it marmoreum. I care not for the grudges of many particular men, that are in very deed a shame to this kingdom. I marvel much you should condemn the commission, without hearing the commissioners: if they be too strict in their points, I pray you complain to me, and I will redress it, and give you ease. God knows I have no other end therein, but the welfare and honour of the kingdom.—Another cause of Grievance is concerning dr. Anion, master of Corpus Christi College in Oxford, whom you have called in question touching Church Matters: you had all of you, at the beginning of this parl. taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, whereby you have acknowledged me supreme head in ecclesiastical matters. I have referred that matter to the bishop of Winchester, who is visitor of that college, upon whose learning, gravity, and piety, I will rely in this case.—Another Grievance of mine is, that you have condemned the Patents of the Apothecaries in London. I myself did devise that corporation, and do allow it. The grocers, who complain of it, are but merchants; the mystery of these apothecaries, were belonging to apothecaries, wherein the grocers are unskilful; and therefore I think it fitting they should be a corporation of themselves. They bring home rotten wares from the Indies, Persia, and Greece; and here, with their mixtures, make waters, and sell such as belong to apothecaries, and think no man must controul them, because they are not apothecaries.—Another Grievance is concerning Books seditious and heretical. It is a shame that England should be the only place in the world to honour such books both popish on the one side, and puritan on the other: but, for this, I will provide there shall be such overseers, that may prevent their coming into print, and those that are in print already, to suppress them. No man shall be more desirous to fulfil your desire in this point than I will.—And lastly, touching my Patents in general, I am grieved that you have called them in and condemned them upon so short examination. I confess I might have passed some upon false suggestion and wrong information; but you are not to recall them before they be examined by the judges. And here I have heard it complained of by divers of my learned counsel in the law, that you will from time to time, delaying the patentees, still call for patents without just ground; and so put the subjects still to more charge, and so consequently put a scorn upon my patents.—Therefore I advise you to be careful, that you have a good ground before you call for your patents, that you do not defraud the patentees; hereupon falls out that which I spake to the face of many here present, the Lawyers, of all the people of the land, are the greatest Grievance to my subjects; for when the case is good for neither party, yet it proves good and beneficial to them: therefore this I say to you when you judge of patents, hear patiently, say not presently, it is against the law, for patents are not to be judged unlawful by you.—I must first believe myself and my council, and then you are to give your opinions of the conveniences that may ensue thereupon. And now I pray you take in good part my thanks and admonitions both; and I assure myself you will take my fatherly admonitions, as well as my thanks, in good part, as you ought to do from a king, who ever was, and still will be the father of your country."

The Lord Keeper's Answer to the Speaker's Speech.] Then the Lord Keeper, conferring first (as the manner is) with his majesty, addressed the Speaker thus:

"Mr. Speaker; I am no way prepared to give Answer to your speech, nor endeavour I to do the same; but, because some philosophers say, that a viol well tuned, hanging upon the walls, and a man touching another, he shall hear that which hangeth upon a wall will give assent to the same harmony; so I can but say something to every of them, and give assent to that sweet harmony of yours. You have spoken of Unanimity, of the King's Grace in asking your advice, and following of it; of the Suffrages of the People in making of Laws; of his maj.'s royal assent; of Swearing; of the Sabbath and Drunkenness, especially in such time of Grace; and so particularly you have returned thanks to his maj. for free Access, and of the large Pardon, and of Priests and Jesuits; of the Subsidies, and of the Palatinate; and of your own behaviour to these particulars, that his maj. hath not answered, I will touch in a word.—For the Unanimity of both houses, it must be attributed solely to the goodness of Almighty God, that work of the Holy Ghost, who was the author of that Unanimity; for God the Holy Ghost, much about this time, fell amongst the Apostles in one place assembled, Acts i. 2. that they were all of one mind and of one assent: so where there is this Unanimity, there is the Holy Ghost, who is the author of it. 2dly. In asking your Advice and following of it, you attribute it to the goodness of the king: and it cannot be denied, for he hath gone beyond all precedents. 3dly. Touching the Suffrages of the People in making of Laws, it is convenient, yea, it makes the people, as st. Paul saith, to be without excuse; for of the law it is said to be a common consent and a covenant; for when God delivered the law by Moses to his people, he takes their consent, Ex. xxiv. 3. whatsoever the Lord said to them they gave approbation to it. 4thly. For the Royal Assent, it is a thing so proper to law-making and giving, that the sceptre is joined to the law-giver: you may remember the promise of the Messias, Gen. xli. 10. 'That the sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet.' Indeed it is best for the people, that this royal assent is in his maj. and not in themselves; for many times it falls out with the assent of kings as it doth with God; for Almighty God many times doth not grant those petitions we do ask.—Now, God and the king doth imitate the physician and a king; they will not give that which they desire, because that they know how to fit their patients and subjects with better things than they do desire. I will put you in mind of two precedents out of the Book of God, in my own profession; the first is in 1 Kings, ii. 20. There is a precedent of Bathsheba putting up a petition to king Solomon for Adonijah, and she desired that the king would not deny her; he bids her, ‘Ask on, my mother, for I will not say thee nay’ yet he denied her petition; and though it was denied, yet she had her intention for it was only to give contentment to Adonijah. The second is out of the New Testament, 2 Cor. xii. 7. where st. Paul saith ‘that a prick of the flesh was a hindrance to him in the performance of good things;’ now he puts up his petition to God, to remove this from him that was such an hindrance unto him. Now this was a public bill for himself and others by his prayer; now God refuseth this his petition, and gives him a better gift: for the Lord gives him grace. And so it fares with kings in giving of their royal assent, for many times they do reject some of their petitions; but yet, in other things, gives them a far more liberal assent than the ydid desire by their petitions. 5thly. For those Bills of Grace; they are so, because it comes from the Grace of his maj. and they do flow from his royalty. As for the bill of grace for the Prince who is grace itself, and must be full of goodness, if that he be the son of such a gracious father. 6thly. Thanks to his maj. 1st, for the Privilege to your Houses; 2nd, you give thanks for such free Access to his maj.; These are without precedents; for, indeed, those kings that have not such large endowments, are not so easy to have access unto. But we may say of his maj. as one said of his son, that as often as he did see him he did admire him, and bless God for him. 7thly. For the Proclamation against the Priests and Jesuits, we have just cause to give God and the king thanks for it. It is your care that be in places and office, to look to the execution of the same, and that it be not said of us as it was said of Rome, That although they be banished out of the commonwealth, yet they will be lurking up and down in corners; therefore they are to be found out by you, and to be punished. For the Subsidies tendered to his maj. you are therein to give me leave to tell you a short story from Macrobius: when one had paid a great subsidy to Augustus, and in acceptance he sent him a letter, and nothing writ therein but this, ‘mihi nihil,’ there was nothing to him. And although there is no part of it which returns to his private gain, yet his maj. thanks you for this care that you have for the honour of religion, and the honour of his kingdom, and for the regaining of his son-in-law’s inheritance; and for the palatinate, his maj. will omit no way for the regaining of it. Now, for your own excusing of yourself; you have done nothing in this session to be accused for, and his maj. thinks that the general pardon, being so large, will serve the turn; then you need no particular favour.

The lord keeper, having ended his speech, the clerk of the crown stood up and read the Titles of the Bills passed both houses; and the clerk of the parl. read his maj.’s Answer to each Bill, which being done, his maj. remembered “the breaking up of three former parliaments together, and the happy conclusion of this session;” and put the Commons again in mind, “that at their next meeting they do so carry themselves, that this parliament may be as happily continued to the end.”

Death of the King.] After all which was concluded, the lord keeper of the great seal, by his maj.’s command, prorogued this present parl. to the 2d of Nov. next ensuing. At which time it was again prorogued, by commission, to the 16th of Feb. following; from thence to the 15th of March; and, lastly, to the 20th of April, 1625. Before which last date, viz. on the 27th of March, in the same year, king James died; by whose death this parliament was finally dissolved.

REVENUE OF JAMES I.

For the following Sketch of the State of the Revenue during the Reign of James I. we are indebted to Sir John Sinclair’s valuable History of the Public Revenue of the British Empire, 3rd Edition, Vol. I. p. 232.

“1. Demesnes.—Though almost every reign, since William the Norman sat upon the throne, had been productive of some diminution of the landed property of the crown, yet it still continued to be of considerable value. The nominal rent was small, (amounting, at James’s accession, to the sum of only 32,000l. per ann.); it was well known, however, to be worth more; and indeed it afterwards yielded about 80,000l. a year. An attempt was made, in the beginning of this reign, to procure a strict entail of the crown lands, on the king and his successors for ever: but a bill for that purpose, though passed by the lords, was rejected by the commons; and James, finding no obstruction to the sale of those lands, continued the practice, and raised by that means no less a sum than 775,000l.”

“2. Feudal Prerogatives.—The rights which the king enjoyed as lord paramount, still remained a badge of the feudal slavery of the English. Purveyance in particular was carried to such a height, that the officers of the crown compelled the people to take for their commodities whatever price they chose to offer; and all the feudal prerogatives had become so intolerable that parliament proposed to settle an independent revenue on the crown in their stead. An agreement was likely to have been entered into, at the rate of 200,000l. a year; when, in consequence of disputes be-

"3. Feudal Aids.—The reign of James furnishes us with the last example in the English history, of any aid being levied on the knight- ing of the king's eldest son, and the marriage of his eldest daughter. The act on which the first claim was founded, though of a very old date, had been frequently carried into execution by James's predecessors; and Henry, the prince of Wales, was such a favourite with the people, and the whole was managed with such moderation, that it yielded a considerable sum (21,800*l.*) The other tax, on the marriage of James's daughter to the Elector Palatine, produced 20,500*l.* It is remarked, that a century had elapsed since this aid had been demanded; no opportunity having occurred since the reign of Henry 7. whose eldest daughter Margaret was married to James 4. of Scotland; in consequence of which alliance, James himself inherited the crown of England."

"4. Customs.—The first parliament that James assembled, granted him, according to former practice, the duties of tunnage and poundage for life. But the more productive this branch of the revenue became, the greater anxiety did the crown feel, to enjoy it in its own right, without the necessity of any application to parl. Thence originated the dispute, so warmly contested between James and his commons, with regard to the power of levying customs, and of adding to the rates of the duties that were imposed. The payment of customs by natives, at least to any amount, certainly originated in the grants of parl.; but the crown had so long received these duties, that it began to consider the customs as a permanent branch of its revenue. Both Mary and Elizabeth had shown James the example, of altering the rates on some particular commodities. The same practice he intended to pursue, and to carry to a considerable height, though he was at first cautious not to give umbrage by any important alteration. But the commons took fire at the principle, foreseeing to what lengths it might be extended; and, indeed, passed a bill, abolishing these additional impositions, which the house of lords thought proper to reject. The next parl. was proceeding to take similar steps, when it was suddenly dissolved; and thus the dispute remained undetermined in this monarch's reign. The amount of the Customs was rapidly increasing. At James's accession they yielded only 127,000*l.* a year. The following is a state of their produce, anno 1613:

At the port of London.

Inwards -	48,250	1	9

Outwards -	£.25,471	19	7	} 38,502	9	4
Inwards -	13,030	9	9

And, towards the close of this reign, they amounted to about 190,000*l.* The disproportion between London and the out-ports is very great; and proves, how considerable a share of the commerce of this country, has uniformly centered in the capital."

"5. Grants.—The Grants received by king James, during the whole course of his reign, were only as follows:

A. D.	Year of reign.	Subs.	Fift.
1621	- 18 -	2	0

These were all the Supplies granted by parl.; and of these, it is said by Hume, that the 3 subsidies and three 15ths, granted anno 1624, amounting to about 300,000*l.* being paid to parliamentary commissioners, ought not to be stated to the king's personal account. But this idea has been fully refuted by Mr. Macaulay, who remarks that, though the commissioners received the money, yet they were totally ignorant how it was expended; and as they were obliged to answer all money draughts made upon them by the crown, their power was merely nominal. "One penny of this money, (the king declared,) shall not be bestowed but in sight of your committees: but whether I shall send two thousand, or ten thousand, whether by sea or land, east or west, by diversion or otherwise, by invasion upon the Bavarian, or the Emperor, you must leave that to your king." It appears that a subsidy produced about 70,000*l.* and a 15th about 36,500*l.*; consequently, the whole parliamentary grants received by James, amounted to about a million. To this, there are to be added about 12 subsidies from the clergy, which, at 20,000*l.* each, would produce 240,000*l.*; and one of the clerical subsidies was at the rate of 6, and not of 4*s.* in the pound; and therefore yielded 10,000*l.* additional. One year with another, it is probable that he received, by parliamentary and clerical grants, about 60,000*l.* per ann. during the whole course of his reign."

"6. Sale of Honours.—James had a price affixed to each rank of nobility, on the payment of which a grant was made out. The dignities of Baron, Viscount, and Earl, might be bought at the rate of 10, 15, and 20,000*l.* and we are told of four earls, who purchased their respective patents, at the sum fixed upon, in one year. But the most complete instance of this mode of raising money, either in the reign of James, or, indeed, in the English history, is the creation of baronets. The plan was carried into execution anno 1611: each baronet, by way of purchase for the honour, became bound to maintain 30 foot soldiers for 3 years, at 8*d.* a day each, to assist the king's troops in the reduction of Ulster in Ireland. The price consequently was 1095*l.* Ninety-three were created, the sale of whose patents yielded 98,550*l.*"

"7. Monopolies.—Among the other sources of dissention between James and his parliaments, that which respected Monopolies was of peculiar importance, being equally connected with the commerce and the revenue of the country. The king had annulled, of his own accord, all patents for monopolies by which any species of domestic industry was fettered: but all foreign trade, that of France excepted, was possessed by exclusive companies; and hence the navigation and commerce of the kingdom were every day sensibly diminishing. At last an act was passed, by which all monopolies were condemned as contrary to law, and the known liberties of the people: an act which ought for ever to have put an end to so destructive a grievance."

"8. Loans.—As early as 1604, James had begun the dangerous practice, of compelling his subjects to lend him money on the security of the privy seal: but it is not known, how much he then procured, or whether any part of it was repaid: 200,000*l.* were afterwards extorted under the same pretence. James's opinion on the subject, he took no pains to conceal: for when the commons petitioned, that no man should be enforced to lend money, or to give a reason why he would not, the king returned for answer, that in matters of loans, he would refuse no reasonable excuse; but that he did not wish to have his conduct directed, by precedents drawn from the reigns of usurping princes, or a people too bold and wanton."

"9. Benevolences.—James exacted, anno 1613, a sum to the amount of 52,000*l.* under the name of a Benevolence; but so small an advantage, was certainly no compensation for the odium and unpopularity of the measure. Nor was he much more successful in his second attempt: for though the case was said to be so urgent, that it could not brook the delays that would attend assembling the parl.; and though it was collected to support the popular cause of the Elector Palatine, yet the people, anxious to discourage so pernicious a practice, at first very slowly and reluctantly contributed."

"10. Money from the Dutch.—The necessities to which this monarch was reduced, made him conclude a treaty with the States of Holland, on terms, in a pecuniary view, indeed, rather beneficial to himself, though, on the whole, not a little favourable to the New Republic. It has already been stated, that the Dutch were indebted to Elizabeth to the amount of 800,000*l.* Of this sum 200,000*l.* had been paid to James, and he was to receive the remainder at the rate of 40,000*l.* per ann. until the whole was discharged. But the payment depended upon a very uncertain contingency, namely, the continuation of a truce concluded between Spain and the United Provinces. The politic Elizabeth, had been put in possession of the important fortresses of Flushing, the Brille, and Rammekins, as a security for her debt: but the expences of the garrisons, (which England was obliged to support,) amounted to 26,000*l.* a year: consequently, 14,000*l.* was all the clear profit that accrued from the annual payment; and the whole sum which the king could possibly receive, in the space of 15 years, after defraying the necessary charges, was only 210,000*l.* The Dutch, however, being anxious fully to establish their independence, which remained insecure, whilst these important fortresses, the very keys of their country continued in the hands of England, offered to take the garrisons into their own pay, and to give James 250,000*l.* for the immediate possession. The terms were accepted; and from the day on which these cautionary towns were evacuated, the complete establishment of the Dutch republic may be dated. Nor was this the only money that James inherited from his predecessor. He also received 60,000*l.* of the debt which Henry IV. of France owed to that princess."

"11. Licence for Fishing.—Anno 1608, the Dutch were compelled to pay an acknowledgment for the Liberty of Fishing on the British coasts: a source of revenue which was attempted to be more fully enforced during the ensuing reign."

"12. Fines.—The last source of James's wealth, arose from the heavy Fines which it was then customary to inflict: 40,000*l.* were imposed upon the earl of Northumberland, and the lords Mordaunt and Stourton, who were suspected of having some knowledge of the famous gunpowder plot, and of concealing it from the king and his ministers. Sir John Bennet, judge of the prerogative court, was fined 20,000*l.* The celebrated chancellor Bacon was sentenced to pay 40,000*l.* which however was remitted. The earl of Suffolk, who held the office of lord high treasurer, was fined 30,000*l.* by the court of Star-chamber; and the earl of Middlesex, in consequence of a parliamentary impeachment, was condemned to pay 50,000*l.*"

"Amount of his Revenue.—A particular account has been published of James's Revenue, during the first 14 years of his reign, from which it appears, that his ordinary income did not exceed 450,863*l.*: that the extraordinary sums he had received during that time, amounted to 2,200,000*l.* and that his ordinary disbursements exceeded his permanent income 36,617*l.* a year. Anno 1610, lord Salisbury declared in parliament, that the king was burdened with a great and urgent debt of 300,000*l.* His income, from all the different sources above enumerated, was probably about 600,000*l.* though his permanent revenue, including the grants of parliament, could not much exceed 500,000*l.* a year; especially as, during the latter part of his reign, he had some reason to complain of the parsimony of his commons. But that sum was sufficient to carry on the government of England, in those days, under a frugal monarch, and in peaceful times, though very inadequate to the splendid manner in which James wished to live, and to those plans of hostility against the house of Austria, into which the commons would willingly have plunged him."

*“ Lottery.—*The first Lottery to any amount, ever known in England, at least drawn under the sanction of public authority, was in this reign. The profit of it was principally dedicated to defray the expences attending the establishment of our settlements in America; to retain the dominion of which, the produce of so many lotteries, loans, and taxes, has since been so ineffectually expended.”

*“ Coin.—*The quantity of specie coined in the reign of James, was about 5,432,000*l.* of which 3,666,000*l.* was in gold, and only 1,765,000*l.* in silver. It still continued to be the practice to issue some base money for the use of Ireland.”

Price of Provisions during the Reign of James I.

By a proclamation issued in the reign of this monarch, establishing public magazines, whenever wheat fell below 32*s.* a quarter, rye below 18, and barley below 16, the commissioners were empowered to purchase Corn for the magazines. The usual bread of the poor was at this time made of barley. The best Wool during the greater part of James' reign, was at 33*s.* a tod.
